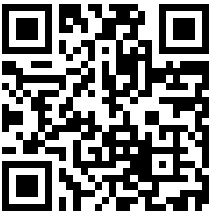
This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google™ books

https://books.google.com



603356739%

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE

FOR HOME AND SUNDAY READING.

VOL. 5. OCTOBER, 1900. No. 1.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

"BE GOOD!"

LONDON: HORACE MARSHALL & SON, TEMPLE HOUSE, TEMPLE AVENUE, E.C.

Cadbury's Cocoa

Absolutely Pure, Therefore Best.

"The Standard of Highest Purity."

—The Lancet.

Digitized by Google

You can discover it for yourselves.
Don't wait for your friends to remark on your yellow and sallow complexion.
Seek relief in time with a BOX-ER two of BEECHAM'S PILLS.

Digitized by Google

The
'Allenburys' Foods.

A PROGRESSIVE DIETARY, suited to the growing digestive powers.

YOUNG INFANTS thrive and sleep well, and are contented and happy, being saved from the disorders and digestive troubles common to those fed on farinaceous foods, condensed milk, or even cow's milk.

Milk Food No. 1. Milk Food No. 2. Malted Food No. 3.

FOR INFANTS FROM

Birth to three months of age. — Three to six months. — Six months and upwards.

Pamphlet on Infant Feeding and Management FREE.

Allen & Hanburys Ltd., Plough Court, Lombard Street, London.

BORD'S PIANOS

25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (second-hand, 10s. 6d. per month) on the Three Years' System. — Lists free of C. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C. PIANOS EXCHANGED.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

These magnificent Pianos for Hire on the Three Years' System, at advantageous prices and terms.—List and particulars free of CHAS. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

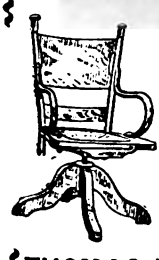
GIVES ABSOLUTE SATISFACTION.

Why not make yourself a Present of an American

"DERBY" Roll-Top Desk?



The "Derby" Desk is quite the Finest in the World. Every portion is made under the personal supervision of the Originator. We both recommend and guarantee it. It has a Roll-Top, which locks all the drawers automatically when shut down; full of convenient pigeon-holes, etc. Elegant, Useful, and Durable. Invaluable in the Private Study and the office.

A large variety of Specialities in Library and Office Appliances always in Stock. All Goods are of Superior make and Device. Quality to suit the most exacting.

Elastic Bookcases, Revolving Bookcases, Flat-Top Desks, Ideal Filing Cabinets, Tilting Chairs, &c.

FREE.—Any reader of THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE can have one of our Handsome Illustrated No. 92 Desk Catalogues on application.

THOMAS TURNER (Leicester) LTD.,
44, HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON, E.C.
Birmingham and Leicester.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

ZOX

is the discovery of a London Chemist, who found it of marked benefit to convalescents from Influenza. So popular did it quickly become amongst his customers that it was found necessary to arrange for its extended sale. The rapid popularity of ZOX is solely owing to its merits as a Reliever of Pain; it is Simple, Pure, and Quite Harmless. To enable you to test the truth of these statements, send stamped addressed envelope, and two FREE SAMPLE POWDERS will be sent per return. Mention TEMPLE MAGAZINE. You will then understand why so many letters arrive testifying to the speedily effected in case of pain.

CURES

Neuralgia, Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, Gout, Rheumatism, and all Nerve Pains relieved speedily. A ZOX POWDER will be found a most handy remedy.

Ulceby.—The Rev. Henry Cox will thank the Zox Co. to send a 2/6 box of ZOX POWDER by return of post. They are most efficacious in relieving acute NEURALGIA.

1/- and 2/6 per Box, of all Chemists, or post free from ZOX COMPANY, 11, HATTON GARDEN, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

FOR MOTHERS AND DAUGHTERS.

ANTIPATHY TO FLOWERS.

It is a curious fact that, although flowers minister such infinite pleasure and delight to man, there are some unfortunate individuals to whom, either, it may be, from natural aversion or from constitutional weakness, certain flowers or their perfumes cause discomfort and even physical suffering. It is related, for instance, of Mary de Medicis (some historians say it was the infamous Queen Catherine), that she could not endure the sight of a rose even in a painting, and that Cardinal de Guise would almost faint if the same flower were brought near him. Many people are affected by the overpowering scent of the lilac and jonquil; the marshmallow has been known to cause hysterics, and the smell of saffron fainting fits; while the blossoms of the lobelia occasionally induce a feeling of suffocation, and in one well-authenticated case even death is said to have resulted where a person had incautiously remained shut up in an apartment where there was an oleander in full bloom. Happily, such strange antipathies are the exception, not the rule.

ROYAL GARTERS.

The heirs of the estate of the late Count Einsiedeln, who was one of the richest noblemen in Germany, and whose family have always been great collectors, have offered the Royal Museum of Berlin a unique collection of garters. It is not merely a series of common or garden garters—far from it. It is a Royal collection, and contains a warrantable exhibit from the wardrobe of almost every princess and queen that Germany has boasted. And best of all, as the catalogue naïvely mentions, each sample has been come by so that it can never bring the blush of shame to the cheek of innocence.

LOOKING UP.

Looking back may show us where we have failed to do as well as we could, or it may remind us that we have done better than we are now doing. Looking forward may suggest to us that we can do better than we have done in the past, or it may encourage us to see possibilities of our doing in the future beyond anything we have thought of until now. Looking up may indicate what God would have us do, and that may be better for us than either regret for shortcomings or encouragement to better doing. Our duty as God shows it to us, that should be our aim, rather than an improvement on our past, or our highest conceivable attainment in time to come.

LADY ROBERTS'S INGENUITY.

A capital story is told of Lady Roberts's "grit," if such an expression be permissible in the case of a lady. When she arrived at Capetown she defied all red-tape regulations and took with her to Bloemfontein eight large trunks. She had to overcome many transport difficulties on the long journey, but eventually arrived safely with her luggage at the capital of the conquered country In all likelihood the question occurred to the railway authorities why, under the circumstances, Lady Roberts inconvenienced herself (and other people) with such a large number of boxes. When opened, however, seven of them were found to contain comforts for ailing and wounded Tommies; one small trunk sufficed to hold her personal belongings.

"The more one has to do, the more one is capable of doing, even beyond our proper path." The diligent man cuts out time and opportunity for whatever work he sets his mind on doing; it is the idle man who "can't find time."

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

THE NEW AUTUMN COAT.

In the latest shape we have indeed a novelty, and I wonder how many of my readers have seen it? The style of the little coat reminds one forcibly of the bolero to which we have clung so long. It is, however, an altogether more serviceable garment. It is arranged to button right over in front, almost in double-breasted style. The points are carried down some three or four inches below the waist. The back of the coat, however, is just as short as the Eton proper, and even slightly clears the waist, quite at the centre. Such a coat is now being made in fine and thick cloths of every colour. Black, however, is, I think, the smartest, for the revers and collar can then be faced with white cloth, brocade, or silk, and the edges trimmed and strapped with black and white braid. A coat of the kind costs anything between one and two guineas, and can doubtless be made at home to match the skirt, if a colour is preferred. With such a coat a fairly light-looking hat can be worn in the early autumn. The jam-pot crown is still as fashionable as ever. Indeed, the crowns to our hats seem to be getting higher and higher, while a pretty fashion is that of strapping the crown round and round with black velvet. The brim can be draped with black velvet, spangled tulle, or chiffon, while two or three good ostrich tips should be added, and a bunch of autumn flowers and colored leaves set underneath the side of the brim, which turns up from the hair.

"DO YOUR POSSIBLE."

Some men are invincible by nature. No failure can break them down. After a life of cloud and storm, with scarcely a ray of sunshine to brighten it, they die facing fate defiantly. This constitutional indomitability is a fine thing. It is the attribute of the highest type of manhood, and if not always a guarantee of success in life it is certainly, humanly speaking, more likely, when combined with integrity, to attain success than any other quality with which man is endowed. But there are thousands of men of superior intellect who are deficient in this glorious gift. Who cannot call to mind some individual of this class who, after battling manfully against perverse circumstances for a time, at last gave up, acknowledged himself beaten, and tacitly admitted that his life was a miserable failure? Many a man has thus broken down, when one more vigorous essay would have tided him over his difficulties, brought him into smooth water, and enabled him to snap his fingers triumphantly at a world which scarcely bestowed a pitying look on him as he threw up his arms and ceased to struggle. Certain dismal moralists tell us that it is unwise to view the world through rose-coloured glass; that our surroundings are "all a fleeting show, for man's illusion given." But we maintain that it is always best to look at the bright side of things, if they have one, and if they have not, to believe that they will have if we persistently try to light them up. This is the creed in which every boy should be educated. Let the young be taught to trust in Providence and themselves, and to fight adverse circumstances to the last gasp. In a large majority of such gladiatorial combats, he who thus "champions fate to the uttermost" wins the day; and at the worst it is a consolation in defeat to feel that nothing man could do to secure victory has been left undone. Never think of breaking down before any impediments. Think only of breaking over them. Let difficulty find you, as the Scotch say, always ready to "do your possible."

Let the winds and waves of adversity blow and dash around you if they will; but keep on the path of rectitude, and you will be as firm as a rock. Plant yourself upon principle, and bid defiance to misfortune.

Digitized by Google

TURKISH BATHS AT HOME.

Everybody has known something of the value of Turkish baths, but only a few could afford them. Those few kept well—kept mind and body up to the highest vigour. The rest let impurities accumulate; and often the end was a wreck. Then the victim goes to a sanitarium or elsewhere to let Turkish Baths cure what they might have prevented.

With a CENTURY FOLDING CABINET you can now take Turkish baths at home at a cost of 1½d. per bath. You can keep well and cure yourself, so far as Turkish baths can do it. In most ills nothing can do more. Nobody is so poor nor so remote that he cannot enjoy the luxury of the Roman bath. Nobody can keep clean or vigorous or maintain a clear complexion without it. Some kind of blood poison is the cause of nearly all ill-health. A poisonous acid in the blood causes rheumatism. Other poisons wreck the nerves. Nicotine weakens the smoker's heart. Blood impurity shows in a thousand ways, and unless one forces the poison out through the pores, it must go through the kidneys, and the tax breaks the kidneys down.

The quick, powerful, certain way to remove these impurities is by forcing them out through the pores. Nobody can doubt that.

Add to this the luxury, the comforting, sleep-bringing, vim-producing qualities. Add cleanliness and clearness of complexion. Add their service in stopping all colds at once. The pleasure of life may be doubled and sickness reduced more than half by the habit of Turkish Bathing.

PRICE complete with Spirit heater and Vaporizer
25/- to 70/-
Free 35 Formulas for Medicated Baths.

THE CENTURY THERMAL BATH CABINET

Is guaranteed to be the best on the market. It is built on a steel frame with Hygienic Waterproof Cloth and folds up like a screen into 2-inch space, weighs 20lbs. The top consists of four flaps or curtains and admits of four distinct temperatures. We sell on 15 days' trial (to be returned if not as represented).

The FACE STEAMER used with Cabinet gives beautiful complexion and cures Colds, Bronchitis, Asthma. SAMPLE OF GOODS, and Valuable Book, sent FREE on receipt of Address. WRITE TO-DAY.

AGENTS WANTED. Exclusive Rights.

CENTURY THERMAL BATH CABINET Limited, Dept. L.P. 203 & 205, REGENT ST. (Late Regent House), LONDON, W.

Hair Destroyed.

Send me an envelope (stamped and addressed) and I will tell you how to remove all superfluous hair free of charge. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Miss B. O. (Room 3), 105, Oxford Street, London, W.

L & C HARDTMUTHS
"KOH-I-NOOR" PENCILS
THE BEST

The "Osman"
Turkish Towels and Bath Mats.

OF ALL DRAPERS.

Made by
BARLOW & JONES, Limited,
Manchester, London, & Bolton.

Benger's Food
FOR INFANTS, INVALIDS, & THE AGED.

Sold by Chemists, &c., everywhere.

Published by special permission of the Russian Court.

"Balmoral Castle,
"Scotland,
"25th Sept.

"Sirs,—Please forward to Balmoral Castle one dozen 2/6 Tins of BENGER'S FOOD for H.I.M. THE EMPRESS OF RUSSIA, addressed to Miss Coster. We have received the box ordered from Peterhoff.

"Yours truly,
"F. COSTER."

Digitized by Google

ABOUT EVENING FROCKS.

The evening dress of to-day is to all appearance severely plain. Yet it is necessary to look into these gowns, for we all know that such simplicity generally means the work of an artist. Indeed, the absolutely simple and flat appearance of our evening bodices must fain be relieved with the most beautiful and elaborate embroideries and passementeries. It is, however, possible to buy these elaborate trimmings for a gown ready made. Most of the big and well-known trimming warehouses in London provide a perfect feast of colour and design. Breast-plates, berthe, shoulder-straps, whole panels and stomachers are sold either in sets or separately, and the amateur may then do up a frock which has seen its best days by means of such possessions, and this, too, at a remarkably low cost.

That which becomes a habit in us most easily is the will. Learn then, to will once, to will strongly and decisively. Thus fix your floating life, and leave it no longer to be drifted hither and thither, like a withered leaf, by every wind that blows.

A FEW THINGS TO LEARN.

Someone has suggested a few things that every girl can learn before she is twelve. Not everyone can learn to play or sing or paint well enough to give pleasure to her friends, but the following "accomplishments" are within everybody's reach: Shut the door, and shut it softly. Keep your own room in tasteful order. Have an hour for rising, and rise. Never let a button stay off twenty-four hours. Always know where your things are. Never let a day pass without doing something to make somebody comfortable. Learn to make bread as well as cake. Never go about with your shoes unbuttoned.

WHERE DOES DEW COME FROM?

Ground, a little below the surface, is always warmer than the air over it. So long as the surface of the ground is above the dew point, vapour must rise and pass from the earth into the air. The moist air so formed will mingle with the air above it, and its moisture will be condensed, forming dew wherever it comes in contact with a surface cooled below the dew point. In fact, dew rises from the ground. Place some metal trays over the grass, the soil, and the road on dewy nights. You will generally find more moisture on the grass inside the trays than outside; you will always observe a deposit of dew inside the trays, even when there is none outside at all. This shows that far more vapour rises out of the ground during the night than condenses as dew on the grass and other objects. Dew, then, rises from the ground. But how is the dew formed on bodies high up in the air? Dew does not rise in particles, as it was once considered, to fall in particles like fine rain. It rises in vapour. Some is caught by what is on the surface of the earth, but the rest ascends in vapour form until it comes in contact with a much colder surface, to condense it into moisture. The vapour does not flow upward in a uniform stream, but is mixed in the air by eddies and wind currents, and carried to bodies far from where it rose. In fact, dew may be deposited even though the country for many miles all round be dry and incapable of yielding any vapour. In such cases the supply of vapour to form that dew would depend on the evaporation of the dew, and on what was wafted over by the winds.

The richest man is not the one who has the most, but the one who can be most thankful for the least.

Digitized by Google

Gregorian Church and Chapel Organs

"A special word to the Church with limited funds having Cathedral-organ desires."

I have much pleasure in stating my opinion that the Gregorian is in all respects the most perfect instrument of its kind extant.

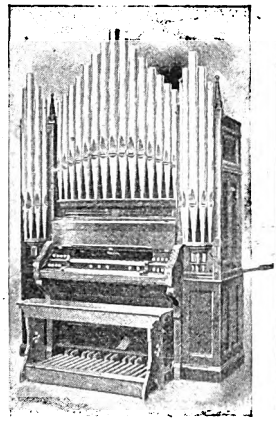
Each stop possesses a distinct individuality of its own, yet, when used in combination with others, they all blend most satisfactorily. The intonation is uniformly good, and the wind is distributed in a manner to insure prompt and perfect "speech" throughout the entire compass of the keyboards under all circumstances—a result never before accomplished in this connection.

The quality and tone is exquisitely pure, and so closely resembles that produced by "flue" pipes as to frequently deceive even the educated ear of an expert; and for this reason the Gregorian is an adequate substitute for a small pipe-organ. This attribute does not, however, detract from its value as a household solo instrument.

Faithfully yours,
FREDERIC ARCHER, Organist.

The Gregorian

system of organ-building enables us to build in compact form and at small cost organs which are veritable reproductions of the cathedral organ. Write us for Catalogue and any information desired regarding the instruments. Even should the outlook for an organ fund not be encouraging, if you need a new organ, write us. Nearly 4,000 Gregorian Organs now in use.



STYLE 22.

The Orchestrelle Company, 225 Regent Street, London, W.

Chatto & Windus's New Books.

The Fourth Generation. By Sir WALTER BESANT, Author of "The Orange Girl," &c. Crown 8vo., cloth, gilt top, 6s.

The Man that Corrupted Hadleyburg, and other Stories and Sketches. By MARK TWAIN. With a Frontispiece by LUCIUS HITCHCOCK. Crown 8vo., cloth, gilt top, 6s.

Philip Winwood: A Sketch of the Domestic History of an American Captain in the War of Independence. By ROBERT NEILSON STEPHENS, Author of "An Enemy to the King." With 6 Illustrations by E. W. D. HAMILTON. Crown 8vo., cloth, gilt top, 6s.

As Luck would Have it. By WILLIAM WESTALL, Author of "With the Red Eagle," &c. Crown 8vo., cloth, gilt top, 6s.

In a Cathedral City. By BERTHA THOMAS, Author of "The Son of the House." SECOND EDITION. Crown 8vo., cloth, gilt top, 6s. Oct. 4.

The Bag of Diamonds and Three Bits of Paste. By GEORGE MANVILLE FENN, Author of "A Crimson Crime," &c. Crown 8vo., cloth, gilt top, 6s. Oct. 11.

The "Pretty Polly": a Voyage of Incident. By W. CLARK RUSSELL, Author of "The Wreck of the 'Grosvenor,'" &c. With 12 Illustrations by G. E. ROBERTSON. Small demy 8vo., cloth, gilt edges, 5s.

A Sugar Princess. By ALBERT ROSS, Author of "Stranger than Friction," &c. Crown 8vo., cloth, 3s. 6d. Oct. 4.

The Adventures of Tyler Tatlock, Private Detective. Related by DICK DONOVAN, Author of "A Detective's Triumphs," &c. Crown 8vo., cloth, 3s. 6d. Shortly.

The Waters of Edera. By OUIDA, Author of "Under Two Flags," &c. Crown 8vo., cloth, 3s. 6d.

The Conquest of Plassans. By EMILE ZOLA. Crown 8vo., cloth, 3s. 6d.

NEW 3/6 EDITIONS.

Infatuation. By B. M. CROKER.
An Adventuress. By L. T. MEADE.
Under False Pretences. By ADELINE SERGEANT.

A History of Our Own Times, from 1880 to the Diamond Jubilee. By JUSTIN MCCARTHY, M.P. A NEW EDITION, uniform with the first four volumes of the CABINET EDITION. Crown 8vo., cloth, 6s. Shortly.

With the Red Eagle. By WILLIAM WESTALL.

Mary Unwin. By ALAN ST. AUBYN. With 6 Illustrations by PERCY TARRANT.

London Memories: Social, Historical, and Topographical. By C. W. HECKETHORN, Author of "London Souvenirs," &c. Crown 8vo., cloth, gilt top, 6s. Nov. 1.

NEW SIXPENNY BOOKS, now ready. Medium 8vo., picture covers.

The New Magdalen. By WILKIE COLLINS.
Held in Bondage. By OUIDA.
The Old Factory. By WILLIAM WESTALL.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

Digitized by Google

..The..
OCTOBER WIDE WORLD MAGAZINE

PRICE 6d. Is Now on Sale Everywhere. PRICE 6d.

THE ONLY MAGAZINE OF ITS KIND IN THE WORLD.

SOME OF THE CONTENTS:—

A CLIMATIC MIRACLE IN CALIFORNIA.—With Extraordinary Photos.
ADVENTURES OF A LADY MISSIONARY IN CHINA.
THE HOT WATER ORDEAL OF THE SHINTOS. By our Tokio Correspondent.—With Photos.
HOW THE AVALANCHE STRUCK US AT LAURIE.—With Photos.
MY JOURNEY TO THE HOLY CITY OF MESHID.—With Photos.
THE FATE OF THE PEARLER "ETHEL."—With Photos.

ORIGINAL NARRATIVES OF PERSONAL ADVENTURE FROM ALL PARTS OF THE WORLD.

Manners and Customs and Strange Phases of Life.—Pictured by Actual Photos.

The OCTOBER WIDE WORLD MAGAZINE

PRICE 6d. Now on Sale Everywhere. PRICE 6d.

GEORGE NEWNES, LTD., 7—12, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

WOMEN MADE BEAUTIFUL

By DIANO. Develops the Bust, fills all hollow places, adds beauty, curve and grace to the shoulders and neck. Charm and attraction to the plainest woman. BEAUTIFUL women everywhere owe their SUPERB FIGURE and matchless loveliness to Diano. Harmless. Permanent. Never Fails. Medical and Private testimonials, and full particulars sealed for stamp.—Address, LADY MANAGER, The C.O. ESPANOLA CO., 203a, late 233a, Regent Street, London, W.

BOTH ADULTS & CHILDREN profit in health in the Summer by a free use of HILLABY'S DELICIOUS LIQUORICE CONFECTION.

A natural laxative and a toothsome sweetmeat.

HILLABY'S LIQUORICE

Send a 1d. stamp for THREE DAINTY SAMPLES.

When you find how good they are you will always buy them.

HILLABY'S LTD.,
Lion Works,
PONTEFRACT.

It contains all the goodness of the wheat, prepared in such a way as to be suitable for all, even those ailing and dyspeptic. Most Family Bakers supply it daily.

* * *

BREAD & TRADE HOVIS MARK BISCUITS

Agents' Addresses will be sent on application to

The HOVIS-BREAD FLOUR CO., Ld., Macclesfield.

3d. Samples of Bread (1s. with Biscuits) will be sent on receipt of Stamps.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

A HOMESPUN DRESS.

This sketch shows a seaside dress made of khaki homespun, a material that is both light and cool, and yet, being composed of pure wool, averts the risk of chill to the wearer. The mode in which the skirt is pleated is made clear in the sketch, a wide three-folded box-pleat being arranged in front, one at each side, and one at the back. The little bolero has rows of stitching like those on the pleats. The former simulate a triple coat, carrying out the idea of the three-fold pleats on the skirt. In the same way, the sleeves end in three simulated sections, with cream-coloured muslin undersleeves, gathered into bands of openwork embroidery. The revers are faced with cream-coloured embroidered muslin, and the front consists of similar muslin, with embroidered bands like those on the undersleeves.

Compassion will cure more sins than condemnation.

Some pretty lounge gowns are being made of Japanese silks, and these look well trimmed with lace, incongruous as it sounds. They are pretty, too, made with large white quilted collars, lined in the same way, when they form a practical, light, yet warm gown.

THE MEAT-SAFE.

How many people purchase a meat-safe and, if large or small, hang it in position and take no more notice of its condition? The food is taken out and put in, and there the care of it ends. This is not right. First, care should be taken in selecting the place for the safe to hang, so that, if possible, a cool, dry draft may blow through it, and as far as possible from any sink or drain. The safe should be emptied and wiped with a clean, wet cloth, then dried, daily in summer, and every other day in winter. The whole outside of the safe should be wiped with water mixed with a good disinfectant and then dried. The safe will have hooks fixed in it; no meat should be fixed on these, but on separate hooks attached to the fixtures. Do not on any account let fresh meat lie about in the house before storing in the safe, but directly it is received examine it carefully, remove any superfluous parts, and hang up at once. It will be well to keep a piece of charcoal in a muslin bag in the safe, and change it constantly.

TIRED EYES.

Few persons, when travelling by train, allow their eyes to rest. If they do not read they watch the scenery. When reading you try to hold the book or paper steady, but the types jiggle irregularly back and forth as the result of the motion of the car and the shakiness of your hand. Your eyes also do a deal of dancing, not only in pursuit of the bobbing letters, but in addition because you also are shaken about more or less by the motion of the train. Imagine the effect on the muscles of the eye! First, the eye itself has an unsteady rest; second, it is trying to fasten itself on that which is more unsteady still. Reading is not the only ill. Fix your eye on things close to the car—on flowers, fence-posts, culverts, trees—and the effect is as bad as would be brought on by reading. A headache is the first warning, but that becomes common after a while, and is not heeded any more than the headache that follows unwise eating. There is closer connection between the stomach and the eyes on one side and a headache on the other than most people imagine.

THE LADY JAPANESE CLERK.—The Japanese are truly making rapid strides in their march towards Western culture. The latest innovation is the formation of commercial schools for the training of female clerks, and one of the largest railway companies in Nippon has intimated that after a certain date ladies only will be employed in the clerical department.

Digitized by Google

THE CHRISTIAN ASPECT OF THE WAR.

Just Published 2/6

FROM ALDERSHOT TO PRETORIA: A Story of Christian Work among the Troops in South Africa.

By the Rev. W. E. SELLERS. With an introduction by Rev. R. W. ALLEN. With 15 Illustrations. Crown 8vo., cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

The War in South Africa has been remarkable for the extraordinary development of many forms of Christian work. Never has so much been attempted, and, notwithstanding many difficulties and imperfections, never before has so much been done for the bodies and the souls of our soldiers. This book contains many records of heroism, of suffering and sickness patiently borne, and of faithfulness to Jesus Christ under great stress and trial. The story of what has been attempted in various forms of religious activity and relief of the wounded and sick in connection with our arms in South Africa, arouses the admiration of all Christian people.

Now Ready!
PRICE 7/6.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME ANNUAL FOR 1900.

"A veritable library of good reading."—CHRISTIAN.

812 pages. Six of Tissot's Coloured Pictures.

Published by the RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY (Incorporated), 56, PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done, with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. E. C. (Room 8), 195, Oxford Street, London, W.

FREE

ON receipt of two penny stamps to cover postage, we will send you a Sample of the celebrated LILROSA COFFEE.

This Coffee has justly gained a great reputation owing to its excellent flavour and absolute purity. It contains no added matter whatever. It is simply the pure Coffee bean carefully selected by experts and every sample tested before purchase.

LILROSA COFFEE is sold ground and packed in half-pound tins at 1/4 per lb., or the whole bean can be obtained in five-pound Cotton Bags. Carriage is paid on all parcels of five pounds or more.

THE LILROSA COFFEE,
101, Leadenhall Street, E.C.

Fardon's

Every housewife knows that a good sauce will give an appetising flavour to the plainest fare. This new Sauce whilst being of a Worcestershire character possesses characteristics which can be found in no other sauce. It is consequently invaluable as a flavouring with Soups, Fish, Meats, Gravy, Salads, and many other dishes.

It stimulates the appetite and promotes digestion.

Sold by all Grocers, Stores, and Oilmen throughout the Country. In bottles, 4½d., 6d., and 1/- each.

Manufacturers: Fardon's Vinegar Co. Ltd., Birmingham.

If your grocer will not supply you with our Sauce, please write to us and we will send you the name and address of our nearest agent.

FREE.—A dainty tasting sample will be sent post free on receipt of name and address.

Sauce.

Digitized by Google

WORLD - TRAVEL

Organised by

HENRY S. LUNN, M.D., F.R.G.S.,

W. HOLDSWORTH LUNN,

AND

CONNOP F. S. PEROWNE.

AUTUMN AND WINTER CRUISES

On the Magnificent Ocean Yacht "ARGONAUT," Tonnage 3,254, H.P. 4,000. Electric Light. First-class Cuisine.

SAILING AS BELOW TO

Oct. 17th. Lisbon, Tangier, Gibraltar, Algiers, Naples, and Marseilles. A 16 days' Cruise for 14 Guineas and upwards.

Jan. 1st, 1901. Sardinia, Palermo, Girgenti, Syracuse, Catania, Naples, Capri, Ajaccio, Villefranche, and Marseilles. A 16 days' Cruise for 19 Guineas and upwards (Return Ticket, London to Marseilles included).

£10 10s. & £13 13s. TOURS TO ROME.

Extensions to Naples, Florence, Venice, The Italian Lakes, The Riviera, etc.

£5 15s. 6d., £7 7s., & £10 10s. TOURS TO THE PARIS EXHIBITION,

UNIQUE SKATING AND TOBOGGANING PARTIES TO CHAMONIX AND GRINDELWALD.

A 12 days' holiday for £10 10s.

Full Particulars from the Secretary—5, ENDSLEIGH GARDENS, EUSTON, LONDON, N.W.

Derby Sauce

For Table and Cooking purposes is a preparation which renders the plainest fare highly palatable.

As a flavouring for Soups, or used with fish, flesh, or fowl, it is unequalled.

There is only one Derby Sauce.

It is sold by most Stores, Grocers, and Oilmen, but if you cannot obtain it we will send it to you post free on receipt of Eight Penny Stamps.

S. Gulliver & Co., Ltd.
(Sole proprietors of the Victoria Date Co.),
7, Argyll Street, Oxford Circus, W.

VINDAYT, the New Vinegar, is acknowledged by Connoisseurs to be superior to all others for Pickling and Household Purposes. We will send you a Sample Bottle post-free on receipt of Five Penny Stamps. Awarded 50 Gold Medals.

PIANOS.

It is difficult to find a Piano that will keep in tune under the strain of ordinary wear and tear. This is because the sound board gives way. A sound board is convex in shape; the strain of the wires causes it to buckle.

By the introduction of our Guy Cord Sounding Board, we prevent this. Our pianos consequently keep in tune, and retain their tone longer than any other pianos in the world.

We shall be glad to send you details and full information in regard to this patent, which can be fitted to any piano, on hearing from you.

T. H. RUSHTON, 34, Cleethorpe Road, GRIMSBY.

Digitized by Google

LINES

Each thing has its own business; most things attend to something else.

It is the particular business of Orain Tablets to cure Indigestion—they do that.

Dyspepsia and its uncomfortable family, Flatulence, Acidity, Heartburn, Pain, Weight and Fulness after Meals, etc., are bad lodgers. They require eviction at short notice. Orain Tablets will attend to this matter.

Indigestion will make a man a misanthrope for years—Orain Tablets will make him love his neighbour inside a week.

Orain Tablets are compounded from the prescription of a fully qualified specialist of wide experience. This is a humiliating confession, but it has to be made.

A spoonful of truth is often taken with a grain of salt; sometimes it is not taken at all, which is foolish.

You must remember that there is a chance—possibly in your opinion a long-odds chance, but still a chance—that, though this is an advertisement, its contents are in line with the truth; and if you have the misfortune to be dyspeptic, you don't need to be told that the merest chance of unloading your burden is worth more than an average risk. Orain Tablets are guaranteed innocuous, so that the risk in their case figures out at 1s.; that being the sum (in stamps) for which we will send you a bottle, post free. Is it too big?

THE ORAIN CO., LTD.,

8, CATHERINE COURT,

LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

A REVOLUTION IN FURNISHING

BY MONTHLY PAYMENTS

NORMAN & STACEY, LTD. 118, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.

MR. LABOUCHERE, M.P., in Truth writes: "NORMAN and STACEY have introduced in their business an ingenious safeguard against the risk of loss to his widow or family through the death of the hirer. They give an insurance upon his life, so that if, for instance, a man gets £200 worth of furniture on the hire purchase system, and dies when instalments to the amount of £190 have been paid, not only does the furniture become the property of his representative, BUT THE £190 IS ALSO REPAID TO THEM."

(Without premium or medical examination.)

THE QUEEN, Jan. 7, 1899, writes: "You would find Messrs. NORMAN and STACEY, Queen Victoria-street, would suit you exactly."

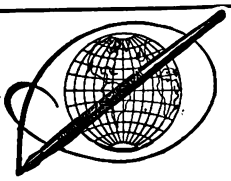
Country orders receive special attention.

MODERATE PRICES.

FREE DELIVERY, TOWN OR COUNTRY.

Call and view Stock before Furnishing locally.

You should use the best in Fountain Pens only; the highest speed and finest work necessitate the best, which is



The Waterman Ideal Fountain Pen.

Has by far the largest sale in American, which is the Home of Fountain Pens, and has received the Highest Awards possible wherever exhibited, including Gold Medal at Paris Exhibition,

We have an exquisitely printed Brochure telling all about this Pen: It is yours for the asking! Mention this Journal.

Prices: 10/6, 15/-, 17/6, 21/-, and upwards.
Of Dealers generally.

L. & C. HARDTMUTH. 12, Golden Lane, London, E.C.

GOOD NEWS FOR THE DEAF.

ORCHARD'S

CURE for DEAFNESS

Safe & Harmless. Has Cured Hundreds.

"Now I can hear the birds sing."

SIR,—Your "CURE FOR DEAFNESS" has been worth a sovereign to me. I could not hear the Church Bells ring when in bed, and now I can hear the birds sing; and return many thanks.

G. T. BERNARD (Marlborough).

1s. 1½d. per bottle. Free by post for 14 Stamps, from

EDWIN T. ORCHARD, Chemist,
SALISBURY.

TO ADVERTISERS.

All communications respecting Advertisements for this Magazine must be addressed to

MESSRS. H. DAWSON & CO.,

34, Norfolk Street, Strand,

LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE

(Edited by JOHN FOSTER FRASER.)

CONTENTS FOR OCTOBER, 1900.

			PAGE
I.	An Irish Courtship	Frontispiece
II.	Peers Who Preach. Illustrated.	George A. Wade	1
III.	A Bolt from the Blue. Serial Story. Chapters I.-IV. Illustrated by Chas. D. Ward.	Dora Langlois	7
IV.	A Chapter on Angels. Illustrated.	E. Browning Triscott	25
V.	Music in the Sanctuary: Choir and Organ.	Rev. H. R. Haweis, M.A.	33
VI.	Lesser Known Paris: Places and Things Some Tourists Never See. Illustrated by The Author.	Clive Holland	38
VII.	The Story of Hilda Waring. Illustrated by A. E. Pike.	B. M. Hicks	43
VIII.	The Wesleyan Missionary Society. Illustrated.	Stephen Stapleton	54
IX.	An English Woman in China: A Talk with Mrs. Bishop. Illustrated.	Sybil C. Mitford	61
X.	How We Spend Sunday	John Pendleton	67
XI.	The Professor's Toothache. Illustrated by Charles Horrell.	Rosaline Masson	71
XII.	In the Public Eye. Illustrated.	The Onlooker	81
XIII.	For the Bairns	Rev. J. Reid Howatt	91

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE will be sent by post each month, to any address, for an Annual Subscription of 8*s. Binding Cases can be purchased from the Publishers for* 1*s.* 6*d.*

All manuscripts and drawings must be accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes, or the Editor cannot promise their return. They must be addressed, THE EDITOR, WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, CARMELITE-STREET, E.C.

Business Communications and Orders must be sent to MESSRS. HORACE MARSHALL AND SON, TEMPLE HOUSE, TEMPLE AVENUE, E.C.

Letters relating to Advertisements must be addressed to MESSRS. H. DAWSON AND CO., 34, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, W.C.

PETER'S

THE ORIGINAL

MILK-CHOCOLATE

THE MOST NOURISHING AND DELICIOUS SWEETMEAT IN THE WORLD.

NO IMITATION HAS THE CHARM OF PETER'S.

6d. Tablets and 6d. & 1s. Croquettes. Sold Everywhere.
Sole Agents (trade only) –
S. J. MACKENZIE & CO., Ltd., Wellclose Square, London.

"NEGO"

No Paper Required. THE FIVE-SECONDS FIRELIGHTER. No Waste of Cinders.

THESE Firelighters are a scientifically-prepared composition, with enormous inflammatory properties. All that is necessary when lighting a fire is to break the block into three sections and place in the stove, surrounding the same with coal. When ignited a steady fire will immediately result. One of these Firelighters is quite sufficient to boil a kettle in a few minutes. Sold everywhere in packets of 10, price 3d., or will be sent post free upon receipt of Three Stamps.

THE "NEGO" CO., GOOLE, YORKS.

A sample of these Firelighters will be sent post free on application.

Digitized by Google

Every Young Man

must have a sound Commercial Education to succeed in business. Foreign competition was never so keen as at the present day, and English clerks to keep abreast of the times must have good educations to fit them for this competition.

The Daily Mail recently remarked that:—

"A SOUND COMMERCIAL EDUCATION was never more urgently needed than at the present time, and if our youth are to compete successfully with the youth of foreign nations they must continue and perfect their education long after leaving school. 'CASSELL'S POPULAR EDUCATOR' offers them the best and most available means of equipping themselves for the BATTLE AGAINST FOREIGN COMPETITION."

Part 1 of the New Weekly Issue of Cassell's

Popular Educator

is NOW READY, price 6d.

THE EXPANSION OF THE EMPIRE AND THE PROGRESS OF IMPERIAL UNITY.

Part 1 NOW READY, price 6d., of the

NEW and ENLARGED EDITION of

The Queen's Empire.

With nearly 700 Magnificent Illustrations prepared from Special Photographs.

The First Edition, published in the year of the Queen's Diamond Jubilee, had a larger sale than that obtained by any similar work. The New Edition has been most carefully revised by Mr. H. O. ARNOLD-FORSTER, M.P., and illustrating the growth of the Empire in recent years have been added to it. There is no other work that can compare with this for the completeness of its representation of the British Empire in all its manifold features.

A Number of New Pictures

To be published in about 24 Fortnightly Parts.

CASSELL AND COMPANY, LIMITED, LONDON; and all Booksellers.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

For Home and Sunday Reading.

VOLUME V.

OCTOBER 1900 to SEPTEMBER 1901.

CONTRIBUTED TO BY

Dr. Parker, Lady Henry Somerset, Rev. Silas K. Hocking, Rev. Joseph Hocking, Rev. Mark Guy Pearse, Geo. Manville Fenn, Rev. E. J. Hardy, Joseph Hatton, Adeline Sergeant, Mary E. Wilkins, the late Rev. H. R. Haweis, Thekla Bowser, Clive Holland, J. A. Hammerton, Ian Maclaren, Mrs. Hirst Alexander, Mary Angela Dickens, Lady Violet Greville, Dora Langlois, Hugh W. Strong, Mrs. Bagot Harte, and many other well-known writers.

1901.

LONDON: HORACE MARSHALL & SON, Temple House, Temple Avenue, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

INDEX TO VOLUME V.

A.

PAGE

Advantages of Common People, The, by Rev. Mark Guy Pearse 868
Albert Edward, Millionaire, by Arthur Mee ... 106
Alfred the Great, by F. A. G. Davidson ... 1055
Almost Fatal, by Sydney Watson 839
Ambulance Dogs and Their Work, by Thekla Bowser 941
Amélie, the Heroic Queen of Portugal, by E. Page Gaston 861
America's Model Prisons, by A. Frederic White 686
Angels, A Chapter on, by E. Browning Triscott... 25
Angels, The Palace of the, by J. A. Hammerton 161
Anglican Sisterhoods, by A. G. Pike 493
Ashville College, Harrogate, by A. P. Easton 463
Atkins, Mr. Thomas, in War Time, by Rev. E. J. Hardy, M.A. 259
Aunt Lavinia's Letter, by Mary E. Wilkins; illustrated by Frances Ewan 211
Avebury, Lord, and His Work, by William Sidebotham 323

B.

BAIRNS, For the :—

Big Man's Little Book, The 563
Children's Poetry 373
Crutch-and-Kindness League 93, 185, 281, 374, 469, 563, 657, 750, 845, 937, 1032, 1118
Funniest Mistake I Ever Made ... 844, 1117
Funniest Thing I Saw on My Holidays ... 279
Our Brothers and Sisters 280, 468
Our Town 938, 1033
Queen Victoria 656
Ramble, A Summer Day's 91, 186

Birthplaces of Distinguished Yorkshiremen, by Chas. F. Shaw 597
Bishop, A Talk with Mrs., by S. C. Mitford ... 61
Blind and Dumb, Wonders of the, by J. A. Hammerton 339
Boer Quarrel, A, by C. H. Kemsley 737
Bolt from the Blue, A, by Dora Langlois; illustrated by Chas. D. Ward 7, 137, 217, 345, 441, 539
Boys' Brigade, The, by Charles B. Penny ... 969
Boy's Love, A, by E. C. Gidley 313
British Museum Reading Room and its Frequenters, by D. Waterson 1092

C.

Caledonians, The Royal, by Katherine Carson 119
Castle Ashby, Seat of the Marquis of Northampton, by George A. Wade 981
Celebrated Historical Painter (J. Seymour Lucas, R.A.), by A. Frederic White ... 1035
Chief Bard Cadvan, by Gwyneth Vaughan ... 1012

PAGE

China, An Englishwoman in: a Talk with Mrs. Bishop, by Sybil C. Mitford 61
Christ Child, The, by Florence Marryat ... 332
Christian Home, The, by the Bishop of Norwich 1097
Christmas Cards, A Chat about, by Helen Marion Burnside 265
Christmas in the Home, by Helen Merriman .. 207
Christmas Party, How to Give a, by Mrs. Lucie Heaton Armstrong 257
Christ's College, Blackheath, by A. P. Easton 363
Churches, Do the, Need Converting?... ... 423
Churchill, Winston, M.P., by John Hulme ... 291
Club Doctor's Wife on "Clubbers," by Ella Jefferiss; illustrated by Marion Reid ... 337
Colonel's Little Boy, The, by Gerda Grass ... 1008
Common People, The Advantages of, by Rev. Mark Guy Pearse 868
Communion, A Highland, by J. Macleay ... 127
Convert, Little Hallelujah's, by Alvah Milton Kerr 95
Cured by Light, by Herbert Charles 577

D.

Dalton Hall, Owens College, Manchester, by A. P. Easton 648
"Davy" Stephens, the Prince of Newsvendors 1018
Deaf Mute, Helen Keller, by Rev. Jas. Johnston 746
Dickens, Reminiscences of, by Geo. Manville Fenn 916
Do the Churches Need Converting? Symposium, by Dr. Farrar, J. Monro Gibson, Jas. Orr, E. J. Hardy, J. W. Horsley, J. C. Brewitt, W. Carlile 427
Do the Churches Want Money? by Silas K. Hocking 491
Dutch Colony in England, by M. Randal Roberts 509
Duxhurst Farm Colony for Inebriate Women, by Lady Henry Somerset 783

E.

England's Greatest King, Alfred the Great, by F. A. G. Davidson 1055

F.

Family Trip to the Seaside, A, by Davina Waterson 1020
Farmers, Some Famous Lady, by Mrs. D. A. Fletcher 169
Farrar, Dean, An Hour with, by Wm. Sidebotham 389
Ferry Cottage, The, by Ernest Cozens Cooke; illustrated by Charles Horrell 920
Flower Girls, London, by Geo. Hatton ... 933

Digitized by Google

PAGE

Four-footed Philanthropists, by John Bell ... 404
French Protestants in England, by Sybil C. Mitford 456 Friend who became the Bridegroom, by John O'Gowrie; illustrated by F. Reason ... 761

G.

Ghost of Malvina, The, by Winifred Graham; illustrated by Jas. Durden 189
Girton College, Some Glimpses of, by M. K. Downing 837
Glamour of Home, The, by Clive Holland ... 297
Glimpse at the Home Industries of Great Britain, by Thekla Bowser... 591
Greatest Need of the Century, The. Symposium—Dr. Farrar, Richard Whiteing, F. C. Burnand, Silas K. Hocking, C. H. Grundy, Dr. Jessopp, Clement Shorter, Max O'Rell, Alfred Rowland, Geo. B. Burgin, Canon Daniell, Geo. Manville Fenn, H. R. Haweis, H. W. Massingham, Canon W. Hay Aitken, J. Keir Hardie, W. Carlile, F. B. Meyer, Corrie Grant, Max Pemberton 288
Greatest Need of the New Century. Symposium—Dr. Newman Hall, Hugh Price Hughes, W. T. Stead, Mrs. Ormiston Chant 467

H.

Hadleigh Labour Colony, by Catherine Carson 1000
Hand of Fate, The, by Adeline Sergeant ... 1106
Highland Communion, A, by J. Macleay ... 127
His Great Chance, by Mary Angela Dickens; illustrated by R. Pannett 201
Holiday in Romantic Wales, by Arthur Playford 1023
Home, The Glamour of, by Clive Holland; illustrated by F. Reason 297
Home Industries of Great Britain, by Thekla Bowser 591
Homeland of Shakespeare, The, by A. Frederic White 871
How a Great Dictionary is Made, by Hugh W. Strong 697
How the Moon Astonished the Sun, by Bertha Harrison 276
How Queen Victoria Spent Sunday, by York Hopewell 743

I.

In Deep Waters, by Mrs. Bagot Harte; illustrated by Sydney Cowell 611, 705, 805, 893, 984, 1071
Inebriate Women, Farm Colony for, by Lady Henry Somerset 783
In Jant's Charity, by G. Clarke Nuttall; illustrated by Frances Ewan 571

In the Public Eye :—

Adams, Alderman Adam 85
Aitken, Rev. Canon W. Hay 525
Allen, Rev. Thomas, D.D. 88
Atkins, Frederick A. 371
Battersea, Lady... 525
Belsey, Francis Flint, J.P. 532
Berndt, Dr. Theodor 963
Bertouch, Baroness de... 1115
Birmingham, Lord Mayor of... 962
Black, Rev. Hugh, M.A. 430
Blouêt, M. Paul 831
Bradlaugh, W. R. 431
Bremner, Miss C. S. 184
Brewer, Mrs. 274
Bridge, Sir Frederick 830
Brown, Miss Munro 832
Burdett-Coutts, H., M.P. 182
Burt, Thomas, M.P. 528
Cadbury, Mrs. George... 84
Caine, Hall 721
Caine, W. S., M.P. 829
Calder, Miss Fanny L. 178
Cardwell, Rev. J. H. 269
Carlile, Rev. W. 632
Carlisle, The Countess of 273
Carter, Mrs. William 177
Charrington, F. N. 83
Childs, Rev. J. Glynn, B.A. 434
Chisholm, Samuel 835
Christie, Rev. James 531
Christopher, Rev. Canon 368
Clifford, Rev. John, D.D. 368
Cockerton, William 370
Cooper, Rev. Dr. 437
Cromarty, Deas... 270
Dallinger, Dr. W. H. 1112
Davies, Rev. John Cadvan, by Gwyneth Vaughan 1012
Dawson, Commander 909
Diggle, Ven. Archdeacon J.W. 530
Edwards, John Passmore 722
Edwards, Alderman Samuel, J.P. (Lord Mayor of Birmingham) 962
Faithful, Rev. J. A., M.A. 430
Farquharson, Mrs. 909
Finn, Mrs. 915
Fowler, Miss Edith 912
Fuller, Mrs. G. P. 181
Garrett, Rev. Charles 180
Gell, Mrs. Freeman 1111
Gibson, Rev. Canon E.C.S., D.D. 275
Gildea, Colonel Jas., C.B. 435
Gordon, Miss Jessie 179
Gore, Miss A. A. 183
Graham, J. W., M.A. 648
Green, Miss Kathleen Hayden 910
Hanson, Rev. Arthur 86
Harmel, Léon 431
Harte, Mrs. Bagot 629
Hassé, Rev. Evelyn R.... 728
Henniker, Lord 89
Henniker, Hon. Mrs. Arthur... 176
Heron-Maxwell, Mrs. 961
Hilliard, Mrs. 1111
Hogg, Quintin 433
Howatt, Rev. J. Reid 433
Kirk, John 633
Lady Mayoress of London 910
Lefroy, Dean, D.D. 429
Leigh, Miss Ada M. 271
Lewis, Rev. L. Elwyn, Mus. Doc. 86
Lewis, Mrs. Travers 271
Lilburn, Adam 1116
Lincoln, Bishop of 88
London, Bishop of 727
Longhurst, Dr. W. H. 914
McLaren, Dr. Alexander 911
McLean, Miss 727

Digitized by Google

PAGE

McNeill, Rev. John 833
Meyer, Rev. F. B. 432
Macdonald, J. Ramsay 631
Macdonald, Mrs. 631
Miller, Mrs. Jenness 369
Minshall, E. 964
Mitchell, Miss Magdalen 182
Morgan, Miss Mabel 367
Morten, Miss Honnor 524
Murray, Rev. T. L. 273
Nicholl, Rev. Canon 82
O'Rell, Max 831
Pagenstecher, Professor Hermann 630
Parker, Rev. Joseph, D.D. 693
Paton, Rev. Dr. 179
Pemberton, Max 724
Pennell, Joseph 367
Perks, R. W., M.P. 847
Phillips, Rev. and Hon. D. T. 526
Pickard, Benjamin, M.P. 272
Quarrier, William 629
Queen of Portugal 861
Rainy, Principal 523
Rigg, Miss Caroline Edith 527
Roberts, Miss Dorothea 183, 184
Rowland, Rev. Alfred, LL.B. 627
Rudolph, Rev. E. de M. 177
Sheldon, Mrs. French 1113
Smith, Gipsy 726
Stalker, Dr. James 912
Stannard, Mrs. Arthur 428
Stannard, Miss Audrey 474
Starr-Canziani, Madame L. 828
Stephens, "Davy" 1018
Storey, Dr. Hugh 429
Thompson, Rev. Peter 829
Tooley, Mrs. Sarah A. 725
Treloar, Sir William 723
Twain, Mark 963
Twining, Miss Louisa 82
Veigele, Madame Alexandrine 965
Verestchagin, Vasili 81
Wakefield, Miss Mary 272
Walker, Dr. Jane 435
Wasserman, Mrs. J. 1116
Waterlow, Sir Sidney 90
Watkinson, Rev. W. L. 1114
Watson, Dr. Robert 270
Waugh, Rev. Benjamin 913
Webb, Sidney 723
Weston, Miss Agnes 529
Wheatley, William 527
Whiteing, Richard 628
Whitfeld, Henry 436
Williams, Sir George 833
Wills, Miss Evelyn 367
Wilson, Miss Edith 372
Winter, John Strange 428
Wood, Henry J. 87
Wood, J. S. 965
Wright, Miss Helena 966
Young, Mrs. 84

In the Shadow of St. Paul's, by Arthur F. Barlow 638
In the Time of Her Wealth, by Ellen A. Smith 514

J.

John Ardeshir's Coat, by Sydney Travers; illustrated by James Durden 501

K.

PAGE

Keeper of the Track, The, by Harold Bindloss; illustrated by Sydney Cowell ... 412
Keller, Helen, by Rev. James Johnston ... 746
King as an Undergraduate, The, by Hugh W. Strong 950

L.

Lady Farmers, Some Famous, by Mrs. D. A. Fletcher 169
Lady Song-Writers, Chats with, by Thekla Bowser 767
Last Post, The, by Dora Langlois; illustrated by C. D. Ward 975
Lauretta, by Mary E. Wilkins 634
Lepers in India, The Mission to, by Stephen Stapleton 154
Light, Cured by, by Herbert Charles 577
Little Hallelujah's Convert, by Alvah Milton Kerr 95
London City Mission, by Audrey Winter ... 729
London Flower Girls, by George Hatton ... 933
Lost Bridegroom, The, by Sydney Watson ... 475
Lost Heritage, The, by Joseph Hatton ... 956
Lost Letter, The, by Lady Violet Greville ... 1039
Lucas, J. Seymour, R. A., by A. Frederic White 1035

M.

Maclaren, Ian, by Cora B. Pearson 659
Man Who Loved Her Best, The, by Joseph Hocking 854
Man's Judgments, by Rev. Silas K. Hocking 967
Marriage Failures, by Rev. E. J. Hardy, M.A. 927
Mary, the Mother of Jesus, by Meta Peterson 565
Men of Silence, Visit to a Trappist Monastery, by John Hulme 417
Message for the New Century, A, by Ian Maclaren 198
Methodist Crusade in the Near East, by Robt. Vincent 1100
Millet's "Angelus," The Vicissitudes of, by Rev. Jas. Johnston 289
Mission to Lepers in India, by Stephen Stapleton 154
Missionary Pennies, by Geo. A. Angus ... 319
Miss Smith, by May Cross 582
Model Villages, by Geo. A. Wade 131
Money, Do the Churches Want It? By Silas K. Hocking 491

MOTHERS AND NURSES, Common Sense for, by Dr. Julia Holmes Smith—

Baby's Wardrobe 439
Bath 652
Blinds 837
Breathing 654
Child-Mind 837
Clinical Thermometer 654
Crying 653
Dentition 736
Food 736, 1045
Food Values 1017
Growth 735
Hints to Mothers 438, 555
Illness, Symptoms of 653
Milk 1045
Nursery Management 653
Play-Clothes 837
Play-Room 836

Digitized by Google

PAGE

Pulse, The 736
Salt 1045
Sleep 654
Sleeping-Room 555
Teeth, Evolution and Care of 931
Teething 736
Temperature of Body 654
Music in the Sanctuary, by Rev. H. R. Haweis, M.A.... 33

N.

Nell's Mistake, by Adeline Sergeant; illustrated by Chas. D. Ward 395
New Century, A Message for the, by Ian Maclaren 199

P.

Palace of the Angels, The, by J. A. Hammerton 161
Paris, Lesser Known, by Clive Holland; illustrated by the Author 38
Parker, Rev. Joseph, D.D. 693
Part of the Problem, by Oswald Chambers ... 173
Paulian (Louis) and the Rag-Pickers 484
Penthony's Sweetheart, by E. Burrows; illustrated by J. Barnard Davis 247
Peers who Preach, by Geo. A. Wade 1
Perks, R. W., M.P., An Interview, by Leonard Graham 847
Philanthropists, Four-Footed, by John Bell .. 404
Pilgrim Fathers' First Christmas, The, by Rev. Everett E. Hale, D.D. 262
Plea for Church Unity, A., by Rev. Silas K. Hocking 703
Policeman-Painter, by Leonard Graham .. 1067
Prince of Wales and His Money 106
Prisons, America's Model, by A. Frederic White 686
Professor's Toothache, The, by Rosaline Masson; illustrated by Charles Horrell 71

R.

Ragged School Union, The Work of, by Robert Vincent 1028
Reality of Christianity, The, by Rev. Joseph Parker, D.D. 607
Reminiscences of Dickens, by Geo. Manville Fenn 917
Return of Jean, The, by George P. Moon; illustrated by E. A. Pike 111
Righteous Overmuch, by Janie E. Owen ... 679
Royal Caledonians, The, by Katherine Carson 119
Royalty and the Camera, by Arthur J. Barlow 753

S.

Sacred Places put to Secular Purposes, by Thekla Bowser 533
Salvation Army Labour Colony at Hadleigh, by Catherine Carson... 1000
Saturday Market in Slum London, by Ernest T. Richards 1046
Scripture Residence, A Famous, by Geo. A. Wade 981
Sea-Nymph, by Justin McCarthy 1061
Seaside, A Family Trip to the, by Davina Waterson 1020
Sermon, My First, Brewitt, Rev. Jas. C. ... 388
,, ,, Horsley, Rev. J. W., M.A. 838

PAGE

Sermon, My First, Mackennall, Dr. Alexander 626
,, ,, Moinet, Rev. Charles ... 1019
,, ,, Thomas, Rev. Arnold ... 483
Shakespeare, The Homeland of, by A. Frederic White 871
Sinclair, Ven. Archdeacon Macdonald, by A. F. Barlow 638
Some Glimpses of Girton College, by M. K. Downing 837
Song-Writers, Chats with Lady, by Thekla Bowser 767
Star Twins, The, by D. Monro; illustrated by Chas. D. Ward 790
Story of Hilda Waring, by B. M. Hicks; illustrated by A. E. Pike 43
Sunday, How Queen Victoria Spent, by York Hopewell 743
Sunday, How we Spend, by John Pendleton 67
Sunday School Processions in the North, by Geo. A. Wade 799

T

Their Scientific Uncle, by Catherine Adams 665
Through Tennyson Land, by Herbert W. Pates 673
Toy Shop of the World, by J. A. Hammerton and E. C. Middleton ... .- 237
Trappist Monastery, A Visit to a, by John Hulme 417
Treasures in the Gutter, by Ward Muir ... 484
Turning of Stephen Rennick, The, by Adeline Sergeant; illustrated by Sydney Cowel 879

U

Union of the Churches—Dean Hole, Archdeacon Sinclair, Canon Hay Aitken, Canon Barker, Dean Fremantle, Doctors Guinness Rogers, Monro Gibson, G. W. Russell, John Clifford, Bp. Royston, Prebendary Webb-Peploe, Hugh Price Hughes, A. Rowland, W. Cuff, Chas. Moinet, G. Campbell Morgan 774
Universities Mission to Central Africa, by Audrey Winter 821
Vicissitudes of Millet's "Angelus," by Rev. Jas. Johnston 289
Villages, Model, by Geo. A. Wade 131

W

Wales, A Holiday in, by Arthur Playford ... 1023
Wesley College, Sheffield, by A. P. Easton ... 558
Wesleyan Missionary Society, The, by Stephen Stapleton 54
Who Shall Rock the Cradle? by Davina Waterson 644
Winter (John Strange), A Chat with, by A. Frederic White 471
Woman and the New Century, by Lady Violet Greville 947
Women Artists, The Society of, by Mrs. Hirst Alexander 377
Women as Workers at Home, by Mrs. Fenwick Miller 1052
Women's Settlements in London, by Mrs. Hirst Alexander 303

Y

Yorkshiremen, Birthplaces of Distinguished, by Chas. F. Shaw 597

Digitized by Google

POETRY.

	PAGE
All He Could	827
Be Still, My Soul	6
Beyond, by John R. Ratham	557
Birthday Song, A	416
Collection, The Hospital, by Mary A. Lathbury	130
Death, This is, by Geo. Savage	908
Easter Hymn, by Edith Ewen	606
Fleeting, by Clarence Hope	160
Flower-starred Lane, The, by Florence A. Jones	955
Folded Hands, by O. Moore	1031
God's Child, by P. Wheeler	1051
Growing Old	508
Happier, Love, for Thee, by Joseph Harding	860
Happiest Heart, The, by R. D. Saunders	1105
Her Life All Mapped Out	60
Hospital Collection, The, by Mary A. Lathbury	130
Infinite Plan, The, by Agnes L. Prat	892
In Her Sweet Eyes, by Bertha E. Bush	945
Into a Far Country, by Florence E. Dunn	258
Into Thy Hands, O Lord! by Julia C. R. Dorr	427
Jesus, To, by William Thomas Adey	513
Just a Word, by Newton Newkirk	1099
Lane, The Flower-starred, by Florence A. Jones	955
Love and Life, by R. D. Saunders	1070
Love and the World, by Charles E. Banks	789
Memory and the Full Moon, by Edith M. Thomas	482
Message of Her Eyes, The	672
Night Storm, The, by Charles W. Lamb	773
Night's Lullaby	470
Old Sweet Story, The, by Frank L. Stanton	590
One Link in the Cable, by Annie Matheson	605
Only a Smile, by George MacDonald	236
Right Shall Prevail, by R. D. Saunders	804
Sealed Orders, by Helen Chauncey	702
Slumbering Hope, The, by Anna J. Speedwell	820
Soldier's Dream, A, by Harriet R. Goff	720
Some Sweet To-day	637
Sunset Solitude, by Clarence M. Case	175
This is Death, by George Savage	908
Thought, by C. P. Cranch	490
Toiler, Canst Thou Dream?	867
To Stifle Care, by R. D. Saunders	655
Unknown Hero, An, by T. L. Stanton	1,027
Weather Forecast, A, by Mrs. Donaldson	32

FULL-PAGE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Angelus, The	283
Bolt from the Blue, A.	347
Boy's Love, A	315
Christmas Guest, A Charming	268
Courtship, An Irish	1
Fair Troubadour, A	941
Far-Away Heart, The	377
Gipsy Queen, A	847
Home from the Wars	95
Japan, A Spring Morning in	659
Madonna, by Raphael	565
Millet's "Angelus"	283
New Year Meditation, A	290
Queen Victoria and Group of Royalties	753
Raphael's "Madonna"	565
Summer Flowers	1035
Waiting for the Bride	471
Winter	189

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

PEERS WHO PREACH.

By GEORGE A. WADE.

"THE Earl of Stamford will occupy the pulpit at St. Ethelburga's Church, Bishopsgate Street, E.C., to-morrow, and give an address in connection with the special mid-day Lent services to men."

Such was the announcement which met my gaze. And it set me thinking upon how many peers there are who preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ more or less regularly every week throughout our land. Some of them are really ordained clergymen of the Church of England; others are appointed "lay readers"; some are simply helpers in different denominations who "take the service" now and then, just as does the "local preacher." But they are all good men and true, working often at great self-sacrifice to preach and testify to the saving power of the Word of God, through belief in our risen Lord.

There are one marquis, three earls, and one baron who are all duly ordained priests of the Church of England. The Marquis of Normanby resides at his place near Whitby, Mulgrave Castle, and is engaged there chiefly in his work as a schoolmaster. For here his Lordship keeps a private school for the sons of gentlemen, and has several rooms fitted up for the work necessary in such an establishment. But now and then he assists at services, both Sunday and week-day, when some neighbouring clergyman or some distant clerical friend needs assistance. And the Marquis is always ready to help on by purse and speech any good cause that appeals to him. As a schoolmaster he has gained an extremely high reputation, and many of the young nobility of our land owe something to his teaching. As a preacher he is ever grave and earnest; his conception of duty is a very high one, and that he carries out in practice his theories the tenants and people about Whitby will readily tell you. Many of them have good reason to thank him for kindnesses, small, but not less heartfelt.

Photograph by Elliott & Fry.

LORD STAMFORD

The Earl of Devon has been Rector of Powderham, in the county from which he takes his title, for many years. He is old now, and cannot do as much either in the actual services or work of the parish as he used to do. Moreover he has felt keenly the death of the Countess, his companion and true helper in all good causes for so many years, which occurred a short time ago. But yet he takes a great portion of the Sunday service in his church, and the villagers crowd there each Sabbath, knowing that they will hear sound, practical advice and godly counsel that will fit them all the better for their weekly tasks.

Digitized by Google

Photograph by Elliott & Fry.

THE MARQUIS OF NORMANBY.

And they will talk to you for an hour at a time about the kindness of their noble rector and landlord, and that of the woman they have so much missed. No words can be too high, in the estimation of these parishioners, in praise of their clergyman. He has baptised most of them; he has married several; he has stood by the graves of their loved ones, read that beautiful service over the dead, and then gone home with the living to speak words of consolation to them. Powderham knows the Earl of Devon, and Powderham loves him with a great love.

The Earl of Bessborough, the head of the Ponsonbys, is also a clergyman. His work has, however, been more retired, and he has scarcely loomed before the public eye so much as some of his brother peers who have been ordained. But his words, both in church and out of it, when he addresses gatherings of parishioners, are none the less appreciated, none the less effective.

Another Earl who is ordained is the Rev. Francis Edmund Byng, who last year came into the dignity of Earl of Strafford, through the death of the late earl. Before he entered upon his new title Lord Strafford had played the part of a country vicar for several years with much success. He had no world-wide reputation as a great preacher, but he had the love and approval of the folks to whom he ministered for so long, years before he dreamed that he would ever become an earl.

To these villagers the sermons and speeches of the Rev. Francis Byng were the sermons of a clergyman to his flock, not the words of a peer, or of one who might some day be such. What was the interest of the parish was the interest of the vicar; what was for the good of his people was a thing to be religiously undertaken, to be carried out at all costs. It is this spirit which gives any clergyman or minister his power in the place wherein he is called to work.

The Rev. Alfred Curzon, Rector of Kedleston, Derbyshire, is also Baron Scarsdale, and is perhaps known better still as the father of the present Viceroy of India, Viscount Curzon. Lord Scarsdale had, until his famous son came so prominently before the public, been almost an unknown faithful worker at the pretty Derbyshire village, over whose destinies he presides both as Lord of the Manor and Rector. His parishioners are mostly also his tenants. Like the Earl of Devon at Powderham the Rev. Alfred Curzon has known nearly all of them intimately from their young days, has watched their lives and progress not as a landlord merely but as a faithful servant of his Master, speaking a word here and there when he saw it necessary to rebuke or encourage, to help or restrain. His people listen to his Sunday sermons with respect which comes from experience, for they have a high opinion of this man whom they love—a high opinion of his good sense, of his knowledge, of his desire to assist them in their daily struggles against the forces of evil. To them the Rev. Baron Scarsdale is not so much a peer of the realm as a clergyman, their clergyman.

Digitized by Google

Whilst speaking of our ordained peers, it may be remarked that the present Bishop of Ely is by title a "Lord." He is Lord Alwyne Compton, of the family of the Marquis of Northampton. His Lordship is the only occupant of the episcopal bench who is actually a "Lord," though there are one or two "Honourables" there, sons of earls or brothers of peers. The work and sermons of the Bishop of Ely need but little remark in an article such as this, they are too well known. Most of our bishops have to work very hard, for their dioceses are often wide and scattered. And the diocese of Ely is not the easiest to work that this country boasts. But for the fourteen years that the present bishop has presided over it, Ely has shown quiet work, quiet rest and peace in its borders, despite fierce struggles in many other districts, and such results are the best test of the fruit and effectiveness of the preaching and counsel of a Bishop.

When we come to peers who are rather

Photograph by Elliott & Fry.

LORD STRAFFORD.

Photograph by Scott & Sons, Exeter.

THE EARL OF DEVON.

lay-preachers of some one or other denomination, we find five or six who are extremely prominent. And as we began this article with a mention of the Earl of Stamford, let us say a few words about him first. His lordship is very much in request at such services as he undertook at St. Ethelburga's. His congregation was chiefly of City men, and he drew a crowded audience of these. This alone would prove his worth as a preacher, for the man, peer or otherwise, who can get some hundreds of busy City men to give up their luncheon-hour to listen to his address in a stuffy City church must have in him something more than common as a speaker.

The Earl of Stamford preaches in a surplice and a cassock, and speaks straight from the heart, keeping well to the point of his discourse. On the occasion referred to he dwelt mainly upon the missionary work at Sierra Leone. As a man who had once held the post of Professor of Classics at Codrington College, Barbadoes, and who had travelled much, the Earl of Stamford could speak from personal knowledge of the value of mission work. And the expressions of pleasure at the sermon after the congregation had left the church showed that he had not failed to carry the audience with him. The Earl is a good speaker in every sense. His clear eyes fix themselves on the crowd before him, and he never lets his grip on that congregation fail until he has finished what he wishes to say.

Digitized by Google

The next peer-preacher whom we may mention is one whose services in the cause he has at heart are heartily and frankly acknowledged both by those who agree with his opinions and those who don't. Few men have done more for the branch of the English Church that is especially identified with his name than Viscount Halifax. But with his private views and works we have little here to do; our part is to present him as a preacher of no mean merit. More than once has the Viscount conducted the service of the Church he loves so well; and his addresses as one of her most prominent members of to-day, both in church and out of it, are always listened to with the greatest attention by the large congregation that ever assembles when it is announced that he will speak. Few preachers, even of those whose work it is to deliver their Master's message Sunday after Sunday, have the gift of eloquence and the logical way of putting facts before an audience as has Viscount Halifax. His style is beautifully clear, his delivery somewhat rapid. But the man who, once under his spell, is not stirred by his enthusiasm and spirited words must indeed be hard to move.

Photograph by Elliott & Fry.

THE BISHOP OF ELY.

Lord Halifax has no sympathy with weak-kneed Christians. Full of fire and go himself, he cannot understand the attitude of those whose policy is summed up in the famous words, "Dolce far niente." The Viscount is one of the most charming of men in ordinary life, polished, kind, and attractive in every way. But when it comes to speaking for his Master it is something more than usually difficult that will prevent his going straight to the mark.

Two Scottish Barons have gained some reputation as preachers and speakers at Gospel gatherings. These are Lord Kinnaird and Lord Overtoun. The former is a man who has made a mark in more ranks of life than one. He is the "doyen" of muscular Christianity, if we may so term it. He stands as an acknowledged authority on football and all belonging to it, and in his past days had a repute as a player that many well-known players of to-day would be glad to possess. But he is not less earnest and resolute as a lay preacher. There are few men ever more ready to deliver a sermon on Jesus Christ and His work for the people of the world than is the Baron. There has been scarcely a good cause during the past twenty years that he has not taken a leading part in. Every Christian labour finds in him an earnest supporter both by tongue and purse. To him Dr. Barnardo's Homes owe no small portion of their present prosperity; to him countless similar agencies for good trace their origin and continuance.

As a speaker in the pulpit Lord Kinnaird is one to whom you must listen, for you feel that he means every word that he says. He has not the eloquence of Viscount Halifax, nor the finished sermons of the Bishop of Ely. But his Scotch voice and his Scotch determination to make his hearers understand his points carry him far on the way to success.

Digitized by Google

Photograph by Elliott & Fry.

LORD HALIFAX.

Now Lord Overtoun is still different from this, though he resembles his compatriot in his philanthropic schemes and interests. Lord Overtoun has been for many years a great employer of labour, and he knows men as few peers know them. He has studied them under several aspects, which is just where the ordinary peer's view is limited as a general rule. So his Lordship can get at his audience, and does get at it when he preaches, as he frequently does in Scotland, in a way that many other peers cannot. The strong light of successful business methods is brought to bear ; there is a practical, solid vein running through the discourses of the Baron that one only too often misses in those of many of the ministers of all sects.

It is not the eloquence, nor the logical analysis, nor the keen debating powers of the speaker that makes his audience listen. It is the stern fact that what a man such as this one says is the outcome of personal experience with the hard business world that they themselves are fighting that compels men to acknowledge that the preacher is worth hearing.

The present Earl of Tankerville—Lord Benet he was before he came into the earldom—has always been regarded as a shining light amongst the select body of peers who preach. He has often done duty at a service, nor have his ministrations always been confined to the congregations of the English Church. Probably he has addressed as many sermons to the people of other denominations of all kinds as he has to those mentioned. Whether his audience be one of the Salvation Army, of Ragged School lads, or of more cultured people, Lord Benet was always ready with something to say that was at once instructive, interesting, and helpful. Since he acquired his new dignity his time has been more occupied with affairs pertaining to that position, naturally, than before, and he has not yet been quite so much at liberty to conduct services as he was wont to do. But all true Christians hope much in the future from him.

Photograph by Elliott & Fry.

LORD KINNAIRD.

Digitized by Google

There are several aristocratic preachers in our land, vicars and others, whom we might have spoken of, such as Lord William Cecil, the Rector of Hatfield. But these are not really peers, such as those who have been dealt with, so we here pass them by. What everybody loving Christ must be glad at is that so many of our peers are ever ready and willing to preach His Gospel and tell His love whenever they get the opportunity.

BE STILL, MY SOUL.

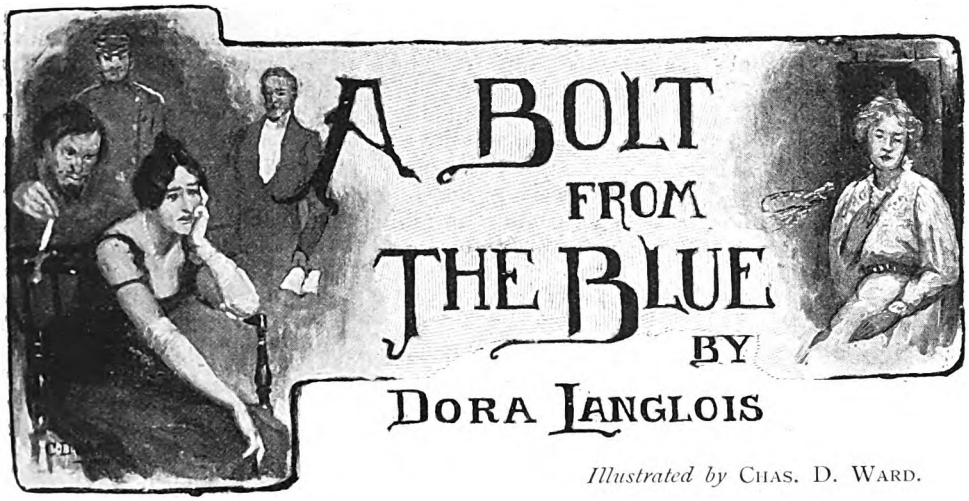
Be still, my soul, nor vainly question why
It should be thine such anguish to endure ;
The gold must in the heated furnace lie
Ere from the dross of earth it comes forth pure.

Life's sweetest songs are borne on wings of night ;
Earth's bosom rent, yields up her richest store ;
Through Error's veil there burns the star of Right,
And Truth is far more radiant than before.

The wounded flower pours forth its fragrant breath,
And dying sends to Heav'n its rich perfume ;
And through the portals of unwelcome Death,
Behold, the Tree of Life doth always bloom !

Be still, my soul, nor murmur, nor repine ;
Why should'st thou weep? The gloom will soon be past,
And thou shalt find a sweeter lot is thine
Where glory beams, and joys for ever last.

Digitized by Google



A BOLT FROM THE BLUE

BY

DORA LANGLOIS

Illustrated by CHAS. D. WARD.

CHAPTER I.

"DO you see him over there? That is he."

"What! The big man with the fair beard trimmed to a point, and the boyish face? Is that really this Francis Osborne?"

"Yes, that is Frank Osborne, only son of the late Mr. Justice Osborne, Recorder of Docktown. His father was always a little queer, you know—believed in 'the quality of mercy' and all that kind of thing, and the son improves upon his father's model."

The scene was a crush at the British Embassy in Paris, and Lady Emilia Dachet, to whom this original character was pointed out, raised her lorgnette and regarded him critically.

"I wish someone would go and bring him here," she said, lazily. "The people one meets nowadays have got into such a dreadful groove of sameness that it is always refreshing to meet one of these oddities. I can't see him very well from here; but I suppose he is not good form—wears his neck-tie awry, and cultivates a big bass voice! All the men do it who have elected to mount the platform and talk to working-men about 'the horny-handed son of toil.'"

"Strange to say, Mr. Osborne does none of these things," remarked a third lady—a placid woman, more than middle-aged, with a sweet, calm face. "He has not appeared as a public speaker yet."

"Oh! You really must pardon me. I quite thought he was 'a man and a brother.'"

"Not in that sense; and, as for the set of his neck-tie, you shall judge for yourself. I will present him as soon as I can catch his eye, and beckon him to come here. I don't think, Lady Emilia, that his voice will startle you; one or two society women have thought it soft and winning; and I think I could point out to you some poor homes in the low quarters of this and other cities where it has made music on occasions."

Lady Emilia was a society dame who had made in her early youth the customary exchange of patrician and maidenly charms for a good establishment. Marriage with the sort of man her husband was had proved a complete education of a kind. The hollowness and depravity of society were an open page to her, of which not one paragraph was left unconned. She had come through stainless, owing more, perhaps, to a certain hardness in her nature than to the possession of any beautiful or high ideal; she believed in neither God nor devil, man nor woman; she loved and admired nothing—not even herself (the cynicism of her nature forbade that), though, like a true sybarite, she was particularly careful of her own bodily well-being.

"Ah!" she said. "Here comes your modern Bayard sans peur et sans reproche," for Osborne, having turned and caught sight of her companion, was making towards them.

Digitized by Google

"Sans peur he is, no doubt," answered Miss Wilfred, in a hurried undertone. "The other he cannot hope to remain for long. You ought to know enough, Lady Emilia, to be aware that no man can oppose all the preconceived notions of his age and his set, without coming to grief sooner or later."

"My dear Miss Wilfred, if you will accept the assurance from a man who has had his back to you, possibly for the last ten minutes—I have been looking for you everywhere—except, of course, in the right place. I want to tell you——"

"Some other time, Mr. Osborne. Now I am going to present you to Lady Emilia Dachet. Lady Emilia — Mr. Osborne," and, with her quiet smile, Miss Wilfred having completed the introduction, turned away, and left the two together.

"If you can spare the time from your more important avocations, Mr. Osborne, I should like you to talk to me a little," her ladyship said. She had taken in the tout ensemble of the man at a glance, and was now regarding him with as little apparent interest as though he were a very familiar object. She had an insolent and daring way of saying and doing what she liked not uncommon to the women of her set—noticeable also among the women of quite another order; but with her it might be said that what she did seemed right.

Osborne caught her vein, and, determining not to be serious with her, answered:

"Don't accuse me of having any avocation here, Lady Emilia. Believe me, I am not such a boor as to bring such a thing into these sacred precincts. If I possess an avocation, I have certainly left it at home, with my boots and my morning coat."

"You will not escape me in that way," she laughed. "I know that you have ideas, and I want to hear about them. It is so seldom that we meet with anyone in our set who has anything of that sort to spare, that it is quite refreshing."

She had quite decided in her one swift glance that Osborne, though a "crank" perhaps, was not so to outward seeming. She had an eye for beauty, too; and there was a certain masculine beauty about the figure of this man, and those portions of the face not covered by his beard, that reminded her of that ideal for ever immortalised by Michael Angelo's David.

To Osborne was given the happy quality of being able to be serious himself, without resenting the levity of others; and, though naturally annoyed (Lady Emilia always commenced by annoying those whom she wished later on to enslave), he answered: "I dread so much the crime of boring you, that I shall tell you nothing, unless in the categorical style."

"That means to say that I am to exert myself," she said, with a flashing smile. "Well, if you can make me exert myself, you have done wonders. This Eight-Hours question now, a horrid subject, bald and uninteresting to the last degree, as a rule; how do you find the thing work in your home?"

"You know then that I have an eight-hours day for all my servants?"

"Yes; one hears that, as soon as one hears you mentioned. How does it work?"

"Very well, I believe. I am satisfied; and I assure you that, in spite of a generally-accepted belief to the contrary, I do get my boots cleaned, and my clothes brushed, much like other people."

There was a merry twinkle in his kindly brown eyes, and Lady Emilia, noting it, tapped the palm of her hand with her fan.

"Let us be serious," she said. "How did you——"

"Get converted? Will that phrase do?"

"Yes. How did you begin? I don't want to know how you came to uphold the movement for factory hands, and those sort of people. Your arguments for that would be the usual ones, I suppose, and I know all about them, and really could not work up a semblance of interest. I mean, how did you come to take the idea home?"

"If I must tell you——"

"Oh, you must, of course; so far, I have done all the talking."

"Well, the affair was simple enough. I had been at the meeting of a debating society, serving my apprenticeship for greater things, which have not yet arrived; and I believe I expounded my views warmly, and advocated the public movement with enthusiasm. On my return home, fired with my own ardour, and not a little pleased with myself as a budding friend of man, I found a drowsy footman waiting for me in the hall, and had my brandy and soda brought me by an anæmic, jaded-looking maid. Something in the faces of those people reminded me of the pathetic picture I myself had drawn, a couple of hours before, of the commercial operatives who have no time to call their souls their own. I asked the girl when she had risen; she told me at six o'clock; it was then 2.30. I inquired if she was likely to rise at the same hour that morning. She answered hastily and apologetically: 'Oh, yes, sir, of course.' I told her to go away and have her breakfast in bed. She decamped, convinced that I was either mad or drunk, certainly dangerous, and I resolved then and there on the course I have adopted since."

Digitized by Google

LADY EMILIA DACHET REGARDED HIM CRITICALLY.

"With success?"

"Well, possibly only with partial success at first."

"I don't understand it. If your servants work only eight hours a day it seems to me that you must get your breakfast or your dinner yourself. Fancy the clock striking, just as Mary Jane has sent up the soup, and having to come down oneself to take up the fish, only to find it in rags!"

Osborne laughed. "We did have one or two mishaps at first, I admit," he said. "Overtime saved us from a domestic crash, however, until I had got my system cut and dried. My people now begin at different hours; 'shifts' is the commercial term, Lady Emilia. After the expiration of the eight hours they are no more my servants than the cotton operative outside the mill. I should no more ask one of them to hand my hat and cane than I should think of flying. To our domestic state occasions they look forward as to a harvest, the harvest of overtime, and we rub along contentedly, I assure you."

Digitized by Google

"Yet you don't live en garçon?"

"No; my sister heads my household at present, and my cousin, Miss Rayne, is always with us."

"And isn't it very expensive?"

"No. I don't think so. I cut my coat according to my cloth, for I am anything but a millionaire. My people's eight hours' work is real work. It is not that weary, purposeless dawdling about, waiting at the beck and call of others, which constitutes the existence of the average domestic. It is brisk, invigorating, lively. If I have—and I am not sure of that—one or two more hands than I absolutely need, what does it matter? No man can hate me because he feels himself my drudge; no, nor woman either, thank Heaven."

"And your men-servants—I don't mean your bailiffs and stewards, and the like—but your grooms and footmen, are they really married men?"

"Why not? Having but eight hours' work to put in at my house, they are at liberty to live in cottages on my estate if they like. It would be contre règle to discuss the question in all its bearings with you, Lady Emilia, but do not our newspapers constantly deplore the vices of the servants' hall? Does not every householder know, from some sort of painful experience, what those vices are, and what they lead to? I tell you candidly that the basements of some houses to which our women-folk go, unhesitatingly, are little better than—but there, this is not the time or place to mount my hobby. I only bore you."

There was a sparkle of interest in Lady Emilia's eyes; not that he told her anything new; she had kept house too long (Mr. Dachet's house, which reflected in the basement the characteristics of its proprietor) not to understand all that he left unsaid; but it amused her that any man should care about these things, or trouble his head so long as his dinner was served properly, the attendance neat and punctual. It stirred her, too, in some vague, undefined manner she had never felt before.

"You do not bore me, Mr. Osborne; far from it. You have interested me deeply." She was very gracious, and she could be so when she chose; but even as she spoke she saw that his eyes were wandering among the throng. He was not impressed by her change of tone. "You are looking for someone? Don't apologise if you have friends to rejoin. I must not monopolise you."

"My sister and cousin are here," he explained. "Miss Osborne does not speak French, and Miss Rayne is not used to these crushes yet. I am supposed to be looking after them, but I fear I have neglected my duty."

She made a slight inclination of the head, equivalent to a bow of dismissal, and he left her side. A moment or two later the person who had first pointed him out came up to her—a certain fleshy Mrs. Gunter.

"Well, Lady Emilia, how do you like Miss Wilfred's favourite?" she asked. "Do you not find him an original?"

"I find him breezy and refreshing in a way," was the reply. "He is more interested in things and more impressive than the majority; but he does not go the length of being ridiculous. Positively I did not get a single laugh at his expense."

"He takes himself seriously," replied Mrs. Gunter, glancing sideways with her beady eyes at the relict of the late Mr. Dachet. "I wonder what marriage will make of him?"

"Marriage! Oh! The pretty cousin? His fiancée is here then to-night?"

"No, she is not here. It is not the little cousin. The fiancée would hardly be received here, though, by the way, she is one of the handsomest women in Paris."

"Indeed?" said Lady Emilia, stifling a yawn. "It is to be hoped they will be happy, and all that kind of thing. That sort of man usually makes a mésalliance, I suppose. Not that it matters much. I don't know that any of the Osbornes were distinguished before the time of his father, the Recorder," and then her ladyship wrapped herself up in her mantle of bored exclusiveness and drifted away among her many friends.

"Hullo! By yourself, Eva? Now that's what I call a special dispensation of Providence. Where's Maria? Why isn't she looking after you?"

Digitized by Google

It was Osborne, who, after threading the crowded reception rooms for some time in search of his missing relatives, had come suddenly on a fair young girl alone under one of the palms of a small conservatory. She looked up, brightening at his approach, and answered:

"The fact is, Frank, Maria seems to have some fish of her own to fry to-night. There is an ugly Frenchman here, who has quite monopolised her, while I——"

"Have been left to shift for yourself? Eh, little woman?"

"I don't know that that matters, Frank, since you seem pleased to find me alone."

The girl was twenty, but she looked even younger; there was something immature about her beauty, which lay chiefly in her large violet eyes, her pale creamy skin, and beautiful fair hair; but almost appealingly childish as she looked in her simple white robes, there was a self-restraint about her, even a suggestion of sadness, which seemed to indicate that the brave and steadfast spirit had already struggled and conquered in that long conflict which we call life.

"But where does the dispensation come in? Why would Maria be in the way?"

"Because," he answered, dropping into a chair, and turning his face full on her, "I am out of sympathy to-night with her and with all this host of gad-flies."

"You are not sad, Frank?"

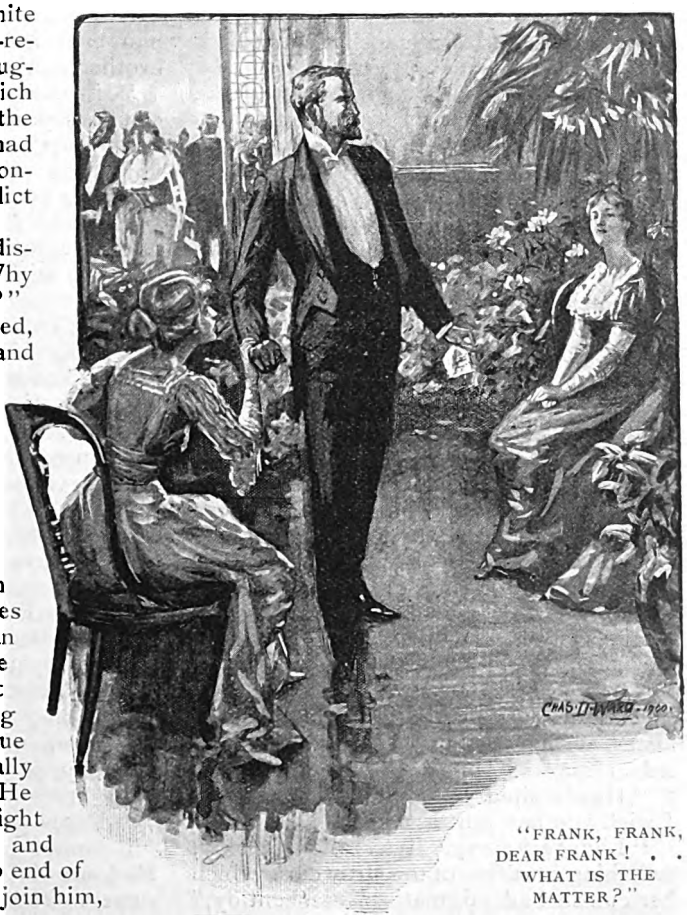
"No, not sad; too happy, Eva, for all this crush and chatter. There are times when happiness makes an idiot of a man; and on those occasions it is as well that he should be alone. Coming here I passed a man in a blue blouse, who was ecstatically happy about something. He was dancing out there right in front of the vehicles and pedestrians, and having no end of a good time. I wanted to join him, I did, indeed. He was not drunk, you know, only just purely, absolutely happy. I would have given a pocketful of money to throw my crush-hat up into the air after his blue cap, and with my hands on my hips start off as his vis-à-vis in the mazes of that intoxicating dance."

"Poor fellow! I hope his cause for joy was as good and as lasting as yours, Frank."

He took her little gloved hand and pressed it with brotherly tenderness.

"Eva," he said, "you have always been my little comrade, since the days I used to carry you, a fluffy-headed baby, pick-a-back round the house; but never have you been so good to me as in your championship of Helga."

The girl smiled bravely into his face. "I can't remember those pick-a-back rides," she answered, "though I know you have often recalled them, to the peril of my dignity when I have been trying to



"FRANK, FRANK, DEAR FRANK! . . WHAT IS THE MATTER?"

Digitized by Google

please Maria by being duly proper and 'grown up.' Our first meeting always seems to me to have been in the dim hall at King's-Barton, where Maria first brought me home after my father's funeral. What you did for me then, Frank, it seems I can never repay; but Helga needs no champion—to see her is to know that you two must be happy together."

"And yet," he said, his brows contracting, "Maria does not like her—can't endure her, in fact, though Heaven alone knows why — unless it be that she is beautiful, my senior by at least a year, and a widow ——"

The girl had turned her head away a little. "Surely those are her advantages," she said in a low voice. "A young wife"—here her voice broke for a moment in what might have been a birth-strangled sob—"a young wife might love you dearly, and sympathise in your life-work; but she could never be the helpmate you will find in Helga. Sometimes I think it was her passionate championship of the oppressed in her own land that first drew you to her."

"What are you two hiding away like this for?" demanded a rather acrimonious voice from behind the greenery, round which a tall, hard-favoured woman of middle-age advanced upon them. "I have been looking for you everywhere?"

"Indeed, Maria? I fancy we have been playing hide-and-seek then. I have but just found Eva."

"And very untidy she looks with her hair like a bird's nest! We ought to be getting our wraps on, if we are to drop in at Lady Stanley's ball. By the way, Frank, here is a letter for you. It was brought just now by a special messenger, and the servants handed it to me. A French gentleman, who has been very polite and attentive, and whose name is Durand, told me you were here, and brought me through the rooms. It seems he once knew our father well. You may as well read your letter; we can wait."

With a muttered "Thank you," Osborne tore the envelope, and his half-sister, dropping into a chair by Eva's side, remarked:—

"How insipid you look to-night, child. I wish you had a little more style."

"I am very sorry," Eva replied, meekly, twitching at a few of the stray curls which her cousin had stigmatised as "untidy," in a useless endeavour to pull them straight. "I can't make my hair lie flat like yours, Maria."

"Ugh! How oppressively hot it is here. I suppose Frank will just drop us at Lady Stanley's and then go on for half-an-hour to Madame Katiskoff's. He makes an idiot of himself about tha woman. Eh, what's the matter now?"

"Frank, Frank, dear Frank!" It wa a cry from Eva that interrupted her. She had her hand on his arm, her eyes raised inquiringly to his pale face. "What is the matter? What—what has happened?"

"Nothing, nothing," he answered, breaking from her and advancing on his sister, the letter crushed in his hand, his voice trembling with anger. "It is common knowledge that the world is full of slanderers, that it is sufficient for a human being to be perfectly happy for some soured wretch to strike at that happiness for the mere wanton pleasure of destroying it."

Eva stood transfixed by the storm that had broken loose, but Maria faced her brother unflinchingly.

"If you will condescend to explain the cause of your agitation, Frank, we shall be in a better position to sympathise with you," she said, though her tones were anything but sympathetic.

He held the paper towards her, and asked, bluntly: "Do you know the writer of this anonymous epistle or its contents?"

"No, I do not," she answered.

"I beg your pardon, Maria," he muttered, hoarsely, thrusting it into his breast-pocket. "I—I did you a great injustice."

He was quite convinced. He knew his sister's virtues as well as her failings—that she, who would tell an untimely and disagreeable truth at the risk of alienating her best friends, would not tell a direct falsehood on any account whatever.

"Pray don't apologise," she said, "I am used to having disagreeable things laid to my door without inquiry; so if Eva will kindly come for her wraps instead of standing staring there, as though an injustice to me was anything astonishing, we may perhaps reach Lady Stanley's to-night."

"Maria—Eva," Osborne stammered, "I cannot take you there. I must see Madame Katiskoff at once. Shall I find someone to accompany you?"

Digitized by Google

"No, no, never mind, Frank," Eva pleaded. "Maria does not care, and really I do not wish to go now. I am so sorry for your trouble. Can we do nothing?" and she slipped her soft fingers coaxingly into his palm.

He shook his head, and, disengaging himself gently, asked: "What is it to be, Maria? Shall I offer Mrs. Gunter a seat in the carriage?"

"You may as well. She will jump at the chance. She's a regular society stop-gap, is that woman," Maria retorted. Then, as with a broken "good-night" he hurried away, she added: "Don't be ridiculous, Eva. We are not going to offend our friends because Frank sees fit to alter his plans. Come to the cloak-room at once, and, mark my words, something has happened which will eventually separate Francis from that odious and designing woman, Helga Katiskoff."

For one moment the girl's colour mounted, and there was a strange, eager gleam in her wistful eyes. Then she mastered herself again and said:

"I hope not, Maria. I sincerely hope and trust that that may never be," and the aspiration came from the bottom of her pure, unselfish heart.

CHAPTER II.

While these scenes were being enacted in the reception rooms at the British Embassy a very beautiful woman was waiting impatiently in her pretty salon in the Avenue Victor Hugo. A dozen times she consulted the clock, a dozen times she moved to the mirror, to glance anxiously at her own reflection, then paused, listening for the sound of the expected footfall.

"I must arrange all quickly." she murmured to herself. "There is no time to lose. Ah! But for his sister we might marry at once. Hark! Is it not his step? Yes, he is here at last."

The door had opened, and she advanced, her face lighting with a radiant smile.

"My friend," she said, with that seductive accent which makes the title "friend" sound infinitely sweeter than all our love phrases strung together, "you are late. You promised you would be here before midnight. This is not usual with you. How is it?"

"I received a communication," he answered, "which delayed me."

She gave him one swift glance, then said, lightly: "No matter, you have arrived. We will spend what remains of the evening tête-à-tête."

"You don't ask what that communication was?" he remarked.

"Truly no. If you wish to tell me I shall hear all in good time. If not, I shall conclude you have other things to say to me which, to my foolish ears, are better worth attention."

Still he stood aloof. "It may interest you to know," he said, "that I received a letter a quarter of an hour ago from a person who describes himself as your husband's friend." The face the woman saw in the mirror could no longer lie to her. It was visibly contracted by pain and anxiety, but she answered, calmly:

"My late husband had no friends save the vicious and depraved. The man must be bold indeed to write to you. Is he begging?"

"No," retorted Osborne, for it was he, "he seeks for nothing. But he gives me some interesting information, for he tells me that Helga Katiskoff is no widow, that her husband still lives.

The woman let the tress of hair fall loose upon her snowy shoulders, and, turning, faced him.

"Then," she said, "I demand to know who it is who dares to say that that man still cumbers the ground?"

"Do you deny it, Helga?" he insisted. "That is the great thing. Have you proof of his death? Proof, reasonable proof, was needed by the woman who contemplated becoming mistress of an English home."

"I thought him dead," she said, slowly. "I think so still. To think otherwise would be to make my life a hell. To prove him living would be to plant a dagger here," and she clasped her hands upon her heaving breast.

"And yet," he said, looking down upon her as she bent towards him, "I must have proofs. You should have been the one to give them to me, though, in my blind love and confidence, I never thought of asking for them. Now I must seek them elsewhere, seek them with the knowledge at my heart that the woman I trusted so entirely, recklessly sought to deceive herself if she did not wilfully seek to deceive me."

"Stop!" she cried. "Do me justice. You are speaking as though you accepted this man's statement as fact. You are prejudging the case. I was a widow in my own esteem. I had proof enough to satisfy me before we met. Then you came and told me that your life's happiness was centred in me. Was it then my duty to become dissatisfied with proofs that had seemed ample before? Perhaps—perhaps it was. But oh! I had not the strength to shatter your air-built castles even for an hour, by saying, 'I did not stand beside that wretch's death-bed. I do not know where to look for his grave.' Your happiness, your peace was more to me than my own."

Digitized by Google

"Happiness and peace," he rejoined, sternly, "are not for the man wedded to a woman who has another husband living. Have you considered what my life would have been should that man have returned in the flesh, after you had become the mistress of my home, the mother, perhaps, of children of mine? Helga, Helga, what can a man think of a woman who could contemplate an action which might make such a state of things possible?"

"Think of such a woman?" she repeated. "Why ask me? Go tell your sister. Ask her, she will tell you what to think. I have done wrong, it seems, in being satisfied that because I am free from persecution therefore that man must be dead. And yet the reasoning is sound. Even now, in spite of your mysterious letter, I cannot think that he lives while I am at peace. But prove it, prove it beyond the shadow of a doubt, and I will revenge you for the wrong you have received—this terrible deception practised by a loving heart. Listen, then, my friend. If I am his wife and not his widow I will return and live with him. Ah, Heaven, that will be a penance indeed! I shall slip from your arms back into the arms of the soiled beast of the gutter, and your sister will say that I am justly punished."

No vindication of herself could have had so great and powerful an effect on him. He caught her wildly in his arms.

"I'd rather make his death a certainty myself," he muttered, "than see you return to him. You are more mine than his."

A swift, triumphant smile flashed across her mobile face. "Yours," she whispered, "and yours only, and for ever if you will have it so."

"Helga," he asked, "why did you not divorce this man long ago? From what you have told me, it seems he gave you cause enough. You were separated from him a long time before you thought him dead. You must have been, for you have often spoken to me of his following and threatening you. Why did you not put him out of your life in the only reasonable way?" She did not answer immediately, and he went on. "It is not too late even now. Your life has been blameless, and if he is still above ground we will make him stand forth, the cur that he is, and get the law to remove the bonds which he broke, leaving the fetters on you."

He trembled in the intense excitement of this new idea. With feminine sophistry she had convinced him that he had not been greatly wronged, that she had not acted a shameless, but only a foolish part, and his heart was as fully open to her as ever.

The woman's hands were clasped together, and lines of care were tracing themselves upon her brow.

"Why did I not?" she reiterated. "Ah! It is so easy to talk thus, to talk like a child. If I could have freed myself should I have waited for death to help me? If I could free myself now should I care whether he rots above ground or under it?"

"Helga," he whispered, an accent of doubt in his voice again, "surely, surely you can free yourself if you choose? No country would refuse her freedom to a woman so shamelessly wronged as you have been, provided she herself were blameless."

"I am a Pole," she answered, in a low voice, "and my country is Russia, Holy Russia!" And she laughed a bitter, mirthless laugh.

"But'——' he protested.

"No matter the Russian laws," she interrupted him imperatively. "They cannot help me. I was married in St. Petersburg; I lived with my husband there. There he committed those acts which give me a moral right to freedom, but"—she leant forward and looked into his face, for she was still standing, and he had dropped heavily into a chair—"I should only purchase freedom for my soul at the expense of my body. I should exchange there, in St. Petersburg, the chain of a hated union for those other chains that are only too plentiful there."

"My God!" he cried. "What do you mean?"

Digitized by Google

THE NEXT INSTANT SHE STRUCK THE GLASS FROM HIS HANDS.

CHAPTER III.

She laughed again, a laugh that was more cutting to his heart than any burst of tears.

"Those pretty chains, those light chains," she said, "which the Great White Father, the loving parent of a vast people, forges for men's strong arms and limbs like these," and she extended her supple wrists held close together. "They are ornaments, indeed, which the recipient need not fear to lose; for though the mementos of an Emperor's favour, they go safely with the wearer over miles of frozen road. Divorce, my friend, divorce! Would it give me to your arms? No; I am a Pole, and every Polish woman with a heart to feel, a brain to contrive, has some time in her life done wild deeds, or thought wild thoughts about her country, the country which once knew a Stanislaus. Figure it to yourself, then, that freed in St. Petersburg of my husband, I should not come to you, but to the convict's chain, the lash, the frozen road, and perhaps (why should I not say it, for it is true?) to the forced embraces of one or two of the Czar's faithful servants, who must needs have some relaxation on the weary road."

Digitized by Google

"Helga! You are then——"

"The truth must out," she answered. "I have been, and to some extent I am—well, let us leave the word unsaid. You Englishmen hate it, because you have never felt the iron rod which enters into the heart, and so corrodes the blood that every good instinct turns into a bad one. I began—hush, listen!—I began as those who are patriots do, willing to fight wrong with wrong. I thought that the wrongs inflicted on us excused what wrong we did. I learnt with riper knowledge that two wrongs do not bring the world nearer right. I am weary, weary. I wish to blot out the past, to escape from it; but in St. Petersburg—where the freedom lies of which you speak—my fate awaits me. Now you know the truth."

"Then, Helga," he said, slowly, "if this report prove true—if your husband still lives—there is no hope for us?"

She sank upon her knees, and wound her arms about him as he sat.

"Is there any hope anywhere?" she asked. "Sometimes I doubt it. Now that you know all, would things be as they were, supposing the report a malicious lie? Could you, would you still take me to your heart?"

"Can you doubt it?" he answered. "With your dear face so near my heart, can you fancy that it does not beat true to you in spite of the past?"

She looked up suddenly, a new light in her eyes. Some gentle angel—if the pretty myth be true, and the Great Father gives us guardian spirits—was moving her to say something to him then, to tell him something of that past which was as yet hidden from his view. But she had only learnt the art of attaining her end by tortuous paths, and her heart was crying out to her that she must keep this man—keep him against all comers.

She sobbed, but did not speak.

"If you can wait for me, Helga," he said, "I will wait for you, though our union be postponed until our heads are grey. Be true to me, and I will be true to you. For better or worse, in the darkness without joy; separated by the world and the knowledge of right and wrong, our hearts will still be one. Can a man give more to prove his love, and ask for less?"

The woman shivered and trembled in every limb; never before had those stains upon the soul he spoke of as united through suffering to his own, seemed one half so black, and yet the triumph was hers.

"We may have years to wait," she murmured. "What have I ever known of any man to make me think that one would wait for me?"

She rose suddenly, her eyes flashing with excitement. "It is only a question of time, then," she cried; "a few weeks, if this man be dead; months, years, perhaps, if he lives. Some day I shall be your wife. Should one of us go out before the other, it will not be here, but hereafter. It is your wish to bind yourself to me and me to you, as firmly, and as truly, as though we were to live the happy life we dreamt of. If it may not be for happiness, you will bind yourself to me for pain and weary waiting. Dare you swear to do it?"

"My word," he answered, "and my oath are one."

"Then make me happy," she cried. "Take from my heart the pang of fearing that I shall lose you in the end. Have you ever seen a Jewish wedding? No? I have, in my own country, Poland, and I remember the rite, but not the form. Come, we will paraphrase both for ourselves."

Passing to the sideboard, she poured out some red wine, placed the glass in his right hand; then opened a little Greek Testament which lay on the table, put her right hand upon it, and indicated that he was to cover it with his left.

Digitized by Google

"Now," she said, her face radiant with triumph, "repeat after me: By the Supreme Being, I take this woman as mine——"

Fired by the contagion of her eagerness, he did as she desired, without pausing to reflect.

"By the Supreme Being, I take this woman as mine," he said.

"To love her living, to mourn her dead," she went on, the words coming from her lips like wind sighing through summer foliage.

"To love her living, to mourn her dead," he repeated, his own voice trembling on the words.

"While I live, she shall have no other husband. While she lives, I will have no other wife, so help me, God!"

More firmly than before, he followed her this time.

"While I live, she shall have no other husband. While she lives I will have no other wife—so help me, God!"

The next instant she struck the glass from his hands, and it shattered on the ground into a hundred pieces. With a sigh, she bade him put his foot upon the fragments.

"As this vessel shall never be reconstructed, so shall these words never be unsaid."

He hurried over the words, and held out his arms to receive her, but she drew back; her quick ear had caught the sound of footsteps in the vestibule.

"Frank, my friend," she cried, "what is to-day?"

"The tenth of the month," he answered.

"True, true; I had forgotten," she whispered, with a blanching face.

"Who is the man who has just been admitted?" he demanded, hoarsely. "I have a right to know, unless this"—and he pointed to the Testament, on which her hand still rested, and then downward to the wine stain on the floor—"has been nothing but a meaningless farce!"

"You shall know," she rejoined, "but not now—not while he is here. I dare not speak, I dare not tell you now. For the love of the gentle Christ, be patient with me, Frank! He is the past; that portion of it which is not connected with my husband. Into the hands of such men as he, we—we who are patriots—give ourselves, when we dream pure dreams of freedom for our beloved country. He is all eyes, all ears. I dare not say another word."

"But what must I do—what say to my own people?"

"Nothing, but that our marriage is postponed. I will see you again; we will look for traces of my husband. But go now—go!"

The servant had closed the door of the adjoining apartment upon the new-comer, and, bewildered and distressed, Osborne found himself a few minutes later under the lamps and the lime trees of the Avenue Victor Hugo.

As for the woman, she pressed her hands upon her bosom, and leant heavily against the table to steady herself.

"It is the summons——it is the summons from No. 13, Rue de l'Esperance," she murmured. "I had forgotten—forgotten that to-night they would draw for the next mission to St. Petersburg. I, to forget a thing like that! I, to forget everything in my love!"

She gathered her silken draperies in her hand, and, stepping over the wine-stain on the floor, advanced to the portière which admitted to the little salon.

The room was but dimly lighted, and under the one lamp stood a tall, ascetic-looking man. There was something of the priest about his remarkable aspect and bearing; yet he did not wear the garments of the Church.

On his face was the absolute calm of an anchorite, who thinks but no longer feels.

"Comrade," he said, looking her over critically as she advanced, "have you received news of our companion No. 113?"

She shook her head. "I have heard nothing since he wrote to tell me that on the morrow he would cross the frontier," she replied. "In that letter he bade me adieu for ever. He did not think he should succeed. He went to the task as one who has no hope. He was too young, too inexperienced. I thought so, and I said so from the first. Who knew him as well as I? Had you not made me work with him?"

He shrugged his shoulders. "We can but work with the tools we have," he said. "When the task is simple and requires only courage—that is to say, when the only drawback is the almost certain danger—we employ those who are fellow-craftsmen merely. If they fail, they fail; we have given them to the cause. If they succeed, the cause retains them for herself."

Digitized by Google

"Then the worst is feared?"

"The worst is known," he corrected her. "We have no fears. Ah! It is difficult to make a woman fit even for the position you occupy in the second degree. Women fail to grasp those ideas which must lead us; without which we are nothing. The worst was anticipated when he left us. We do not fear or hope. There was a chance. He took it by lot; we took it with him. The venture has not prospered, that we know. We have no news directly from himself, therefore we assume that he was not in a position to send any. He might have set the very world alight by his deed. He has not done so. He might, on the other hand, have engulfed us all, so far as lies in the power of a mere craftsman. He has not done that either; therefore we say that he was staunch to the end; and to-night I, president of the ten, placed his number on the roll of the faithful comrades who have departed."

She did not speak, she merely bowed her head; and the master, regarding her closely, added: "To-night his private papers were all destroyed."

In spite of herself a sudden glance of interest, a sigh of relief escaped her.

"All, all were destroyed?" she asked.

"By an order from the unseen three," he replied.

"There is nothing more to say, then?" she demanded. "You have nothing further to tell me?"

There was anxiety in her voice, try how she would to steady it.

"One thing more," he replied, calmly. "To-night we drew lots from the members of the second degree for the next mission to St. Petersburg. You were absent, comrade."

There was neither anger nor condemnation in his quiet, even tones, but the woman turned as white as a sheet.

"I forgot," she answered. "I acknowledge my fault and await my sentence."

"No matter," he continued. "I knew your loyalty too well to believe that you were purposely absent. Therefore, exercising my prerogative, I did you the service of drawing for you."

"You were very good," she answered, faintly. "What was the result?"

The man regarded her with a kind of lofty pity for an emotion he could not understand. "Until you can take the result of such a chance, comrade, with absolute calm," he said, "you are unfit for the position you now hold. You have won and held it so far by your ability, but you are one of those promising students who learn too fast at first, and who are petted and thought more of by their masters than they deserve."

A wave of rebellion swept over her. "The result—the result?" she panted. "Let me know it quickly."

"It is a great mission," he went on slowly; "and you were highly honoured in being thought fit to undertake it. The result was that I, drawing for you, drew a blank. I beg you to excuse my lack of fortune. You will not as yet have the opportunity of being ranked among those who have risked martyrdom for the cause."

She shivered and drew herself together.

"The mission was so grave and so great that in fairness to those aspiring members who could not take part in this drawing, it was arranged before the lots were drawn that all who participated on this occasion should not draw again for a period of six months. Your presence, therefore, before the council of ten is not required for six calendar months from this date, though you have permission to present yourself should you require to do so."

A great relief was apparent in her face in the fact that her figure had lost its drooping attitude, but she answered only: "I accept the ruling."

He moved towards the door. "I wish you a good-night and au revoir," he said. "By the way," he added, stepping back to her side, "when did you last hear from your husband?"

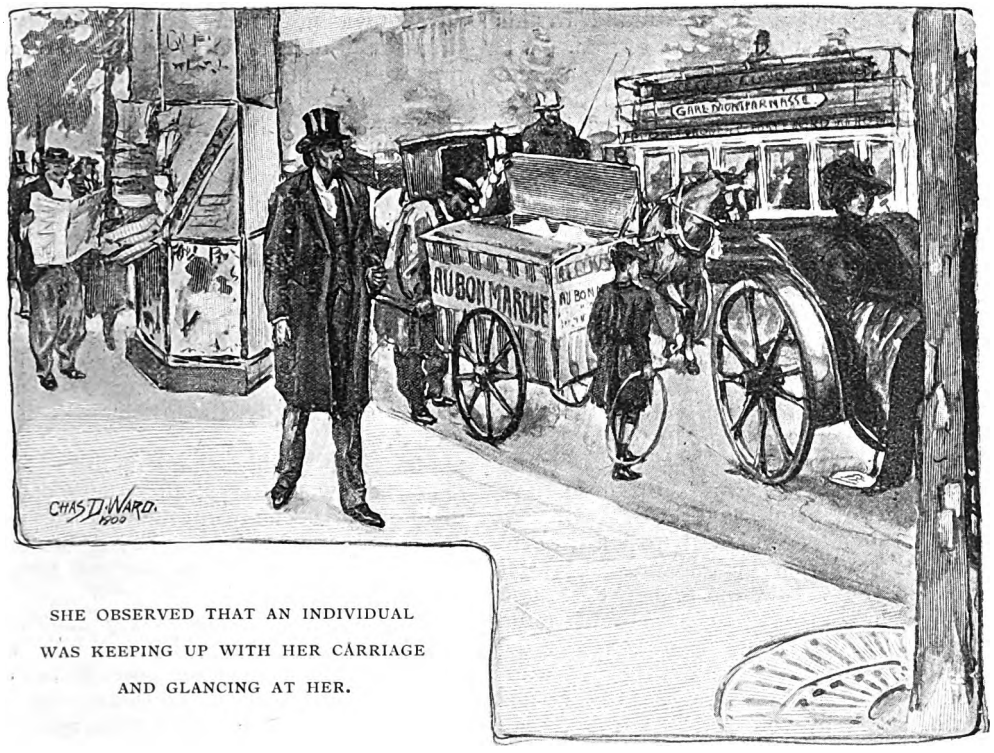
She did not dare to lie to this man as she had lied to the man who loved her.

"I hear of him every day. He is in a home for inebriates. He cannot last much longer, his state is now a living death."

"Good," replied the master. "He was always a useless beast from whom no good could come. Possibly before the expiration of your term of rest he will be gone. Then you will be free from all distractions, let us hope, and able and willing to devote yourself entirely to the cause."

Was there a sneer or a covert threat in his words? The woman could not tell; but in her heart she was determined to defy him—to make such use of the time before her as to place herself beyond his power.

Digitized by Google



SHE OBSERVED THAT AN INDIVIDUAL WAS KEEPING UP WITH HER CARRIAGE AND GLANCING AT HER.

"I have been over confident," he mused, as he strolled slowly away. "I had no right to allow her the chance of six months' grace. It would have been simple enough to preclude such a possibility. I had only to see that all the lots drawn for by the others were blanks, and that I myself held the one with the red cross, ready to substitute it for the one actually drawn by me. My authority would have borne me out in such an action. The thing, or something like it, has been done before; but I did not wish to drive her into open rebellion, and she is ripe for that. I did not wish to have to denounce her myself as a renegade. She has but to be weaned from her lover; or, since that seems impossible, I must see that he is weaned from her. She will then return and dedicate her glorious energies to the cause. It is for the cause that I am thus merciful to her, not for herself. What is she, with all her wit and beauty, more than any of our comrades? For her own sake she must return to us soon; even my authority cannot shield her much further. This Englishman received my letter and was distracted by it, yet he left her just now at least on amicable terms, as I judge from her eagerness to accept the six months' grace."

It was in a very unenviable frame of mind that Francis Osborne left his beautiful fiancée to her interview with the unseen visitant.

"I love and trust her all in all," he said to himself; "but if I am to be thrust out of her presence almost without time to bid her adieu, that she may be closeted in secret with a man whose power over her she herself admits, of whose honour I have no guarantee, the situation will become unbearable. If Maria would only help me I would remove her, take her away with us somewhere at once; but were I to propose such a thing, were I to hint at the necessity for the step, I'm afraid that she would hound Helga down and refuse to believe in the honesty of our intentions."

Occupied with these gloomy reflections, he wandered aimlessly down the Boulevard Hausmann, his only object to kill time somehow, so that Maria might not be up to greet him on his return; and when at last he thought it safe to make his way homeward, he found to his immense relief that she had retired.

Digitized by Google

"Monsieur will permit me to hand him a letter," said the garçon, who brought him a brandy and soda. "It was given to me by mam'selle, after madame had retired. Placing it in my hand, she said: 'Give this to monsieur on his return. Make no mistake; it is important.'"

Osborne took the letter, and, being an Englishman, paid the full market value of the smile which accompanied it; then, telling the fellow to leave the room, he tore the envelope, and read as follows:—

"Frank, dear Frank,—I am writing this in my bedroom, and in great haste, lest Maria should surprise me. I am afraid—very much afraid—that you have a great trial before you; but, if you can bear it—if it is your wish to show them all that you trust Helga—pray, pray let me help you. Take me to her, dear, and let us show people that we don't mind their envious malice and their cruel slanders. I can't say more; I only want you to know that while you stand by her, I will stand by you both. I know I am only a girl, and not much use; but you may like to have my sympathy, and it is yours, dear, from the bottom of my heart.—Eva."

"What can this mean?" he cried. "What does Eva know? I suppose she guessed something from what I said. I know I was maddened and spoke incautiously. Eva is as good as gold, and as true as steel! I wish Maria had some of her qualities, for I must thresh out the question of removing Helga with her in the morning; and if she refuses to help me I must look, with Eva's assistance, for some female relative likely to prove less obdurate. I can count on Eva; I can always count on her, thank God. My poor love! My poor Helga! I will not see her again till I have at least made some effort in her behalf. She must be uneasy and full of terror after that man's visit. I will write and tell her what I intend to do; she will get my letter first thing in the morning."

Through the long watches of the night, during which poor Osborne hardly slept at all, he arranged his plan of campaign, framing a hundred convincing arguments, a hundred forcible appeals to his sister's head and heart. He might have spared himself the trouble, for it so happened that he was not to have an opportunity of firing off the verbal battery so carefully prepared. Miss Osborne herself had something to say on the subject, and the reader misjudges her who thinks she was likely to allow her half-brother the benefit of the first or last word.

She had driven the previous evening (be it remembered) to Lady Stanley's ball in company with Mrs. Gunter, a penurious and sycophantic individual who was mistress of the art of living on her friends. In a word she was made use of by all, trusted by none, but by a conspiracy of silence, allowed to hold her own as a correct and worthy, though humble individual.

She thoroughly understood Miss Osborne's weaknesses, and guessed that dislike for the half-brother's fiancée was stronger than affection for the half-brother: so with an eye to futurity she laid herself out to please.

"By the way, what a very delightful person that Monsieur Durand is," she began, when they were seated in the carriage. "He asked me where he could find Mr. Osborne for you, as some note had been brought by a messenger for him. I suppose I owe the pleasure of accompanying you to the sender of the epistle, for no doubt it was that which caused your brother's departure. The note contains no bad news, I hope?"

"I don't know what it was," rejoined Maria. "My brother does not make me his confidante."

"I was afraid it might," murmured Mrs. Gunter, "because I heard a statement made to-night that literally astounded me. May I repeat it without offence? It is as well that you, who have so much sense, should know what is being said."

With cheeks now red, now pale, poor Eva caught the whispered revelation that the society stopgap was making to her cousin, and her heart turned sick with pure pity for those whom it concerned.

In the fulness of her heart she had written her little letter, but in the morning, confused by the recollection of her own temerity, she hardly dared to raise her eyes to Frank's, and when by chance she turned them on Maria, it was only to lower them again, trembling at the ominous expression that lady's countenance wore. Indeed, she was quite relieved when, after returning thanks with great unction for a meal which nobody had tasted, her cousin coughed slightly and said:

Digitized by Google

"I think your drawing-master must have arrived, my dear. Go and see."

Alone with her brother, Miss Osborne cleared her throat, took another chair that her judicial aspect might not be obscured by the coffee urn, and remarked:

"Well, Frank, you saw that person last night, I presume?"

Poor Osborne! Over at one blow went the fabric he had so carefully built up.

"Maria, to whom do you refer?" he stammered.

"To Madame Katiskoff, of course," was the blunt reply.

"Then why do you speak of her in that way?" he asked.

Maria gave vent to a short, unpleasant laugh. "I really don't know how else to speak of her," she said, "without using words unfit for my lips, and possibly unpleasant to your ears.

"Am I to understand," he demanded, "that you were really aware of the contents of that letter, all knowledge of which you denied last night?"

"I know nothing about that letter," she said, "but I may hazard a guess at its contents. At any rate, I know that all the men at the clubs are bandying about the name of the person who calls herself Madame Katiskoff, and that they do not treat it in a respectful manner."

"And how do you, a woman, a spinster, come to know anything of the unclean jests and foul slanders discussed in those places?" Frank inquired, angrily.

She bridled up at once. "I thank you, Frank, for your brotherly courtesy," she said. "Though I may choose to remain a spinster, I have married friends, who show me more confidence than I receive from some relatives. At any rate, I think that my state will compare favourably with that of a creature who, having one husband living, desires a second."

"Unfortunately, she is not in a position to deny that there may be some foundation for a rumour which has reached us stating that her husband is still living," he answered, hoarsely, "but you know that he deserted her long ago. She thought him dead; she is utterly prostrated by the bare supposition."

"Oh, no doubt she feels a very natural regret at seeing her prey escape the net."

"I do myself the honour," he corrected her, "of aspiring to the hand of a good and beautiful woman; but should this report prove true (and mark you, Maria, it may be not only false, but quite unfounded) Madame Katiskoff will not sue for freedom in the courts."

"And why not, pray?" demanded his sister, with a sudden change of front. "I had no idea she was so particular."

"She has her reasons," Osborne answered, "and I am satisfied with them."

"And yet you say that your engagement is not broken off?"

"It is not. I am engaged to marry her at the time originally arranged, supposing we can set all doubts at rest at once. If not, we shall marry, should we both outlive her husband, though his demise be postponed for years. That is a simple statement of the position, Maria. Does it satisfy you? It ought to, as you have conscientious scruples against the re-marriage of divorced persons."

"No, it does not," she retorted. "What are her reasons? That is the main question. My scruples are nothing to her. No doubt she knows, though Continental divorces are often granted when both parties have offended against the moral code, that you would not care to espouse a woman who had got her freedom in the courts, and left her honour and good name behind her there."

Osborne started as though he had been shot. The reason Helga had given him overnight, in the glow of the soft lights, with her passionate, tear-stained face close to his own, had seemed reasonable enough, but here was another hard, obvious, terrible; the cruel force of which lay in the fact that it found some echo in the recesses of his own heart, stirred by the visit of the man with whom he had left her.

"For pity's sake, don't try me too far, Maria!" he cried, wildly.

"I don't want to be hard, I'm sure," she responded, "but in the interest of the family, someone must show a little common sense. Whatever you may urge to the contrary, it is my intention to judge her past by her present conduct. I daresay you were both upset last night, but it is clearly her duty to dismiss you altogether for a time, and I hope you will be able to tell me that that is her intention before many hours are over."

"Maria," he said, "try to understand if you possibly can, that I don't want or value my freedom ; that all my hopes are centred in her, and that I will not accept a dismissal."

Digitized by Google

"Is she willing to offer you one, Frank? That is the great thing."

Again poor Osborne started painfully ; for the first time it struck him forcibly that all Helga's energies had been used in the other direction.

"Maria," he urged, "she sadly needs a friend. I am not going to give her up. In fact, I was going to beg you to help me to take her away——"

"Stop!" cried his sister. "If you don't know, she at least ought to, that I will have nothing to do with her till she can prove that she was innocent of the crime of contemplating a double marriage. What proof have you—what proof, I say—that she really did not know of her husband's existence?"

"I have my faith in her," he answered, doggedly.

"Your faith in her!" laughed Maria. "What a poor fool you must appear to certain people, Frank, if she has been (as it is quite possible to conceive that she may have been) in collusion with her husband all the while, keeping him quiet by the prospect of the rich picking to be made out of the infatuated Englishman."

"That will do!" thundered Osborne. "I will not hear another word," and, torn with a wild fury of impotent resentment, harassed by a thousand galling doubts, he burst from the room.

Then the champion of virtue folded her hands before her, smiled complacently, and remarked :

"He may go off with the creature, of course—that is only to be expected ; but there will never be a foreign mistress at the Hall."

CHAPTER IV.

The reader is not asked to accept Helga Katiskoff as the heroine of this narrative, though as "a woman with a past" an author would have fin de siècle fashion to support her claim to that distinction.

This creature, this modern Delia, who could be false as water or true as steel—whose complex nature contained the capacity for a great devotion, who when she had placed herself at the foot of a shrine was capable of immolating herself on its altar—loved Osborne well, but did not even dare to hope that he would never learn that which would rob her of his love. The disclosure relative to her husband's existence stood in the way of that marriage (legal or otherwise), which would have saved her for ever from her "friends" of the secret society ; but she had still the six months' grace permitted to her, and it seemed infinitely precious.

"I shall not see you, dearest, until to-night. By that time I hope to have devised some means of taking you away from your surroundings, to live where you will not only be among people upright and honourable, but where I myself may be near to watch over you till we can thrash this unhappy business out."

That was the substance of the brief message Osborne wrote her overnight and despatched before he saw his sister ; and though it gave her hope she sighed as she read it.

"This wretched business indeed!" she said. "But for it we need have had no she-dragon like Maria to mar our happiness. No matter, he will come to-night. I must be satisfied."

Meanwhile society was distasteful to her, but solitude and inaction absolutely unbearable ; and to kill time she ordered her carriage and directed her cocher to drive her somewhere—anywhere—where there was life and bustle.

The man set off at an unexciting pace, which presently dwindled to a walk as they got into a crush of other vehicles. They were near the pavement, and after a time she observed that an individual whom they had overtaken was keeping up with her carriage and glancing at her.

That she did not know him she was sure. He was tall, but stooped and carried his head bent forward as though short-sighted ; his face was sinister, his glance keen and furtive. There was a certain insolent boldness in his carriage, yet it did not seem to her, accustomed as she was to judge character at a glance, that the man was by nature bold. No, she did not know him ; yet, stay, he had raised his hat, looking straight into her eyes, at the same time making a swift, peculiar movement with his left hand. As though against her will she returned his bow.

"We have met before, madame."

"I think not. I cannot recall the occasion."

He laid his hand on the side of her victoria, which was now almost at a standstill, and corrected her :

Digitized by Google

"If my recollection serves me it was at the house of Monsieur Bonhomme, our common friend."

"Do you mean at No. 13, Rue de l'Espérance?" she queried, in a low voice.

"In the Rue de l'Espérance, of course," he answered. "A long time ago, shortly after the death of my father, aged seventy-four."

"My father reached the age of a hundred and one," she replied, in a dull, heavy tone like a child repeating a lesson painfully got by heart.

"Ah, yes," he said. "By the way, our mutual friend is moving shortly into the Rue de la Pays Libre."

"I saw him yesterday," she retorted, fretfully. "I shall not see him nor his family again for six months. I am exempt."

"Not from the first duty of all his relatives—fraternity," he corrected her.

"Get into the carriage," she said; and as he took his place beside her, she issued the brief order to her cocher "Return."

"You were not at the British Embassy last night," the man said, as their vehicle, extricating itself from the block, rolled in the other direction.

"I was not," she answered. "The invitations did not include me. In any case it would have been impossible. The Russian Ambassador was one of the guests. Were you there?"

"Yes," he said. "I thought it possible I might meet you; but that was not my object. I made there the acquaintance of an English lady, the daughter of a man whom I have cause to remember," and he smiled grimly to himself. "It is well to cultivate those who may one day be useful. Therefore, I do not regret my evening, though I failed to meet you."

She shuddered. The man was horribly in her way as it was, but anything was better than a rencontre in Osborne's presence would have been.

"Now," she said, when they had arrived at last, and she had conducted him into her petit salon and closed the door, "tell me briefly what your errand is, for I have trouble just now, and private business to which I have leave to attend. What do you require of me?"

"I desire a little of your society, comrade," he answered, dropping into an easy chair lately occupied by Osborne himself. "You shall permit me to drink to our friends."

"My house is open to the knock of a brother," she answered. "Do you require both meat and drink?"

"Not now," he answered, though he extended the glass he had emptied for more wine. "I wish particularly to be alone with you."

"Then," she said, "I must tell you frankly that it seems to me you are out of order. I am exempt, therefore you have not been sent to me by number ten. He has his pass-key, and comes and goes here at his will. I am one of the few to whom he is a personality, not merely a name, a voice in the air. There is no need for a messenger between him and me. I tell you I have my exemption direct from him."

"Our friend, Monsieur Bonhomme, must esteem you highly," he murmured, regarding her out of the corners of his eyes, "but there are others who sometimes employ messengers without troubling the leader of the ten."

"I expect no special message from the three," she answered, "nor have you proved yourself qualified to carry one." She paused as though expecting him to answer some sort of challenge implied in her words, but as he made no reply, only continued to regard her furtively, she went on: "How you come to know me I cannot guess, but I say again, unless you are the bearer of a special message you are out of order. Our charter does not allow us to make ourselves known to each other, except in times of emergency——"

"Or in cases of personal necessity. You forget that, comrade."

"If," she said, with evident relief, "the emergency is personal and not connected with the cause, you have but to tell me your needs, and I am bound to furnish you with the means to satisfy them so far as I am able."

"A hundred louis will serve," he answered. "My chemical and mechanical experiments are costly, comrade, as you no doubt will understand. They occupy my time. I make but little for myself."

She rose, unlocked her escritoire, and without further question passed him notes for two thousand francs, no doubt hoping to be all the sooner rid of him.

"Ah," he murmured, pocketing them without any acknowledgment just as a man might take up his own, "these experiments are truly expensive. It was I, by the way, who furnished the outfit for our dear Brother 113, who has gone on his way. He knew and trusted me. From him I heard of your fidelity; in his hands I saw your portrait."

Digitized by Google

"Our brother was brave and devoted, but he was a babble, I fear," she said, angrily, touched with the same restless impatience she had evinced the night before at the mention of that number. "Take what you have, comrade, and leave me now. Should you require more, remember that, as the emergency does not seem great, you must bring me the usual recommendation from one of the ten."

"Do you think that necessary?" he demanded, rising and drawing closer to her.

"Assuredly," she answered. "At present I know nothing of you beyond the fact that you have presented yourself as a fellow-craftsman, and——"

"You are not disposed to grant me the privileges of a past-master? Is that not so, comrade? Eh bien! I must bring credentials from one of the ten."

He seemed to be inwardly enjoying some grim joke. But as he spoke he slowly drew a broad gold band from the third finger of his left hand, revealing beneath it a tiny freckle, blood, blister, or birth-mark—a thing of no apparent significance, but, judging by the cry she uttered, terribly significant to her.

"You are yourself one of the ten," she stammered. "What do you want with me?"

"Did I not tell you that I wished for your society? That I was minded to drink a glass of wine in your company?" he responded, his wicked eyes gleaming at the spectacle of her uneasiness. "You admit that I am qualified to ask for supplies, that I am a fit messenger to approach you from the three? That is enough. I am satisfied. Be easy. I have no commands for you. I come simply to see one who will, some day, perhaps, become by lot my co-worker. I pay a tribute to the judgment of our departed brother, who declared you to be as beautiful as you are gifted."

She shrank from him. "Had you revealed yourself——" she whispered.

"Exactly," he responded. "You would have accorded me a better reception. No matter, we understand each other. Adieu, comrade, for the present. My name is of no moment to you. I have, as you may guess, more than one. You know the age at which my father died—seventy-four. That is enough. Should we meet again in the streets of Paris we may not recognise each other; but I think, yes, I believe, that we are destined to work together later on, and then, well then, I hope, we shall work amicably."

Almost as though the action were insignificant he passed his arm about her waist. She disentangled herself on the instant, and he resumed his former attitude, passing one hand over the other as though he washed them with invisible soap.

"Yes," he said, slowly; yes, we will work amicably. Your talent was thrown away on the poor youth who has departed. We shall electrify the world when you are told off to work with me. Again adieu, comrade, or au revoir."

He kissed his finger tips lightly, looked at her once more with the cruel, furtive gleam in his wicked eyes, and was gone.

"This seventy-four," she murmured, "must be the spy employed by the three. The three, never seen by those of the second degree and by few of the ten, are all known to him, and he is their tool. He has a presentiment. Well I, too, have a presentiment, that, if so, some day I shall kill the loathsome beast."

As the man of whom she spoke passed the concierge's office and stepped into the street he almost ran against a tall man in a loose cloak, who was advancing as if to enter. They drew apart with the usual "Pardon, m'sieur," apparently without any mutual recognition taking place, but the taller man muttered as he passed on:

"It is Durand again! Am I suspected? It would seem so. They know that she is slipping away into the arms of an Englishman, and they consider me too lenient with her, or I should not find that fellow at my heels. My first shot failed; my second must not miss its mark. To-night, little sister, this brief dream of yours must end.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

THE ANNUNCIATION, BY FRA FILIPPO LIPPI.

A Chapter on Angels.

By E. BROWNING TRISCOTT.

THE artistic representation of the Angels is an instance of the most supreme conservatism. For about six thousand years, the form in which the angelic Idea has been embodied has never (or only very slightly) varied. In the very early days of the World's history, a clever craftsman, one Bezaleel, fashioned of beaten metal two figures; in their form human, and winged: the "Angels" who "with their faces one to another," covered with their wings the mercy-seat. The work of the modern ecclesiastical craftsman, carving the ornamental seat-ends of choir-stall or pew, embodies with but slight variation the same idea; a human form—winged.

The genesis of this mental conception is easy to trace. The words recorded in the first chapter of the Bible—"Let us make man in Our Image," suggests easily a possible consulting, on the part of the Creator, of the Angels, concerning the meditated creation of man. In such wise at least have some of the Jewish Doctors interpreted the above-quoted words. Directed then, by the Holy Writ, the Seen was taken as a guide to an artistic materialisation of the Unseen, and the human form was made use of as the model wherefrom to fashion the semblance of the spiritual Being, the Angel. The non-human appendage, wings, are of course merely an expression of the most readily-occurring idea concerning transit through space: an idea embodied in Dante's phrase, "Birds of God."

"All the Angels that one ever reads of are men," remarks one of the characters in a modern novel—and the observation, though distinctly flippant, is literally true. History supplies us with the names of seven Archangels:—Michael, Gabriel, Raphael, Uriel, Chamuel, Jophiel, and Zadkiel; and history, it will be observed, is ungallant! The first four of these names are familiar to the Christian Church; the last three are known chiefly to the Jews.

To be exact, the Biblical revelation of the Angels is of Beings in an abstract sense "masculine," but endowed with the feminine attributes of purity and beauty. They are, further, immediate embodiments of the Beauty of the Eternal Mind—endowed, therefore, with supreme mental and moral grace. Theirs also is the gift of eternal youth. In this last connection an artistic inexactness becomes apparent. Since an "old" Angel is a thing inconceivable, Baby-Angels, Cherubs as they are commonly called, are also, strictly speaking, inconceivable; and in their many appearances in Christian Art must be regarded merely as so many instances of license on the part of the artist.

Digitized by Google

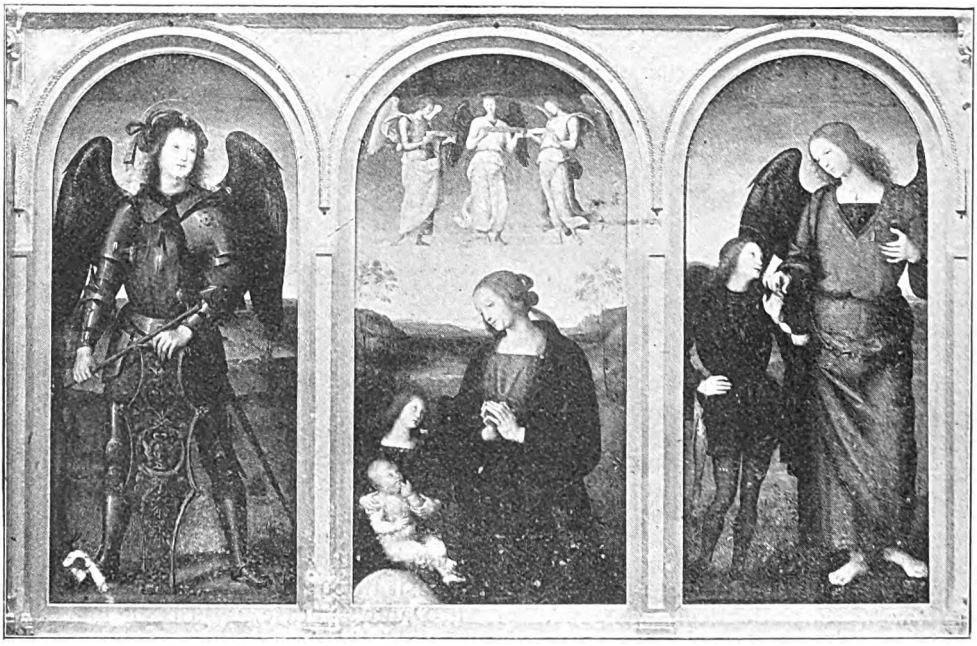
"... There was war in Heaven: Michael and his Angels fought against the Dragon; and the Dragon fought and his Angels."

being represented in his rôle of warrior, the latter in the more peaceful character of guardian to the youthful Tobias. Tradition, further, assigns to the Archangel Michael a control of the elements, and it is for this reason that most ancient hill-churches (especially those which owe their origin to the vow of some traveller in imminent peril of shipwreck) are dedicated to St. Michael. Mont St. Michel in Normandy, the Cornish St. Michael's Mount, the little hill-church of Brent Tor on Dartmoor, and the disused votive Chapel at Torquay, are well-known instances of this dedication. St. Michael



VIRGIN AND CHILD, WITH ARCHANGELS MICHAEL AND RAPHAEL, BY PERUGINO.

This triumphing of Michael over that fellow-Angel who, with a great following from among the Hosts of Heaven sinned, and was therefore driven from his heritage, is one of the most dramatic presentments of Christian Art. St. Michael in this especial character is usually represented in full armour. He wears a crown, surmounted by a cross, and bears in his hand a lance or sword. Beneath his feet writhes a vanquished dragon. In the three-panelled picture (the "Virgin and Child," by Perugino) the two outer compartments, it will be seen, are occupied by figures of the Archangels Michael and Raphael—the former of course, is a prominent figure in all paintings of the Last Judgment—in which connection he is sometimes represented as weighing souls; his old adversary, the Devil, being set in one scale and several human figures in the other.

St. Gabriel, the Angel of the Annunciation, is the next best known of the Archangels. In Art, he commonly holds a lily, wears a long white garment, and sometimes, a crossed "stole." In the "Annunciation" here reproduced, the Archangel is represented as very richly attired in white embroidered robe and flowing cloak; his wings are of golden peacocks' feathers, and the two first fingers of his right hand are extended in the episcopal form of blessing.

Digitized by Google

Of St. Raphael we read in the apocryphal Book of Tobit. An early tradition declares him to be the Angel who on the first Christmas night appeared to the shepherds and announced to them the birth of the Messiah. As already pointed out, a figure of this Archangel occupies the third panel of Perugino's Triptych.

St. Uriel, the fourth Archangel, is supposed to have appeared to Esdras. Chamuel wrestled with Jacob. To Jophiel, tradition assigns the guardianship of the Tree of Knowledge; and lastly, Zadkiel is reputed to have stayed the hand of Abraham, when the latter was about to slay his son.

The ancient Jews believed in Good, Evil, and Guardian Angels; and the New Testament, in frequent references to the Celestial Hierarchy, amplifies these Jewish ideas. Messengership, for instance, is, in the New Testament, especially dwelt on, and there is a continued reference, both in the Gospels and in the writings of St. Paul, to the intimate interest of the Angels in the affairs of men.

Ecclesiastical subtleties are out of place in the pages of a magazine. Suffice it then, that these vast spiritual Hosts, which we of the inexact laity speak of collectively as Angels, have been divided by theologians into nine orders; commencing with the Seraphim (who are reputed to surround the Throne of God) and ending with the Angels proper—that is, with the "messengers" whose business it is to travel constantly between Earth and Heaven on errands of the Divine Will; intangible spirits who thus link together the Seen and the Unseen.

Between these two extreme Orders, comes a great array of Beings who (while commonly spoken of, as I have just said, under the collective, if incorrect, term Angels, and which are, moreover, not very distinctly differentiated in Art) are distinguished theologically as Cherubim, Thrones, Dominations, Virtues, Powers, Principalities, and Archangels; nine in all; the two lowest Orders, Archangels and Angels, standing in the closest relation to Mankind, and being therefore, the two Orders with which we are artistically and historically, most familiar.

A TRINITÀ, BY PESELLINO.

Digitized by Google

In pictures which aim at representing the whole Hierarchy of Heaven, these nine Orders are commonly arranged in circles—commencing with the Seraphim and ending with the "Angels." Some of these orders have distinguishing symbols, and in certain instances, an arbitrary form of clothing. Thus Seraphim and Cherubim (who, by the way, are usually represented merely as Winged Heads) are commonly given two, four, or six wings, and the heads as well as the wings, are usually painted a bright red or green. Occasionally, the Seraphim are depicted as of a vivid blue hue, or sometimes, variegated. The "Trinita," by Pesellino, contains a circlet of these winged "Heads," and in the "Virgin and Child" by Bernardino Fungai, the slight variation is introduced of the Cherubim being represented as possessed of half bodies—terminating in a second pair of wings. Dominations, Virtues, and Powers wear long white garments, ecclesiastically known as "Albs;" mere "Angels" carry a wand or musical instrument.

The Angels, I have said, are commonly supposed to possess a more or less masculine form. A Thirteenth Century artist, however, had the temerity to introduce the innovation of feminine Angels. In the picture in question, the figures consist of a human head, and a body human to the waist—terminating in a second pair of wings. From that date to the present, women-Angels have

VIRGIN AND CHILD SURROUNDED BY CHERUBIM, BY BERNARDINO FUNGAI.

Digitized by Google

NATIVITY, BY SANDRO BOTTICELLI.

from time to time appeared in the pictures of different Artists.

Wings, it may be observed, as symbols of strength, dignity and those various qualities which we may consider, reasonably, to appertain to the highest order of created Beings, are not essentially Biblical, nor especially an invention of the religious mind. To the most ancient civilisations, wings, from time immemorial, have been a symbol of might, of superhuman qualities, swiftness, and Divinity. It is probable that the work of the craftsman, Bezaleel, owed something of its form to ideas derived from the Egyptians during the enforced sojourn of the Israelites among that ancient people.

Concerning the treatment by various artists of their Angels' wings, Mr. Ruskin has made some interesting remarks. He notes that in most examples of very early Art there is "a certain confidence in the way in which Angels trust to their wings." The uncomfortable question as to whether great bird-like appendages could be anatomically joined to a human shoulder had not as yet been propounded, and it was only when Science began to suggest disturbing things on the subject, that a certain timidity in the treatment of wings became observable. In the pictures of some of the later "old masters," the wings affixed to the shoulders of their angels are very frankly useless; mere ornaments in fact; the "sign of an Angel." In pre-scientific days however, "an Angel was a complete creature, as much believed in as a bird, and the way in which it might cast itself into the air and lean hither and thither on its plumes, was as naturally apprehended as the manner of flight of a chough or a starling." In these latter days when Science is all-triumphant, this "timidity," curiously enough, has again disappeared. The anatomical difficulty of course, is not forgotten, but it is leapt lightly over, and the modern Angel is furnished with superb feathered appendages; in appearance at least, quite capable of upholding the weighty body to which they are gracefully, if not scientifically, affixed.

Digitized by Google

In Botticelli's "Nativity" a curious group of light-hearted Angels occupy the sky—their action being something between flying, walking, and dancing. Wings indeed, they have—of the order, however, ornamental rather than useful; in spite of which fact their buoyancy is remarkable. In proud superiority to all natural laws, they seem literally to tread the air—tripping on their way with the same assurance with which mere mortals set their feet on pavement or floor. The "Nativity" by Pietro della Francesca contains a group of wingless Angels; and the figure in an "Angel adoring," attributed to Filippo Lippi, appears to be also wingless.

NATIVITY, BY PIETRO DELLA FRANCESCA.

Up to the present we have been thinking only of Good Angels. There yet remains to be considered those Angels who, at a remote period of their history, yielded to some form of sin, and so fell from their first high estate. These Angels sinned, not as Man, through the persuasion of a tempter, but voluntarily and without temptation, and inasmuch as their intellectual powers and their whole nature belong to a higher order than does the nature of man, so was their moral fall and the resultant change which took place immeasurably greater. The most evil among men, it is said, have some strain of good in them. It is a general opinion however, that the spiritual demoralisation of the Evil Angels is complete; they are inconceivably and unredeemably depraved.

Digitized by Google

In Art, Demons, as well as Angels, are commonly represented as winged, but their wings are no longer of feathers, but webbed like the feet of a duck. In the middle ages, the imaginations of a class of monkish artists fairly ran riot, and every possible grotesqueness of form was assigned to the fallen Angels. A mediæval picture (which depicts the sinning Angels being cast headlong from Heaven) imaginatively attributes to the outcasts varying degrees of physical deformity—their especially demon-like characteristics becoming intensified as the distance between themselves and Heaven increases—those nearest the gates of Heaven yet bearing traces of their natural beauty, those furthest away being represented as having assumed every exaggerated characteristic of a fallen estate. A conception more reasonable (if that word may be used in connection with matters entirely imaginative) supposes the Evil Angels to have kept much of their physical beauty and to retain also some traces of moral grace; a view, the reader may remember, embodied in a modern work of fiction, wherein the chief of the fallen Angels, choosing for his own temporary ends to assume a visible form, is represented as a courteous, polished gentleman; sympathy-arousing and on the whole, contrasting very favourably with, at any rate, one of the merely human characters in the book. A curious, and very ancient tradition considers the Evil Angels to be the progeny of one Lilith—a demon woman who, according to some writers, was companion to our forefather Adam (whom, after a time she deserted) prior to the creation of Eve.

ANGEL ADORING.
(Attributed to FILIPPINO LIPPI.)

Around the names of the Archangels, and more especially around that of St. Michael, cluster a vast number of curious traditions; I will conclude this paper by recounting a fragment of folklore from the wilds of Devon.

Some five or six centuries ago, the little church of Brent Tor (dedicated, as I said just now, in honour of St. Michael) was in course of building, and Satan felt aggrieved at this fresh sign of the high estimation in which men held his triumphant adversary, Michael. The devil therefore, determined that the building should not reach completion. The masons toiled by day, and the emissaries of Satan worked by night; as much as was built by human hands during the hours of light, as much was pulled down by supernatural agencies during the reign of darkness. As every one concerned in the matter appeared to be at their human wits' end, St. Michael presently determined to take the very serious matter into his own hands; he would at least demonstrate that the Prince of Heaven was not a person to be lightly trifled with. Taking up therefore, a convenient position on a neighbouring Tor (three miles distant from the site of the new Church!) the Archangel awaited the appearance of the band of nocturnal destroyers, and as soon as the work of destruction had fairly begun, St. Michael seized one of the enormous granite boulders (which crown the highest points of the Devonshire moorland) and with Archangelic might hurled it at the head of his old Enemy. The aim was true, and the Prince of Darkness, it is reported, decided, there and then, that discretion was the better part of valour. From that night, the builders were able to proceed with their work in peace. Tradition, I may add, asserts that the boulder, bearing on its face the dent of St. Michael's thumb. still lies somewhere in the neighbourhood of the little moorland church. (The writer of this article however, confesses to a personal failure in the matter of identification. Perhaps the reader. should he ever visit Brent Tor, will be more fortunate!)

Digitized by Google

A WEATHER FORECAST.

They strolled along one winter day,
A man and maid together,
And as they sauntered through the lane
They talked about the weather.

"My own, the future's bright to me,
Since we shall be together;
For us no dark or dreary days;
Our glass is set 'fair weather.'"

One summer day these two went by,
Strolling once more together;
They looked into each other's eyes,
They still talked of the weather.

"Dearest," she said, "altho' our hopes
Are bound up now together,
We must expect some wintry days,
As well as sunny weather."

And so they started off to share
Their griefs and joys together;
They loved each other all their lives,
Through fair and stormy weather.

Mrs. Donaldson.

Digitized by Google

MUSIC IN THE SANCTUARY.

CHOIR AND ORGAN.

By the REV. H. R. HAWEIS, M.A., Incumbent of St. James', Marylebone, London.

WE have heard all that can be said about the enormities of the Popes, especially the old Popes, the demoralisation of the cardinals, the iniquities of the monasteries and the perversions and fallacies of the Roman Catholic doctrine generally. But the immeasurable debts of Christendom and civilisation to the genius and administration of the Roman Church are too often forgotten.

Who built the cathedrals, paid for the immortal canvasses and frescoes, preserved the literature, taught agriculture, protected the women, educated the children, fed the poor, mitigated the brutalities of the Middle Ages, and made the music of the world? Why the Church, of course, and chiefly the pre-Reformation Church, and specially the Roman, not the Greek, Church. And what has been achieved since? Much every way!

But I have no intention here to range over the whole field or trespass on any debateable ground. I wish here to speak of music only, for there the Church may put in an almost undisputed claim of sovereignty.

Admitted that a wild free sort of melodic recitation was from the earliest times current at fairs, tournays, and banquetting halls, even at Alfred's rude court, and spread itself over Europe later on in finer form of rondel and ballade from the Troubadours of Provence; admitted that court minstrels and bards twanged the harp at national festivals in city and camp, and intoned lays and legends; and that as early as 1200 A.D. we find a specimen of secular three-part writing or descant in the oft-quoted "Summer is a-cumin' in." But this more orderly scoring of "descant" was a mere leakage from the cloister science. We may even admit that the free popular melodies outside the Sanctuary reacted upon the mathematical stiffness of the early church music; yet all that made modern music possible sprang from the scientific basis which after centuries of tentative study was evolved by the Church.

The argument is quaintly clenched by the formulation of the modern octave; that great discovery without which modern music, which is only about four hundred years old, could not be born! Our common musical nomenclature is an echo of the cloister, being a hymn to St. John Baptist, and so is inseparably bound up with the offices of religion.

> Ut queant laxis, Re-sonare fibris,
> Mi-ra gestorum, Fa-muti tuorum,
> Sol-ve hotuti, La-bi-i reatur, etc.

Music indeed was long coming in. Of course the power of musical sound—music as subordinate to the dance—the marshalling of processions, the dithyramb of poets, the regulation of the orator's voice, the dirge, the pæan, the festal improvisation, all this dates far back indeed, but it never amounted to music as an independent art.

From remote antiquity the properties of musical sound have been known just as the presence of electricity in amber was known ("electro," Greek for amber), but, for all that, we had to wait thousands of years for the electric telegraph. So music as an ordered language of emotion, as a complicated and marvellous machinery for expression, a sort of physical counterpart of the inner life, was never known, explored, or discovered, could not at all come forth until the grammar and accidence, the scientific bases of the sound art, were hit upon. By the grammar and accidence, I mean in brief the octave and the perfect cadence or chords summing up the peculiarities of the octave. This is what we mean by modern tonality, making the semi-tone fall in the same place whatever be the key, making the division of the keys uniform, so that the same sequence of notes remain in the ear in whatever key you chance to play. The octave and perfect cadence were only discovered about 1550, and the discovery is usually connected with the name of Monte Verde, though no doubt for some time previously the sun of fixed tonality had begun to rise and dawned upon many about the same time, but when the octave, with its aureole of the perfect cadence, arose clear above the horizon of the musical firmament the whole of modern music was discovered, and the proof of it is that music, which had made hardly any progress for a thousand years—spite of the boasted innovations of Hucbald Grey, of Arazzo, and Franco, of Cologne—immediately burst into that sudden splendour, the fullness of which we of the 19th century have been the privileged spectators, or auditors!

Digitized by Google

From the death of Monte Verde in 1643, the nominal originator of the new tonality, to the birth of Handel in 1685, the perfect master of the new tonality, is a bare forty-two years. Yet in Handel the miracle of modern music is already accomplised, and the art which hung fire for nigh one thousand two hundred years, i.e., from the 4th century, whem Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, introduced musical chants into the Church service, started on a career of phenomenal speed with gigantic strides from Monte Verde and Carissimi to Handel, 16th to 17th centuries; before the death of the giant of oratorio we find ourselves in the presence of Glück, master of the improved opera; Haydn, father of the quartet and symphony; whilst with Mozart in the world (an actual contemporary of Handel), born after Haydn, though dying before him, all the forms of modern music were created; the modified opera with solo recitative, chorus and musical prelude or overture, the cantata, the oratorio, the developed string quartet, the full orchestral symphony, the sonata, and the various forms of cabinet music.

Before the death of Haydn in 1808 we are in the presence of the giant Beethoven, 1770-1827, and the great tone poets, Weber, Rossini, Bellini, Verdi, Mendelssohn, Auber, Schubert, Chopin, Schumann, Gounod, Bizet, Wagner, Liszt followed in rapid succession, and all within the confines of one century!

The only possible explanation of the sudden appearance and development of the latest born, most complex and most spiritual of the arts, which had bided its time since the world began, is that not until its grammar and accidence in the new tonality, the octave and the perfect cadence were discovered, could it possibly be developed into an independent art, but the instant the scientific basis was revealed three hundred years sufficed to bring about the dazzling perfection and unimagined resources of a new art, which for a thousand years had failed even to foreshadow the wonders of the greatest and most perfect emotional language that it is possible for the human heart to conceive of.

Yet honour to whom honour is due. It was the bright idea of the good Bishop of Milan, St. Ambrose, to select and arrange some of the Greek modes or scales for use in the Sanctuary.

Crude and rough and harsh to modern ears such experiments may seem, but what a revelation it must have been to the monks who morn and eve muttered their monotonous prayers to a sea of emotional sound for the first time welling up under the words and giving a strange new lift to the soul.

Suddenly too a bond of sympathetic union seemed to be established between them all, binding them together and uniting their devotions whilst defining their individualities. They now discovered that they had different voices, basses, tenors, baritones; something was added to the strophe and anti-strophe, the magic power of sound setting up vibrations in the soul, through which the prayer disengaged itself from the earth and was borne upwards as on angels' wings to the great White Throne and to Him that sitteth thereon.

I wonder whether those many tourists who visit Milan and sit for a moment in the rude stone chair still preserved at the Ambrosian monastery, in which the gifted Bishop must so often have reclined whilst he drilled his pioneer musical monks; I wonder if they ever realise the enormous debt which the whole Christian Church owes to the man who first unlocked the treasures of sound and devoted them to the use of the Sanctuary.

The great Pope Gregory, who three hundred years afterwards sent the Monk Augustine over to these shores to place the imprimatur of the Mother Church on whatever was left of Christianity in these remote islands after the Roman occupation, also sent over his Gregorian chants. What were they? Gregory had simply adapted and enlarged Ambrose's repertory, and Augustine with his acolytes landed singing Gregory's chants, known ever since as Gregorians.

Digitized by Google

Mr. John Richard Green, in one of the most eloquent pages of his "Short History of the English People," has told us how this strange company of monks headed by Augustine found our King Ethelbert with his Queen Bertha holding his rustic court on the chalk downs of the Isle of Thanet. After being well received by his Majesty, who cautiously said he would think of the new proposals made to him from a foreign court and civilisation far in advance of his own, Augustine, we are told, turned from the Royal presence and set his face towards the town of Canterbury. The sea in those days washed in muddy shallows close up to the rude huts and shanties which then represented the Cathedral city over which the Roman monk was destined to preside as the first Archbishop of Canterbury. The ships lay high and dry as the tide went out, and as Augustine approached with banner and crucifix lifted high we are told that he sang aloud a Gregorian to these words:

"Turn away, O Lord, Thy wrath from this city and Thine anger from its sin."

But in our retrospective glance we are still about nine hundred years off the birth of modern music, and why we should go on singing these most ancient and crude Gregorians still passes my comprehension! When the Church had nothing better, well and good! But now in the golden age of music why go back to these beggarly elements? True in these days the organist flourishes about with Wagnerian harmonies, so it little matters what is the melody piped or harped by the choir. But the very fact of their being used at all is an anachronism, or let us say a reversion to a retrograde type, as though we went forth to battle with bow and arrow or dressed in skins and fig leaves.

Free melody and subtle harmonies have for ever destroyed the musical ear for the sounds and progressions which saluted the ears of Ambrose and Gregory with the magic spell of novelty. The interest they still possess for some people is no doubt largely antiquarian, not artistic, or it is tolerated because it happens to jump with the revival of a somewat grotesque theology and a ritual as obsolete as the music.

The dawn of the Reformation beheld the dawn of modern music, which coincided, as we all know, with the rise of the great singing schools at Naples—the rise of the great violin makers at Brescia and Cremona, who made chiefly for the Church.

By an untoward fatality the Reformed Churches, in reacting against all the artistic tendencies and gorgeous ceremonies of Rome, dropped out of the Liturgy to a very great extent the dramatic power of music, which in the Roman Catholic mass made the whole service hang together with an almost scenic propriety and unity of plan which sustained attention whilst deepening the emotion of the congregation.

Those who understand enough of the Roman Catholic ritual will easily see why Mozart and Beethoven delighted to write their masses. Their music was an essential element in a great work of art, where everything had its proper place.

The dislocated and mutilated fragments of the Protestant service (largely borrowed from the old Catholic ritual), admirable as they are in parts, possess no dramatic unity of any kind, and when service is piled upon service—as it was certainly never intended to be—at the cost of needless repetition and wearisome monotony, to which nothing but habit could reconcile people, the result from an artistic point of view is something like chaos.

Still any clergyman, organist or choir master, who has sufficient intelligence to understand the beauty of the old ritual and the way in which it was saturated with emotion and bound together with musical and dramatic emphasis, can do a vast deal more with our book of Common Prayer than is commonly done.

In some churches, where services intended to be distinct do not follow en suite or portions are judiciously used avoiding vain repetitions—an attempt to sustain attention by respecting the laws of the mind and the powers of human endurance is occasionally made; but, as a rule, throughout our country parishes chaos, prolixity, and dullness reign supreme, chapels are naturally full whilst churches are as naturally empty. But the remedy lies with the clergy and the choir, though both are handicapped by an essentially inartistic and undramatic Prayer Book.

Digitized by Google

The organ should create the devotional atmosphere — cutting in at the right moment—varying psalms and canticles, chiming to the prayers and recitations and accompanying the congregation with fervour. In the general Thanksgiving Creed, or even in that supreme formula, the Lord's Prayer, is there no emotion worthy of music? The organist should teach us otherwise. The ragged ends and awkward pauses of the service should be minimised—a brisk strike in after each lesson is very important—thus, with due vigilance and alertness, something of an artistic whole can be restored even to such a patchwork, well meant and admirable, but artistically defective formulary, as our book of Common Prayer.

For such partial rehabilitation of art in the Sanctuary as is sometimes attempted we have certainly to thank the High Church party. The only thing we owe from an artistic point of view to Protestantism is the fine chorales, hymns and sacred cantatas; whilst the famous music of the "Stabat Mater," Bach's "Passion" music, and the more strictly devotional oratorios remain the one point of contact —a sort of neutral meeting ground—between the Catholic and the Reformed Churches.

Properly speaking, the oratorio and sacred cantata alone kept alive in the Reformed Churches the conception of dramatic unity as something appropriate and desirable even in the devotional atmosphere of the Sanctuary.

After all, the constitution of the human mind is the same whether at a concert, a theatre, or a church—it tires, it needs excitement, it resents dullness, it demands ability. We don't like to be bored in church any more than out of church. That is the long and short of it, and it would be well if all those who are charged with conducting religious services were as keenly alive to these constitutional necessities as are the managers of theatres or the directors of any other public assemblies designed to draw or edify the public.

No one who has seen the Pope celebrate mass in the Sistine, or enter St. Peter's borne aloft in state, can fail to have been impressed by the fact that the organ, or chanting, and the sudden bell enables the whole of the congregation, however vast, to follow the service and watch for the points; there is never any hesitation about the exact moment to kneel, to rise, to murmur responses or prayer, when and where to turn and make the sign of the cross and go out—the whole service moves in such a dramatic framework that the people who often follow the singers with their devotional manuals really participate a great deal more in the service than ordinary Protestants, who gaze about and understand nothing, seem to suppose. So solemnising indeed is the ancient cult that has been handed down with little change for centuries that murderers are recorded to have paused at the last moment—quite melted and overawed have they been by what they have heard and witnessed.

In this way the life of the famous composer Stradella was saved, his bitter rival having hired two assassins to put an end to him whilst conducting one of his own sublime masses. They crept into the cathedral, concealing their weapons beneath their cloaks, but were affected to that degree by the beauty of his music and touched by the power of the ceremony that they threw up their bloody business and confessed their inability to carry out their abominable instructions.

When the Church emissaries in what are called the Dark Ages went forth to hew down dense forests in Gaul and Spain, teach agriculture, gather the children into monastic schools, feed the poor and protect the helpless, her gorgeous ritual was a perpetual source of wonder and admiration, and rough men-at-arms, reckless free-booting barons would enter the cathedrals and gaze with admiration and awe at the clouds of incense and many lights and rich robes and rhythmic motions of the priests and acolytes before the high altar—what time solemn sounds—Gregorian chants, and later on the barless music of Palestrina filled the sacred edifice with weird and ghostly solemnity of sound.

The music of the Sanctuary is both active and passive — active when the people themselves join in with response, canticle, and hymn; passive when the organist and choir charge themselves with controlling the phases of emotion and providing the whole service with the mystic sound-element which energises and lifts the service of prayer and praise.

Digitized by Google

The passive predominated in the pre-Reformation Church, the active has won its way since. We do not now accept a service in which the priest and the choir in their railed-off sanctuary do everything for the people who are left outside the sacred enclosure.

The Reformation has taught us that the priest is not there merely to do things for us but as our representative (our servant for Christ's sake, as St. Paul says), i.e., to do for us representatively what each one is bound to do for himself.

The multiplication of hymns and chorales i the sign of this remarkable change of attitude which has, let us hope in England at least, made the Church service for ever largely and chiefly congregational.

Still the influence of a devout anthem is very great. I have seen people melted to tears in listening to "He was despised and rejected of men." I have seen countenances lightened up with an inner peace whilst "O rest in the Lord" was sung, and filled with exaltation by the victorious chorus "The Night is Departing," and almost "rapt from the fickle and the frail" in listening to the double chorus "He shall give his angels charge over thee" in the "Elijah," in which memorable masterpiece of Mendelssohn Jenny Lind, although but the leading voice in a double quartette, produced an effect so electrical under Sir Michael Costa's baton that those who were privileged to hear her in those palmy days of the Sacred Harmonic will carry the seraphic echoes of that angelic voice unforgotten to the grave.

I am glad to see that the Organ Recital is taking deep root in our town churches. No one has done more for its popularity than M. Lemaire in his fine rendering of the Parsifal music at St. Margaret's, Westminster. In many churches now at the close of the evening service the voluntary is duly honoured by a number of people who refuse to be played out of church. The Organ Recital adequately conducted is highly recreative and a fit close to the religious functions of the Day of Rest, but I would have the organist rise to the full level of his high calling, which is not merely to play solos or to dance attendance on the singers, but to be on the qui vive to lead, not to follow, from beginning to end, never letting the service droop, never caught napping or coming in a shade too late, ready to pull up a flat bass or soprano with a trumpet stop if needful, careful to nurse a complicated chorus, to cover a halting or defective bar here or there, generally to hearten up everybody in the choir all round.

Thus will be produced something of that impression or unity of effect which is so admirable in Roman ritual, which undertakes the regulation and stimulation through music of the emotional atmosphere from beginning to end.

It is of extreme importance and has been brought to a far higher pitch of excellence and edification by the great Nonconformist bodies, who have adopted so many of the Church's methods, but from whom the Church has certainly something also to learn.

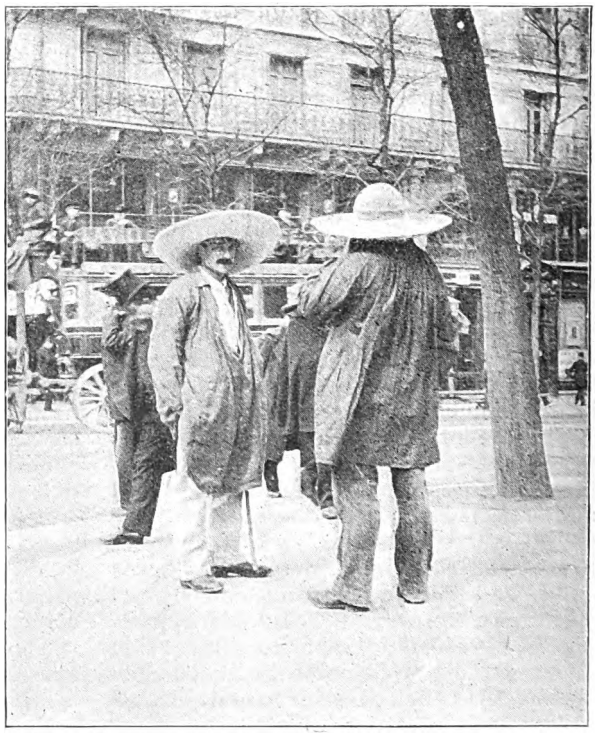
Digitized by Google

Lesser Known Paris.

PLACES AND THINGS - SOME - TOURISTS NEVER SEE.

Written and Illustrated by

By CLIVE HOLLAND.



FAR fewer English people visit Paris annually than might be imagined, except in such a year as the present —one of a great International Exposition. And of the annual batches of tourists which pour across Channel and incidentally into Paris, only a few make that city a stopping place for longer than a day or two, and probably not ten per cent. ever see more than the "stock" sights, and equally "stock" "places of interest" as they are generically called.

They have rushed through the Louvre; but how many have idled an hour or two away amongst the quaint treasures of the Cluny? They have dined at the Café de la Paix or a better class Duval according to the depths of their pockets; but how many have dined in the Quarter for a franc and a half, and thereby caught a glimpse of the life there which is, and has been for centuries, an important part of Paris itself? They have been to the Invalides and gazed at the tomb of Napoleon; but how many have troubled themselves concerning the other great dead in the old churches of Paris, and in even Notre Dame itself? They have felt sentimental over the tomb of Abelard and Héloise and admired that of Raspail; but of the other monuments such as that exquisite one to De Maupassant in the Parc Monceau how many know?

It is just this, as it were, half-hidden Paris that is most charming and distinctive—in a word that is Paris.

It is because the Parisian is blessed with a more genial climate than our own that the streets of the City by the Seine are so much more fruitful of picturesque types and features than those of London. The boulevards many know; the faubourgs are known intimately to the few. And yet these same faubourgs or suburbs of the toiling classes have gradually crept in towards the centre of Paris to a point where their advance is checked by the necessities of business or of wealth. They are full of interest, and also of the colour, tragedy and comedy, and la lutte de la vie, which last, alas, is peculiar to no large city, but common to all. And in the streets of the faubourgs the Parisian has that outdoor home which plays so important a part in Paris life. The Municipality of the City in making it beautiful have ministered not to the taste or the few merely but to the needs of the many. And it is just because colour, form, and beauty appeal to even the middle-class Frenchman very strongly that the countless regulations, by which he is bound to build his shop front or house according to the ideas of the fitness of things of the authorities, are seldom openly or inwardly resented, and grumbling at the "grandmotherliness" of the said powers that be is seldom heard. The explanation is easy. It is because such conformity leads to the artistic effect for which the French as a nation have so keen an appreciation.

Digitized by Google

A GROUP OF STUDENTS, PLACE DU CARROUSEL.

But to come to that lesser-known Paris which is so full of interest to the observant.

An enterprising firm of tourists' agents has, I believe, recently added the Halles or Markets to the things to be seen. But these huge places from whence the food of Paris filters through arteries of streets and the shops to the consumers should be visited at half-past two or three o'clock on a summer morning to be really seen. And so the average sightseer usually does not manage to visit them.

Then there is the Bird Market in the Rue de Lutèce, where one can purchase anything from a goose to a canary. There is always a typically Parisian crowd here—mothers, fathers, children, old men, old women, and maidens—peering with that peculiar and wrapt interest the Parisian can apparently summon at will into the wicker baskets containing ducks, the crates of quails or pigeons, and into the glass pen of the incubator, over which the fat lady proprietor is dozing, in which there are to be seen innumerable balls of yellow fluff representing chicks just out of the shell. A little further along, in the shade of the wall, are a pile of small square cages in which canaries chirp cheerfully. Around these there is always a little crowd, and in it are the little grisettes, who have saved up their two sou pieces to purchase a yellow-hued songster, to hang on fine days to a nail in the wall just outside the window of their apartments au cinquième which are so high up as to be almost near the sky on cloudy days.

IN THE TYPICAL STUDIO.

Digitized by Google

And here and there are parrots, in dome-like cages of brass or zinc wire, which swear volubly in an argot not understood of tourists, and therefore quite innocuous. Around these, gamins with sticks and twigs furtively hang for a chance to stir the gay-hued things into louder screeching and yet more vituperative language.

Quite close at hand, also on the Ile de la Cité, is the Flower Market, which day by day almost all the year round pours forth in bouquets and the humbler two sou buttonholes a stream of fragrance into the streets and Boulevards of the Rive Droite, and up the Boul' Mich', and along the endless Boulevard St. Germain by means of the flower-laden baskets of the trim bouquetières, who have ever-ready smiles and deft fingers, and the flower barrows of the elder women.

Then across the river and the Boulevard St. Germain and up the broad Rue Monge and one reaches a part of not merely old, but ancient Paris or Lutetia, which at the corner of the Rue de Navarre hides away in the form of the Arena in which gladiatorial and other shows took place. There is not much of the amphitheatre left, but here one stands and gazes upon what the eyes of Roman conquerors must have beheld, and sees what remains of that city which was once, long since, the spot of civilisation in the desert of North-Western Europe. The chamber where the beasts were confined is still almost intact as to masonry, the rusted bars may be the original ones or not. Children, gamins who scuffle in the dust of the ancient arena in mimic combat in a scorching sun, love these bars, and the timider ones grow big-eyed as they think of the horrors their elder companions recount.

Then once more back down the Rue Monge to the Boulevard St. Germain. At the corner of one of the intersecting streets very often are to be seen two or three human curiosities who wear blue blouses, whitey-brown trousers, and huge white felt hats, not smaller than the top of a round "gipsy" tea-table. They are forts des Halles, literally strong men of the Markets, whose business in life it is to unload millers' and other waggons. The two in our picture refused to be photographed — modest men! — but obligingly shifted their position (to escape the camera which was levelled at them) into a better light and were speedily caught.

A STREET IN THE FAUBOURG.

Just a little further along, and on the famous Boul' Mich' one plunges at once into the life of the quarter—that life of which, except the mere surface, tourists see little or nothing, the life described in the novels of Murger, Chambers and in the pages of "Trilby." Students of law, medicine, literature and art are promenading this world-famous street. Little groups of these gay and smiling, with étudiantes and models, are on fine days almost always found sitting outside the cafés such as the Harcourt or Pantheon at the tiny marble or enamelled topped tables. It is only sometimes that these be-cloaked and baggy-corduroy-trousered individuals with slouch felt hats visit the other side of the river and appear (as they do in our photograph) in the Place du Carrousel.

Digitized by Google

Hard by are the famous Rue de Seine in which so many famous Parisians have from time to time lived, where artists and studios swarm, and the equally famous Grand Hotel Corneille where "little Billee" in Du Maurier's novel lodged, and where scores of would-be Leightons, Geromes, Sargents, or Meissoniers have since first taken up their abode ere finding a more modest apartment in the Quarter. Maybe a huge, bare-looking chamber, combining the duties of studio, bedroom, and living-room in one. A typical student's studio is that depicted in our photograph. Not the show one of some great artist crammed with armour, statuary, bric-à-brac, rich hangings, costly rugs and skins; but a workshop in which, could it but tell its own tale, reputations have been built up or lost,

IN THE BOIS DE VINCENNES.

Fame has been at last a willing if at first a somewhat laggard guest, or dark Despair has conquered mortal efforts, well or misapplied as the case may be. Such a studio may cost anything, from thirty-five to sixty francs a month in the neighbourhood of the Rue des Fourneaux or Quai Voltaire, and often it is shared by a couple of chums. Down below it is often a shop, it may be a curiosity shop where everything from artists' materials to damaged canvasses with the germs of pictures still upon them, or draperies, old armour and odd and quaint pieces of furniture may be had at ridiculously low prices if the stamp of the student and not that of the tourist be upon the would-be purchaser's countenance.

IN THE CAFE DES LILAS.

Right up the wide Boul' Mich', along which students gaily race and sing of nights, where it runs into the wider space of the Carrefour de l'Observatoire is the famous Bullier, against the saffron coloured wall of which ill-fated Marshal Ney was shot on December 7th, 1815. Bullier is not the reckless, joyous, if somewhat risky, place it was even ten years ago, but on certain nights it still swarms with students, models and grisettes much as it did in the old days when across the road. And those who would see types of Latin Quarter life, and scratch a little below the surface, will find a visit repay them. If Trilby no longer dances there, there are other Trilbies not less irresponsible than she, not less fascinatingly roguish and elf-like, not less children of the hour. And if the visitor is particularly lucky one of those strange nodules of disturbance may develop, and the whole place be aflame with rival factions before the nervous tourist can beat a hasty retreat. A little revolution which will subside almost as quickly as it arose, and all go on as before.

Digitized by Google

Across the way is a famous Café into which the tourist seldom or never ventures. There, amid the thick smoke of caporal, foregather little coteries of students with their models, who after Bullier in summer sit and chat and smoke and laugh and sing till the birds begin to twitter in the trees outside, and then go home in the the freshness of a Parisian morning often lovely beyond comparison with opalescent haze and softened sunlight not yet born into full day, to dream of bronzes at the Salon or successes at the schools. To awaken at mid-day to but another vanishing of visions.

It is, perhaps, a common failing to regard the Seine—the river which winds like a ribbon of oxidised silver almost through the heart of the city — as merely a river of pleasure. But though at Suresnes, St. Cloud, or Sèvres, it is that and little more, at Bercy, up above the Ile St. Louis, it becomes suddenly a busy stream encumbered with barges, with bassins or docks, and with quays piled up with merchandise. The huge entrepôts de Bercy, with their thousands of wine casks and green-blue paraffin barrels, burst upon the explorer an insistent note of unsuspected commerce. "It is like the Thames," will probably be the exclamation, and the matter is in the phrase adequately summed up. It is, indeed, difficult at first to realise that the murky water of the bassin in which a man is patiently fishing is the same silvery Seine which flows beneath the Pont D'Iena. Or that the boy in the wherry is not a Thames "water-rat" instead of a Parisian gamin.

And yet almost close by all this busy wharfage and bustling activity of lading and unlading barges, and the white spiteful puffings of innumerable tugs, named "Jean et Jeanne," "Soleil d'Or," or "Rapide," and gaily painted blue, green and scarlet, is the lovely Bois de Vincennes. Everyone knows the Bois de Boulogne, but not a tithe as many its lovely but neglected sister wood with its allées of acacia trees, bosky dells, picturesque lake, and wide lawns. The Bois de Vincennes, except on special occasions, seems given over to the less fashionable and perhaps more interesting classes of Parisians. The frequenters have the art of enjoying themselves to even greater perfection than those who are to be seen in the Bois de Boulogne. The bloomer girl on her becane is less correct and more merry. She rests at ease, and jokes her escort. She may even take a whiff or two of caporal in the form of a cigarette. And as she rests on one of the comfortable seats a fatherly municipality thoughtfully supplies she will laze unstudiedly and enjoy herself. And then, after a long day, there will possibly be the trip home by a swift "Hirondelle" or Bateau Parisien when the river has become mysterious in the oncoming night, and a path of silver broken into scintillations by the wash of the swiftly passing boats is all the light one gets till the quays of commerce are left behind, and the dazzling illuminations of the city itself break upon the eye with almost magic suddenness.

Digitized by Google

THE STORY OF HILDA WARING.

Illustrated by A. E. PIKE.

By B. M. HICKS.

WHEN I was in Grahamstown I was invited to a dance at Fort England —that is the lunatic asylum. But before then I went over there with my friend Du Merton, and, as he knew the doctor there, we saw all there was to be seen.

One face struck me most—that of a woman, who was strictly guarded by the warders. She had masses of tangled hair, which had been once raven black, but was now snow white, although she was still young; beautiful features, a nose so straight, and a delicately-moulded chin; but the eyes—they changed the beauty into a raving beast, which I shall remember to my dying day.

"Will that be one of our fair partners?" I asked in horror. "Shall I dance with her?"

"The dance of death, if you like," laughed Du Merton. "I believe she'd kill you like a shot if she got the chance."

And then he told me the story. Her name was Hilda Waring, and they told me the same tale up in the Queenstown district, when I have stayed at Whittlesea and at the Zwaart Kei.

You know it is a good long way from Queenstown to Whittlesea, and it takes some hours to drive. The road winds about and the drifts are often bad. It is an uninteresting drive, too, until you get nearer Whittlesea; then it gets prettier, and you go through a kloof with thickets of mimosa, with the rocks rising on one side and the river running down beneath on the other. Then there is a bit of veldt again, and you come to the village, which is quite different now to what it was in old Waring's time. If you go straight on the road takes you right through the main street and the river to Shiloh, but if you turn off to the left when you get to the middle of the village you pass a long white house, with a verandah in front. This is where old Waring had his canteen, or hotel, as he liked to call it, and a good trade he did in those days. The road soon after the hotel, gets bad, and only leads over the veldt to Fair View; they changed the name when the farm was sold, for it used to be called Doorn Kloof when Tregenna had it.

Tregenna, as everyone says who remembers him, was a handsome man, tall and fine, and very dark—so dark that people used to say he must have black blood in his veins. But he had no relatives anywhere at the Cape, and he himself had only just come out before the war, so he could have had no Kaffir ancestry; but there was a rumour of his father having been an English officer and his mother an Indian princess, but that was only a story, and no one ever knew the truth about him or why he stayed on at Whittlesea. He had fought hard, they said, in the last war with the Kaffirs, and at the end, when the land was portioned up, he was given Doorn Kloof, where he built a hut like a Hottentot's and settled down with his oxen and goats. Sometimes he would come down to Whittlesea in the evening, and could drink more whiskey than any other man without getting drunk; and then he would get more talkative, and say queer things, and his eyes glistened. These—his eyes—seemed to be the wonderful part about him, and, after a time, they said he had the "evil eye"—whatever that may be—and could cast it on people and hurt them, if he wished. Many were the tales they used to tell about him, how he could find cattle that were lost, like the Kaffir witch doctors did, and how he could fascinate people and make them do as he wanted, and that it was a bad thing to thwart him too. His eyes, and the swears he uttered—they were enough to make the dead even rise up and shudder, so they said. Oh! I've heard many tales about Tregenna. A strange man he must have been.

Digitized by Google

Well, now, about Hilda Waring. Old Waring, at the canteen, lost his wife and his three children as well, so he sent for his brother's daughter from Ireland, who was an orphan and hadn't a farthing in the world. Old Waring took her as his adopted daughter, and treated her—well, as well as the old miser could treat anybody.

She was a tall, fine girl when she came out—a handsome-looking girl, with her black hair and clear, blue eyes. She was bright and clever, and answered back well to anyone that made fun with her. They said she had learnt something coming from Ireland to Africa; but that was the girls who were jealous of her, or the old women who cursed her for being a Romanist. She was the only one in Whittlesea, and had to go in to Queenstown for mass. Needless to say, all the young farmers around were in love with her; men are like sheep—where one goes the others follow.

She liked Walter Macfarlane the best of the lot. He lived in Whittlesea and worked at one of the stores, and was a good-natured, good-hearted young fellow, and nothing more. Old Waring knew what was going on between Hilda and young Macfarlane, and how people said they were engaged; but he took no notice and laughed in his sleeve. Young Macfarlane was only hired at the store and got £5 a month, and his father sent him in mealies and flour from the farm. But, however much a man may be in love, he can't marry on £5 a month and a sack or so of corn, and Hilda Waring was no fool. Her uncle had other plans for her. She was well worth her keep at the canteen, and he encouraged the men who outspanned at his place, seeing that it all meant business.

One evening there was a lot of them there in the bar, and old Waring was sitting by the fire. Several people have told me the story.

Tregenna came swinging in, banging the door, behind him, as usual. It was the first time he had been down for months; the first time since Hilda came. He threw himself down in the easiest corner of the couch—two of the other men making room for him—and "Halloa!" he said, "I hear you've got a new barmaid. All the young fellows after her like flies. I'll wait till she comes, if you call her quick. I'm like the rest of them; I like my glass filled by a pretty girl if there's no extra charge. Ten or twenty years ago I was reckoned a good judge of the points of a woman, but I haven't had much chance lately. Your women out here are like your horses, not much breed about either of them."

They were accustomed to his way of talking, so took no notice, although most of them were Cape born. Old Waring hobbled off to call Hilda. She came at last, looking handsomer than ever—tall and slim in her white dress, and her pretty head with its masses of hair.

"Well, uncle?" she said, standing and looking disdainfully around.

"This gentleman wants some whiskey, my dear. Be as quick as you can."

"You said you would attend to the bar to-night, uncle. I am busy."

"Nonsense; serve this gentleman at once. He's been waiting five minutes. Must attend to business."

"Gentleman; what gentleman?" she said, turning round slowly and curling up her little mouth. (I have met men who would have sold all they had in the world for one kiss from Hilda Waring's mouth.) Then she looked at Tregenna, apparently not noticing him. "Gentlemen generally take off their hats before they come into my parlour," she said, slowly reaching down a glass.

"Your parlour," broke in Tregenna, with his sneering laugh and taking off his hat. "Ach! you women quickly take possession, especially the pretty ones. It reminds me of the little rhyme we used to say: 'Will you walk into my parlour? said the spider to the fly.' You are the spider and we're the flies, eh? Not a bad-looking spider either; but, take care the flies don't prove indigestible. I never knew a woman yet, who got lots of men fooling around her, but what made a mess of it in the end. You seem, though, pretty cool about it all, eh!"

Digitized by Google

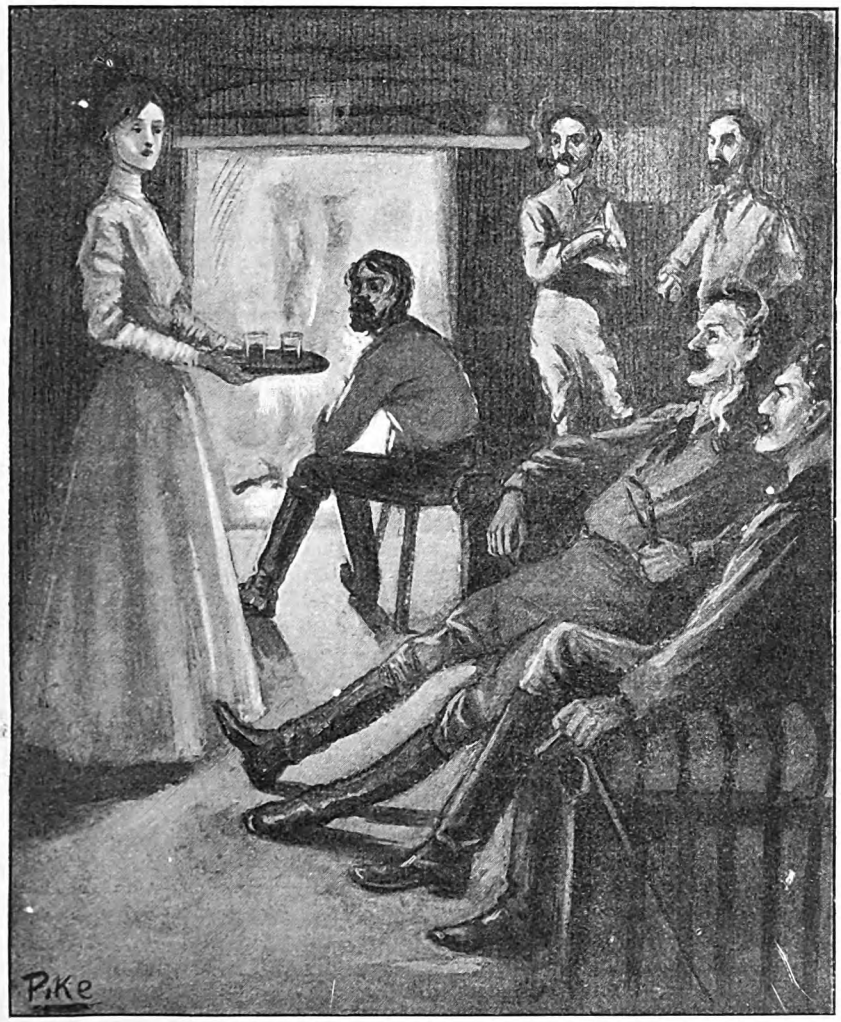
She took absolutely no notice of him, and old Waring got angry. "Hilda," he said, "what is the matter with you to-night?"

"Perhaps the right man isn't here, or has gone after somebody else. Enough to upset any girl," said Tregenna. "Well, here's to your health, my dear! May your beauty never grow less and your temper never grow worse, eh? don't you think so, boys? if so, it'll be the worse for you. She'll give you a time of it." Hilda was turning red with anger. "Eh! see; now she's blushing. That's right, a little colour becomes you. You'll knock the wind out of those Queenstown girls!"

Hilda's eyes flashed; but she kept her self-possession, as she almost always did.



HILDA'S EYES FLASHED, BUT SHE KEPT HER SELF-POSSESSION.

She had a lot to put up with old Waring. "Uncle," she said, quietly, "as there seem no other gentlemen to serve" ("no other gentlemen," with a curl of her lips), "I shall go to my room and finish my work. Good-night."

She made a sort of bow to the other men in the room and was going out, when

Digitized by Google

Tregenna jumped up and put his back to the door. "No, not yet. We haven't done with you yet! I'm going to have two or three more glasses to drink first; and besides, we want to talk to you. 'Tisn't often we have the chance of looking at such a pretty thing as you. Tell us about old Ireland. I knew some rattling girls over there, too. Now, the flies will keep the spider in its own little parlour, eh? That's a good joke."

"Please let me go," said Hilda, haughtily advancing, not used to such treatment.

"Not till you've paid toll," said Tregenna. "This gentleman hasn't taken off his hat for nothing, and he hasn't forgotten how he was told to do so. We want something to make up for that. I daresay you treat these young men how you like; but not so me. For everything you give me you'll get back double. Come, now, give me a kiss and then you can go."

"Uncle," cried Hilda, drawing herself up, "how can you allow this man to insult me in this way?"

"Insult you!" cried Tregenna. "It's best to cry out after you're hurt," and so saying, he dashed forward, put his arm round her neck, and kissed her twice or thrice.

In an instant she freed herself, and, quick as lightning, seized up a glass of ale and dashed it straight in his face.

"There!" she screamed.

"Curse you!" he yelled, as the beer trickled down his face.

"How dare you? How dare you do that?" she went on, panting. "I know you now. You're Tregenna. I have heard tales of you—tales that made me blush to hear them. You are a bad, wicked man. I know that and hate you, and I shall hate you for ever. And if ever you dare touch me again I shall kill you; yes, even though I'm a woman, I will."

"Hilda, Hilda!" broke in old Waring, frightened at the outbreak and fearing Tregenna.

"No, uncle. I will not be quiet. This man has insulted me before you all—before these others. And you stand by and calmly ——"

"Hilda, my dear!" said old Waring.

"It's true what they say. You're a fiend, not a man," she screamed at Tregenna.

He only laughed. "Let her be! Don't worry, Waring; let her be! She'll cool down, and we'll have apologies enough one day. By Jove! I like to see her like that. Shows there's some pluck in her, and some devilry." He gave a laugh, lolled down in a chair, and pulled out his pipe, as if he had forgotten the splashing he had got. He laughed on, while Hilda, in her passion, railed at him. Then finally she burst into tears, and rushed out of the room.

The next morning Tregenna rode down to the canteen again, offsaddled his horse, and marched in, smacking his whip against his riding boots.

"Waring! Hi!" he called out, and when the old miser appeared he caught him by his buttonhole, drew him into the parlour, and shut the door.

There they talked for an hour or more, and now and again the black boys, by the stoep outside, could hear Tregenna's coarse laugh, when he thought the old man was cutting the bargain too fine.

"Well," he said, getting up and pushing away the chair, "that's settled. An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth, they say. That's right. I don't know why I took a fancy to the girl. Because of her spirit, I believe. Not everyone would have dared to have thrown a glass of beer over me. I made up my mind then; she's the only sort of woman I can marry, and it suits me to do so, too. Don't say anything about it to her. Things will arrange themselves. But we will sit behind and pull the strings, eh? Remember—I promise you £500 if I marry her within six months, and I'll think about the farm."

"Yes, yes—I will do my best. It will be all right. But she's a fine girl. She has plenty after her."

"No; but, hang it! no one will bid so high as I. Everything has its price, a woman especially. If she were a Kaffir I'd give a man ten cows for her, and take her right off, but as she's white we have to bide our time, and take her to church and all that foolery, and pay you hard cash of the realm. But the principle's the same after all, isn't it? And women are the same—hang 'em—I know, whether they're black or white."

After that he often came down to Whittlesea, and at first Hilda would take no notice of him, and he would pretend to take no notice of her, except to call out rudely for what he wanted—just as he would to old Waring.

Digitized by Google

But one day they were, a whole lot of them, at a picnic at Shiloh, when a Kaffir child fell in the river. It was only a little thing, and Hilda shrieked for some one to pull it out. Without waiting a moment Tregenna jumped in—he was always a plucky man, and stopped for nothing.

"Oh, how brave you are!" called out Hilda, spontaneously, as he landed the dripping child; and from that time forth she deigned to be more gracious to him. There were other little things beside which he did, which drew him more into her favour.

He noticed it all, and laughed. He believed in Time.

"See how you have tamed him," said some one, laughing, to her. "He will do anything for you!"

"Oh, don't," said Hilda. "Pray don't say that. I don't know why, but I cannot help hating him. I think I am frightened of him. I hate him, though he fascinates me. I wish I had never seen him!"

And one day her uncle broached the subject to her (of course not mentioning the bargain he had made)—how Tregenna wanted to marry her.

"Marry him! I would sooner die," she said.

But all this made Hilda anxious about the future, and as she strolled down by the river, towards sunset time, her mind was full of sad thoughts of the past, with its quiet school life at the convent, and the meek, patient-faced nuns; and then she remembered the happy evening walks with her father, as they stole out together from the unhappy home and her tipsy mother. Her father! And the future just now seemed as black as the past had been, only, there was no father now. Instinctively she fingered the little cross she always wore round her neck, as she thought of him. A breeze had sprung up, and it refreshed her. She wandered on, pulling the grass as she went, while the river made a gurgling beneath over the stones. Suddenly she looked up, and there was Tregenna. He was quite near; she could not escape, and a blush covered her face. She longed to flee; somehow her heart beat at the sight of him.

He took off his hat to her, and then stood idly for some minutes kicking stones into the water. She did not move, and at last he came nearer.

"Why did you blush now when you saw me?" he asked. "Why did you stop and not come on? I know. They have told you that I want to marry you, and that's true. You know it, too; your own heart tells you so. They say a woman always knows when a man loves her, and I love you more than I have ever loved anyone in my life. No wonder you feel it! The more you insult me the more I love you."

Hilda put her hands to her heart and stood still.

"Why don't you say something?" he went on, "or do something? It is good that I have met you here. Then we can settle matters—you and I—without your uncle, old fool; or the rest. Just you and I alone, Hilda. You and I alone, and only the world besides. You look upon me as a rough and rude man. I daresay I may be. You have heard tales about me; they may be lies, or they may be true. But my love's as good as anybody's; better than any of those young asses in the village. It's true what I'm telling you. On my oath, it is. And you will be mine. You love me, I know; though perhaps you do not know it yet. You are the only girl, the only woman in the world for me. I knew it the first moment I saw you, when you threw the beer over me, like a young tigress. You were mine from that minute, and I shall have you; but I want your love too. Hilda, you love me. Say so, you must."

But she shrank back, frightened and tongue-tied.

"Speak!" said Tregenna, sternly.

"Do leave me; go away," she said at last, struggling to free her hands.

"No, I shan't; not until I've heard you say you love me too."

"You frighten me. I don't know what to say. Do let go my hands. You hurt."

"Well, there! Sit down here upon the grass with me and talk. No; you won't? All right. But now I have caught you I shall not let you go, you little one. Do you know how often I have wanted a time like this to tell you how much I love you? Don't shrink back. I am not hurting you. You shall talk to me now. You shall tell me what you feel, dearest."

She winced and tried to pull back.

"Now, don't look confused. It is startling—sudden. But you will get accustomed to it when we two live at Doorn Kloof together—when you are my wife. We two up there; we can laugh at the world, you and I."

Digitized by Google

"But——" she broke in at last. "No, it can't be. You don't understand. I can never, never marry you."

"Hilda, Hilda!" he said, in a half-commanding, half-entreating voice. "Hilda; you must marry me; you must! Don't you feel it yourself? For my sake; to save me——"

"To save you? From what?"

"I don't know. From myself, perhaps. At first I loved you for your beauty, now I love you for your goodness. No, Hilda; you must not say me no. Be my angel; make me a better man. Help me, Hilda. I am tired of the wickedness—of the darkness; I want to leave it. You have been sent as my help—as my star. I feel it. It is Fate that has brought us together; we cannot withstand it. It is greater than we are; it is greater than I am."

"You are wrong," cried Hilda, "there is no such thing as Fate. But you are wicked; you do not believe in anything. It is the good God above. He orders our lives, and we must pray to Him to guide us and protect us. If it is true you want to be a better man, go to Him, not to me. I cannot save you. I will not even pray for you. And by God's help," she said, speaking half solemnly, half fiercely, "by God's help, I will never marry you. I feel you are a bad man. I know it, and as such God will keep me from you. I am not afraid of you." She set her mouth, and stood up bravely before him.

"Ah!"—he gave his short laugh. "Fate! God! I know your religion. The faith that will remove mountains, but the mountains don't move, all the same, eh? But a good enough religion for a woman. But see here," pulling her to the bank, and pointing in the distance to the rivers. "You shall look. See! Here we are on this little bit of land, between the two rivers; this one is muddy, and that clear and pure. And there—do you see?—round the krantz, they meet. They cannot help it, the land slopes so. Ha! Fate! And then they join, and the Great Kei rolls down towards the sea. Do you follow? I am this one here," and he kicked another stone below. "The stream of life carries a man, even in the ordinary way, into shady places, and on its journey it gathers, unwillingly perhaps, mud from the banks. And mine was not an ordinary life; perhaps it is best that it is hidden by the bend of the present. But still, it flows by here, you see, dark, and slow, and black."

He stopped for a moment, as if with a sigh. He was holding fast her hand, and was talking more softly and more earnestly than usual. "And you are that one, yonder. You must come into my life, purifying it, brightening it, cleansing it. We will join and flow on together—to the sea. I was not always like you see me now. I shall not always be like this, if you come to me. Give me this chance"—he spoke imploringly—"give me this chance—for the last time. Speak to me, dear; tell me."

Then, at last, summoning up all her courage, she turned and faced him.

"Mr. Tregenna," she said, "I don't know how you dare to speak to me like this. You know all the time that I am going to marry another man. You have suddenly become romantic, with your tale of the two rivers. I prefer deeds to words, and I have heard of deeds enough of you. What! I daren't imagine what I should become if I married you. I should sink lower and lower. Is the Great Kei clear and bright, as is the little river flowing into it? No, I shall repeat and say for ever, rather would I be struck down dead here than live to be your wife." Her voice failed her, and she quickly turned away, but he sprang after her.

"But I say you shall," he muttered through his teeth, as he put his arms round her, so that she could not move. He had lost his temper now, and his eyes flashed. She struggled, but he still held her. "No one says 'no' to Tregenna. When I want a thing I get it. Look at me; look at my eyes now. Mine is a great love—be careful it is not a great hate. Say 'yes, I will be your wife,' and I will let you go. You won't. Well, then—I shall keep you."

Hilda felt giddy; she did not know what had come over her, with Tregenna's eyes fixed on her like that. They were fierce, wicked, demonish, and she could not take her own eyes off them. Her heart seemed to stop beating, and she gasped for breath. She felt herself gradually falling backward and sinking, and then, with an almost superhuman effort, she gave a shriek. A Kaffir boy was herding the sheep beyond the thicket, and he ran up. But when he came Tregenna was standing by the river knocking in the stones, and Hilda was sitting, almost fainting, on the veldt, holding her hand to her forehead.

Digitized by Google

"Klaas," she said, in Dutch, "I am ill. The sun, I think. Here, take my book for me, and I will go home."

And she managed to get up, and went with the Kaffir boy. They had to pass Tregenna. He looked up. "Good-bye," he said, with a sneer and a bow, and then, with emphasis, "so long."

His eyes met hers and made her tremble; and all through that sleepless night his eyes were before her, gleaming and fascinating her.

In the morning she said to the boy: "Klaas, go and tell the young boss Walter, you know, down there at the store, to come here into the garden now—now before it gets hot."

And when Macfarlane came she flung her arms around his neck. "Oh, Walter, here you are! I have wanted you so much. Oh, Walter, I am so frightened."

"Why, Hilda darling, what's the matter? You look as if you hadn't slept a wink."

"Walter,— Tregenna — Tregenna wants me to marry him. You say you know it, but I'm afraid—I don't know what to do, and I'm going into town to-day with Klaas, and uncle says Tregenna will ride back with me to-morrow. He wants him to, I know—I must go to town; I promised Sister Blanche. She will be going back to Graham's town to-morrow, but you must come in for me; you must; you must. I cannot see Tregenna again. I can't live here, in this place, any longer with him. I feel I must go away. Walter, you say you love me; take me away with you—over the Katberg, down to Bedford, or somewhere. Let us go away and be married. Oh, Walter—quickly, or I feel it will be too late."

"Hilda, are you ill? What is the matter with you? Has Tregenna been doing anything, saying anything to you? No? You are excited, darling, because you didn't sleep last night, and I daresay you've had old Sannie working in the kitchen, and she has been telling you lies,

"YOU SHALL LOOK. SEE!"

like all these Kaffirs do. I can't make you out this morning," as Hilda sat down, sobbing hysterically—a thing he had never seen her do before. "But, what do you say about being married and the Katberg? What would your uncle say? We must wait. I have only saved a little at present, and I couldn't soon get another billet over there. Hilda, I'm working for you as hard as I can."

"But, Tregenna—you don't know——"

"Yes, I know he wants to marry you in his way, like all the rest of them do, but I'm the lucky man, darling, am I not?" kissing her.

Digitized by Google

"Yes, but I can't ride home with him to-morrow. Uncle says I must, and I can't——"

"Well, it will only be for once, and you are that sort of girl, if you don't like a fellow, you can keep him at arm's length. You, frightened of Tregenna! I reckon I know him as well as most people do. He was in the store only yesterday. It's only his manner, and if you know his ways he's all right. He's given me that piece of mealie land of his, on the half with him, down by the river. And don't you see, dear, you must be reasonable. We must keep right with your uncle until we get him round to our side. I wish I could come for you to-morrow, but I can't.

"I'll ride back alone."

"Of course, you couldn't do that, all that distance."

"And you say I must come out with Tregenna. I hate it—I don't think I shall ever come back alive."

"Nonsense, darling. There's the old chap calling you. Ah, the post-cart going off. Good-bye! I shall see you before you start this evening."

Several people said afterwards that she looked the same as usual, riding away that day, only, perhaps, a little pale and worried, and the people in Queenstown said so, too.

The next day Hilda saw the sister off at two, and she intended to start home early to avoid Tregenna; but it was hot as yet; the sun was streaming down.

She wanted to rest a little while in the cool and quiet, where she could be alone and peaceful. So she went into the church where she always worshipped. It was a tiny place, built of corrugated iron, with a tawdry altar. It is improved now, since richer folks have come to live in the district.

She was quite alone, and after a little formal prayer for a time she sat still, with her head on her hands, trying to sort her thoughts. At first they were all confused and miserable; then she roused herself, and went over the case in her thoughts.

"It's no use behaving like this—they all seem to want me to marry Tregenna. But I won't. Even Walter, I don't think, would mind much. He laughed at me this morning; he didn't seem to care. Oh, Walter, how can you, how can you?" She wiped her eyes, and then: "But I am myself, my own mistress. I will not marry him, no, whatever happens, no. I know he is wicked, he is bad—his eyes—and I will have nothing to do with him. But I can't help it. If he rides home with me to-night and looks at me so—oh! What was the matter with me then? What is the matter with me now? I cannot bear it; I cannot help myself. I hate him, yet I have to do as he wants. Oh, God! help me, help me."

Instinctively her heart turned to prayer. She rose and went to a side altar, with its little image.

"Father, dear God," she began, fingering her rosary, and opening her heart as soul to soul. Past and future both faded away in the earnestness of her prayer. She forgot where she was, and why; her lips moving noiselessly, and her eyes seeing no earthly vision.

"Oh, God," she murmured, "kill this man! kill him! I shall never be freed from him till then. I hate him, but am powerless to hurt him. Help me! and I will be your servant for ever."

So she prayed more earnestly than she had ever done in her life; her prayer intensified by hate. The time went, and she knelt on, as in a trance. At last the door banged and aroused her. Some other worshipper came gliding in. Hilda got up slowly; she felt dazed, and rubbed her hand over her forehead. She was almost surprised to find herself in the chapel. Where had she been? Tregenna, through it all, had been ever before her—his eyes had been on her always. The clock over the door struck four; this quite woke her up, and she went out.

There was no one awaiting her at the hotel.

"The dear God has heard my prayer," she thought, as she quickly told the boy to saddle up, and then went off gladly alone, although she knew they would be angry at home with her riding all that distance without a companion.

It is a good four hours' ride from Queenstown to Whittlesea, and many people, especially if they are driving, stop on the way for a rest. But she had not started as early as she had meant to, and wanted to get home before it grew very dark; the sun set early, though the days were hot. Coming out of town she fell in with Tom Morley, of Tarkastad, in his buggy, and she rode alongside him until his road turned off. Very few she

Digitized by Google

AND THEN BEGAN THAT FEARFUL RIDE.

Digitized by Google

met going along—some Kaffirs trekking, and a Dutchman or so riding into town.

Then a shower of rain came on, then it hailed; so she had to shelter at Kotzee's farmhouse. But it soon stopped, and she would go on, old Kotzee said.

It was stormy-looking still, and the sun was setting, red and glowing, behind the banks of clouds. But the air was fresh, and Hilda took off her hat and let it blow through her hair, and so she felt revived and cooled after the heated day. The horse was one she often rode, and it knew the way almost better than she did, so she paid scarcely any heed to the road.

It was just at the turning down into the mimosa bushes, where it gets more stony, and on one side the krantz rises steep up—the horse stopped dead.

Hilda looked up. Within a short distance of her, on a rise in the road, was Tregenna on his horse.

It was so sudden. She had thought herself free from him. A cold shudder of fear ran down her.

Tregenna stood there still—with the dying sunlight shining red on his face, and with his horse champing and pawing the ground. He was looking at her; he evidently had been waiting for her. He had on a large hat, his riding hat, and top boots—the clothes he generally wore, but they all looked red in the glow.

There was no other way home. She must go with him; and, trying to subdue her fear, she determined to go forward. Her horse, usually quiet, now began rearing, and she could scarcely induce him to go on.

"Firefly; go on," she whispered while she patted him. "He will not hurt us. There is nothing to be afraid of."

Tregenna's lips curled, and a smile came on them as he saw her coming, urging the horse. He waved his hat.

"Mr. Tregenna," she said, boldly advancing; "seeing you and meeting you here, I presume you mean to ride home with me. That's what my uncle told me. But, remembering what passed between us the other day, I should think you know your company is not welcome to me. Kindly let me pass. It is dark already, and I must be quick home. It is not manly of you to wait for me like this."

"Wait for you! yes, Hilda. I have been waiting for you. I shall wait for you for ever." His voice was gloomy and ominous. She shuddered as she felt the old fear coming over her.

She drew her horse and passed him, and then he turned and followed behind. She closed her lips; she would not speak to him. There were four miles further to go.

And then began that fearful ride.

She hoped, perhaps if she did not notice him or speak to him, he might turn off by the bridle path to Doorn Kloof, but she heard always after the clank of his horse's feet. Once she stopped, as her horse stumbled—and he stopped too, only a foot or two behind. As she turned she caught sight of his face, grim and severe.

Neither spoke. On they went. Hilda would not turn round. A storm was coming up; she felt some spots of rain on her face, and it grew darker. The sun set, it got gloomy, and the wind whistled through the bushes. The road was bad, but she urged Firefly into a gallop, while the loose stones flew down the sides of the rocks.

The storm came nearer. A crash of thunder and a streak of lightning, which rebounded on some stone not far ahead, and for an instant lit up the whole kloof, the rocks, the river rushing underneath, and the little house on the kopje opposite. Another terrific burst of thunder, and Hilda, with her excited nerves, gave a scream, while her horse plunged.

"Wait!" called Tregenna, coming nearer, and even above the howling of the storm and the noise his voice was cold and clear. "Wait! Let us wait a little, sweetheart. You must not go on," he said.

He put out his hand to catch the bridle of her horse, but it swerved and started forward again.

"No," cried Hilda, "I must go home!"

"Home; yes, my home—Doorn Kloof. You are coming with me to-night. I have waited for you long enough. You are mine now—now and for ever," he hissed in her ear, as again he made a lunge at her bridle.

She lashed her horse furiously, and it rushed forward despite the lightning ahead. And so they dashed on through the thorn trees, he trying vainly to catch up with her. Once she heard a rumbling behind; she hoped his horse had fallen, but he was up again and after her in a minute.

She was frightened, terrified, as one possessed!

Digitized by Google

They were through the thicket at last; the noise, the terror seemed less. She gave a little gasp—she could see the lights of Whittlesea in front. She would soon be safe now; only a second or two more.

They dashed into the street—the people rushing to their windows as they heard the noise. But it was dark, and they could see nothing.

But nearer, nearer he came. At the corner he caught her up; his horse was alongside hers. He bent forward and seized her arm.

"Doorn Kloof," he muttered.

His hand held her fast—fast, that it hurt like fire; but, after some wrestling, she was able to wrench herself free, and fell, half fainting, half mad, from the saddle in front of the inn.

He rushed on, not halting, and dashed on towards Doorn Kloof. She, dazed and giddy, staggered into the parlour.

They all started up, and scarcely knew her at first, with her ghastly look and drenched hair streaming around her, covered with mud from head to foot.

"Good heavens, Hilda!" cried old Waring. "Fancy being out such a night as this. You ought to have stayed in town. Where have you come from, girl?"

"I rode out," she panted, breathlessly. "I came through the kloof with Tregenna!"

"Tregenna!" they screamed.

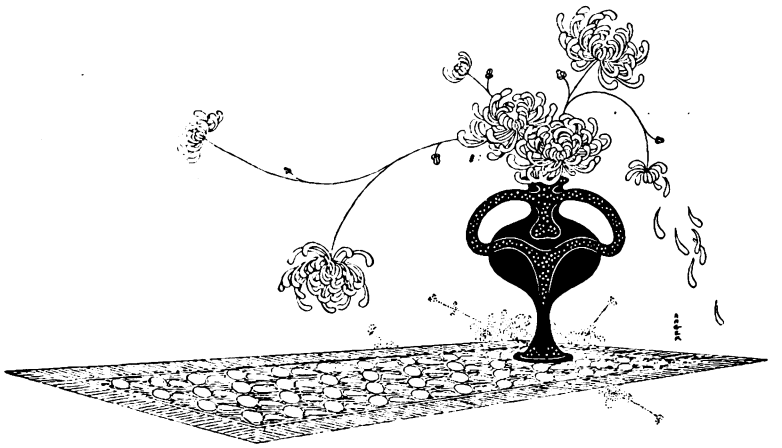
"Yes, he wanted me to go with him to Doorn Kloof—see—" and she put up her sleeve and showed the red patches on her arm where his fingers had pressed. "He would not let me go; he pulled me here!"

"What are you saying?"

"The girl's mad!"

"What has happened to you?" they called out. "Why, Tregenna is dead. He lies over there at the store. He died about four this afternoon. His horse threw him ——"

But Hilda is not the only one who has seen Tregenna in the kloof.



Digitized by Google

A CHAPEL COLLECTION IN CEYLON.

The Wesleyan Missionary Society.

By STEPHEN STAPLETON.

THE Wesleyan Missionary Society is another of our great evangelical organisations which have grown grey in the service of spreading the light to the heathen; and after close on a century and a quarter of that arduous and harassing, but noble work, is still young and ardent and enthusiastic.

John Wesley himself was Chaplain to a Mission in Georgia for the Conversion of the Indians, from 1735 to 1737, before he formed the first Methodist Society. But the first Methodist missionary was Wesley's younger contemporary, Dr. Thomas Coke, who in January, 1784, issued a plan for the establishment of Methodist Missions among the heathen. Coke was appointed "superintendent" to discharge episcopal functions in the American Methodist Societies; and he left England for that purpose in September, 1784. Three years later his title of "superintendent" was altered into "bishop" by the American Methodist Conference. It was this that called forth Wesley's famous declaration, "Men may call me a knave, or a fool, a rascal, a scoundrel, and I am content; but they shall never, by my consent, call me a bishop." Coke also gave great offence in England by signing, in 1789, an address of congratulation from "the Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church" to George Washington, on his appointment, that year, first President of the United States. In 1786 the first Methodist Missionary Committee was formed; and Coke, who was appointed its head, henceforth devoted himself with immense zeal and resource to the operations of Methodist missionary enterprise abroad. In the following year the first missionary of the Society went to the West Indies. At the Methodist Conference in 1804 the movement was reorganised and Coke was again elected "the General Superintendent of all the missions." Missionaries were sent to Gibraltar in 1804, and Sierra Leone in 1811. Coke's last enterprise was a voyage undertaken with a view to promote the evangelisation of India. He set sail from Portsmouth on the 30th December, 1814, with a band of workers, and died on the voyage. On the 3rd of May 1815, in the Indian Ocean, he was found dead of apoplexy in his cabin. The body of the great missionary was committed to the deep.

Digitized by Google

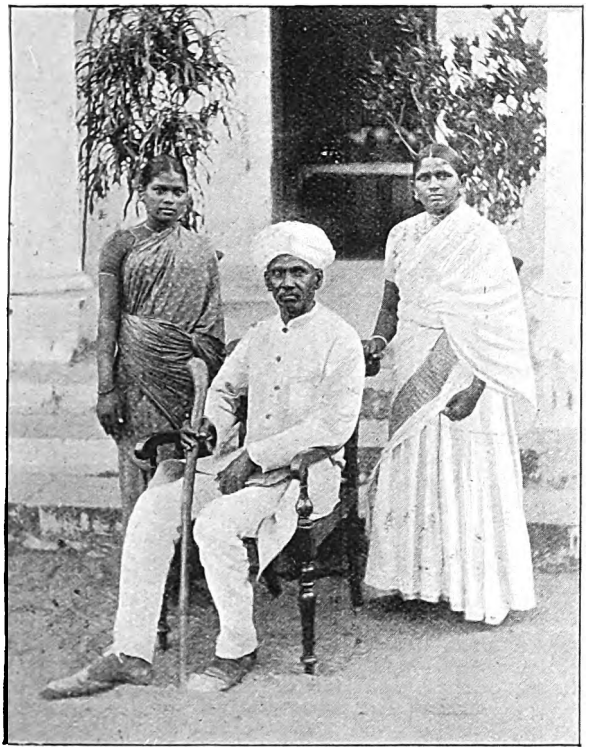
During the next twenty or thirty years the Society spread its missionary work to the Cape of Good Hope (1814); New South Wales (1815); Gambia (1821); New Zealand (1822). In the West Indian islands, where the Methodists first began operations as early as 1786, the missionaries took a most prominent part on the side of the slaves in the struggle for emancipation. Many of them suffered in consequence by the violence of the baser sort of the infuriated planters, but they won the undying love of the emotional negroes, and in the insurrection of the slaves in 1831, which terminated in their emancipation in 1834, the teachings of the missionaries exercised a beneficent restraining influence. In West Africa opportunities for still further widening the Society's sphere of labours were seized as British influence extended. The Gold Coast was successfully occupied in 1835, and Lagos in 1854.



A NATIVE EVANGELIST OF THE MADRAS DISTRICT, INDIA.

Perhaps in no part of the world do so many difficulties beset the path of the missionary as in West Africa. The climate is the most deadly to Europeans in the world; and the native paganism is the lowest type of religious fetishism; witchcraft and human sacrifice, involving unparalleled cruelty and terror. Yet along the 2,000 miles of coast from Gambia to Lagos, and including of course, Sierra Leone and the Gold Coast, and at many points inland, there are flourishing Wesleyan-Methodist missionary centres.

Many curious and interesting sidelights on the characters of the natives are obtained from the experiences of the missionaries. The Rev. A. Taylor, who was in charge of the Gold Coast district in the early sixties has many an amusing story to tell of his efforts to raise money from the native Christians in support of the mission. These people though not rich, as the word is understood here, are by no means poor. Their wants are few and simple and easily supplied; and they can live well on threepence a day. "The natives are better off than thousands in England," said Mr. Taylor, "and can better afford to give in support of missions than many in that country." So he determined to try if he could induce them to contribute to the funds of the mission. At the close of the service one Sunday at Anamabu, he pointed out to the congregation the obligation of conforming to the rule with regard to subscriptions. "You know by experience," he said, "that embracing the Christian religion saves people much more than it costs them. You, yourselves, have saved money by becoming Christians. You know how much you wasted every year in silly, senseless, heathen customs. Let me ask you a question. Do you think that the blessings of the Gospel—repentance and faith, pardon, holiness, happiness and heaven—the white robe, the palm of victory, the golden harp and crown of glory will be dearly bought at a penny a week and a shilling a quarter?" What happened at the quarterly collections Mr. Taylor thus relates :—

Digitized by Google

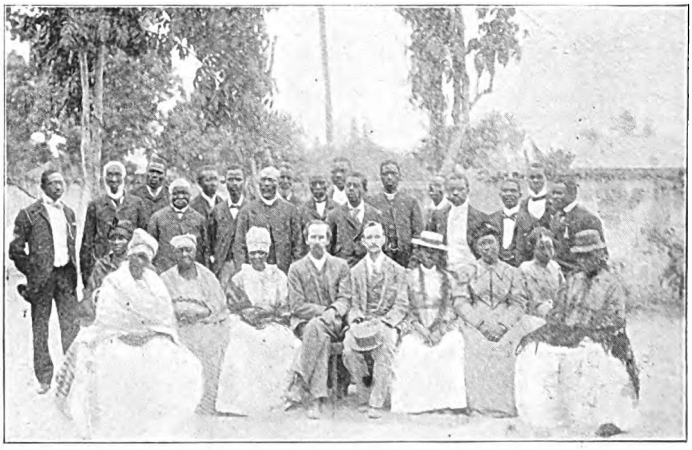
Several of the sisters who were "black but comely" practised a little guile. They did not wear "dresses" but native cloths, so did not carry purses; but just the money they wanted tied up in knots at the end of their cloths and tucked in the bosom. In meeting the classes the schoolmaster acted as interpreter. The members would leave their seats one by one, come and stand between us, and give their experience in Fanti, which the interpreter would put into English. I would reply in English, which he would turn into the native tongue. Then I would hand the ticket to the members. Those who meant to give a shilling would give it in two sixpences, tied up in two hard knots at the end of the cloth. On receiving the tickets they would untie one knot and lay down a sixpence. If I noticed them, they would unfasten another knot and put down a second sixpence; but if I were not looking they would give only one sixpence. However, the leaders were quite equal to the occasion. They would nudge me, saying, "That sister only gave sixpence; she can afford a shilling." Then I would say, pleasantly, "Sister, can't you observe the rule?" She would smile, and lay down another sixpence. The brethren were less shrewd than the sisters, but more shabby. They would stand up, argue the matter, and say, "I had been in their country some time now, and must know that things were not always at the same price. Corn and yams were sometimes one price, and sometimes another." But what they could not understand was, whatever the price of corn and yams, this ticket was always a shilling, and never any reduction. Another brother would stand erect, close his eyes, look very pious, and give a gushing and glowing experience. He loved the Lord, because He had done, and was doing, so much for him. He was so happy day by day, and was making such progress on the road to heaven, and quite longed to be there. But when offered his ticket would politely decline to accept it, thinking that was the cheaper way. But when told that by refusing the ticket he cut himself off from the society, the matter was placed in a different light. A third brother, who thought I was selling the tickets, would come and ask, "How much for a trial ticket?" But a little explanation and patience won the day, and ere long class and ticket money became an established custom.

The natives, however, often generously contribute to the mission. Several native traders in the Gold Coast district, who when lads were educated in the mission schools showed their gratitude by giving £4, £6 and £12 a year towards the expenses of the schools in the places in which they lived.

Some five hours' journey by hammock through the "bush" from Cape Coast is a small interior town called Abakrampa. In an account of a visit paid to this town Mr. Taylor tells us how the missionaries travel in Western Africa, and how they hold palavers with great chiefs and king :—

The day before my journey my servant spent in securing hammock-men and carriers. As there were no hotels nor lodging-houses where I could get what I wanted by paying for it, all I required for eating, drinking and sleeping, washing and dressing, cooking, etc., had to be taken with me. The following morning at seven o'clock the hammock-men and carriers came to the mission-house in high glee, smoking, talking, shouting, joking, and laughing. In a few minutes we started, the carriers in front with big boxes balanced on their heads. Next came the hammock in which I lay, my man-servant walking by its side. The way to Abakrampa lay through a dense forest abounding with tall grass, bushes and trees, large and small, wild flowers in great variety, handsome butterflies big as bats, lazily roving from shrub to shrub, while birds of gay plumage would dart from branch to branch and from tree to tree. In some places there were narrow, winding foot-paths, in others no path at all. Occasionally, a great tree, like a fallen forest giant, would lie across the way. Now and then we had to be content with occasional glimpses of blue sky through the tops of the trees, while the sun would shoot his fierce rays down upon our head. About noon we arrived at the Wesleyan Mission-house.



MEMBERS OF THE GAMBIA SYNOD.

According to custom Mr. Taylor sent his respects to the king, informing his Majesty of his arrival, and of his intention to visit him in the afternoon. The king returned the compliment by sending him word that he was glad the missionary had come to his place and would be pleased to see him, and accompanying the royal message was a present consisting of a bunch of plantains, several yams and a live goat. In due time Mr. Taylor set out for the palace.

Digitized by Google

Presently we came to a place consisting of four high walls thatched with dead grass. The entrance was through a door of unplained boards. This was kept shut by a heavy stone tied at the end of a piece of rope, fastened to the top. My friend said "this is the King's palace!" We entered and found ourselves not in the palace but in a large court-yard. At one end the floor was raised about two feet and a-half, making a sort of platform; above it was a thatched roof. Under this canopy on an Ashanti stool sat Otu Amfu, King of the Abrahs. On his right-hand there was a rusty iron chair, tied together with string. There was also a number of domestic slaves about the yard, sitting, standing, and lying down. My friends and I walked towards the king. He rose and shook hands with us, and bade me come on the platform and sit in the rusty lawn chair. Then he made a most interesting speech, though he was a heathen. He said "he was glad I had paid him a visit; he was thankful for many things especially that the Gospel had been sent to his country. Before it came the land was all dark, and the people knew nothing at all. But now it was all light, and the people knew many things, and one thing they knew was that the heathen customs of their country were no use. One thing, however, he was sorry for. Formerly, a minister lived in his town, but he had been removed and only a catechist put in his place. Now his town and people were very important and required a minister. So he hoped that I would remove the catechist and appoint another minister without delay."

Mr. Taylor told his Majesty he was pleased to hear him speak so highly of the Gospel, and promised to do his best for the place. The missionary then enquired of the king if he attended the chapel himself.

He said he did not. The fact was, his country was large, his people were many, and he had very important duties to perform. That was why he did not come to the chapel. I replied, "I knew he was a great king and ruled over a great people, but in the Bible we read of King David, who ruled over Israel and Judah, yet he found time to 'go into the House of the Lord.' Also England was a great country, and Queen Victoria was a great sovereign, but her Majesty found time to go to God's House on Sabbath days. And I thought if King David and Queen Victoria could go to God's House on Sabbath days King Otu Amfu might go too." He said, "He had heard my words, and thanked me for them; but another reason why he did not attend the chapel was because he was not well. Though he was young and tall, he was not strong; but was often sick and obliged to stop at home and 'medicine himself.'"

"One touch of nature makes the whole world kin."

I looked into the sable face of his Majesty, and, smiling, said, "King, you are a tall, fine-looking young man, and in your native country, where the climate suits you well. I am a little, weak, white man, in a foreign country. The climate does not agree with me at all. I am sick 'too much,' yet I go to God's House twice every Sunday and several times in the week besides; and if I can go, I think you might." Again the king replied he had heard all, and said, "We all worship God. God gave us all we had. It was God that had made him a king. Some worshipped God in one way, and some in another. Though he did not come to chapel, he worshipped God all the same, only in another way."

"God is a great King over all." Mr. Taylor went on to say. "We are all His servants, kings as well as their subjects, and we are all in duty bound to serve Him. Not, however, as we please, but as He commands. If we do, we shall be abundantly rewarded; but if we do not, we shall be severely punished."

The missionary work of the Society in China began in 1852, when a foothold was established at Canton. China is another country which is often the despair of all but the most enthusiastic missionaries. It seems, at times, almost hopeless to make headway against the Confucianists among the upper classes, with their agnosticism and materialism, and their worship of ancestors, and the ignorant masses of the people with their Taoist and Buddist superstitions and their disposition to attack "the foreign devils." These, and the malarial effects of the climate, make the task of the missionaries in China hard indeed. But with dauntless hearts behind it the work goes bravely on. When a town or a district is selected for fresh evangelistic efforts, a colporteur is sent there to distribute tracts, and to rent a house there according to Chinese custom, by obtaining a signed agreement and paying the earnest money. The mandarin, or magistrate of the place, is then requested to put up a proclamation explaining to the people the treaty rights of the Christians. Sometimes the mandarin demurs; sometimes he consents. But the way is not yet clear, even if the desired proclamation be issued. A feast, perhaps is prepared in one of the temples, the leading men of the town are invited, and drinking wine in which chicken's blood is mingled they make a vow that the missionaries shall not be allowed to have a house in the district. The anger of the mob is inflamed

Digitized by Google

WESLEYAN MISSION HOUSE, TEKWANI RIVER, MATABELELAND.

by placards declaring that the Christians entice children to attend their schools in order to eat them ; and many are bribed with gifts to create a disturbance. In one case, in the country town of Chi Shui, a man was bribed by the gift of a coffin for his aged mother, to lead a mob in attacking the mission hall or chapel. There is no more precious gift in the eyes of the Chinese than a coffin. But the missionaries hold on, at the peril of limb and life, until the feeling against them has worked itself out, or they have conciliated the people by their devotion and self-sacrifice.

As in India, the plague periodically visits towns and districts of China, and slays thousands of the unfortunate natives. What adds to the terror of those awful visitations, is the belief of the people that it is due to the malevolent influences of angry demons.

Sanitation they have never heard of, and indeed they would not believe in its efficacy if it were preached to them. The extraordinary measures they adopt in order to repel the malignant spirits who are believed to cause these plagues are thus described by a Wesleyan Methodist Missionary in China :—

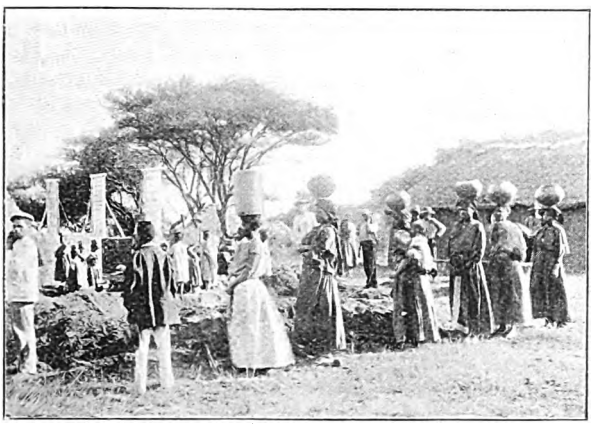
> Mat sheds are erected in the streets, always facing south, and if the streets are long two or three are built. In these open sheds idols are seated — idols which have lived in darkness and cob-webs and filth for years, perhaps. The largest in the centre are supported, like a general with his staff, by the smaller and more insignificant ones. They are decorated with long strips of crimson bunting, regaled with piles of fruit and dishes of meat, and refreshed by vases of heavily scented flowers. The Chinese thus cajole their idols into that state of mind and volition consonant with a vigorous activity in attending to the matter brought to their notice. These groups of idols are placed in this way to insure the work being well done. Should the first idol be found nodding, the second will be awake, and if both are avoided by the invading demons, the third will surely check their progress.
>
> But like good strategists, the Chinese leave no stone unturned. The watchfulness and ability of their idols cannot always be relied upon, well treated as they are. Over the gate of every street, and door of each house, the people hang first a small bag of cockle shells, then a bunch of prickly cactus, bristling with threatening spears, also a piece of fine netting. If the demons escape the watchfulness of the idols, and attempt to invade the sanctity of the home they may yet be hindered. For the rattling shells may frighten them, as the beating of gongs frightens off the dragon when attempting to swallow the moon on the eve of an eclipse. Should the evil spirits laugh at these, they must yet force their way through the branches of cactus, with its barricades of needle-like spikes; if they get through this, they will then be entangled in the netting. In this way the people endeavour to repel the malignant spirits, first by their idols, then by placing these obstacles in their way. But all their efforts are fruitless, and the demons strike their victims—men, women, and children—with their invincible darts, which no hand can stay.

It is when the towns of China are thus scourged, when only those remain who

WESLEYAN GIRLS' SCHOOL, TALATNA, CEYLON.

Digitized by Google

are chained to the doomed place by the want of means to leave, and when those unfortunates are frantic with terror, that the missionaries most truly reveal themselves as soldiers of Christ. What a terrible time it is for them in India and in China, when famine and plague are sweeping off their victims in thousands! The living skeletons, with protruding bones, sunken eyes, pinched faces, that run madly to them for some alleviation of their terrible sufferings—what a sight to make the heart ache! But it is in these times of famine and plague that both in China and India the seeds of the Gospel are most fruitfully sown. The kindness, gentleness and love displayed by the missionaries in these calamitous times; their nursing and succour of the plague-stricken patients, touch the people's hearts and teach them that a religion which can inspire its ministers to such deeds of heroic self-sacrifice must, indeed, be true and noble.



WESLEYAN CHURCH IN COURSE OF ERECTION, M'PHATLELE'S TOWN, GOOD HOPE, ZOUTPANSBERG, TRANSVAAL.

Many Indians and Chinese, no doubt, join the missions for sordid motives, for the material benefits which membership sometimes confers. It is inevitable that there must be some who are merely nominal converts and who will lapse back again into heathenism. But apart from these, there are thousands of men and women who become sincere and true Christians, whose lives are completely transformed by the teachings of the Gospel, who have broken completely with the past, who remain loyal amid great temptations, steadfast in the face of great persecution.

Some faint idea of the heroism of the missionary in India who, as the friend and physician to all his people, fearlessly goes about on his duty in the plague-stricken districts, nursing and comforting the sick and dying, uplifting and strengthening the living, may be gathered from the following extract from a letter written by Mr. Rees, who is in charge of Tumkur, in the Mysore country, and just received by the Society:—

On Thursday, September 28th, the Evangelist Jonathan reported to me that a man, named Devadasa, and a woman, named Sundari, had fever. I carefully enquired if there were any plague symptoms, such as swellings in the neck, armpit, or groin, and being assured that there was none, and that they were ordinary cases of fever, I ordered them to be brought in a cart next morning to the Tumkur hospital. Next morning, fearing there might be some delay in bringing them in, I started off on my bicycle for the village, which is 2½ miles distant, and midway met the cart in which were not only Devadasa and Sundari, but also Devadasa's wife Suniti, their little boy, and also a baby in arms. Sundari had left her four month's old baby with a neighbour, and her husband drove the cart. Every one of them with the exception of the baby had fever. The cart was stopped outside the town, and I took the doctor to see them. He examined as carefully as he could on the roadside, and though there were no distinctive plague symptoms, except in the case of Devadasa, we decided that our best course was to place them all in a ward of the plague hospital, which was near at hand, and wait for developments. Next morning Suniti had a bubo, which clearly indicated that they were suffering from plague. I now had to arrange for nurses, as the hospital was not provided with any. Here the courage and humanity of our Christians again made themselves manifest. Without hesitation, two young men and a woman volunteered for this dangerous work and have from that time worked faithfully, and tenderly ministered to the sick and dying. Having made arrangements for the patients, I cycled off to Betheluru to make arrangements for disinfection and segregation. On my arrival I found Sundari's baby was dead.

The annual report of the Society for 1900, dealing with mission work in Europe, India, China, West Africa, Mashonaland and Rhodesia, British Honduras and the Bahamas, showed that there are 2,450 chapels and other preaching places in connection with 315 central stations or circuits; that the staff consisted of 366 missionaries, 3,090 catechists, day school teachers and other paid agents, with 6,133 unpaid agents, such as local preachers and Sunday-school teachers. The Church members numbered 47,372, besides 13,265 on probation and 92,488 scholars. The net ordinary income had been £106,346; contributions for special missions, £1,834; receipts in the mission districts, £8,787; and incomes from investments, legacies, etc., £16,722, making, with a small balance from the previous year, a grand total of £133,757. The expenditure had been £19 less than the income.

Digitized by Google

What lies behind these cold figures is well set forth in the following extract from the annual report:—

It is noteworthy that all the Districts in India, Ceylon, and China, that is, our entire Asiatic field, where the most ancient and highly organised forms of heathenism are encountered, report an increase of church membership, along with many other signs of progress. But it is with respect to our Asiatic Missions above all that we would repeat the oft-expressed caution against a too literal and narrow interpretation of figures. There is much real progress that cannot be set forth in statistics. There is the diffusion of Christian thought and sentiment over widening areas; there is the moral impression made by the character of good men and women, and the affection cherished by thousands of young people for those who have taught and cared for them; there is the movement, under social and economic pressure, of whole classes, and even races, towards the religion that pities their sorrows and recognises their aspirations. These are but a part of the influences that co-operate with the direct preaching of the Gospel to loose the people from the past, and to prepare among them the way of the Lord. Whatever we at home may be inclined to do, those who are working for Christ in the East do not accept their own statistics as giving the real or adequate measure of their work. The growth of the seed, the spread of the leaven cannot be reported on with precision. The Kingdom of God cometh not with observation.

The operations of this great evangelical organisation are directed from the Wesleyan Mission House, Bishopsgate Street Within. It publishes two excellent monthly magazines — "Work and Workers" and "At Home and Abroad," the latter being intended for young helpers in the work.

HER LIFE ALL MAPPED OUT.

If no one ever marries me,—
And I don't see why he should,
For nurse says I'm not pretty,
And I'm seldom very good,—

If no one ever marries me,
I shan't mind very much;
I shall buy a squirrel in a cage,
And a little rabbit-hutch;

I shall have a cottage near a wood,
And a pony all my own,
And a little lamb quite clean and tame,
That I can take to town.

And when I'm getting really old,—
At twenty-eight or nine,—
I shall buy a little orphan girl,
And bring her up all mine.

Digitized by Google

An English Woman in China.

A TALK WITH MRS. BISHOP.

By SYBIL C. MITFORD.

THE other week I spent an interesting hour with Mrs. Bishop, just when all eyes were turned towards China, when all England was racked with anxiety concerning the fate of the Legations and of hundreds of our fellow countrymen and women in Pekin. So it was natural that our talk should have been chiefly of China and the Chinese, of the beauty of the country, and of the cruelty and the charity, the civilisation and the barbarity of the strangest people in the civilised world.

I had read Mrs. Bishop's book "The Yangtze Valley and Beyond," which had interested me greatly. It is a book full not only of graphic descriptions of places, but replete with information about the people amongst whom she had travelled alone for fifteen months in three years, visiting towns and villages in which no European woman had ever before set foot. Remembering how intimately she had studied the people I asked her if she had then seen signs of the coming present insurrection and the causes which have led to it.

"Yes," she said, "in those three years of travel I saw many signs that foretold a storm. I saw that the hatred of the foreigner, always so marked a characteristic of the Chinese, was steadily growing. This was in a great measure due to the methods of the Roman Catholic missionaries, for whom personally I have the greatest respect. But they too often fail to make themselves popular with the Chinese. By insisting on precedence being granted the Roman hierarchy equal to that of the higher mandarins, by claiming huge indemnities out of all proportion to the damage sustained during the riots in Sze Chuan, by the non-admittance of heathen into the churches during the celebration of Mass and other services, in all these ways they have done much to excite the animosity of the Chinese. And once their ire is aroused against any class of Europeans all others are immediately included. All are Christians and 'foreign devils,' and as such only fit to be extirpated.

MRS. BISHOP.

"But the question of the foreigner, apart from his religion, has always been and always will be the greatest difficulty in dealing with the Chinese. 'There's a foreign devil, kill him,' is a favourite cry. It is an instinct strongly engrained in his nature, and it is doubtful whether it will ever be overcome."

Digitized by Google

But Mrs. Bishop herself almost always got on well with the Chinese. Their language she does not speak, but by means of an interpreter she knew them well, and in many ways she liked them. They are to her the most interesting people she has studied. They are made up of paradoxes. They are at once the most cruel people in the world, and one of the most charitable. Their cruelty is, of course, proverbial, but their charity is certainly less recognised. And yet they are in the forefront of civilisation with their charitable institutions, and benevolence is taught in their classics and enforced in their religions.

"In Chin-Kiang alone," Mrs. Bishop said, "they have a foundling home, an orphanage, a hospital for the blind, homes for the aged and for strangers, a beggars' refuge, and pensions for the destitute. Then there are well organised free dispensaries, and a splendid Life Saving Institute, whose little red boats are to be seen every hour of the day skimming about the Yangtze in all the foam and fret of the river, and there are also a widows' relief society and a widows' home. What European town could show more benevolent institutions? And yet with all this there is the usual cruelty, the usual callousness and indifference to life, whilst in Southern China infanticide is ruthlessly practised amongst the girl babies whenever they become too numerous. I myself have spoken to women, now become Christians, who have practised this cruel habit. One of them had put to death no less than five girl babies. But yet, though Christianity had taught her that it was wrong and wicked, she evidently did not regard her crime with any very harrowing feeling of remorse."

A PAI FANG.

Mrs. Bishop, although she managed, as a rule, to keep on good terms with the Chinese, experienced some cruel treatment at their hands. At Liang-shan Hsien she was stoned and beaten, the whole populace being in an uproar, yelling and shrieking at her, and howling with all the fury of a Chinese mob. Fortunately she managed to take refuge in a dark shed in an inn yard; and there, with the door bolted and barred, she waited expected every moment her fortress to be forced in, when nothing would have saved her from the cruel rage of the people outside.

Digitized by Google

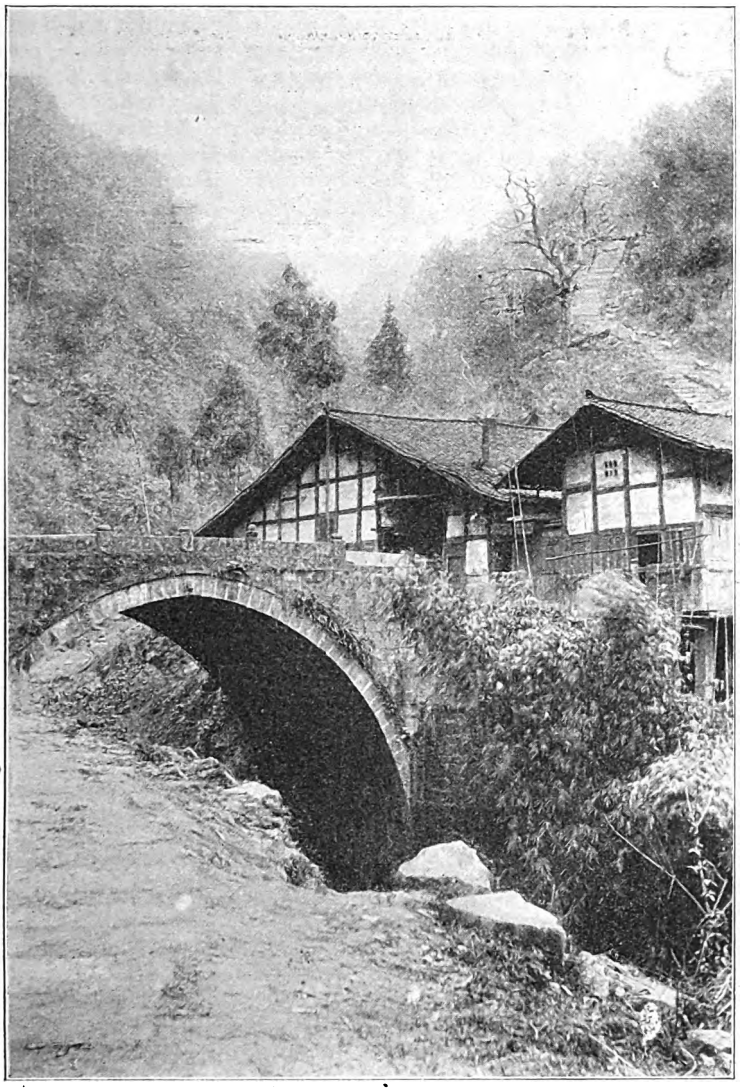
Again at Lo-kia-chan she was at the mercy of a rowdy crowd, the whole population being roused to a frenzy by the sight of her open chair, which was to them a novelty and the sure sign of the foreigner. They kicked at her chair, spat at her, yelled "foreign devil," "foreign dog," "child eater," and showered stones upon her and her chair until one hit her at the back of the ear, making her insensible for some time. This treatment was repeated at Peng Hsien, where again she had to be hidden in a room in the inn and the door securely barred until the mandarin's secretary and another official arrived to restore order. But with all these unpleasant experiences Mrs. Bishop has not lost her zest for travelling. "They never do me any harm," she says, "so long as I sleep well, which indeed is my constant habit. Even if I go to bed afraid, and with a revolver loaded by my side, I am asleep directly. No amount of danger has ever kept we awake."



BRIDGE AND INN, SHAN-RANG-SAR.

And then returning to the Chinese, I asked her if they made good Christians. "The very best," she said. "There is no cringing about the Chinese. They stand before you as men, and when they have accepted the Christian faith they will endure any torture rather than renounce it. And it is through the particular characteristics of the people that the religion will grow amongst them. They are such ardent propagandists. If one man is converted he will not rest content until he has converted a hundred others. Then their own ethical system taught by Confucius is so high that it can be appealed to in support of our own religion, and an able missionary by quoting Confucius is sure to gain a hearing."

Leaving the subject of the Chinese, Mrs. Bishop talked about her early life and the causes that led her to travel and to write, the two occupations that have made much of the interest of her life until the last years, when photography has become another of her favourite occupations.

Digitized by Google

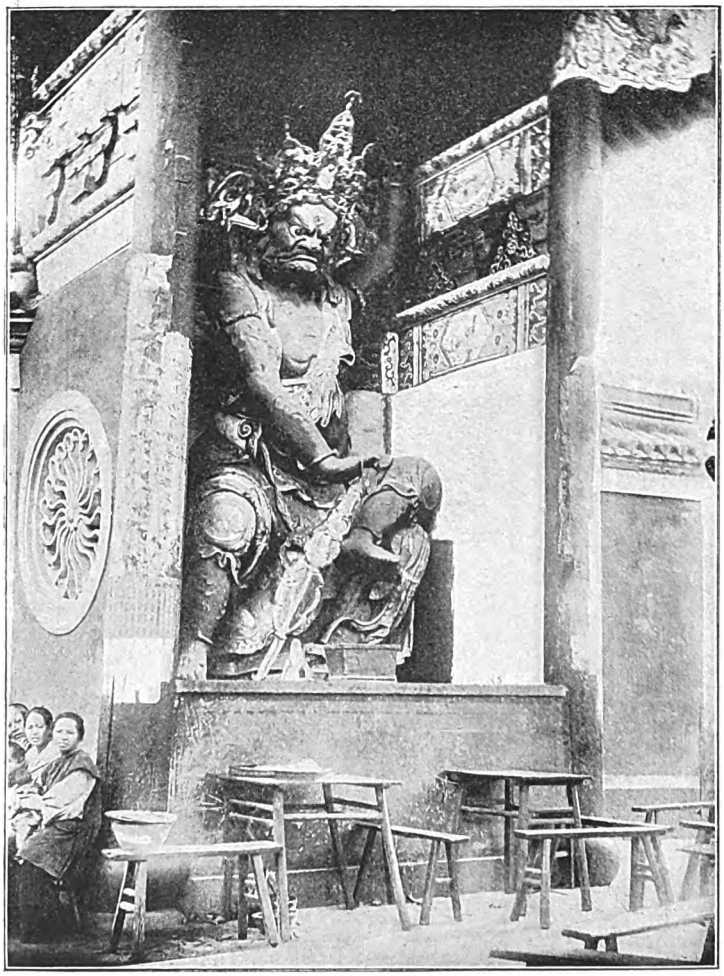
Mrs. Bishop was born in Boroughbridge Hall, Yorkshire, but most of her youth was spent at Tattenhall in Cheshire, where her father, the Rev. Edward Bird, was rector. Here and at Wyton rectory, Huntingdonshire, all her girlhood was spent with an only sister, and with parents whose one thought was to train their girls to take an intelligent interest in all the great questions of the day. At the age of sixteen Miss Isabella Bird made her first appearance as an authoress, publishing a political pamphlet on the subject of "Free Trade versus Protection," a pamphlet which had quite a success; but it gave her little pleasure, as her relations, far from being proud of her ability, were horrified at her "precocity."

At twenty-one she took her first long journey, travelling then in more conventional manner than has hitherto been her custom. For she went to visit a cousin who was military secretary to the Governor of Prince Edward's Island, and from there wandered on through Canada and America in search of health and strength. For in those days, and, indeed, all through her life Mrs. Bishop suffered greatly from a weak spine, a delicacy which has given her so much suffering that she has often when travelling had to dismount from her horse and lie by the roadside to get relief.



GOD OF THUNDER, LUI YANG.

These travels did Miss Bird so much good that she was tempted to renew the remedy, and in 1873, after spending much of three years in bed owing to her spinal trouble, she made the first of her lonely wanderings, exploring many of the hitherto untrodden paths of the Sandwich Islands, living all day in the saddle, rejoicing in the beautiful colouring that makes these islands a paradise to the lover of natural beauty, and studying the people—her heart at one moment revelling in the gorgeous scenery around her, at another overflowing with pity for the poor sufferers on Leper Island, and again filled with longing to bring some of the glorious beauty of the country into the lives of the thousands who crowd our narrow streets and alleys, living their lives without knowledge of the loveliness that can be found on earth, in sea, and sky.

Digitized by Google

On her way back to England Miss Bird spent three months in the Rocky Mountains, enduring many hardships and experiencing many adventures, travelling alone as usual, but ever and again coming across people who interested her, finding them in the most unlikely places, in the most lonely mountain districts. In 1878 she made her first journey to Japan, a country whose fascinating influence soon enveloped her, as it has so powerfully attracted so many travellers before and since. "I feel at home in Japan," she said; "its scenery, its people, its climate, all attract me. Five long visits I have paid to the country, and I should be glad to travel there again. The people are so polite, always anxious to do something to help you, and then so many speak English, and I felt altogether at home with them." And then she told me how during her last sojourn in the land, being on photography intent, three or four Japanese young men offered their services to carry her camera, which they said was much too heavy for her. And all through the summer they accompanied her in all her expeditions, carrying the camera and drawing the water she needed to develop and tone the photographs.

"Photography is quite a craze," she said laughing. "I feel a day is wasted on which I have not developed or printed or taken some photographs." And even as we talked there were many frames lying outside the window, which she brought in at intervals, when they had been sufficiently long a time in the sunshine. "To-morrow I am going to try a new paper for printing," she said, "and I am quite excited about it. There is no doubt about it, it is quite a craze with me." And those who have read her book on the Yangtze Kiang will no doubt remember the beautiful photographs which illustrate it, and the difficulty she experienced in getting water to wash out the "hypo." For although there was the water of the Yangtze all around her it was so full of mud and sand that it was of no use, for it would deposit a veil on the negative. But at last she hit on the successful method of washing by leaning over the gunwale of the junk and holding the negative in the wash of the river, giving it its final wash later in filtered water. It was a chilly arrangement, but that was a small matter to such an enthusiast. That it was a successful arrangement we have only to look at the pictures in her book to know.

SZE CHUAN MARKET-PLACE.

Digitized by Google

After her first visit to Japan Miss Bird visited the Malay Peninsula, "the Golden Chersonese," of which she has written so graphically. In 1881 she married Mr. John Bishop, but after five short years of happiness she was overwhelmed with the terrible blow of his death, having lost her only sister in 1880, the sister to whom all her letters had been written, and who had also sympathised with her in all the dangers and pleasures experienced in her travels.

Since that time Mrs. Bishop has devoted her life to travel and to philanthropic work, taking always great interest in missionary work—the work of medical missionaries in particular, and in building or laying six hospitals—in Kashmir, the Punjaub, Korea, and China. "It has been a very interesting life," she told me, "often intensely lonely, but always very interesting." She has had many hours of terrible solitude, but naturally she prefers to travel alone to taking an uncongenial companion. Then, too, the responsibility of leading another person into the dangers she so often encounters would be too great. These dangers she can meet with equanimity when she has only herself to consider, but she could not endure them if she knew another's life was in her hands.

And so, through the Malay peninsula, through China and Japan, through Korea, Persia, Hindustan, and Central Asia, she has travelled alone and unattended save always by one servant of the country in which she was journeying. But it is no feeling of restlessness that has caused her to travel so much. She has always had some set purpose before her. The study of the various peoples of the earth has been her greatest inducement. To be free of the trammels of civilisation has been another. A life of independence, of freedom from all conventionalities, from the petty worries of civilisation, has always attracted her; and the noise and bustle and rush of civilisation she finds most tiresome. "Civilised clothes too are so troublesome," she added. "These long trailing skirts that hamper every movement, I cannot walk in them. But when I get far away in the East, I wear my short skirt and high boots, and then I can walk long distances without feeling any weariness."

"What an argument you would be for the dress reformers," I said.

"Yes, indeed. But I have no sympathy with the movement. With the purpose, yes. But not with their methods. I hate aggressive women, women who make a great row about all they wish to do. And," she added, "I am quite sure they would accomplish more, these dress reformers, if they would set to work quietly, wearing neat, well-made clothes that would attract no attention and would disarm suspicion by their suitability and reasonableness."

"So it will not be long before you are off again?" I said. For, although she had told me that she had as yet made no plans, I had no doubt that before many months had passed we should hear that Mrs. Bishop had started on one more of her daring journeys. "But all the world is in such a turmoil just now that I can decide nothing," she told me, "and for the present I shall go to the home I have made for myself in Huntingdonshire, and there write and photograph and see my friends, for the next few months at any rate."

And so I left her, sorry that my pleasant talk with our greatest woman traveller had come to an end, and fascinated, as so many have been before, by the gentle manner and quiet voice that are so often found in women combined with the strongest minds, the most daring spirits, and the greatest powers of endurance.

The Illustrations of this Article are from Mrs. Bishop's works, published by Mr. John P. Murray.

Digitized by Google

How We Spend Sunday.

By JOHN PENDLETON.

CARLYLE asserted that society is founded on cloth, and that it would be difficult to tell a row of bishops from a row of navvies if the prelates and diggers were clad alike. He might also have said that the English Sunday has become conspicuous by fine raiment. Even the middle classes were at one time accustomed to speak of their "Sunday clothes," and though the phrase is old-fashioned, the custom of putting on our best garments on Sunday still obtains, except among the Bohemian horde of artists, authors, and journalists, who give no thought to apparel, and among the aristocracy, who rigorously don extravagant attire for the Queen's Drawing Room, but have a tendency to négligé, to shabbiness on Sunday, perhaps because they chiefly worship the God or Goddess of Fashion, and are evidently, in many instances, superior to the criticism of religion and conventionality.

GARB AND VENERATION.

There is undoubtedly some mysterious connection between prim and orthodox "Sunday clothing" and public worship. The best dressed people on Sunday are church and chapel goers. The carelessly clothed look upon Sunday as a lazy time, or an opportunity for recreation, or belong to the army of workers who think sardonically of the commandment that tells us how the Sabbath day should be spent —without labour. However frivolously or seriously we spend our Sunday, we are proud of the character England has obtained as a Christian country. The story credited to her Majesty that she told a negro prince that the Bible was the secret of England's greatness may be a myth; but only the other day a clergyman of the Church of England, speaking in the northern province, hazarded the opinion that the English people "venerated two things—their Bible and their Sunday, and though they did not read the one nor observe the other, he had hopes that they might be approached through their respect for the two."

The bold qualification he made that we neither read the Bible nor observed the Sabbath was somewhat disquieting; but the statement, applying, as it does, to a large section of the community, gives the Bible reader and Sabbath observer the chance of posing as a common-sense pharisee. He has no hesitation in thanking God that the English Sunday is still free from such scenes as are developed on the Sabbath at the races in Paris, at the lawn tennis tournaments at Homburg, and on the pleasure boats on the Rhine.

ASLEEP IN ST. PAUL'S.

Whether our respect for the Bible and for the English Sunday is deep enough to inculcate reverence and increase public worship is another question. The afternoon services at Westminster Abbey and St. Paul's, for instance, reveal curious side-lights of English character. Many persons act as if these two venerable sanctuaries were opera houses. They sit wrapt in adoration till the singing is over —and they shuffle or creep out before the sermon begins. Charles Lamb described a Quaker meeting-house as the cavern of Trophonius, "where you could bathe in stillness when the spirit was sore fretted." The lower end of the nave of St. Paul's is applied to similar purpose on Sunday afternoons. The noise of traffic is subdued. The preacher's voice, strident afar off beneath the sounding board, comes to you in soothing murmur. You use St. Paul's as a bed-chamber. The anthem has thrilled you, but you sleep peacefully through the sermon, and one wonders whether the ancient ecclesiastical office of sluggard-waker should not be revived.

THE FATE OF PUBLIC WORSHIP.

In the provinces the vicissitudes of public worship are always arousing comment. Not long ago a Wesleyan minister, a capable preacher and an earnest worker in a large circuit, bemoaned the fact that he could not fill his chapel, and even the Rev. Dr. Maclaren, the famous Nonconformist pastor of Union Chapel in Manchester, has not hesitated to admit, though he invariably preaches to a crowded congregation, that he thinks the attendance at public worship is decreasing. He says that the former custom of attending service twice a day is dead, and he accounts for the change, to some extent, to the indifference of parents, who give less attention to the religious teaching of their children at home. He holds that boys and girls should be fitted at the mother's or the father's knee for public worship.

Digitized by Google

Nevertheless, the time comes when both youth and maiden drift or break away from parental control, and then it is that public worship should be a safeguard. The Sunday school, often attended merely as a duty, loses its hold, especially on the young man, almost immediately he is a free agent, and, unless the pastor is either his friend or a powerful preacher, he gradually severs all ties with the Christian associations of youth, and slips into indifference, laziness, Sunday athleticism, or worse.

IN THE PULPIT.

It is said that oratory is extinct in the House of Commons. Certainly it is rare in the pulpit. Now and again one hears a young and zealous minister declare that he intends to become a great preacher; but it must be admitted that many clergy and ministers cut only sorry figures in the pulpit. They are, no doubt, sincere Christians; but they have not kept abreast of their flocks in education. They do not even understand the art of reading aloud, and are disappointing in matter and manner as preachers. The pulpit is scarcely the place for the whimsicality of a Parker or the peculiar originality of a Talmage; but the utterances of these men are preferable to the sing-song wail of the clergyman, or the amazing hodge-podge of the mediocre Dissenting minister. A knowledge of Greek and doctrine does not make a capable preacher. The modern occupier of the pulpit should be an encyclopedia of men and things; but what is more important still, he should be taught at the outset of his ministerial career to open his mouth! No man, though full of wisdom, can ever be an orator if he slurs his words or tears them with his teeth.

The late Bishop Fraser owed his popularity to the fact that he spoke in distinct language about homely things. Dr. Maclaren does not tub-thump, mystify, or befog. He is one of our greatest expositors of the Scriptures because his congregation knows what he is talking about. He gets his metaphors from the incidents of daily life and from nature. He can analyse, explain, illustrate, appeal, persuade, and declaim with forcible simplicity. He does not sob theatrically, or indulge in ferocious gestures. He is perfectly natural in all his movements. The exceeding charm of his preaching is due to three facts: he is a good man, he believes what he preaches, and he does not bustle his words. He will always attract a great congregation, and the preacher who cannot go and do likewise may lament the modern trend in the direction of Sunday recreation and pleasure; but is he free from blame?

PARADOX.

The modes in which Sunday is spent brings one face to face with much paradox. Nearly every man is a law unto himself, and there is great divergency of opinion as to the keeping of the Sabbath. Half a century ago the cooking of a dinner on Sunday was, in some households, considered a sin. Now few professing Christians are content with cold mutton. Years ago Sunday journeying was looked upon as an outrage on religion, with Tartarus for its ultimate terminus. Now a minister sees no evil in going to his church in tramcar, cab, or train. He will even travel to distant town to preach special sermon for special fee. Not long ago anathema was hurled from the pulpit against the Sunday use of the bicycle. Now the minister uses it for getting quickly to morning or evening service, and the bicycle stable seems likely to become part of nearly every church equipment.

The opening of free libraries, picture galleries, and museums, the band playing in the parks, the Sunday lectures, and the "pleasant Sunday afternoons" have revolutionised the English Sabbath. The new sources of recreation and entertainment have given no fillip to public worship. They undoubtedly tend, by their freedom and novelty, to thin the attendance at church or chapel, yet the originators and supporters of these methods contend that they keep people out of mischief, and that the object justifies the means. On the other hand, the rigid Churchman or Dissenter looks askance at every Sunday innovation, says grimly that the Devil is getting in the thin edge of the wedge, and that by and by Sunday observance, as far as religious ordinances are concerned, will be a thing of the past—that Sunday will degenerate into a weekly holiday, as the bicyclist, the golfer, and the excursionist already make it.

Digitized by Google

THE HARDEST TO REACH.

Among the aristocracy and the rich there seems to be antagonism between the stomach and the soul, and the needs of the former, judging from the Sunday attitude of society, are the most imperative. The morning service at fashionable churches in town is attended during the season by many persons distinguished in English public life; but at night they worship late dinner! The great business community, after its struggling throughout the week, has strong temptation to evade public worship, and occasionally succumbs to the fascination of Sunday laziness and recreation; yet out of the ranks of those engaged in trade and commerce come the steadiest church and chapel goers. They are, in the main, as methodical in worship as in business. Probably they are not all actuated by the highest motives in attending public worship; but they go. They occupy their pews regularly, and they afford a remarkable example of English respectability leavened with Christianity, for religion is not so rare as some cynics imagine, either at home or in church, and has a knack, when least expected, of asserting itself, and confounding smug hypocrisy.

The industrial class, even in this prosperous time, are the hardest to reach. Their excuse a couple of decades back for non-attendance at public worship was lack of suitable apparel. Now wages are good and suits cheap; still congregations are only sparsely sprinkled by working men. The children are packed off to Sunday school so that the mother may have a free hand in the kitchen to grapple with the cooking of the Sunday dinner. The father remains in bed, or takes a stroll, either with or without his little ones, or hangs lazily about the house, or waits at the nearest street corner for the delicious moment at noon when the tavern opens.

There are many thoughtful, devout working men who keep the Sabbath day holy; but the general inclination among artisans and labourers is to enjoy a free and easy Sunday. They will attend a labour demonstration, and march in procession for some industrial principle, but they have no great admiration for the parson. In their opinion he gets his livelihood without working for it, and they consequently hold him in contempt. Anyhow, both clergyman and minister speak despairingly of their influence among working men. The late Archbishop of York, powerful in voice, gigantic in stature, bluff and hearty in manner, invariably aroused their attention. They were interested in his personality, and were wont to say he was a splendid iron worker spoilt by preferment. But the preacher capable of civilising working men into regular attendance at public worship must be not only a Christian, but a big, muscular Christian, with the eloquence of Demosthenes and the zeal of St. Paul.

SUNDAY WORKERS.

Of all sections of the community the Sunday workers are the most to be pitied. To them the day of rest is a travesty; nor does the break they get in the week compensate them for the loss of the Sabbath. They are pariahs toiling while other people do as they list, and they loathe Sunday work, notwithstanding the extra payment it sometimes brings. A book of the Sunday sayings of the engine driver, boiler cleaner, 'bus driver, tramway man, compositor, and others doomed to work on Sunday would surprise the religious world. Nor does the journalist, who must take his Sunday duty or relinquish his appointment, hesitate to express his detestation of Sunday work, which is increasing in nearly every newspaper office. The outcry against Sunday newspapers, though perfectly just, tickled the journalists' sense of humour. The indignant public did not realise that for years they had tolerated and encouraged Sunday work. It is not so much the Sunday paper as the Monday paper that necessitates work on the Sabbath. The compositors are at their frames, or at the type-setting machines, while the bells are ringing for evening service. The sub-editors have gone to their desks even earlier, for they must have a supply of copy ready for the printers, and have to tackle two days' news. The reporters are here, there, and everywhere, inasmuch as Sunday in every great city is always eventful. There is either demonstration, disaster, fire, or tragedy to describe, or some notable preacher's sermon to report.

Digitized by Google

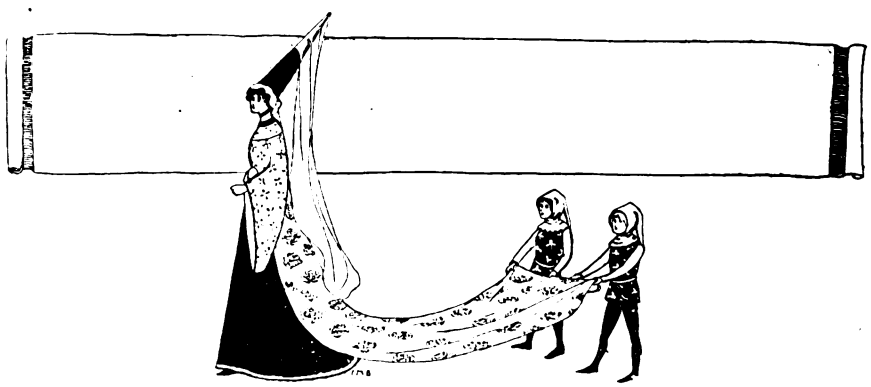
Thackeray said: "That mighty engine the Press never sleeps." The novelist was slightly in error, for she takes a nap on Saturday night, when nearly every newspaper office is deserted. But the press is wide awake on Sunday night. There is ceaseless activity in the office of every daily journal, from the Times to the half-penny morning papers, and clergymen or Nonconformist ministers anxious to investigate the various phases of Sunday work would surely get inspiration in Fleet Street and the Strand from a visit to such London offices as the Scotsman, the Yorkshire Post, and the Manchester Guardian, in which all sorts of news is in progress of transmission by private wire.

One of the greatest paradoxes of the English Sunday is the whimsical fact that the prelate or other famous preacher, while holding forth in the pulpit against the heinousness of Sunday work is actually creating it. The preacher thinks Monday's paper more complete if it contains some notice of his Sunday's sermon, yet knows that the third or half-column report of his utterances cannot appear without Sunday work. The reporter, compositor, printers' reader, stereotyper have all broken the Sabbath practically at his behest. In fact, there is no journalistic record of protest from any divine against the reporting and newspaper production of his sermon for Monday's issue. Bishop Fraser kept the reporters on the trot every Sunday, and one pressman who boasted that he had reported his lordship in every church in the diocese, smiled grimly when any one ventured to speak of Sunday as a rest day. "That millennium," he said, "will not arrive till Fraser's in Heaven!" Notwithstanding the robust life of many Christian churches, the ways of spending the English Sunday are infinite, and the modern conscience is certainly—elastic.



Digitized by Google

The Professor's Toothache.

By ROSALINE MASSON, Author of "The Transgressors.

With Illustrations by CHARLES HORRELL.

FRAU GRUMPFELLBAUM was a little difficult to amuse. Her idea of pleasure was the truly German one of a day's excursion, with various meals at various hostelries en route. This hardly fell in with Sylvia's and my inclinations. Sylvia and I were very fond of, and very proud of, our home, and we would willingly have spent all our time lying on the beautiful lawn, under the dancing shadows of the old trees, staring up at the blue sky and the grey gables of Gladholme. In hot summer weather it was quite an effort to us even to go our drive in the little governess-cart that was our special property; calls we considered a penance; and on Sunday it was a strong sense of duty that took us to the village church—but it did take us.

I really believe that Professor Grumpfellbaum was of our way of thinking, and that, if he had come alone to visit us, he would have been a delightful guest. He was very big and stout, and florid, with upright grey hair and large mild spectacles. He was, I believe, very learned about something uninteresting to the rest of the world, but he wore his learning lightly—or, rather, hidden. He could speak but little English, and, though we heard him growling and hooting very amicably at his wife, when he was with us his conversation was limited to "Ach so, Mees Sophee!" or "Ach no, Mees Seelvee!" But, as I pointed out to Sylvia, we had asked Professor and Mrs. Grumpfellbaum, and now we were bound to entertain them.

"I didn't want to ask them," said Sylvia.

WE WOULD WILLINGLY HAVE SPENT ALL OUR TIME ON THE LAWN.

Digitized by Google

"But we had to, Sylvia," I answered sternly, "after they had been so kind to Father in Germany."

"Well, then, Father ought to entertain them."

"This is foolish, Sylvia!"

Sylvia owned it was. Father never entertains anyone.

"Wouldn't driving content them?—driving Griselda?" she asked.

"Poor Griselda!" I murmured. Griselda was our fat white pony.

Sylvia sighed.

"We might send them out solemn drives in the carriage to 'see the neighbourhood.' Frau Grumpfellbaum would like that!"

"Send them alone?" I asked.

"You could take them one day, and I the next."

I sighed.

Now, unfortunately, there was an undeniable excursion in our neighbourhood, only about twenty-five miles off, though a troublesome cross journey by rail. This was the old castle of Carinbeck, with the rocks near it where some of the Spaniards were washed up after the Armada time, and the little cave where the Earl of Monkscombe proposed to his first wife, and they were caught by the tide while she was making up her mind. It was all very interesting; and there were a quantity of relics gathered in the only room that had a roof left on it, and the guide sold photographs and things made out of the wood of the park, with "A Present from Carinbeck Castle" on them. Of course I knew we should have to take Frau Grumpfellbaum sooner or later, so we broached the plan the second evening of her visit. She was enchanted, and asked volubly all about it; and it kept her an hour from remembering the draughts. She made us play draughts in the evenings. She took it as a matter of course that games were the proper occupation for the evening. We usually, when we were alone, went into the garden after dinner in summer, with our garden cloaks over our evening dresses; and, if we did stay indoors, we read. But Frau Grumpfellbaum never read: I never saw her with a book in her hand, unless you call "The Queen" a book. And, as Sylvia mournfully remarked to me, she seemed to regard the piano as one form of table.

"Never mind, dear," I told Sylvia. "'Learn the way to Heaven by doing deeds of hospitality.' We go to Carinbeck on Saturday."

And we went to Carinbeck on Saturday; and that was the beginning of the whole adventure, and how I met—but I must not anticipate.

On Saturday morning the Professor came down to breakfast with one of his already fat cheeks excessively swollen, and his mild blue eyes behind his spectacles bloodshot from want of sleep.

"But ach, Mees Sophee," he began, when his wife burst into the room and interrupted him.

"Ach, so meeserable! So onfortunate!" she cried. "Jost thees day, and all arranged! Here he has got the toothache in his head, and already at two o'clock thees morning he has begun to swell!"

We expressed our sympathy.

"And because to-morrow yes is Sonday, he think he must seek to-day already the Zahnarzt—how then do you say it?—denteest."

"There's a very good dentist at Middleham!" cried Sylvia, eagerly. I could see she thought the excursion was "off" for the day. It was a lovely morning, the sun striking the dew on the grass, and little tender clouds floating about in the sky.

"So he cannot come with us to the castle!" cried Mrs. Grumpfellbaum. She wept a little, and Sylvia's face fell comically. But soon, under the influence of hot coffee and kidneys, the voluble little German was gaily chattering again. These sudden tears and ready recoveries were most fatiguing to our British nerves—even more so than the excursions and the draughts.

We proposed that the Professor should start with us, get out at Carbrex Junction and catch the express to Middleham, which was an hour and a quarter from there. We could drive to and from Carbrex, instead of going the whole way by train, pick him up there on our return, and all come back together by the 6.40 in time for dinner. It seemed very simple, if the Professor could manage to idle about Middleham for a couple of hours; but you would have thought we were arranging for the entire transport of an army for the fuss the little Frau made. She insisted on looking up the time-tables herself, after Sylvia had done so; and then she could not understand them. She wept at the thought of the expense the carriage would be to us, though we assured her that we usually drove from Carbrex to avoid the slowness of waiting for trains. "And it is a pretty drive," we said; but she did not seem to care. When she found we were going to telegraph to have the carriage waitting, it somehow seemed to be the last straw. She wept profusely.

Digitized by Google

"All thees expense, and we shall lose him most cairtainly, and he might have tooken the toothache in his head so comfortable yesterday, and no trouble to no one!"

She glanced at him reproachfully; but he went on drinking his coffee in calm unconcern.

"I wonder why they married one another," said Sylvia to me as we went upstairs to get ready.

"It's what I often wonder—about married people," I replied.

"I hate a man that can't manage things—for himself, and for you as well."

"Yes, dear,"

"Whatever I do, I shall never marry a foreigner!"

"No, dear."

"And neither must you, Sophie!"

"No, dear."

Well, everything went quite nicely. We put the Professor out at Carbrex Junction, where we left him on the little platform, with his hat in one hand, and in the other a sheet of paper with the dentist's name and address on it, and the hour of his return train. His wife wept a little at parting from him, but her face cleared the moment the train curved round a corner, and she lost sight of him. She drew in her head, dried her eyes, and requested us to shut both windows.

We found the carriage waiting, and enjoyed the cool drive after the hot train. We lunched at a little inn near the castle, and compared English cookery with foreign—most unfavourably. We did our duty nobly by the castle, screamed at the waves that came roaring up the rocks, and spent hours in selecting photographs and wooden boxes and needlecases to take back to our friends in Germany. Then we had tea at the inn, and drove back, tired out, but with good consciences, in the late afternoon, with the setting sun turning all the beautiful land to gold.

It was not till we arrived at the station, and found we had five minutes to wait till the Professor's train came in, and twenty-five for our own, that Frau Grumpfellbaum seemed to recollect her absent lord.

HE WAS HELPING AN OLD MARKET WOMAN.

"He will not have caught ze train!" she sighed, resignedly.

"He can't have failed to," answered Sylvia. "He had two hours with nothing to do in them except to catch it."

"He is not occostomed to travel alone—to care for himself," replied his wife with dignity.

"Well he ought to learn, then," responded Sylvia, with conviction.

"My hosband?—nevair!"

Mrs. Grumpfellbaum seated herself with stoical dignity on a petroleum barrel as she spoke, and Sylvia and I walked slowly up and down in front of her. The hands of the station clock moved round to 6.20—6.25—6.30.

"The Professor's train is late," I murmured to Sylvia.

"And ours is due in ten minutes," Sylvia murmured in reply.

We consulted the station-master. He shrugged his shoulders.

"Well, she may come in before yours starts; or, again, she may not," he told us.

Digitized by Google

"But, if it doesn't, ours is the last train home!" I gasped.

"He'll have to put up at the inn," said Sylvia.

We returned to Frau Grumpfellbaum on the petroleum barrel, and hinted the awful possibility to her. Her stoicism vanished at once, and she rocked herself backwards and forwards in her grief; to which form of expression the petroleum barrel responded with alarming sympathy.

And at that very moment our train came puffing up to the platform. With difficulty we persuaded the weeping wife to get in. "We must not lose it," I told her. "It will be quite easy for the Professor to go to the inn if he does."

"The inn? But he with no loggosh!"

"He can drive, you know, if he prefers."

"Ach, Wilhelm, Wilhelm! Und der Vater von zieben Kindern!" sobbed the woman.

"The other train is signalled, miss! We'll keep this a minute or two. The gentleman will do it!" cried the friendly station-master, looking in at the window.

We thanked him profusely, and sure enough in a few moments the other train came in on the other side of the line. We all three craned our heads out of the window nearest to it, and scanned the carriages as they passed.

"Wilhelm! But it is he, I sees him!" cried Mrs. Grumpfellbaum. Sylvia and I both held her firmly. Yes, there really was the Professor. We could see him through the window of one of the carriages. But what was he doing? How slowly he got out!

"If he does not hurry he will miss us," cried Sylvia. "And he has to cross the bridge over to this side!"

I let go my hold of the now frantic wife, and went to the other window to see if the friendly stationmaster were there; but he had gone.

When I returned Sylvia was laughing with vexation.

"He is helping an old market-woman out with all her babies and bundles!" she told me, behind Frau Grumpfellbaum's capacious shoulder. "He is the first civil German ——"

"Hush, Sylvia!"

His wife was by now shrieking hoarsely from the window, and waving her arms at him. He did not see her. He continued slowly, calmly, carefully, to set down one bundle after another.

A whistle—a puff. Our train began to move.

"Wilhelm! Wilhelm!" called Mrs. Grumpfellbaum.

The Professor did not hear. Having carefully lifted out the last baby, he looked vaguely about him. The market-woman curtseyed to him, and he walked slowly away. Our train moved away from the platform, and he was lost to sight behind the other. Mrs. Grumpfellbaum sank back, a heaving heap, in her corner, and Sylvia—naughty girl!—burst out laughing.

I soothed the poor lady as best I could. I even shut both windows, although the petroleum was still very convincing. I scolded Sylvia, and I described the comfort of the inn. It was, however, Sylvia, when she had recovered her gravity, who offered the real tangible suggestion. Sylvia was always practical.

"The best thing he can do is to get them to stop the Peversham express for him, and get out at Mudholme. Then we can send there for him,—it is only about five miles from us. I think the express gets in there a little after nine; we can keep some dinner for him."

"Oh, why didn't we think of that and tell the station-master!" I exclaimed.

"Well, I thought of it, but it seemed as if it were going to be all right. I did not foresee the market-woman, of course." Sylvia's eyes twinkled. "How delightful foreign courtesy is!" she added rapturously.

"My hosband, he will never think to cease the express," remarked Mrs. Grumpfellbaum.

"No, nor shall we trust to his doing so," I answered firmly; "we will wire to the stationmaster!"

"Und der Vater von zieben Kindern!" was all she said; then she dried her eyes and fell asleep.

So we wired from the next station: "Stop Peversham express and put foreign gentleman into it, tell him he will be met at Mudholme.—St. Claire."

And in our innocence we thought that our troubles were over, and that we had done cleverly and well!

We got back in good time for dinner, and gave Father a full account of our day's doings, including the loss of the Professor. Father gave the order for the carriage to go to Mudholme to fetch the wanderer, and he comforted the bereaved Frau with gentle words.

Digitized by Google

"Oh, by the bye, I quite forgot," he added suddenly, pausing in the act of cracking a walnut, "your young friends from the Rectory came this afternoon to ask us all to go round there this evening."

"You did not say we would go, Father?"

Then Sylvia, who had been in one of her naughty, cock-sparrow moods all day, was inspired to special wickedness.

"I suppose, as the Professor can't accompany us, you will, Papa dear?" she asked sweetly.

IT WAS NOT PROFESSOR GRUMPFELLBAUM.

"Yes, my dear, I said you and Professor and Mrs. Grumpfellbaum would. Did I not do rightly? You like going to the Rectory, do you not?"

I gazed in consternation at Sylvia. How like Father! So kindly meant—but we were dead tired!

Mrs. Grumpfellbaum looked up from the excavations of a nut.

"Oh yes, and you also, is it not? That will be so pleasant! For since that I come, I have nowhere with you gone, you are so the student, is it not? But this night, and the Professor not here, it will be necessairy."

Digitized by Google

Father rose to the occasion.

"It will be a great pleasure to me," he said, and Sylvia, who was rather frightened, looked amazed and relieved.

So they all walked up to the Rectory after dinner, and I was left to receive Professor Grumpfellbaum.

I did not expect him for fully half an hour, so, having given orders for his supper, I went into the drawing-room, turned up the lamp, pulled my favourite low chair right in front of the fire, and sat down in lazy content with a book. I think I had just begun to doze, when I was aroused by a mighty peal of the bell. I laid down my book, and rose with a sigh to go out and welcome the strayed Professor.

There seemed to be some sort of skirmish going on in the outer hall. Coming from the blazing fire-light and lamp-light, I could not see very distinctly. The front door was open, and the wind was making the hall-curtains wave, and the hall-lamp flare. I could see the gleam of carriage lamps outside, and several figures moving about, and voices were raised.

"Go and see what is the matter, Jane," I said to a passing housemaid.

She went, and in a moment Purves came to me, wringing his hands.

"The gentleman is very violent, Miss!" he cried.

Purves has been with us for over thirty years, which is longer than I have. He is quite white-haired, and he lets the wine spill when he pours it out. I must say he behaved with extraordinary idiotcy that night.

"Violent?" I repeated, straining my eyes into the dark hall, where I seemed to see two figures struggling.

"Yes, Miss! And one of the men from the station has had to come up with him. Oh, dear! I wish master were at home!"

And—was it to be wondered at? I conceived the horrible idea that good, mild Professor Grumpfellbaum had returned intoxicated!

And, like a weak woman that I was, I fled back into the drawing-room and tried to lock the door.

But drawing-room doors won't lock; and, while I was fighting desperately with a stubborn snib, I heard a scuffle in the passage, hoarse imprecations, and then a crash against the door. The door burst open, and three men, in a struggling mass, fell into the room, and by the force of their entrance divided into three component and very dishevelled parts. They were followed by the trembling Purves and the staring Jane.

One of the men was Morton the groom; the second was a railway porter. I saw this much without looking, for my eyes were rivetted on the third man. It was not Professor Grumpfellbaum!

He was tall, young, graceful, with a pale olive face and great flashing dark eyes. He had no hat, and his clothes were hanging in shreds. He glanced round wildly, like an animal at bay. As his eye took in the calm and cosy interior of the lamp-lit drawing-room, his look changed to one of wonder. Then he saw me. His hand at once went up to his dark, ruffled hair, evidently in search of his hat; but his hat was gone. Then he bowed.

"Signorina, what means this?" was all he said.

"Indeed, that is what I was going to ask! What does it mean?" I answered, thinking what a soft, mellow voice he had.

He shrugged his shoulders and spread out his hands with a foreign gesture, and glanced at the bystanders.

"Ask these!" he demanded, and leant back against the wall and folded his arms, as if giving up all responsibility or interest in the matter.

"Who is this gentleman?" I enquired.

"From the station, miss!" remarked the porter.

"What is the meaning of this, Morton?" I cried, bewildered; "and did you not bring Professor Grumpfellbaum from Mudholme?"

Morton simply looked from the tall Italian to me and back again, speechlessly.

"Who is this, Morton?" I demanded.

"Ain't it the gentleman, Miss?" he muttered.

And then suddenly the awful truth flashed upon me. They had brought the wrong man: they had brought him by force!

I looked at the victim. He was standing, tattered, hatless, dignified, with his arms folded, looking at me. His black eyes no longer flashed. He was waiting for the explanation: courteously awaiting it, at my pleasure.

"I am afraid there has been a terrible mistake!" I began.

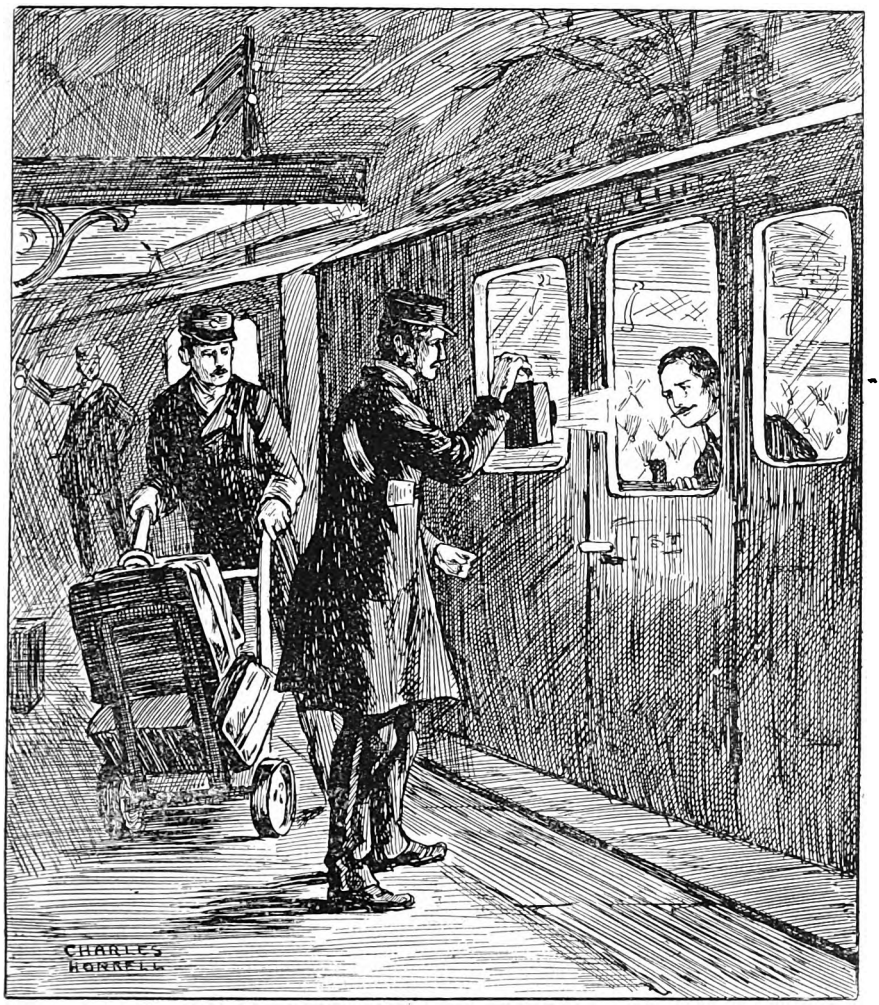
Digitized by Google

He smiled, and made a deprecating gesture with his hands. He had long, thin, sensitive hands. I glanced at his torn coat and his twisted tie. Pity and indignation filled my heart. He followed my eyes, read my thoughts, and smiled.

"Did you think this was the gentleman you were sent to Mudholme to fetch?" I asked Morton, sternly.

"Yes, miss."

"Have you not seen Professor Grumpfellbaum?"



"ARE YOU A FOREIGNER?"

"It is no matter for the Signorina to feel distress over," he said, gently, as though my feelings, not his, were the first to be considered. Then his eye lit on Morton the groom and the railway porter.

"These fellows!" he began, and his eyes went on fire again. "Explain!" he thundered. They quailed.

"No, miss."

"Why didn't Jevons go himself, then?"

"He told me to go, miss!"

"Didn't he tell you whom you had to meet?"

"Yes, miss!—furrin chap—beggin' your parden, furrin gentleman, miss."

"But do you always use force—I mean, what made you——"

Digitized by Google

The railway porter stepped forward.

"It was this way, miss. The guard of the express, miss, he told us that the furrin gentleman had been wired for by his friends, but he was drunk and very violent, and they had had great trouble with him—him and the station-master at Carbrex—and had had to take him out of his train by force, and lock him into a carriage. So we got him out and had a great fight with him—he was like a raging lion. But we forced him into the carriage, Miss, and I got up beside Morton here to help if he got loose or fightin' again."

I looked at the Italian. He evidently had not half understood the men's speeches, and was leaning back, weary but courteous.

"And you call him—drunk!" I said in a low voice of indignant protest. The two men looked at one another.

"Well, he's quiet enough now, for sure!" one of them answered.

"You have brought the wrong man—no wonder he fought!" I told them.

They all gasped, and drew nearer together. Jane the housemaid giggled, and was sternly reproved by Purves.

Turning to the stranger, to begin my explanation, I noticed his look of weariness.

"Won't you sit down, Signor, while I try to explain how this has happened?"

"You can all go," I told the servants. "Purves, bring this gentleman a glass of wine."

I offered the Italian an armchair by the fire. He waited till I sat down, and then sank into it. There was a clatter of steps as the servants went across the polished floor of the hall. Purves returned with the wine and handed it deferentially to his late enemy, and then went out, shaking his white locks.

"It is all a mistake—you are the wrong man, Signor," I began, when we were alone.

"Through my life, Signorina, it has often happened to me that I am the wrong man. Not often has it ended so pleasantly."

But I was anxious to explain, and went on seriously.

"We have a German friend staying here, and we telegraphed——"

"'Here,' you say,' he put in, as I paused, feeling the futility of a long explanation. "But where, is it permitted to ask, is 'here'? I know not! I know nothing! I travel to-day from one friend's to stay with other friends, to whom I bring introductions. The train is not to reach where I descend for many hours, so I sleep. Sudden I awake—lanterns and voices—the window is open—someone say, 'Are you a foreign gentleman?' I assent. 'Then get out!' someone cry, very rough, 'the train cannot wait for ever!' I protest—I want not to descend. Then they drag me forth. 'What means this?' I ask. 'Your friends have telegraph to send you!' they say. 'It is meestake!' I tell them. 'It is not the first meestake you make this day!' they say, and laugh. Then I strike them, and they strike me. They are many—I am but one; they throw me down. Then they put me into another train, and I am a prisoner. Then it is another station—where I know not, —and in the dark they drag me forth. 'He is drunk!' tell one man to another, and they laugh. 'I am not drunk! Cowards! Assassins!' I cry. Then I strike again—very hard. And they strike me. They are many—I am but one. Then it is a carriage that they thrust me into, and I am drive away into the black of the moonless British night. I think it is for murder—I remember all my sins to no-one. Then it is you, Signorina,—and what matters?" He rose and put down his glass.

"Except that you say I am the wrong man," he murmured softly, into its emptyness, as he set it on the mantlepiece.

"You must be hungry!" was all I could think of to answer.

"Oh, Eengleesh meess!" he laughed.

I took him across to the dining-room, and had some coffee while he supped.

He told me his name was Rizzio Roccazzi, and that he came from Pavia, and he showed me his card, and brought out his letters of introduction for me to read. And I told him that our name was St. Claire, and that my father and sister were out at the Rectory, and all about Professor and Mrs. Grumpfellbaum and our adventures. Then, as we got up to go back to the drawing-room, I remembered that foreigners all smoke.

"Would you not like to stay and have a cigarette?" I asked.

But he smiled sadly, and spread out the palms of his hands.

"My case is empty, and my luggage—where?" he answered.

Digitized by Google

"Why, your luggage!" I cried, "what about it?"

"Perhaps it is with Professor Gruf—Grum—Grup—I cannot say the name!"

"Oh! And to-morrow is Sunday!—And you cannot possibly leave here, for there are no trains!"

"Of trains, Signorina, have I had enough. But of your voice, Signorina, have I not had enough. Therefore my luggage regret I not, nor my torn and wounded clothes. My torn and wounded heart, Signorina—"

And just at that moment the front door banged, and I heard Sylvia's laugh and Father's voice in the hall. They had all come back from the Rectory. I was rather glad.

"Father, this is Signor Roccazzi," I said, as Father followed the others into the room. And I frowned at Sylvia, who was standing staring at him quite rudely. As to Frau Grumpfellbaum, she simply came to a dead standstill in the middle of the room, and ejaculated "Gott im Himmel!" When I poured out the whole story, Father looked ruefully amazed, and Sylvia laughed delightedly, and Signor Roccazzi smiled at her indulgently.

"We must render you our deepest apologies," began my father, when I had ended.

"And to-morrow is Sunday, so he can't possibly go away nor get his luggage! And you can't go out, because you have no hat!"

How could Sylvia be so childish!

"Is the sun then so warm in this your country, Signorina, that one is not permitted to go forth without the head be covered?"

"There, Sylvia, you are snubbed," I said.

"'Snoobed'—'snoobed'—what does 'snoobed' mean?"

The young Italian turned to my father, laughingly, for explanation; but he caught Father's eye resting on him somewhat gloomily. His sensitive Italian face grew grave in a moment.

"Sir, it is I who give you the apology," he cried. "I come here—you know me not!"

"SIGNORINA, TELL ME, THEN, AM I THE WRONG MAN?

Digitized by Google

Father looked embarrassed at the Italian's quick intuition. He hastened to reassure him, to tell him his visit was a great pleasure.

"And you didn't come here, you were brought!" put in the irrepressible Sylvia.

But Signor Roccazzi put his hand, with a quick gesture of vexation, to his forehead. "You know me not!" he repeated tragically. Then suddenly he drew from his pocket the letters of introduction he had shown me at supper—I had barely glanced at them.

"Perhaps," he said, with graceful humility, and handed them to father. Father took them.

"Perhaps you may know some?" asked Signor Roccazzi, anxiously.

"You will like me to look at them," Father said, and opened one diffidently.

"This is a name well-known to all lovers of Art," he murmured politely, and opened another.

"Oh—Sir William! He is our county member—an old friend!" he cried. "Were you going to stay there when those idiots captured you?"

"Yes! Thees night!" laughed Signor Roccazzi, delightedly. "You know him? Good! Then it is that I am introduced, is it not? Good!" He laughed again.

"You take it all most good-naturedly—you heap coals of fire on our heads!" said Father. "I only hope Sir William will take it in the same forgiving spirit—our borrowing his guest in this forcible fashion!"

"But where then is my hosband!" cried an agonised voice. It was Mrs. Grumpfellbaum.

"Signora, he sleeps in the train, where also sleeps my luggage. There too, but for Providence, had I been still."

"Oh, I wish you were!" she cried.

"So wish not I!" he answered.

"The Professor is most probably at Carbrex inn," remarked Sylvia, the practical. "It was a pity we interfered by telegraphing—men always manage: I said so."

"Ach yes, soch peety!"

"No—no pity!" smiled Signor Roccazzi.

The door was flung open by old Jevons, and there stood the Professor in our midst. One moment we saw him, massive in a big brown overcoat, his huge mild spectacles gleaming over his beard, his stiff grey hair upright on his enormous head. Then he was lost to sight, for Frau Grumpfellbaum flung herself upon him, and the spectacled visage was bowed over her neat auburn plaits.

They all gathered round him—even the servants had come up into the hall, and now stood in a peeping group outside the open door, behind old Jevons. Mrs. Grumpfellbaum hung on to her husband's coat sleeve; Father shook his other hand; Sylvia balanced herself on tiptoe, with her hands behind her back, and questioned him sternly; only Signor Rizzio Roccazzi and I held back, watching the scene.

"I am glad you have got safe back—we were beginning to feel quite anxious, Professor!" said Father.

"Why did you lose your train? And how have you come?" demanded Sylvia.

"Wilhelm! Wilhelm! Mein Würmchen!—I sink you lost—gone—nevermore!—Ach!—Und der Vater von zieben Kindern!" sobbed the anguished Frau.

The Professor beamed round on us genially and impeturbably.

"I dine at the inn, and zen I drive," he announced. "And,—Gretchen!—I haf had my toos pull out!"

Signor Roccazzi lent towards me in the firelight. He had been surveying the Professor wonderingly.

"Signorina, tell me!—am I then what you say of me—the wrong man?" he asked beseechingly.

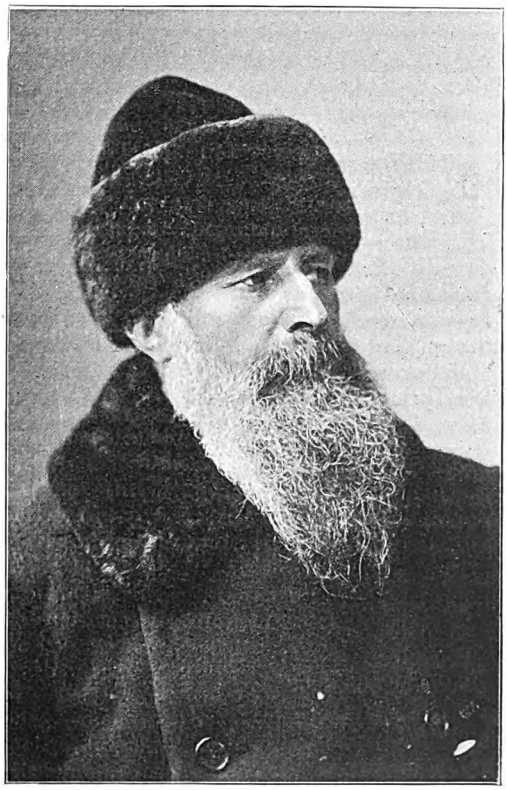
I did not answer him at the time; though now, after a year has slipped by, I can safely say he is not. But Sylvia says she will never forgive me for marrying a foreigner.

Digitized by Google

IN THE PUBLIC EYE

Men and Women who are Helping to Make the World Brighter and Better.

THE more the world knows of the horrors of war, the sooner the world is likely to hail the coming of peace. M. Vasili Verestchagin, the most famous military painter of our age, has done more than most men to hasten the end of war. M. Verestchagin was the first great painter to paint war as it really is. "I paint what I see," he said to me the last time he was in London. "People tell me that I should not paint the worst side of things, that I should paint war with a halo of romance and glory. Those people have never seen war. They have never seen men fighting like wolves. They have no idea what a battlefield is like. It is all very well to say that war is grand and heroic and that fighting is a glorious thing. So it is—to read about. But I have seen war; I have fought for my country; I have killed a man and many men in the terror and excitement of battle. I know what a horrible, savage, inhuman thing it is, and it is my business to let the public see what I have seen. They tell me I should paint war in beautiful colours, as if an honest man could paint a lie and call it truth!" The great Russian artist is honest to the core, and, though he has fought bravely and escaped death narrowly on the field, he is an ardent lover of peace. Nobody can say what peace owes to M. Verestchagin. Moltke forbade his soldiers to see his pictures lest they should lose heart, and some of the pictures have been destroyed by the Russian Government through the same fear. But Verestchagin goes on painting, and his pictures are among the most powerful influences for peace.



M. VASILI VERESTCHAGIN.
(Photograph by E. Bieber.)

Digitized by Google

MISS LOUISA TWINING.
(Photograph by Lankester, Tunbridge Wells.)

FEW women of our time have done more to make the world better and brighter than Miss Louisa Twining, who is spending the evening of her days in Rochester, still lighting up the dark places of the earth by kindly deeds. It is to Miss Twining, more than to any other single woman, that we owe the transformation of the workhouse from a foul prison-house to what it is to-day. Miss Twining, nearly half a century ago now, first called public attention to the question of workhouse reform in a paper she read at Birmingham; and she has devoted the best part of her life to brightening the lives of our pauper population. Miss Twining remembers the days when hospital nurses were paid in beer and gin; when medical officers prescribed coloured water for all the ills the flesh of a pauper was heir to; when workhouses were such frightful places that nurses could not be found to attend the sick. She made up her mind early in life that this great scandal should pass away if aught she could do could remove it, and to-day everybody sees the result of her work, however little they may know of the ways and means by which it has come about. Miss Twining's father was one of the volunteers enrolled during the panic caused by the expected invasion of England by Napoleon. She heard Mendelssohn play, saw Charles Kemble at the height of his fame, and was present at the entry of Louis Napoleon into Paris. In the long winter nights of long ago she sat by the fire reading "Nicholas Nickleby," as it came out in monthly parts, and she is still well enough and strong enough to read and work and do a hundred things in her own way for the betterment of the poor to whom she has given her life.

TO have taken an active part in over thirty thousand religious services in London is surely a unique distinction. The record belongs to Canon Nicholl, the veteran rector of St. Leonard's, Streatham. Canon Nicholl will be ninety-one this autumn, and he has been rector of St. Leonard's since Photograph by Wayland.

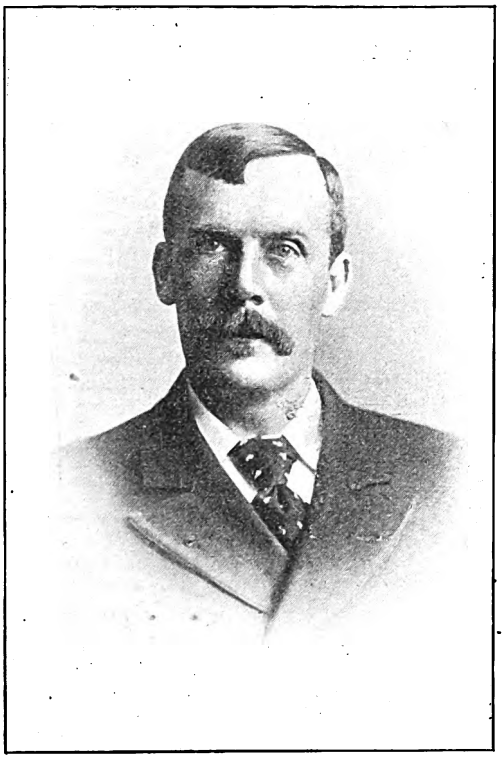
CANON NICHOLL.

Digitized by Google

1843. Few London clergymen have better earned a rest than he, but Canon Nicholl takes part in the daily service at St. Leonard's when he is at home. A service every day is his ideal for every church, and he has carried it out in his own church for forty-nine years. Since 1851 two services have been held each day in Canon Nicholl's church, and a simple calculation shows that the Canon has been responsible for between thirty and forty thousand services at Streatham. He has seen the population of the parish rise from 8,000 to 60,000, and he has seen the number of churches rise at more than double that pace. When Canon Nicholl came to Streatham, St. Leonard's was the only church in the parish; now there are nineteen. St. Leonard's was a "dreadful spectacle" when the Canon first saw it—the phrase is his own. Forty long poles supported the ceiling, and there were white square pews and a "three-decker" pulpit. Everybody in the congregation was rich; most of the parishioners drove to church in carriages. It was disgraceful, the Canon told them, that only the rich should come to church, and before long a new church had been built, and the congregation doubled and trebled, and embraced all classes in the parish. The Canon was one of Mr. Gladstone's school companions—he sat next to the G.O.M. on the sixth form at Eton—and knew the late Premier well all through his life. He is a great reader, and his study is still, in spite of his great age, his favourite spot. It is the room in which Lord John Russell drafted the Reform Bill.



MR. F. N. CHARRINGTON.
(Photograph by Weston and Son.)

MOST men of high principle pay for their principle some time or other, but it is given to few to sacrifice a fortune for their convictions. One of the few to whom this privilege has come is Mr. F. N. Charrington, a member of the family of brewers of that name. Mr. Charrington, when a young man, decided that he could not touch a penny of his father's fortune, and withdrew from the firm which would have brought him a fortune of his own in order that he might devote himself to the uplifting of East London. Down the Mile End-road, in the middle of one of the widest parts of that thoroughfare, is a public-house sign advertising Charrington's ale; directly opposite, not a stone's throw distant, is Charrington's Hall, where, for thousands of nights without a break, the Gospel has been preached to the people of East London. During the twelve years that have passed since the Great Assembly Hall was built, its doors have not once been closed for twenty-four consecutive hours. Sunday night in this Hall is one of the sights of London. Five thousand men and women crowd the great building—the biggest mission hall on earth—and the service is one of the heartiest and most inspiring in London. The Great Assembly Hall has a magnificent record of 4,000 transformed lives. Lord Shaftesbury declared that he had never heard of such great results as Charrington's Hall produced. Thirty years ago the work began in a hayloft; and in those early days Mr. Charrington preached from milk carts in the streets and outside the music halls. He has spent a night in a prison-cell for street-preaching. Mr. Charrington is fifty this year, and his friends, from the titled sympathiser in the West to the humblest docker in the East, have presented him with a purse and £3,000, in recognition of the great sacrifices he has made for conscience sake, and the beneficent work he has carried on in one of the poorest parts of the Metropolis.

Digitized by Google

ONE of the great centres of philanthropic work of all kinds is the Manor House at Northfield, near Birmingham, the home of Mrs. George Photograph by E. B. Mowll.

MRS. GEO. CADBURY.

Cadbury, one of the most sympathetic and active of the whole army of men and women who are working to uplift humanity. In Birmingham there is a unique "Union of Girls' Clubs" representing all religious denominations, and its success is greatly owing to Mrs. Cadbury's help as President. Young Women's Christian Association work engrosses some of her time and thought, as she is now district referee for Birmingham and Warwickshire. As Treasurer of the National Union of Women Workers Mrs. Cadbury is brought into touch with many phases of women's life and work, and with her it is no theory. Her ideals are put into practice, as far as possible, and two lady gardeners are at work in the beautiful grounds at Northfield, helping to solve the problem of the suitability of gardening as a profession for women. Mrs. Cadbury does a large amount of personal work amongst the people who live around her. There are meetings for wives, social afternoons, girls' clubs, Bible classes, and many other organised efforts carried on under her supervision, and conducted by her personally. On the outskirts of the "model village," as Bournville is popularly called, is a house used as a Home of Rest for Christian workers and a Holiday Home for Children. The slum-workers of the Salvation Army know of its advantages, and many a tired, worn-out person has been restored to health there. Mrs. Cadbury and her husband delight to welcome to their own home the many societies in which they are interested, and, during the summer, gatherings of various kinds are held in the grounds. Sometimes the members of a political association are welcomed; at another a large temperance organisation is found there. One day there may be a children's Sunday-school party, and on another a band of waifs and strays from the alleys of Birmingham or the towns of the Black country. Mrs. Cadbury dislikes publicity, and a great deal of her charitable work is done as quietly and unostentatiously as possible, but the lives of dozens, nay hundreds, of women are the brighter and better for her own.

"LITERA Scripta Manet." "By this shall all men know that ye are My disciples if ye have love one to another." The above are the mottoes of an organisation which is doing a great deal to make the lives of the hard-working factory girls brighter and better. The Girls' Letter Guild was founded in 1889 by Mrs. Young (who was then Miss Isabel Kenward) and it came about almost by accident. Mrs. Young had personally befriended a girl and wrote kind and helpful letters to her. Other girls wished and longed for the same kind of help and so the idea was formed of having a society which should bring this new element into the lives of some working girls. The Guild was started for Birmingham girls as the home of its founder was in that city, but now there are centres in Leeds and London. It numbers nearly eight thousand members, half of whom are ladies who write to their girls once a month. The object of the Guild is "to give to working girls instruction, sympathy and kindly counsel for their daily life by a system of regular and individual correspondence between cultured Christian women and themselves." To help Mrs. Young in her work as Hon. General Secretary there are thirty ladies who act as assistants. The Guild has a monthly journal of its own in which Mrs. Young writes her messages to the members. There are two seaside Homes of Rest, one of which is at Yarmouth under her personal supervision. It is difficult to speak of results in work of this kind, but that the girls appreciate the help afforded is shown by the numbers of applicants who are always waiting for ladies. At the present time there are over one hundred girls on Mrs. Young's list and there are no available ladies. Those wishing to help this good work can get all particulars from the Hon. Secretary at Acle Rectory, Norwich.

Digitized by Google

MRS. YOUNG.
(Photograph by Wayland, Streatham.)

ALDERMAN ADAMS, J.P.
(Photograph by H. W. Bevan, Lowestoft.)

THE Primitive Methodists as a body are not largely represented in the ranks of our public men. But they are disposed to make the most of such distinctions as come in their way, and the new Vice-President of the Connexion, Mr. Adam Adams, of Lowestoft, may rely upon being introduced at many a Methodist function as "Alderman Adams, J.P." I do not think he will be likely to resent this, for he is a public man by instinct, and not without sound reason for pride in his public work. Lowestoft is a comparatively young borough, but he has been twice its mayor—his second year of office being that of the Queen's Diamond Jubilee; and he has been nine years an alderman. From its beginning, also, he has been a member of the East Suffolk County Council, and he is a magistrate for both the borough and the county. On the County Council, indeed, he has been so active and watchful in the interests of his constituents that, although the town has seven other representatives, he has gained for himself in a special sense the sobriquet of "the Lowestoft member." Mr. Adams is, in fact, a good type of the vigour and aggressiveness of Primitive Methodism. He is keen, alert, uncompromising, and the overflowing energy which manifests itself in his own business and in the service of his town and country, has been equally characteristic of his religious and philanthropic work. He has been an active lay preacher of the Primitive Methodists for half a century, and a frequent speaker on their public platforms; in temperance advocacy also he has done his part, and as a controversialist has given and received many a hard knock. Few men can claim to have been "in labours more abundant," and his election to the Vice-Presidency of the Connexion has for some years been looked forward to as a fitting compliment to a veteran worker.

Digitized by Google

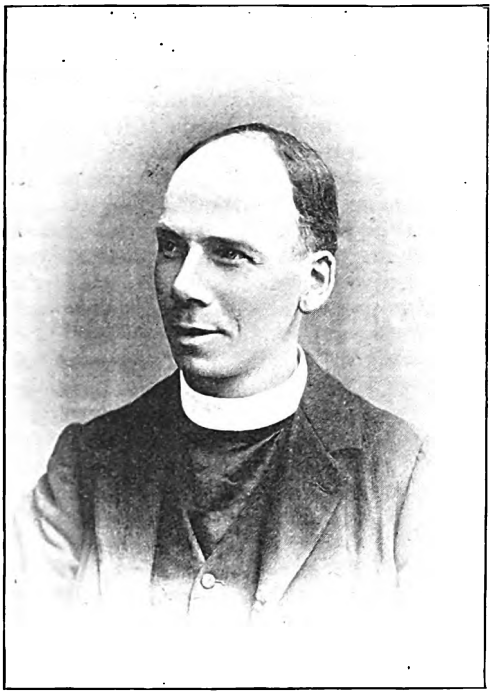
AS Special Missioner to the convicts of Great Britain the Rev. Arthur Hanson, of the Church Army, is accomplishing a task of which any man might be proud. Mr. Hanson has been singularly successful among those who have offended against the laws of the country. He is the son of a Derby tradesman, and was born in that town in September, 1867. The Christian atmosphere of the home made a deep impression upon him, and after working as a clerk, at the age of twenty-one he entered the training home of the Church Army. For six years he was stationed as a parochial evangelist at Derby, Canterbury, Bolton, and Swansea. Since the prisons, workhouses and reformatories of our country have been thrown open to the Church Army, it has been his privilege to visit as missioner many such places, and to interview thousands of men in their cells. The work is an unspeakably sad one, yet Mr. Hanson has cause to be full of thankfulness for the success attending his efforts, and for the large number of men who, on their discharge have been given a fresh start in life by the aid of the Church Army Homes all over the country. Having first concluded an eight days' mission at Wormwood Scrubbs he is now at Portland for a longer mission amongst these convicts, many of whom are now received on their discharge by the Society, the Home Office having shown its appreciation of the work by appointing the Church Army a "Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society" for the four convict establishments.

REV. ARTHUR HANSON.

CELEBRITY in pastimes appears to be the lot of the Rev. Elwyn Lewis's family. His father, the Rev. Woodward Lewis, Vicar of Meopham, was the well-known chess player. The son is known by, and has earned, the honourable title of the cyclists' chaplain. The Rev. Elwyn Lewis was appointed to the rectory of Fyfield in 1895, and immediately commenced the special Sunday afternoon services for cyclists, which have made the little Essex village famous. At first the services were chiefly attended by local clubs from Epping, Chelmsford, Brentwood, Dunmow, and Ongar; but since last year wheelmen from Surrey, Middlesex, and adjacent counties have attended, as many as two thousand putting in an appearance at a single service. Dr. Lewis's paternal care does not stop short at the soul alone; he provides tea in the beautiful rectory grounds after service, and the visitors then stroll about enjoying the picturesque and cosy places which his artistic eye has helped to create. The shady walks, rustic bowers, and pretty summer houses, which are dotted over the seven acres which comprise the rectory grounds, have been prepared by Dr. Lewis personally since he became the cyclists' chaplain. When Dr. Lewis—he is a Mus. Doc.—was in charge of a parish in Lincolnshire in 1894 he organised the first cycle parade ever held in Tennyson's county. He has been a keen wheelman for twenty-five years, starting in the old bone-shaker days when he was fifteen years old. He is also an expert poultry farmer, and has won many prizes with his birds at the shows. His parishioners owe much to his zeal and influence—a better conducted parish it would be impossible to find.

Digitized by Google



REV. L. ELWYN LEWIS.
(Photograph by Frank Foulsham.)

TO all devotees of music the Queen's Hall, London, is a Mecca when the symphony and promenade concerts are taking place. One of the finest orchestras of the world has been gathered together here, governed by the magic baton of Mr. Henry J. Wood, magnificent renderings of the works of the great masters and many new composers being given. Mr. Wood so early displayed extraordinary musical talent that at the age of ten he was deputy organist of St. Mary's, Aldermanbury. Since then his career has been one long triumph. He has steadily made his way to the front rank of orchestral conductors. In November, 1898, he received a gold-mounted baton from the Queen in recognition of the command performance given by his orchestra at Windsor Castle on that day. He has had wide experience, having been in turn associated with Mr. D'Oyley Carte and Sir Arthur Sullivan, the Carl Rosa Company, and Signor Lago. It is interesting to remember that it is now five years since Mr. Robert Newman secured Mr. Wood's services for the Queen's Hall concerts. Last year he visited Berlin and conducted the famous Philharmonic Orchestra with great success. That he is still young will be seen by the accompanying photograph.

THE Bishop of Lincoln is one of the most respected prelates in the English Church, yet one of the least known out of it. The reason is not far to seek. He has never been written about in newspapers and magazines, as have other dignitaries of the Church. He has a dislike to being interviewed, and regularly refuses to accord that privilege to those who ask for it. The life of the Church in the Lincoln diocese has strengthened and deepened owing to Dr. King's life and influence. He has gone about amongst the people as no other bishop had before him. Tiny villages know him as well as the large towns, and no person has ever been too humble to gain his interest if that was sought. The bishop, on his accession to the see, refused to live in the large house a few miles from Lincoln which had been the residence of the Lincoln prelates for years. The old palace below the minster was restored, and there the bishop makes his home and gives hospitality to all kinds of workers in the diocese. The growth of the guilds is largely due to his fostering care and the enormous number of men and women who assembled in the cathedral a few weeks ago to hear him give his triennial address must have been a source of joy to him. The bishop is a remarkably telling preacher, not particularly eloquent, but clear and simple; so simple, that a child can understand. He has a wonderful insight into character, and this quality helps him to reach people's hearts. His hearers feel as if he is talking to them personally, and they wonder how it is that he knows all about them. The effect of his preaching is greatly heightened by his expression. His face constantly lights up and shines, so great is the beauty of soul behind. A lady who had heard him preach for the first time was once heard to say, "His smile gave one a glimpse of heaven." The following story will give an insight into his character better than any other words. Staying one week-end in a country village where a short time before he had held a confirmation, he went for a walk, attired in ordinary clergyman's dress, and came across a ploughboy tenting. The bishop got into conversation with the boy, and elicited from him the fact that he had lately been confirmed. Wishing to know if what he had said had been remembered he went on asking questions, and rather sheepishly the boy admitted that the bishop had told them to read the Bible, to pray, and at last, in a burst of confidence, exclaimed, in broad Lincolnshire, "He might ha' been a ploughboy hissen, for he talked as if he knew all about us." The bishop, in telling the story afterwards, said it was the greatest compliment that had ever been paid him.

Photograph by MR. HENRY J. WOOD. Alfred Ellis.

Digitized by Google

THE BISHOP OF LINCOLN.
(Photograph by Duckmanton.)

THE Rev. Thomas Allen, D.D., the new President of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, is a Cheshire man by birth, but a Methodist minister, under the rigid rule of itineracy, has no "continuing city." As a set-off, he has the opportunity of making friends over a wide area, and Dr. Allen has many friends in the leading English cities who will rejoice that at length he has been called to sit in Wesley's seat. Dr. Allen has "travelled," according to the quaint terminology of his order, for forty years, and his later stations have included important circuits in Southport, Sheffield, Manchester, and London. He was chairman for six years of the Sheffield district, and when a suggestion was put forward for establishing a kind of Methodist Episcopate under the name of "separated chairmen," I remember that it obtained some support in Sheffield for the avowed reason that it would enable Mr. Allen to remain in the city. For the last three years Dr. Allen has been chairman of the Birmingham district, the Leeds Conference in 1897 having appointed him governor of Handsworth College, and professor of pastoral theology and church organisation, a post for which he has special qualifications. For some years there has been a growing desire to see Dr. Allen in the chair of the Conference, and the responsibilities of that high office will, without doubt, be adequately fulfilled. He is habitually calm and dignified in his bearing, and his leadership of the Connexion may be expected to display ripe wisdom and sound judgment. He may speak less than some of his predecessors, but his utterances will be those of a man of culture and refinement, applying himself thoughtfully to the controversies of the day. He is in full sympathy with progressive Methodism, and those who know him best are most confident that he will make a safe, but by no means a dull President. He is a man who makes warm friendships wherever he goes.

Digitized by Google

Photograph by Braycott.

REV. THOMAS ALLEN, D.D.
(President of the Wesleyan Conference.)

Photograph by J. E. Bruton, I. of Man.

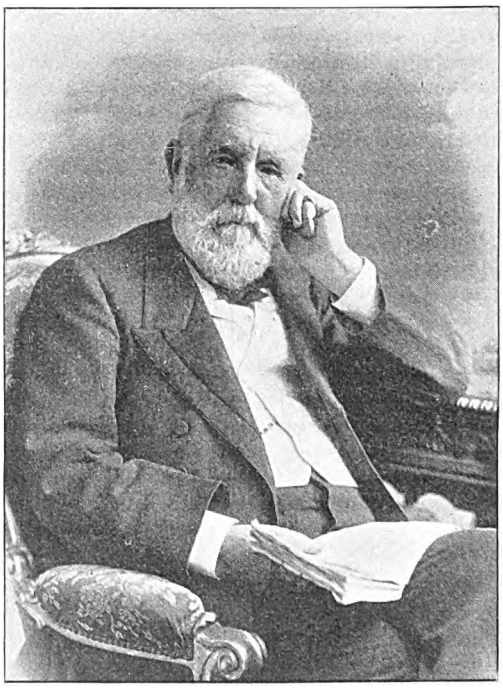
LORD HENNIKER.
(Governor, Isle of Man.)

WHEN Lord Henniker was sent to govern, in the name of the Queen, that unique fragment of the United Kingdom, the Isle of Man, with its separate legislature, its quaint judiciary, and its keen estimate of the spending power of the English pleasure-seeker, the county of Suffolk parted with a nobleman who realises that rank spells duty. Lord Henniker, at home in his pretty place at Thornham, near Eye, was emphatically a county man. He was elected in early manhood to represent East Suffolk in Parliament, and his duties as a county member were conscientiously discharged, but it was after his accession to the peerage that, by his close association with the internal administration of the county, he became almost an embodiment of county government. As chairman of Quarter Sessions, his work helped to justify the anachronism of a non-elective rate-spending authority, and when the County Councils came into existence there was never a question as to his selection for the chairmanship. The distinguishing characteristics of Lord

Digitized by Google

Henniker's public work have been patient conscientiousness, sound judgment, and rare modesty, and personally he is one of the kindest and most unassuming of men. Suffolk people still hope that his removal from their midst may be only temporary. Unfortunately, since his appointment to the Manx Government his Lordship has not had the best of health. I may add that Lord Henniker has for many years been a prominent Freemason.

FEW men have done more lasting work in a quiet way than Sir Sydney Waterlow, whose statue has lately been unveiled in the park he presented to London some years ago. Sir Sydney is one of London's Dick Whittingtons. Beginning life as a printer's apprentice, he became Lord Mayor nearly thirty years ago, and he built up one of the most flourishing business concerns in the Metropolis. Sir Sydney has entertained in his time a Sultan of Turkey, a Shah of Persia, and a Viceroy of Egypt; but it is in connection with the democracy rather than the aristocracy that he has deserved well of his generation. It was he who, nearly forty years ago now, initiated the movement for the better housing of the working classes, and the Improved Industrial Dwellings Company, which he started in 1863, has expended three-quarters of a million of money in housing between twenty and thirty thousand people. Sir Sydney may be thought somewhat of a heretic in this matter by many younger adherents of the movement. He is not by any means in love with the notion that the working classes should be housed outside London. It is much better, he thinks, that they should be kept inside the town, and not be separated from their richer neighbours. Mr. Gladstone, in conferring a baronetcy upon Sir Sydney at the close of his reign at the Mansion House, paid a high tribute to the recipient's "intelligent and indefatigable philanthropy," and nobody will question Mr. Gladstone's judgment. Sir Sydney is one of the men to whom the Metropolis owes more than it conceives. He has taken some interest in party politics, having sat through Lord Beaconsfield's last Parliament as a Liberal, but he has preferred to devote himself rather to the social welfare of the people than to political affairs.



SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW.

THE ONLOOKER.

Digitized by Google

For THE BAIRNS.

Conducted by
THE REV. J. REID HOWATT.

"A SUMMER DAY'S RAMBLE."

I have received so many letters for this competition that the best I can do is to make a selection, for to print them all would be to take up more room than can be spared. This month we shall let the younger ones have their chance; those a year or two older next time; the Three Kingdoms are represented. And since there have been so many letters, and, generally, such good ones, I shall give two prizes instead of one only, but shall not announce the winners till all the letters I mean to print are printed. Without any remarks of my own (so as to save space), I let the letters speak for themselves. There is a fine waft of summer and the freshness of youth about them all:—

Chalmers Street Manse, Dunfermline.

I have had many "Summer days' rambles" but I think this is the latest one, so I write it. I am very fond of botany, and there is a very nice walk for botany out by a loch called Luscar. We went at the time when the trees were in flower and got some nice specimens of wild flowers, and the fruits of the trees and ferns. When we got to the loch we wandered round it, and then went into a wood and did the same thing and then went home. I was a little tired, because it is a good three miles. I mean to have more rambles before the summer is out. Hoping you think this worth publishing and not too long,—I remain your little friend, ENA GEORGE (Aged 10 years).

Ivydene, Gilbert Road, St. Leonards-on-Sea.

DEAR SIR,—Last year, when we were at Reading, we rode on a coach to a place called Silchester. One of the hills we had to go down was so steep, we had time to pick some blackberries. We went to see the ruins of a Roman city. When we got there it began to rain, and we were twelve miles from home. At the place where we had tea there was such a funny old gentleman. We had some honey for tea, and he asked if we had ever tasted it before. This was very amusing, for at the place where we were staying we had honey for breakfast every day. We saw some birds' nests on the roof of the inn. I forget now what they were called. It rained all the way home. Once we stopped under an arch for the horses to rest. We were very wet when we reached home, but we did not mind that at all. I think this is the best summer day's outing we have had. I could tell you much more but my hand aches, and my fingers are so inky, and it is nearly bed-time.—Your little friend,

MARJORIE ELDRIDGE (Aged 7¾ years).

Ivydene, Gilbert Road, St. Leonards-on-Sea.

DEAR SIR,—I should like to tell you about a very happy day we had last year, when we went with the Sunday school belonging to our church for their summer treat. We went by train to Polegate, and saw some children who waved their hands to us. When we reached Polegate we had two miles to walk to Wannok. It is such a pretty place and there are some lovely tea and fruit gardens there, where we had tea. We went for a long walk to the glen. There was a steep field which was very hard to climb. I thought it was just like a mountain, and I was quite tired when I had climbed it. When we had had a nice walk we went back to the field at Wannok and had some gooseberries, cherries and currants. We had tea in the garden, and then we sat down on the grass and saw the races. This was very interesting. When the races were over a gentleman opened some large boxes of sweets, and threw them all over the ground, and the children scrambled for them. Then Marjorie, two little boys and I ran races and had pennies for prizes. When it was time to go home some wagons came to take the little ones back to the station. It was such a happy day and we were all so sorry when it was over. When you come to St. Leonards I hope you will go to Wannok, I am sure you will like it.—Your little friend,

OLIVE CLARA ELDRIDGE (Aged 8¾ years).

Digitized by Google

Teviotside House, Hawick.

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—I think the best ramble I ever had was with my brother Robert. We were at Dunbar then, so we went round to the bathing pool, and then we went in and out among the rocks. The first big rock was shaped like a camel. Then we passed a stream, of which we had found the source. And after a while we saw some fisherwomen gathering cockles and mussels. Then we went home for tea.

JAMES AITKEN (8 years 11 months).

Crosbie Dykes, W. Kilbride, Ayrshire, N.B.

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—I live at an old farm, and every Saturday my brothers and I go and ramble about the woods and look for birds' nests. Sometimes we go away to the burn and fish for trout, and also go up to the hill to look for white heather, which is very scarce. In the holidays we go into the garden and pull gooseberries and black currants. While we are gathering the gooseberries, we sometimes go and try to catch butterflies. There is a new water works being made, and the men who work at it are called navies (?!). On Saturday when they get their pay they go down to the town and get drunk. At night when we come home from the town, we see them lying on the road singing.—Yours truly,

ROBERT BLACK (Aged 9½ years).

24, Lucas-street, Openshaw, Manchester.

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—My sister and I went to Morecambe for our holidays, and during our stay we went to Grange-over-Sands. The steamer we went on was called "The Sunshine of the Bay." It seemed to me to be a very large steamer, as I had never seen one before, and it was my first visit to the sea-side. At first I did not care for being on the steamer, but after I had been on for some time, I began to enjoy it very much. When we had nearly got to the Grange, it began to rain very heavily and spoiled part of our outing. We got off the steamer and sheltered in a barn, but it soon cleared up and turned out to be a very nice day. We thought the Grange a very pretty place, and we would have liked to have stayed longer but we had to be back by a certain time. We went a short walk and went through some pretty lanes, from where we could see the sea. We then went through a large park and went back to the steamer, but it could not get near enough to the land, so we had to go in a small boat to the steamer.—I remain, Yours truly,

LILY BLAYMIRE (Aged 12 years and 2 months).

3, Smith-street, Dalry, Ayrshire.

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—Seeing this competition in the TEMPLE MAGAZINE, I thought I should like to try it. I am 13 years of age last January, and so still under the limited age. It was a fine day about the middle of May that I and a companion, Tom, went out seeking birds' eggs. We went about two miles without getting anything more than a robin's, blackbird's, and wagtail's. Having all these, we left the eggs in the nest and walked on. Now we entered a wood so thickly planted with trees that we had to keep two or three yards apart so as not to get struck with the fir branches. Suddenly, I saw an old piet's nest with what I at first thought was a cat in it. Tom told me to run away, that it was a weasel. I said no, and gave the tree a kick, but it did not move, so I climbed up the tree (half in terror of getting my eyes torn out), and when I neared the nest a bird flew off and fluttered about. Tom said it was blind and he would catch it, so when it fell into the dark branches he tried to catch it, while I descended with two out of the three white eggs which were in the nest. When I came down, Tom was crying. Its great eyes and cat's face were staring out of the darkness at him, and he had been scratched by it in his efforts to make it prisoner. I took a stick and struck the branches round about it. It flew up in the air, and I saw some small birds chasing it. When I reached home I found that it was an owl's egg, and after tea I went to bed and slept soundly.—Your most affectionate friend,

JAMIESON BONE.

27, Dartmouth Park Avenue, Highgate, N.W.

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—We went to Hampstead Heath a few weeks ago; we live quite near it. "We"—that means my father and mother and sister and brothers—walked, and took our lunch with us. It was on a Bank Holiday. There were a lot of people there, but I suppose they did not care to go very far because it was so hot, for there were hardly any people where we went on beyond the flag-staff. We ate our dinner under a tree and then we went to seek oranges. Then we had a game of hide-and-seek among the bushes, and enjoyed ourselves thoroughly. After that we went round Golder's Hill and saw some convalescent soldiers sitting under the trees, some playing and some sitting in little tents. We walked home another way in time for tea, and spent the rest of the day in our garden.—From your friend,

GWENDOLEN M. CAUSFIELD (Aged 11½ years).

4, Brownhill-road, Birstall, near Leeds.

DEAR SIR,—As it is the first time I am writing, I will try and do my best, but I scarcely expect to get a prize. One morning in the summer last year, father came downstairs and said to me, "Would you like to go with me to Bolton Woods to-day?" I was quite excited when he said this, and said I would very much like to go. Then I got ready and went to the station with father, and when we got to Bradford Station we met the gentleman who was going with us. We saw a number of children with baskets and bags, who were going to a pic-nic, and I think some of them were going to Ilkley, and there was a rush for the train. Father and I nearly missed it. When we got to Bolton we got into a carriage and drove off to the woods. Then we had some refreshments and I had some strawberries and a banana. Father and his friend who went with us sat down under the trees while I was doing what I wanted; I was dabbling in the water and running over the stepping stones. We went into the Abbey and round about the river. It is a very old Abbey; it is a ruin, but it is very bonny with ivy climbing up it, and I noticed that there were two or three artists making pictures of it. It is a very lovely place, is Bolton; it is all country, and there are not many houses except the farmhouses, and there are very few of them. There is a part of this river Wharfe called the

Digitized by Google

Strid, and it is very, very deep; I have read in the papers that there have been many people drowned by trying to jump it. They call it the Strid because that is the only part of the river that you can stride over, but it is very dangerous, the water is so deep and the current so strong that it draws you down, and there is no chance of your being saved; but the water looks so beautiful splashing down; it looks like salt water when it dashes together. Once, a boy called Romilly was walking in Bolton Woods with his hound and he wanted to jump across the Strid, and when he was jumping, the dog pulled back and let him into the water and he was drowned, and his mother founded the Abbey in memory of her son. When we came back from the Strid, I gathered some forget-me-nots and other flowers; then we went to Barden Towers to have tea, and afterwards we drove off to the station. I was tired, but I was very sorry when I had to go home, and I think it was one of the best days I ever spent.—I am, Yours sincerely,

IDA MARY BURRELL (Aged 13 years 8 months).

6, Foxhall Terrace, Mornington Road,
Ranelagh, Dublin.

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—I have been so many rambles I hardly know which to describe. There are so many pretty places around Dublin, but they are so far. Last Saturday afternoon mother, my two sisters and I, started out to go to Killiney, a pretty seaside place about ten miles away. We were going to a little station an hour's walk away, called Sidney Parade Station. It began to rain when we were near the station, and when we got there we found a train just gone. So we went to Blackrock on the tram, a seaside place. We went in the park at Blackrock and sheltered under some trees. It is a very pretty park; there is a lake with swans and ducks on it. There are tea rooms and a band-stand where a nice band plays some evenings. You have a grand view of Dublin Bay from the park. It cleared up a lovely evening so we went on the sands, and my little sister paddled in the water. The water had gone out a long way. We went in the park again after, and walked around the park. We saw a lot of lovely convolvulus growing and we saw the ducks sleeping. We walked along the high road to Booterstown, and then went in the tram as far as Aylesbury Road and then walked up this road home. It is a nice shady road in summer, for on each side are beech, elm, laburnum, and many other trees. We beguiled the way by playing at "Rhyming Words." One of us said, "I've thought of a word that rhymes with dance," or any other word, and the rest guessed it. It began to rain again, so we hurried home.—Yours truly,

GWENNIE HEAP (aged 14 years).

THE CRUTCH-AND-KINDNESS LEAGUE.

Let the reader give a glance over the list of members at the close of this article. The addresses indicate almost every quarter of the globe—Dublin, Plymouth, Dunoon, Keswick, Tunbridge Wells, Highgate, Guernsey, New Zealand, and so on over an area of thousands of miles. What has brought them all together? That spirit of kindness and pity which is independent of either space or race, seeking its outlet wherever there is a compassionate heart on the one hand and a sad or suffering one on the other. And the addresses of the correspondents could be extended almost indefinitely, for the Crutch-and-Kindness League has its members in Chicago, Tokio, Shanghai, New Guinea, St. Petersburg, Berlin, Paris, Como, St. John's, Newfoundland, and all that is included in the convenient phrase "the uttermost isles of the sea." As a phase of the progress of modern philanthropy these facts are not without their significance, especially when we consider that the compassionate purpose of all the writers is focussed upon London, for in the great city there are no less than six thousand young people—poor, some very poor—lonely and pained ones shut off from all that makes life joyous to the young, for they are cripples. So far as it can, the Ragged School Union, by the help of its many voluntary visitors, takes a kindly oversight of these little afflicted prisoners of God, but the work is great, and the workers always sadly fewer than the need, so that the loneliness, which is almost a necessary part of their affliction, is often painfully intensified on many of these little suffering mites. To relieve this monotony, in some measure at all events, the Crutch-and-Kindness League was started. Its main object is the writing of a friendly letter, once a month at least, to some cripple put into the writer's care, or when pressure of time makes a letter impossible the sending of some illustrated magazine or paper or card, toy or anything likely to interest the suffering child's mind and buoy up the little heart with some suggestion of freshness cast into the life. This may not seem a great thing to do, but no one who knows anything of a child's nature will be likely to undervalue the pleasure thus given. It is a means of doing good quite after the spirit of the age—in these days we shop by post, or even make the telephone a substitute for a visit, and as the rush of life necessitates these expedients in one direction, the same rush often necessitates some similar time-saving means if the good impulses of the heart are to have any practical effect, for there are many who fain would do some good in the world, yet find it impossible to do it by personal visitation. The Crutch-and-Kindness League gives an opening to all, young or old, men or women, bedridden or active, at home or abroad, to do something to make the lot of maimed and lonely children a little brighter. The League has grown from its start somewhere at the rate of about a thousand members a year, but what with deaths, removals, and other such causes between one and two thousand members are still required for every poor cripple child in London to be able to say, "I have a friend." While all may see at a glance something of the happiness thus afforded to the children, no one can reflect a moment without seeing the blessing shed in the heart of the writer himself or herself. All further particulars concerning this most gracious and compassionate work may be obtained for a stamp not from me, but from Mr. John Kirk, Secretary, Ragged School Union, 32, John-street, Bedford-row, London, W.C., together with a beautifully embossed card of membership for framing.

Digitized by Google

New Members for the Month.

Muriel King-Smith, Ronald King-Smith, Buckfastleigh; Percy Holman, Marjory Holman, Joyce Holman, Highgate; Miss F. Easy, South Norwood-hill; Miss Aggie Grant, Arbroath; Miss A. Nixon, Keswick; Miss Louisa Craven, Bradford; Miss Robinson, Manchester; Miss Annie Walker, Miss F. Jossie Faur, Miss M. Chandler, Miss Daisy Abbot, Miss Seaborn, care of Miss Underwood, Luton; Miss J. Ford, Ilford; Miss Adelaide Robinson, Bristol; Mr. W. H. Bournes, Dublin; Miss Gladys Quarrington, Maidstone; Miss Sayer, Southborough; Mrs. Gains Smith, Leedlow; Miss May Percival, Southport; Miss M. V. Miles, Primrose-hill; Mrs. H. S. Bennetts, Chislehurst; Mrs. Garratt, Wimbledon; Miss F. E. Dawson, St. John's Chapel; Miss M. A. Trigg, Miss M. Trigg, Storking Pelham; Miss Dorothy Cook, Oxton; Stevenson, Tunbridge Wells; Miss Mabel Moscrop, Saltburn-by-Sea; Members of Senior Endeavour, Members of Junior Endeavour, care of Miss Humphreys, Plymouth; Miss Mary Long, Swinderby; Miss Hilda Hayes, Frodsham; Miss Maggie Hooper, Miss Ida Stanley, Miss Ethel Banbury, Miss Edith Darvill, Miss Dora Hare, Miss Lily Martin, care of Miss M. Hooper, Leytonstone; Members of Junior Endeavour, care of Miss Hibblethwaite, Hornsey, N.; Miss Ada Husband, Miss Elizabeth Spencer, Cottingham; Miss Linda M. Choldcroft, Oxford; Miss Phoebe Young, Chislehurst; Miss Mactaggart, Wimpole-street, W.; Mrs. Watson, Shrewsbury; Miss C. W. Ellis, Plymouth; Miss C. H. Bawtree, Croydon; Miss Nicholas, Dartford; Miss N. Stranger, Guernsey; Miss M. J. Williams, Grays; Miss K. L. Walliker, Basingstoke; Miss A. Ray, New Zealand; Miss Chew, Kingsholme; Mr. Charles Ockenden, Oxford; Miss L. Stephenson, Surrey; Miss Mabel Portlock, Lordship Park, N.; Miss Ella Mason, Streatham; Miss Lily Scott, Mrs. Whitehead, Stamford-hill; Miss Hope Ennals, Honiton; Miss Catherine Ramsay, Brigham; Miss Snashall's S.S. Class, Epsom; Master Francis W. Day, St. Albans; Mrs. L. L. Armitage, Little Hulton; Mrs. John Highgate, Dunoon; Miss Youpha Upham, Guernsey; Miss N. Lumb, Reading; C.E. Junior Endeavour, care of Mrs. Douglas, Bishop Auckland; Mrs. Hugh Ferguson, New Zealand; Miss Bertha M. Savage, Miss Savage, Miss Savage, Tunbridge Wells; Miss Daisy Sharpe, Nottingham; Mrs. Hunt, Miss Boniface, Waltham Cross; Miss Fanny Blake, Stroud; Miss Ethel Spragg, Birmingham; Miss Bowden, Tipton; Miss Gertrude Stranger, Guernsey; Mrs. Asquith, Scarborough; Miss Mary Sayers, Glasgow; Miss Bertha Foster, Miss Eva Kelly, care of Miss Underwood, Luton; Miss Blanch Inch, Walthamstow; Miss Lily Robinson, care of Miss Dickson, Boscombe; Miss Winifred Hubbard, Sheffield; Master James Parsons, Miss Aubrey Down, care of Miss Medway, Hendon; Mr. Cope, Bedford.

Digitized by Google

When you see a particularly high lustre on a metal article, it means that GLOBE POLISH has passed that way, and left its signature.

USED IN THE HOUSEHOLD OF THE QUEEN.

GLOBE POLISH

Outshines, outlasts, outsells all others. Is the speediest, easiest, safest burnisher for all metals—silver, brass, copper, nickel steel, &c., &c.—in everyday use.

It does not injure the skin of the user, nor will it in any way scratch or damage the most valuable metalwork. Sold Everywhere. RAIMES & Co., Stockton-on-Tees; and Bow, London, E.

USED IN THE HOUSEHOLD OF THE QUEEN.

Digitized by Google

Keystone Burgundy

meal by meal costs scarcely more than beer, but is infinitely superior as an article of diet.

The flavour is delightful, arising out of the wine being wholesome and natural.

Whilst there is not enough iron in Keystone Burgundy to offend the palate, there is enough to invigorate and enrich the blood.

FLAGON, 2/-; BOTTLE, 1/6; HALF-BOTTLE, 10d.
AT LICENSED GROCERS, CHEMISTS, AND WINE MERCHANTS.

Proprietors: Stephen Smith & Co., Ltd., Bow, London, E.
No. 294.

THE OLDEST AND BEST.

UNEQUALLED FOR ITS BRILLIANCE AND CLEANLINESS.

ADAMS'S FURNITURE POLISH

FOR FURNITURE, BROWN BOOTS, PATENT LEATHER, OILCLOTHS,
AND ALL VARNISHED AND ENAMELLED GOODS.

THE QUEEN says: "Having made a fresh trial of its virtues after considerable experience with other compounds of the same nature, we feel no hesitation in recommending its use to all housewives."

VICTORIA PARK WORKS, SHEFFIELD.

THE BEST AND QUICKEST REMEDY FOR

RHEUMATISM, GOUT, LUMBAGO, BRONCHITIS, SORE THROAT, NEURALGIA, &c.

SMEDLEY'S CHILLIE PASTE

Bottles, 1/1½, 1/6, & 2/9, of all Chemists.

Gives instant Relief.
Does not Blister.

The most obstinate cases of Rheumatism, Gout, Lumbago, Neuralgia, etc., are soon cured by the outward application of SMEDLEY'S CHILLIE PASTE, together with an occasional dose of

LASCELLES' PILLS

Bottles, 1/1½ and 2/9, of all Chemists.

Sole Proprietors—HIRST, BROOKE, AND HIRST, LIMITED, LEEDS.

WHEN BUYING A CHEAP BICYCLE,

look at the tyres. If they are not the machine is not cheap at any price.

DUNLOP TYRES

The DUNLOP PNEUMATIC TYRE CO., Ltd.,
ALMA STREET, COVENTRY;
160 to 166, CLERKENWELL ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

METROPOLITAN

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS
FOR BOOTS & SHOES

CREAM

W. CLARK,
528, Oxford Street, W.

Over 70 years' Established Reputation.

NEAVE'S FOOD

"Highly Nutritious." Lancet.

FOR INFANTS & INVALIDS.

Used in the Russian Imperial Nursery.

Agents for Australasia and the Colonies: R. A. THOMPSON & Co., Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane, Adelaide, Cape Town, etc.

LONDON: PRINTED FOR THE PROPRIETORS BY THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY, LIMITED, WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, CARMELITE STREET, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE

FOR HOME AND SUNDAY READING.

VOL. 5. NOVEMBER, 1900. No. 2.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

READY FOR THE PARTY.

LONDON: HORACE MARSHALL & SON, TEMPLE HOUSE, TEMPLE AVENUE, E.C.

Cadbury's Cocoa

Absolutely Pure, Therefore Best.

"The Standard of Highest Purity."

—The Lancet.

Digitized by Google

LINES

Each thing has its own business; most things attend to something else.

It is the particular business of Orain Tablets to cure Indigestion—they do that.

Dyspepsia and its uncomfortable family, Flatulence, Acidity, Heartburn, Pain, Weight and Fulness after Meals, etc., are bad lodgers. They require eviction at short notice. Orain Tablets will attend to this matter

Indigestion will make a man a misanthrope for years—Orain Tablets will make him love his neighbour inside a week.

Orain Tablets are compounded from the prescription of a fully qualified specialist of wide experience. This is a humiliating confession, but it has to be made.

A spoonful of truth is often taken with a grain of salt; sometimes it is not taken at all, which is foolish.

You must remember that there is a chance—possibly in your opinion a long-odds chance, but still a chance—that, though this is an advertisement, its contents are in line with the truth; and if you have the misfortune to be dyspeptic, you don't need to be told that the merest chance of unloading your burden is worth more than an average risk. Orain Tablets are guaranteed innocuous, so that the risk in their case figures out at 1s.; that being the sum (in stamps) for which we will send you a bottle, post free. Is it too big?

THE ORAIN CO., LTD.,

8, CATHERINE COURT,

LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

BORD'S PIANOS

25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (second-hand, 10s. 6d. per month) on the Three Years' System. — Lists free of C. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C. PIANOS EXCHANGED.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

These magnificent Pianos for Hire on the Three Years' System, at advantageous prices and terms.—List and particulars free of CHAS. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done, with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. E. C. (Room 8), 195, Oxford Street, London, W.

FARDONS' SAUCE

is a stimulating appetiser, possessing characteristics found in no other Sauce, and is invaluable as a flavouring with all kinds of Soups, Fish, Meats, &c. To enable everybody to test the merits of this delicious sauce

Absolutely Free of Charge

the manufacturers will, from now to the 31st of December, refund the cost of a sixpenny bottle if the purchaser's name and address is written across the outside wrapper of the bottle, and the wrapper posted direct to

FARDONS' VINEGAR CO. LTD., BIRMINGHAM.

(Not more than one sixpence refunded to same address)

If your Grocer will not supply you with FARDONS' SAUCE, send us your Order, and his name and address, and we will see that you are supplied.

In bottles at 4½d., 6d., and 1s.

FARDONS' VINEGAR Co. Ltd., BIRMINGHAM.

Please mention this Paper.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

Fascinating Flowers

To make . . .

A PERFECT PICTURE IN YOUR GARDEN,

to last for years.

NOW IS THE TIME TO PLANT

Kelway's

Lovely New Paeonies

The Fashionable Flower; in an almost endless variety of lovely tints, and, in many cases, with the fragrance of the Tea Rose; Kelway & Son's celebrated improved kinds certificated by the Royal Horticultural Society. Strong country grown plants for flowering next and many succeeding seasons in the hardy perennial border or bed, or in shrubberies, drives, grass, park or woodland. The cut flowers are gloriously decorative.

Collection C .. .. 30/- per dozen.
" D (extra fine kinds).. 42/- "

Carriage paid for cheque with order to those mentioning "Temple Magazine."

130 Gold and Silver Medals.
London, Paris, Chicago, etc.

KELWAY & SON, The Royal Horticulturists, LANGPORT, SOMERSET.

Digitized by Google

FOR MOTHERS AND DAUGHTERS.

A LADY FACTORY INSPECTOR.

Miss Gray, Inspectress of Female Workshops and Laundries in Islington, points out a curious condition of affairs in her last report. While women in humble circumstances are leaving laundry-work for typewriting and other supposedly "genteel" pursuits, educated women are rushing in and attempting to fill up the vacant places. As the Central Bureau for the Employment of Women is continually showing, there are good openings for such ladies as laundry-managers and superintendents as well as laundry-matrons in Poor Law Schools and Industrial Institutions (the trade papers have even contained advertisements offering as big a salary as £200 to competent managers), but Miss Grey does not disguise the fact that the work is very hard and the hours are long.

ABOUT MUFFS.

Fur muffs this year are very expensive owing to their size. Here is a hint to the economical for a home-made muff of velours du Nord, of which half a yard suffices. The muff consists of a band of velvet mounted on wadding lining, edged with two double frills of velvet which are interlined with muslin and are stitched at the edge. The top of the muff is decorated with a satin ribbon bow and a bouquet of flowers.

THE QUEEN'S WARDROBE.

All the dresses and robes the Queen has ever worn are kept stored and laid by; none are either sold or given away. Not only are those used for her coronation, her bridal, and for affairs of State put carefully into the large cabinets at Windsor Castle, but the plain gowns for every day use—all are preserved, even after their wearer has well-nigh forgotten their existence.

NEW FURS.

The fashions in furs were decided upon long ago. The sort of furs people are to wear were bought and made up and got ready for winter while the same people were baking under a blazing summer sun. According to all the prominent dealers, there is a great increase in the price of fur. Sealskin has gone up about 80 per cent. since last year, and is to be very fashionable. Chinchilla will be in high favour, but only the rich will be able to wear it on account of the price. The fur is very beautiful for trimming, and it is no wonder that it continues in fashion. Grebe is used very much for trimming also, and ermine will be more in vogue than ever. A novelty in trimmings mentioned is fur that can be dyed to match the wrap for which it is intended. Mink will be popular, and for the animal scarfs all the foxes, and black and white thibet. Sable collarettes with stole fronts are fashionable too. Fancy muffs of mink and marten will be very much worn.

IT PAYS TO TAKE PAINS.

Take pains. Take trouble. Whatever you do, do thoroughly. Whatever you begin, finish. It may not seem to be worth your while at the moment to be so very painstaking, so very exact. In after years you will find it was worth your while; that it has paid you by training your character and soul; paid you by giving you success in life; paid you by giving you the respect and trust of your fellowmen; paid you by helping you toward a good conscience, and enabling you in old age to turn back and say, I have been of use upon the earth.—CHARLES KINGSLEY.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Hall's Wine.

Invaluable after influenza.

It is no wonder that a heavy percentage of victims succumbs to influenza, for it attacks the nerves with uncommon severity, and those who recover have, when convalescence is reached, but little further resistance left to offer possible complications.

The time to take Hall's Wine is when convalescence begins. Its restorative powers are then engaged and demonstrated by the recovery of the impoverished and debilitated system.

Hall's Wine is indebted to influenza more than to any other complaint for its reputation —the reputation that it enjoys both with the public and physicians.

Sold by licensed grocers, chemists, and wine merchants.

Stephen Smith & Co., Ltd., Bow, London, E

No. 119.

Digitized by Google

ARNOLD'S

"LANCET" RAZOR.

The Razor of Razors.

Never fails to give the utmost satisfaction. Made of the best Sheffield Steel and surgically ground. The most perfect Razor in the market. Every "LANCET" Razor is carefully tested and guaranteed.

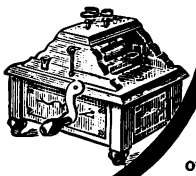
When ordering please state light or strong beard.

Pair, with Ivory Handles, in Case 19/6
Four, ditto ditto 42/-
Seven, ditto ditto 70/-
Sample Razor, with Ivory Handle, post free 7/6

All Orders to be accompanied with Remittance.

ADDRESS—

A. ARNOLD, 61a, Piccadilly, London.



THERE is not a musical instrument made that can approach the "Orchestral" for beauty of tone, cheapness, and ease of manipulation.

DRAPER'S

ORCHESTRAL ORGANETTE

is a real organ in miniature, containing two full sets of reeds and three stops. Productive of wonderful variations of tone and effect. Can be played at sight.

A CHILD CAN PLAY IT.

PRICE 35/- A Marvel of Cheapness. Can be returned if unsatisfactory. Also supplied for Easy Payments. WORTH £4:4:0

THIS IS FREE!

Everyone can have a copy of our handsome new Catalogue of Organs, Jewellery, Watches, &c., FREE on application.

J. M. DRAPER,
Dept. 103,
Organette Works,
BLACKBURN.

WORLD — TRAVEL

Organised by

HENRY S. LUNN, M.D., F.R.G.S.,

W. HOLDSWORTH LUNN,

AND

CONNOP F. S. PEROWNE.

WINTER CRUISES

On the Magnificent Ocean Yacht "ARGONAUT," Tonnage 3,254, H.P. 4,000. Electric Light. First-class Cuisine.

SAILING AS BELOW TO

Jan. 1st, 1901.—Sardinia, Palermo, Girgenti, Syracuse, Catania, Naples, Capri, Ajaccio, Villefranche, and Marseilles. A 16 days' Cruise for 19 Guineas and upwards (Return Ticket, London to Marseilles included).

Jan. 17th, 1901.—Athens, Palestine, Egypt, and Naples. A 27 days' Cruise for 29 Guineas and upwards (Return Ticket, London to Marseilles included).

£10 10s. & £13 13s. TOURS TO ROME.

Extensions to Naples, Florence, Venice, The Italian Lakes, The Riviera, etc.

£5 15s. 6D., £7 7s., & £10 10s. TOURS TO THE PARIS EXHIBITION.

UNIQUE SKATING AND TOBOGGANING PARTIES TO CHAMONIX AND GRINDELWALD.

A 12 days' holiday for £10 10s.

Full Particulars from the Secretary—5, ENDSLEIGH GARDENS, EUSTON, LONDON, N.W.

Digitized by Google

THE BEST OF GIFT BOOKS.

If you want to make a gift to anyone of the BIGGEST, BEST & BRIGHTEST BOOK OF THE YEAR,

Order VOLUME IV. of

"The Temple Magazine,"

WHICH CAN NOW BE ORDERED FROM ANY BOOKSELLER.

It contains 1,096 pages; has two long Serial Stories which cost Six Shillings each in book form; it has dozens of Short Stories; a hundred bright and instructive Articles; and 500 Illustrations. It is beautifully bound in cloth and is fully indexed.

It is a Volume for the long Winter Evenings. It is for the Home Circle. Not an objec onable word appears from cover to cover.

You can pick it up for an hour and reap instruction; it will also give you entertainment for months.

No bound volume of a magazine is so large or so cheap.

The Price is 7/6.

Should you live in a village and want the Volume at once, send a Postal Order and your address to the Publishers,

Messrs. HORACE MARSHALL & SON,

Temple House, Temple Avenue, LONDON, E.C.

Postage of the Volume, 8d.

Digitized by Google

Chatto & Windus's New Books.

The "Pretty Polly": a Voyage of Incident. By W. CLARK RUSSELL, Author of "The Wreck of the 'Grosvenor,'" &c. With 12 Illustrations by G. E. ROBERTSON. Small demy 8vo., cloth, gilt edges, 5s.

A Sugar Princess. By ALBERT ROSS, Author of "Stranger than Fiction," &c. Crown 8vo., cloth, 3s. 6d.

 1,615,000 copies of ALBERT ROSS'S NOVELS have been sold in America.

The Fourth Generation. By Sir WALTER BESANT, Author of "The Orange Girl," &c. SECOND EDITION. Crown 8vo., cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"An interesting and dramatic story....It arrests the attention, and holds it from first to last."—Daily News.

The Man that Corrupted Hadleyburg, and other Stories and Sketches. By MARK TWAIN. With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo., cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"Only Mark Twain would have conceived the idea of 'The Man that corrupted Hadleyburg,' only he could have developed it with such quaint and dry humour."—Daily Telegraph.

Philip Winwood: A Sketch of the Domestic History of an American Captain in the War of Independence. By ROBERT NEILSON STEPHENS, Author of "An Enemy to the King," &c. With 6 Illustrations by E. W. D. HAMILTON. Crown 8vo., cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"The story is exceedingly well told, and will be read with unflagging interest."—Scotsman.

As Luck would Have it. By WILLIAM WESTALL, Author of "With the Red Eagle," &c. Crown 8vo., cloth, gilt top, 6s.

In a Cathedral City. By BERTHA THOMAS, Author of "The Son of the House." Crown 8vo., cloth, gilt top, 6s.

The Bag of Diamonds, and Three Bits of Paste. By GEORGE MANVILLE FENN, Author of "A Crimson Crime," &c. Crown 8vo., cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"As a Watch in the Night": a Drama of Waking and Dream. By Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED, Author of "Madame Izan," &c. Crown 8vo., cloth, gilt top, 6s.

The Adventures of Tyler Tatlock, Private Detective. Related by DICK DONOVAN, Author of "A Detective's Triumphs." Crown 8vo., cloth, 3s. 6d.

A History of Our Own Times, from 1880 to the Diamond Jubilee. By JUSTIN MCCARTHY, M.P. A NEW EDITION. (Vol. V. uniform with the first four volumes of the CABINET EDITION.) Crown 8vo., cloth, 6s.

London Memories: Social, Historical, and Topographical. By C. W. HECKETHORN, Author of "London Souvenirs," &c. Crown 8vo., cloth, gilt top, 6s.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

TOO STOUT.

I was for years; by chance I came across a simple home remedy that reduced me from 17st. to 10st. 12lb., and I will willingly send particulars free to any sufferer enclosing stamp.

MRS. A. P. FELL, 195, OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.

TO ASTHMA SUFFERERS.

IMMEDIATE RELIEF in all cases of ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, CROUP, and WHOOPING COUGH is gained by the use of

POTTER'S DATURA ASTHMA CURE.

Sold by all Chemists and Herbalists, in Tins at 1s. each. Free Sample sent on receipt of Post Card to POTTER AND CLARKE, Artillery Lane, London, E.

Smooth as Velvet. White as a Lily.

Every one admires soft white hands and smooth skin. These are easily acquired. A little of METCALFE'S BALM OF LILIES rubbed on the skin after washing, and also at bedtime, will speedily remove all roughness and redness from the skin. It possesses marvellous soothing and healing properties. It is the only certain cure for Chapped Hands.

Sold by all chemists, in bottles 1s., 2s., and 4s., or will be sent Post Free, on receipt of P.O. together with 3 penny stamps to cover cost of postage, by the proprietor

F. C. LONG, Pharmacist, Headingley, LEEDS.

TO ADVERTISERS.

All communications respecting Advertisements for this Magazine must be addressed to

MESSRS. H. DAWSON & CO.,

34, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

Delicious, Nutritive, Digestible.

BENGER'S

FOOD FOR INFANTS, INVALIDS, and the AGED.

The LANCET says—

"Mr. Benger's admirable preparation."

The LONDON MEDICAL RECORD says—

"Retained when all other Foods are rejected. It is invaluable."

GOLD MEDAL awarded Health Exhibition, London.

Benger's Food is Sold by Chemists, &c., everywhere.

Digitized by Google

A SMART DRESSING-GOWN.

Tea and dressing-gowns are, of course, a necessity in every wardrobe. We must all own a pretty dressing-gown, and most of us fancy a teagown of more or less elaboration. Certain it is, however, that teagowns are not what they were. They are never seen now worn by the young girl, and even the young matron prefers something with a more juvenile appearance. Dressing-gowns, however, of much elaboration are popular. White would seem to be the prevailing fashion for every dressing-gown of note. The beautiful thick swansdown flannels lead the way, and, from this, we range to white serge, white alpaca, white flannel, and, of course, several kinds of white silk. The fronts of such dressing-gowns are usually elaborated with white chiffon or folds of white Swiss muslin, while revers are frequently added, and these are edged with full frills of lace and bands of lace insertion placed above. Girdles or waistbands are a matter of individual choice, but smartest of all is the soft sash of China silk, knotted under one arm and supplied with very long tasselled ends which reach to the foot hem.

Human nature has much greater genius for sameness than for originality.

THE SPEAKER'S LADY.

The wife of the reigning Speaker has a number of pleasant duties and pleasanter privileges. Among the latter is that of disposing of the pretty little gallery which is situated on the Ministerial side of the Ladies' Gallery. There are always placed those Royal ladies who desire to hear a debate, and here Mrs. Gully and her daughters have spent many an interesting hour, as did Lady Peel and the Misses Peel before them Among the duties of the Speaker's lady is that of holding great receptions, to which all the Parliamentary world, without distinction of Party, is invited, and most hospitably entertained in the splendid reception-rooms which form the most important part of the Speaker's official residence.

WHERE WOMEN ARE PILOTS.

In Norway, Sweden, and Finland, women are frequently employed as sailors, and do their work excellently, and in Denmark several women are employed afloat as State officials, generally in the pilot service. They go far out to sea in their boats and meet the vessels coming into port, and, having nimbly climbed on board and shown their official diploma, they calmly and coolly steer the newcomer into harbour.

THE GAS SELF-LIGHTING CO., LTD.

BY means of this Company's valuable patents, the use of matches or tapers for lighting gas-jets is entirely dispensed with, dispensing also with a bye-pass jet continually alight. (Thus saving the expense.) A great source of danger from fire is thereby removed, and an annnal expense far exceeding the cost of the Self-Lighter is saved.

Send for Price List and full particulars or remit 3/- for sample.

THE SELF-LIGHTER.

A Simple, Effective, Economical Danger Remover.

You turn on the gas and the Self-Lighter ignites it. Invaluable to all Gas Consumers.

THE GAS SELF-LIGHTING CO., LTD., 130, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Telegrams: "SPONGELET," LONDON. Telephone No. 5206 BANK.

Digitized by Google

Gregorian Church and Chapel Organs

"A special word to the Church with limited funds having Cathedral-organ desires."

I have much pleasure in stating my opinion that the Gregorian is in all respects the most perfect instrument of its kind extant.

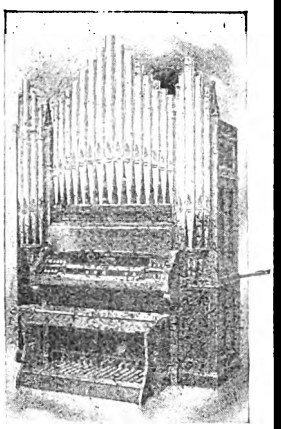
Each stop possesses a distinct individuality of its own, yet, when used in combination with others, they all blend most satisfactorily. The intonation is uniformly good, and the wind is distributed in a manner to insure prompt and perfect "speech" throughout the entire compass of the keyboards under all circumstances—a result never before accomplished in this connection.

The quality and tone is exquisitely pure, and so closely resembles that produced by "flue" pipes as to frequently deceive even the educated ear of an expert; and for this reason the Gregorian is an adequate substitute for a small pipe-organ. This attribute does not, however, detract from its value as a household solo instrument.

Faithfully yours,
FREDERIC ARCHER, Organist.

The Gregorian

system of organ-building enables us to build in compact form and at small cost organs which are veritable reproductions of the cathedral organ. Write us for Catalogue and any information desired regarding the instruments. Even should the outlook for an organ fund not be encouraging, if you need a new organ, write us. Nearly 4,000 Gregorian Organs now in use.



STYLE 22.

The Orchestrelle Company, 225 Regent Street, London, W.

WOMEN MADE BEAUTIFUL

By DIANO. Develops the Bust, fills all hollow places, adds beauty, curve and grace to the shoulders and neck. Charm and attraction to the plainest woman. BEAUTIFUL women everywhere owe their SUPERB FIGURE and matchless loveliness to Diano. Harmless. Permanent. Never Fails. Medical and Private testimonials, and full particulars sealed for stamp.—Address, LADY MANAGER. The C.O. ESPANOLA Co., 2032, Regent Street, London, W.

CONSUMPTION

CONGESTION of the LUNGS,
CHRONIC BRONCHITIS & ASTHMA
COUGHS, COLDS &
INFLUENZA cured by

CONGREVE'S Balsamic ELIXIR

Sold by all Patent Medicine Vendors.
Congreve's Book on Consumption, 6d. or 1s. post free from Coombe Lodge, Peckham, London.

TO ADVERTISERS.

All communications respecting Advertisements for this Magazine must be addressed to

MESSRS. H. DAWSON & CO.,

34, Norfolk Street, Strand,
LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SAC WALKING COAT.

There is no garment that is so dependent for success on the wearer and the manner of wearing as the sac coat. Round shoulders or a flat chest make it at once into a dowdy-looking wrap, however fine its material or smart its make. A slouching carriage has the same effect. The one shown in our sketch is made of mastic cloth, with collar and cuffs in dark blue velvet, the edge of which is strapped with the cloth and trimmed with black and gold cord. The coat is lined with blue and amber tartan silk.

DR. LIVINGSTONE'S CENTENARIAN COUSIN.

Mrs. MacQueeny, better known as Kate Livingstone, a cousin of the celebrated Dr. Livingstone, has now entered upon her one hundred and fourth year. She lives at Salon, Mull. Though afflicted now with deafness, and her memory to a considerable extent gone, she is in fairly good health. Dr. Livingstone invariably, on visiting Mull, called to see her or sent for her to visit him She still exhibits with pride a handsome silver brooch with her name inscribed on it with which the distinguished traveller presented her.

WIVES OF POLITICIANS.

It has been said that the wives of great politicians have chanced to be the happiest of women. Everybody knows that the unions of Lord and Lady Salisbury and Lord and Lady Beaconsfield were ideal ones; that Mr. and Mrs. Gladstone were inseparable, and Sir William and Lady Harcourt are never happy apart. One could quote a number of other instances where the older politicians and their wives were concerned. The reason, if any, is this. That women in their hearts worship a big man, and a great politician who has greatly succeeded must of necessity be a great man.

WOMEN DOCTORS IN CHINA.

A writer in a German paper gives an interesting account of European and American lady doctors in China and their work The Société des Missionaires de la Femme, he says, employes five European female doctors in its hospitals and six Chinese nurses. He reckons the total number of European and American women doctors and surgeons in China to be not less than a hundred. In Tientsin there are two lady physicians from Chicago, two from Canada and one from London. Only one Chinese lady has studied medical science and practice after the Western manner.

Christ's College,

BLACKHEATH, S.E.

PRINCIPAL—

F. W. AVELING, M.A., B.Sc.

Home Comforts.
Public School Training.
Practical Science Teaching.
Five Laboratories.

Digitized by Google

TURKISH BATHS AT HOME.

A Turkish or Vapour Bath opens out seven million pores at once. From every pore flows a tiny stream of impurity. So powerful is the effect that a single bath has removed the poison of a snake bite—poison enough to kill. Vaccination will not work if you open the pores for fifteen minutes to let the virus out. This is the method used in every sanitarium to purify impure blood. The quick, powerful, certain way to remove all impurities is by forcing them out through the pores. Every physician in the world will commend this.

Add to this the luxury, the comforting, sleep-bringing, vim-producing qualities. Add cleanliness and clearness of complexion. Add their service in stopping all colds at once. The pleasure of life may be doubled and sickness reduced more than half by the habit of Turkish Bathing.

With the CENTURY THERMAL IMPROVED (Self-purifying, Folding) BATH CABINET you can take Hot-air Vapour and Medicated Baths at home even better than in Turkish Bath Rooms. You save breathing hot air; save exposure to cold air afterward; save inconvenience, time and expense. The cost is three halfpence per bath.

PRICE, complete with Spirit Heater and Vaporizer,
25/- to 70/-
FREE—35 Formulas for Medicated Baths.

The CENTURY CABINET is made of Hygienic Waterproof Cloth over a steel frame. Folds into 2 in. space. Weighs with Spirit Stove less than 20 lbs. Is set up, HEATED and ready for use in five minutes. THE FACE STEAMER gives the face the same vapour treatment as the body. Clears the skin of pimples and blotches, leaving it clean and soft as velvet. Invaluable for the successful treatment of Asthma.

AGENTS WANTED. Exclusive Rights.

FREE SAMPLE OF GOODS AND VALUABLE BOOK, "HEALTH, STRENGTH, HYGIENE." and others, with medical testimonials. WRITE TO-DAY.

L.P., CENTURY THERMAL BATH CABINET, Ltd.,
Dept. 71, 203 & 205, REGENT STREET, LONDON, W. [Mention TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

The New Story for ADULTS

BY AMY LE FEUVRE,

AUTHOR OF

"PROBABLE SONS," "LEGEND LED,"
"TEDDY'S BUTTON," &c., &c.,

BEGINS IN THE

SUNDAY AT HOME

FOR NOVEMBER (NOW READY), 6d.

New Readers should begin NOW.

Published by the RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY (Incorporated), and SOLD BY ALL MAGAZINE DEALERS.

Digitized by Google

USEFUL FICHU.

For small country gatherings and every-night-at-home wear there is no doubt that the fichu is the most useful of all other possessions. This, partly, because any girl who is clever with her fingers can arrange such fichus at home. They may be made of gauze, chiffon, mousseline, or spotted tulle, as we will, while they may be frilled at the edge with the same kind of material, or a deep frill of sufficiently good lace may be added instead. Quite the most useful evening dress can be enhanced by such an addition, or even a blouse bodice turned in at the throat, and draped with one of these etceteras, and made into quite a presentable evening gown, as occasion demands. Then, again, for matron's wear these fichus own every possible advantage. They form, too, a most charming gift, and one that can be made with very little outlay. Nowadays, when we have such enormous overcharges on our luggage to consider, the possession of one or more fichus of the kind should prove a meritorious economy.

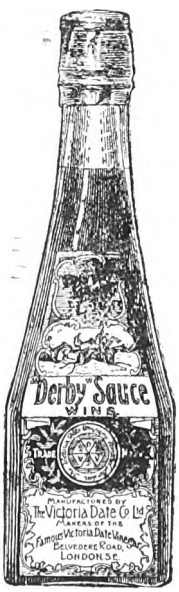
A statue to Rosa Bonheur has been erected at Fontainebleau. The famous French artist had a studio at By, near Fontainebleau, for many years, and there she worked at her marvellous pictures, always in male attire. The statue is life-size, and represents her in her ordinary working dress of a smock and trousers.

Derby Sauce



For Table and Cooking purposes is a preparation which renders the plainest fare highly palatable.

As a flavouring for Soups, or used with fish, flesh, or fowl, it is unequalled.

There is only one Derby Sauce.

It is sold by most Stores, Grocers, and Oilmen, but if you cannot obtain it we will send it to you post free on receipt of Eight Penny Stamps.

S. Gulliver & Co., Ltd.
(Sole proprietors of the Victoria Date Co.),
7, Argyll Street, Oxford Circus, W.

VINDAYT, the New Vinegar, is acknowledged by Connoisseurs to be superior to all others for Pickling and Household Purposes. We will send you a Sample Bottle post-free on receipt of Five Penny Stamps. Awarded 50 Gold Medals.

GOOD NEWS FOR THE DEAF.

ORCHARD'S
Cure for Deafness.

HAS CURED HUNDREDS.
SAFE AND HARMLESS.

A Characteristic Testimonial.

"NOW I CAN HEAR THE BIRDS SING."

SIR,—Your "CURE FOR DEAFNESS" has been worth a sovereign to me. I could not hear the Church Bells ring when in bed, and now I can hear the birds sing; and return many thanks.
Marlborough. G. T. BERNARD.

1s. 1½d. per Bottle;
or Post-free Fourteen Stamps.

EDWIN J. ORCHARD,
Chemist,
SALISBURY.

Digitized by Google

FREE

ON receipt of two Penny Stamps to cover cost of postage and bag we will send you, post-free, a Sample of the celebrated LILROSA COFFEE.

This Coffee has justly gained a great reputation owing to its excellent flavour and absolute purity. It contains no added matter whatever. It is simply the pure Coffee bean carefully selected by experts and every sample tested before purchase.

LILROSA COFFEE is sold ground and packed in half-pound tins at 1/4 per lb., or the whole bean can be obtained in five-pound Cotton Bags. Carriage is paid on all parcels of five pounds or more.

THE LILROSA COFFEE,

101, Leadenhall Street, E.C.

Profitable Business.

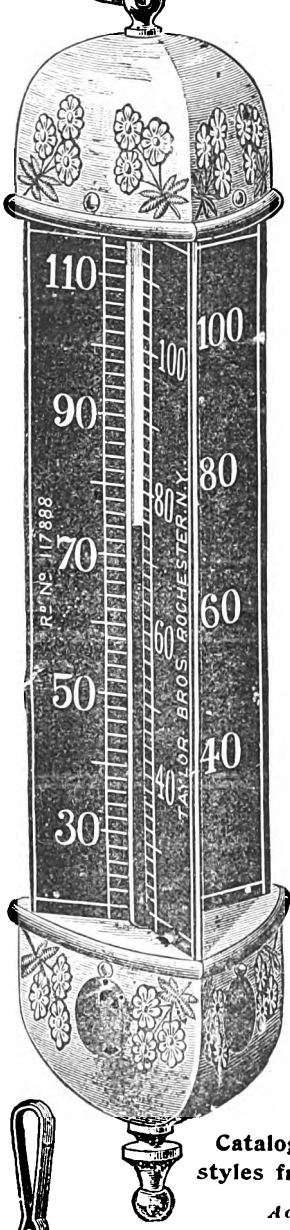
This is what we all want.
You are probably making a good income, but you would like to make a better one.
How are you going to do it?
Can you answer this question? If not, may we help you?
We are business experts.
We know how to make any genuine article sell well.
It is no use having a really good article unless you can make the public realise that it is good, and want to buy it.
You can only do this by means of advertising.
Advertising has made many fortunes. It will make one for you if you handle it judiciously.
Many of our clients are now making thousands a year from an article which was unheard of a few years ago.
We helped them to do this, and we can help you in the same way.
Nothing is too large or too small for us to handle.
All you have to do is to write us a letter stating what your business is, and we will help you.
Our advice only costs a penny postage stamp, and it may lead you on to a fortune.
It is worth trying.

H. DAWSON & CO.,

34, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A Taylor RADIAL . . SCALE Thermometer



A Most Appropiate

CHRISTMAS, WEDDING, OR BIRTHDAY PRESENT.

Can be suspended from chandelier or bracket and read from any part of the room.

Artistic in design, beautiful in finish, accurate in registration

From dealers generally, or sent securely packed, postpaid, on receipt of

7/6

Catalogue of many styles free by post.

Address:

Taylor Brothers Company.

Dept T.,
103, Hatton Garden, London, E.C.

HOUSE GOWN.

Grey is a shade which is never out of date. Indeed, many folks insist upon ordering a grey frock of more or less worth every year. There is a lovely shade of pigeon grey, which goes particularly well with cherry-coloured red, and the sketch shows a French model charmingly carried out for an afternoon frock in grey voile, piped right the way down the skirt and bodice, with an infinitesimal line of cherry-red. The yokepiece of the bodice is arranged with the same pipings, but set across the figure, while the upper part of the sleeve is carried out en suite. This charming frock is lined throughout with red silk, while the feature of the whole is without doubt the dainty frills of écru-coloured lace, which commence some 12in. above the first hem, and cascade from thence to the ground. The same kind of gown could be most effectively carried out in black, piped with white, or, indeed, for smarter occasions, in white, piped with black.

The constant duty of every man to his fellows is to ascertain his own powers and special gifts, and to strengthen them for the help of others.—RUSKIN.

Digitized by Google

Never Fails.

Established
26 YEARS.

Have you a Cough?
A DOSE WILL RELIEVE IT.
Have you a Cold?
A DOSE at BEDTIME WILL REMOVE IT.

WHEN YOU ASK FOR

Owbridge's Lung Tonic

BE SURE YOU GET IT.

Try it also for
Bronchitis, Whooping-Cough,
Asthma, Consumption.

Prepared by
W. T. OWBRIDGE, Chemist, Hull.
Sold everywhere
in bottles, at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s.

COPYRIGHT.

Now Ready, the 2nd Edition of the UNIVERSAL STANDARD CATALOGUE OF THE POSTAGE STAMPS OF THE WORLD.

Entirely re-written, and prices revised up to date. Gives the market value of every stamp issued to August, 1900, including the new stamps for Orange River Colony and Transvaal, also Mafeking Siege Stamps. Thousands of Illustrations. Latest, cheapest, and most reliable.

Price 1/3, post free.

Interleaved Edition, cloth gilt, 2/6, post free,

Fifty-two page Price List of packets and sets of Stamps, Stamp Albums, and every requisite for stamp collectors, sent gratis on receipt of 1d. for postage.

WHITFIELD KING & CO., IPSWICH.
(ESTABLISHED 31 YEARS.)

ASTHMA

WHY is it generally thought that there is no Cure for ASTHMA,
CHRONIC BRONCHITIS,
SHORTNESS OF BREATH,
BLOOD SPITTING, &c. ?

BECAUSE the usual treatments only confine themselves to combating single symptoms instead of attacking the root of the disease.

BE SURE THERE IS ONE

ABSOLUTE LASTING CURE

SUFFERERS WILL RECEIVE, POST FREE,
FREE OF CHARGE,
Particulars of the famous WEIDHAAS HOME TREATMENT when applying to the Paul Weidhaas Pulmonary Institute, 16, T.M., Buckingham Road, Brighton.

Mr. Weidhaas has tried the Treatment on himself, after having been given up as incurable, and cured himself, and had then practised it for over nineteen years in many thousands of special cases. Many having suffered for over forty years have been cured by his treatment (in some instances even at the age of seventy or eighty years), after having been GIVEN UP AS INCURABLE.

No interference with daily occupation. Send description of complaint, and mention if you suffer from COLD FEET. Read the following testimonial, one out of scores received.

Consumption and Hæmorrhage of the Lungs Cured.

MRS. ARNOLD
(From a Photo.)

I suffered for several years with Consumption, and the doctors gave me up, and told me the only cure would be to go abroad. I lost a half-pint of blood a day. I could only walk across the room with difficulty. Also, I suffered with a dry cough and night sweats, and whenever I attempted to do anything I had a fearful pain in my left side. In September, 1897, I was given up. I didn't know what it was to enjoy a good meal. My food did not seem to do me any good. I made up my mind to try your cure, just at the time I was at my worst. After trying your treatment I began to improve; my cough ceased, and I did not suffer from the night sweats, and have not had a return of the bleeding of the lungs for over 12 months. Now I can walk a considerable distance without feeling the least fatigue. I don't think I can thank you enough for your marvellous treatment, to which I owe my entire cure.

Mrs. ARNOLD, Polegate.
(Full address on application.)

The DIRECTOR is prepared to pay £1,000 to any Charitable Institution if the above is not a genuine extract from the patient's own letter. The original may be seen at THE PAUL WEIDHAAS HYGIENIC INSTITUTE by any bona-fide inquirer.

CURABLE

BROOME'S MUSIC.

SEE THAT THE NAME "BROOME" IS ON EVERY COPY.

*938 For Liberty, March. Fabian Scott.
948 Star of My Heart, Marie (Song). Theo. Bonheur.
*956 Imperial Volunteers, March.
981 A River Lullaby (Pianoforte Solo).
982 Worthwhile (Song). A. E. Berridge.
983 Soreta, Spanish Waltz. A. E. Wilson.
984 Twilight Memories. Morceau de Salon.
985 Old Exeter March. Henry Martin Guest.
986 Whistling Darkies, Barn Dance.
*987 Night Attack. Fabian Scott.
*988 The Departure of a Troopship. Fabian Scott.
*992 Ladysmith March. Fabian Scott.
*993 Kimberley March. Fabian Scott.
*994 Mafeking March. Fabian Scott.

*WAR NUMBERS, 2D. EACH.

*995 Bloemfontein March. Fabian Scott.
*996 Pretoria March. Fabian Scott.
*997 Relief March. Fabian Scott.
1005 On Moonlit Seas, Barcarolle. Fabian Scott.
1006 Go, Forget Me (Song). A. E Berridge.
1007 'Neath the Cloisters, Recessional March.
1008 Asiana, an Oriental Danse. Fabian Scott.
1009 Pigtail Polka.
*1010 When the Boys Come Marching Home, March. Theo. Bonheur.
*1017 Chinese March. Ezra Read.
*1018 Pekin, Chinese Carnival. Ezra Read.
*955-4-5 Going to Table Bay. (Descriptive Fantasia on the War.) By Alan Macey. Post Free, 7d.

W. H. BROOME, 15, HOLBORN, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

PLEATED DRESS.

The smart dress shown in the sketch is made of cloth in the shade of mauve known as automobile. Both bodice and skirt are pleated, but the pleats of the latter commence only where the basque of the bodice ends, in this way preserving as much as possible the slimness of the figure below the waist. The illustration shows where the pleats on the skirt are released from the stitches that fasten them down. A close vandyke trimming of narrow gold cord appears upon the two front pleats. The collar and yoke are white satin, trimmed with gold cord. The cuffs are trimmed with cord to match. The tendency of the hour is to give undue prominence to the front of the bodice. This is the chief fault of the fashion at present, with the overlong skirt. Sleeves, too, incline to be uncomfortably tight, and it is often difficult to persuade a dressmaker to give the arm sufficient room in its covering. The effect of a too-tight sleeve is to give a wooden look to the arm which is far from artistic. We do not seem to be able to wholly reconcile ourselves to the plain sleeve. On many of the new dresses there is a shoulder trimming of some kind. However slight it may be, it serves to break the line. It will be noticed that in the walking dress illustrated this relief takes the form of some vandyked rows of gold cord. Often it is introduced in tucks of the material of which the gown is made. Of this a very small and unobtrusive epaulette is made which stands out very slightly beyond the line of the sleeve itself. Guipure is used in the same way, but never unless it is also introduced on some other part of the bodice. Chiffon, again, is very useful for epaulettes, matched to the colour of the gown, and either tucked or pleated.

Idleness travels so slowly that poverty soon overtakes it.

NOTICE TO OUR READERS.

We call our readers' attention to the advertisement, which appears on another page, of Volume IV. of the Temple Magazine. This volume forms an admirable gift book for the Christmas season. It contains two complete serial stories, "The Shadow of Gilsland," by Morice Gerard, and "His Grace," by Mrs. C. N. Williamson. There are 500 illustrations in the volume. It is beautifully bound in cloth and is fully indexed. Those of our readers who do not live near a bookseller's should apply at once to the Publishers, Messrs. Horace Marshall and Co., Temple House, Temple Avenue, London, E.C. The price is 7s. 6d., and the postage 8d.

Our Christmas Number will be ready on November 24th. It will have a special cover, and the contents will be of an unusually attractive character. Miss Mary Angela Dickens, Miss Winifred Graham, and Miss Mary Wilkins will each contribute a Christmas story to the Number. Among other features will be a racy article by the Rev. E. J. Hardy, Chaplain to Her Majesty's Forces, entitled, "Mr. Thomas Atkins in War Time;" an interesting sketch, "The Toy Shop of the World," by Mr. J. A. Hammerton; "The Pilgrim Fathers' First Christmas," by Dr. Everett Hale; "How to Give a Christmas Party," by Lucie H. Armstrong, and "A Message for the New Century," by Ian Maclaren. The price will be, as usual, 6d. Orders should be placed early with your newsagent.

Digitized by Google

Re-issue in Fourteen Fortnightly Parts.

PRICE SIXPENCE EACH.

The Most Interesting PICTORIAL FAMILY BIBLE ever issued in any Country or in any Language.

. . THE . .

ART BIBLE,

COMPRISING

The Authorised Version of the OLD AND NEW TESTAMENTS.

1,360 Pages, embellished with 850 Splendid Illustrations (many of them full-page), which include selections from the Masterpieces of Old and Modern Artists.

PART I. NOW READY.

GEORGE NEWNES, LTD., 7—12, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

The "Osman" Turkish Towels and Bath Mats.

OF ALL DRAPERS.

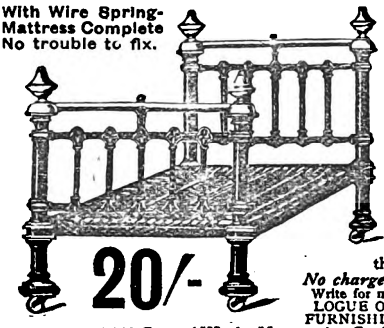
Made by

BARLOW & JONES, Limited,

Manchester, London, & Bolton.

The 'Newmarket' Bedstead.

With Wire Spring-Mattress Complete No trouble to fix.



20/-

6ft. by 6ft. 6in. rin. Pillars. Brass Mounts, Brass Knobs, Strong and well finished. Gold decoration. Cheapest and best Bedstead ever offered

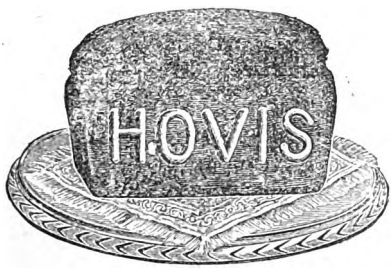
20/-

With Wool Overlay Mattress, Bolster, and Pillow, the lot for 30/-

No charge for Packing. Write for my NEW CATALOGUE OF COMPLETE FURNISHING. Post Free.

ARTHUR DALE, Central Works, Newmarket St., Birmingham.

The very nicest and most Digestive of all Breads.



Most family bakers bake and deliver it daily everywhere.

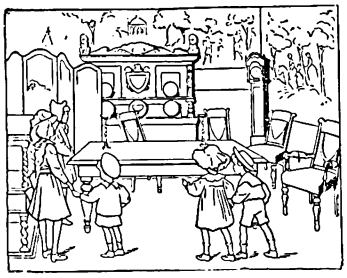
Trade—HOVIS—Mark.

Agents' Addresses are sent on application to HOVIS, Ltd., Macclesfield.

Digitized by Google

A REVOLUTION IN FURNISHING

BY MONTHLY PAYMENTS.



LADY'S PICTORIAL:—

"The system, in a word, has found such favour that not only has the business increased as though by magic—a large guaranteed percentage being amongst former customers and friends recommended by them, but even TRUTH, a critic never content to commend without good reason, has expressed its approval of the Company's instalment and insurance system."

N.B.—Cash Buyers are also given a Free Life Insurance Policy (for 2 years) equal to the amount they have spent.

NORMAN & STACEY,

LIMITED,

118, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C.

Moderate Prices.

Free delivery Town or Country. Call and view Stock before Furnishing locally.

You should use the best in Fountain Pens only; the highest speed and finest work necessitate the best, which is

The Waterman Ideal Fountain Pen.

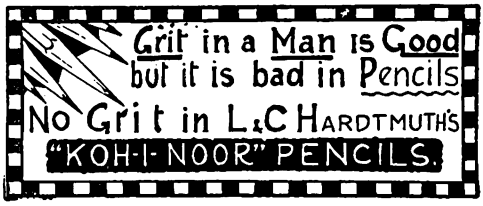
Has by far the largest sale in America, which is the Home of Fountain Pens, and has received the Highest Awards possible wherever exhibited, including Gold Medal at Paris Exhibition,

We have an exquisitely printed Brochure telling all about this Pen: It is yours for the asking! Mention this Journal.

Prices: 10/6, 15/-, 17/6, 21/-, and upwards.

Of Dealers generally.

L. & C. HARDTMUTH, 12, Golden Lane, London, E.C.

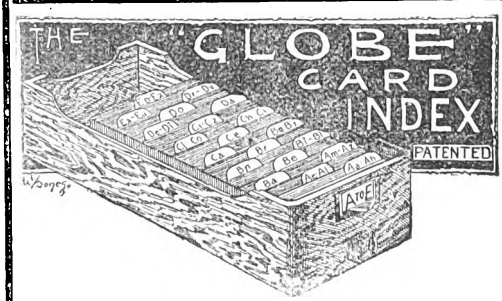


Hair Destroyed.

Send me an envelope (stamped and addressed) and I will tell you how to remove all superfluous hair free of charge. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Miss B. O. (Room 3), 105, Oxford Street, London, W.

THOS. TURNER, LTD. (Leicester),

44, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.



Will make a poor business good—a good business better. The Globe Card Index reduces guesses to facts — estimates to certainties. Profits increased! Expenses and trouble decreased!! Call to have system explained, or if you cannot call send for Illustrated Explanatory No. 92 Catalogue, free to Readers of "Temple Magazine."

Also at 23, Snow Hill, Birmingham, and Leicester.

PIANOS.

It is difficult to find a Piano that will keep in tune under the strain of ordinary wear and tear. This is because the sound board gives way. A sound board is convex in shape; the strain of the wires causes it to buckle.

By the introduction of our Guy Cord Sounding Board, we prevent this. Our pianos consequently keep in tune, and retain their tone longer than any other pianos in the world.

We shall be glad to send you details and full information in regard to this patent, which can be fitted to any piano, on hearing from you.

T. H. RUSHTON, 34, Cleethorpe Road, GRIMSBY.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS FOR NOVEMBER, 1900.

			PAGE
I.	Home from the Wars	Frontispiece
II.	Little Hallelujah's Convert: A Western Railroad Story Illustrated.	Alvah Milton Kerr.	95
III.	Albert Edward, Millionaire: The Prince of Wales and His Money	Arthur Mee	106
IV.	The Return of Jean Illustrated by E. A. Pike.	George P. Moon	111
V.	The Royal Caledonians Illustrated.	Katherine Carson	119
VI.	A Highland Communion	J. Macleay	127
VII.	Model Villages Illustrated.	George A. Wade	131
VIII.	A Bolt from the Blue. Serial Story. Chapters V.-VIII. Illustrated by Chas. D. Ward.	Dora Langlois	137
IX.	The Mission to Lepers in India and the Far East Illustrated.	Stephen Stapleton	154
X.	The Palace of the Angels Illustrated.	J. A. Hammerton	161
XI.	Some Famous Lady Farmers Illustrated.	Mrs. D. A. Fletcher	169
XII.	Part of the Problem Illustrated.	Oswald Chambers	173
XIII.	In the Public Eye Illustrated.	The Onlooker	176
XIV.	For the Bairns	Rev. J. Reid Howatt	183

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE will be sent by post each month, to any address, for an Annual Subscription of 8*s. Binding Cases can be purchased from the Publishers for* 1*s.* 6*d.*

All manuscripts and drawings must be accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes, or the Editor cannot promise their return. They must be addressed, THE EDITOR, WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, CARMELITE-STREET, E.C.

Contributions accepted for "In the Public Eye," are paid for at the uniform rate of 5/- per paragraph including portrait. All photographs, which must be non-copyright, are returned.

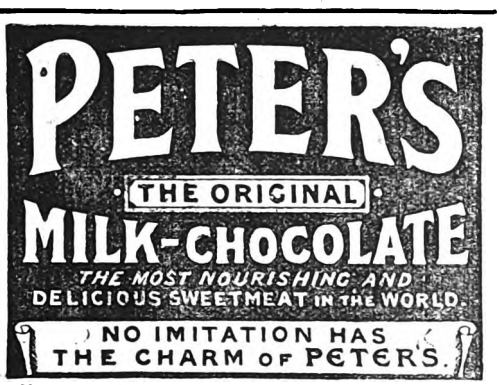
Business Communications and Orders must be sent to MESSRS. HORACE MARSHALL AND SON, TEMPLE HOUSE, TEMPLE AVENUE, E.C.

Letters relating to Advertisements must be addressed to MESSRS. H. DAWSON AND CO., 34, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, W.C.



6d. Tablets and 6d. & 1s. Croquettes. Sold Everywhere.
Sole Agents (trade only) -
S. J. MACKENZIE & CO., Ltd., Wellclose Square, London

Digitized by Google

The NOVEMBER PART of

THE QUIVER,

*Which inaugurates the 40th Year of this World-Famous Magazine, is Now Ready, price 6d.

A New and Striking Design has been prepared for the Cover, and among the Special Features of this issue are:—

An Exquisite Rembrandt Photogravure of the beautiful Painting by ALF. U. SOORD, exhibited in this year's Royal Academy, entitled "The Lost Sheep."

Christ, the Teacher. By the Right Rev. the LORD BISHOP OF RIPON.

The Furnace for Gold. A New Serial Story. By JOHN K. LEYS.

A Master of Sacred Song: A Conversation with Mr. Ira D. Sankey. By F. M. HOLMES.

Buildings Built from Books.

The Strange Delay. By the REV. MARK GUY PEARSE.

The Maker of Headville. New Serial Story. By M. BRADFORD WHITING.

The Little Rascal. Complete Story. By K. E. VERNHAM.

Things that Happened on a Sunday.

The New Canon. By AGNES GIBERNE.

The Missionary Martyrs of the Nineteenth Century. By the REV. A. R. BUCKLAND, M.A.

N.B.—A VALUABLE ILLUSTRATED BIBLE DICTIONARY will be placed within reach of every Reader of THE QUIVER at a Nominal charge. The First Coupon entitling Subscribers to obtain the work appears in the November Part.

NOTICE.—In place of the separate Christmas Annual of THE QUIVER which has hitherto been issued, there will be published this year a on November 26th, price 1s. (being the December Part and CHRISTMAS NUMBER combined), which will not only form a record issue, but will far ECLIPSE IN IMPORTANCE, BEAUTY, AND VALUE any Number of THE QUIVER which has ever been published. Further particulars of this extraordinary Number will be duly announced.

Grand Double Number of THE QUIVER

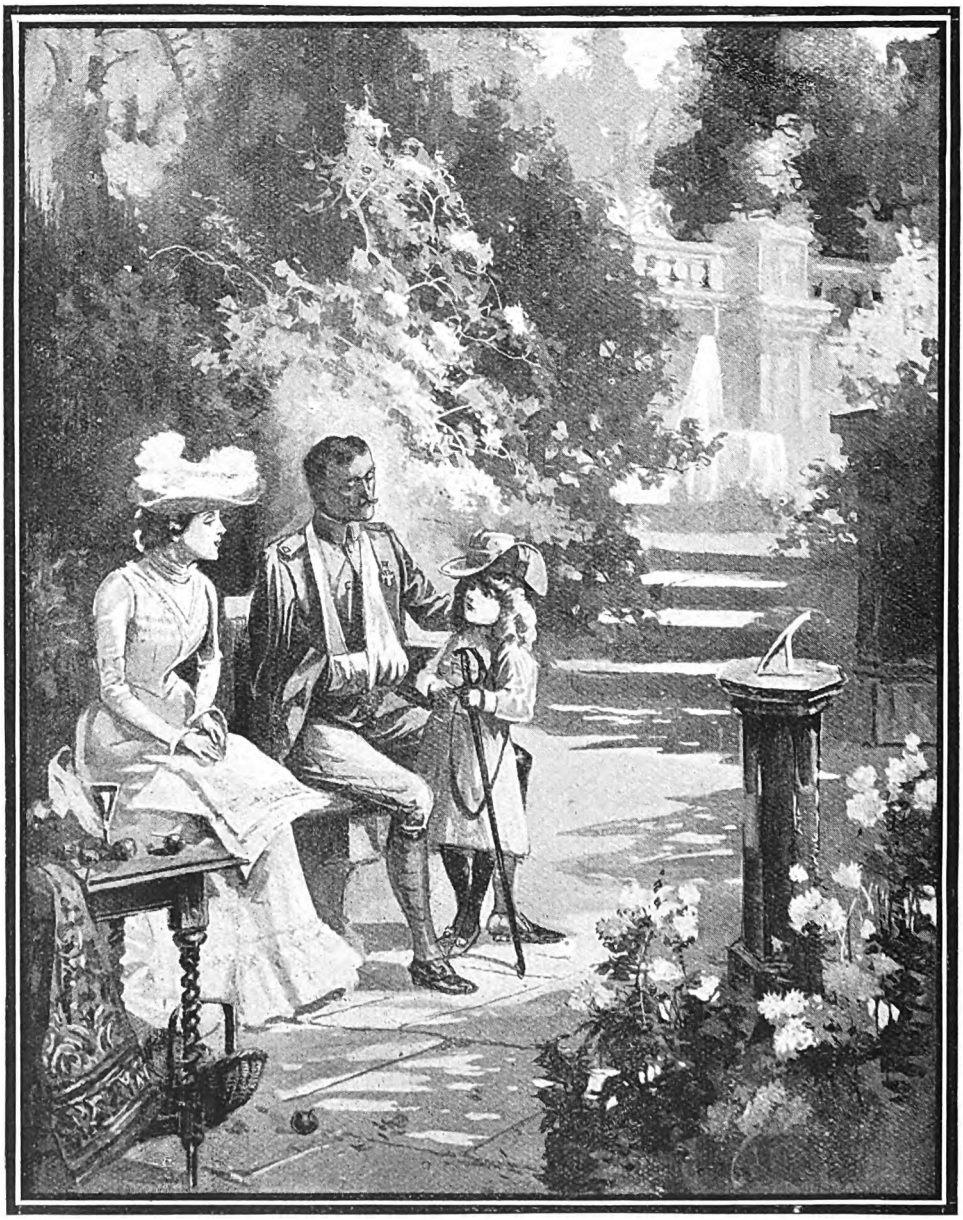
CASSELL AND COMPANY, LIMITED, LONDON; and all Booksellers.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google



HOME FROM THE WARS.

Digitized by Google

Little Hallelujah's Convert.

A WESTERN RAILROAD STORY.*

By ALVAH MILTON KERR,

Author of "The Luck of the Northern Mail," "In Front of the Stampede," and other Stories.

THEN there was "old" Barrett, train-master, who held that when an engineer had once gone, unkilled, through a head-end collision, he was never so much a man of courage afterward. Perhaps the grumpy old chief's contention was grounded on fact, for what man, having faced such monstrous peril, could be quite the same again? But Nat Shandon's deed at Muley Fork gave Barrett's theory a refutation so marked that I, for one, never heard the "old man" "chew" that argument more. Doubtless Barrett would have felt the contradiction less had he liked the young engineer better, for Shandon was a bit hard of control—so fond of fast running indeed, that Barrett had threatened to discharge him more than once.

It was Shandon, you know, who brought the Star Route its first fame for quick service by driving the 407, hooked to Governor Graham's special, across the State in two hours and forty minutes. The hostler ran the engine into the house, when the hot clip was finished, with her frame cracked and her driver flanges whittled to knife blades. Barrett was * Copyrighted in the United States by S. S. McClure Co.

Digitized by Google

wroth, being gray and conservative ; but Superintendent Joy, younger, and of the new school of haste, slapped Shandon on the back, and praised him. He was getting in some new passenger engines, Baldwin compounds with seven - foot drivers, he said, and Shandon would be expected to see what sort of speed lay in the first one that should arrive. That one proved to be the famous 990. Shandon liked the idea immeasurably, but approved it quietly. He would do his best, he said.

"Of course, you are not to press her too hard," said Joy, with a grain of misgiving, "but I think you can make the record of the 407 without injuring the engine. The directors are expecting us to shorten the card here on the mountain end of the route ; business has been going round by the Southern rather heavy of late."

Prior to the Governor Graham run, Shandon had "snapped" a dinky caboose from the tail of a wild stock-train on the eastern division, taking the string down a grade and around a curve so fast that the little caboose flew the track, turned over, and skated across a frozen creek, injuring several people. Shandon was charged with being reckless from drink, but investigation failed to make the accusation stick.

Shandon, too, had met the monster face to face, that dementing thing which Barrett averred made cowards of engineers. It was he who sat on the right-hand side of the cab of the old 200, going up Angel Pass, when Jerry Burns came down with the big 722, and piled the gulch with ruin. Jerry was not at fault, for he couldn't hold seventeen cars of steel rails on a slippery mountain track when something was wrong with the brakes. Jerry and the fireman of the colliding engines jumped, with natural and calamitous results ; but Shandon stuck, and saw the supreme vision.

It was only for a moment, but little more than a glimpse, then he was having a voyage in air, with a disagreeable notion that he was making the passage in sections. At the end of the journey he found himself pasted against a creek bank fifty feet away, broken of limb and unpleasantly lacerated. Three months of hospital life made him good as new—so he declared—while Barrett declared the "newness" would be found in his lack of grit, that the wild moment of the colliding of engines would prove to have been an end of matters for Shandon, at least as respected courageous running. But, remember, it was afterward that Shandon made the Governor Graham run, and later he did the deed at Muley Fork, which, after all, is the real story.

Shandon was a large man, or, perhaps, to put it more precisely, a big boy. Even such gravity as seems natural to one approaching life's thirtieth year was rarely his. When his hand was on the throttle and the machine was going fast, he was sometimes sober and looked his age ; but for the most part he was "cutting up," almost disagreeably exuberant, indeed, especially when he came into the despatcher's office, as he sometimes did, and literally stampeded us with his pranks. At times he was rough as a grizzly, after he had indulged in a cup too much of that which he designated as "most elegant booze." But he had a great heart, a prodigal benevolence of nature that kept him always looking for the pay-car, and a fearlessness of railroad officials which, to men who suffered the normal trepidation of beings who might at any moment lose their "jobs," was fairly appalling. As I remember him, he stood something more than six feet in flat-heeled shoes, was powerfully fashioned in body and limb, slightly stooped in the shoulders, with head and face nearly handsome, but almost too small for his frame, and medium-sized gray eyes that looked square into the eyes of other people and danced with bantering smiles.

Barrett could not understand him, and on that account, and for the more prickly reason that he could force no sign of subserviency from the man, disliked him. But Joy, who was of larger nature, liked him unreasonably. At least, we despatchers thought so by the time he had pushed Shandon, over Barrett's protests, to the best passenger run on the line. But the affair at Muley Fork settled it all.

Life in Round Hill, the division station, was not a dry thing, save for higher social functions. There it was arid quite, kid-gloved affairs and full-dress occasions being nearly unknown. Still, it was lively. Nearly every one was active, and the building and repairing of cars, the overhauling of engines, the constant despatching and returning of trains, and all that goes to make a pulse-point on a great transportation artery, are things of unabating interest. These we had in plethora.

Digitized by Google

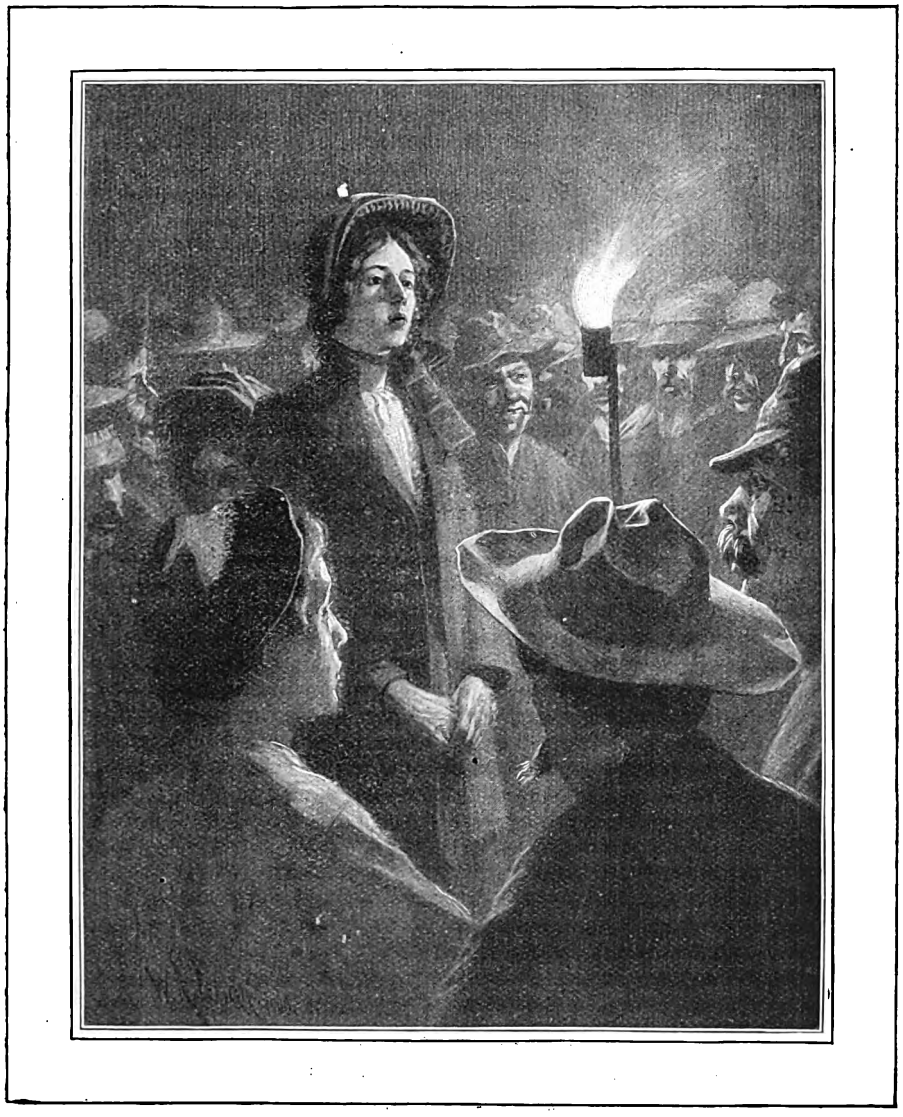
Round Hill, too, was a "wet" town, for what town beyond the line of the Rockies could hope to excite the envy of its rivals, unless its saloons outnumbered its stores? The place was wicked, not with the brutal abandon of the mining camp, but chiefly in the way of recreation. The men, largely denied, by the exactions of their trade, the restraints of the church, and the refining niceties of polite life, "broke loose" occasionally, being human. Perhaps it was for this reason, or because it was agreed that an aggregation of Western railroad men could perforce not be else than in need of grace, that the drums and tambourines of the Salvation Army startled its Main Street habitués one February evening. The "Hallelujah People" had arrived.



WITH LIFTED EYES . . . SHE BEGAN TO TELL THE STORY OF THE CRUCIFIED AND RISEN LOVER OF ALL LIFE.

To the eye and ear of the Round Hill populace the spectacle was not at all religious, but, on the contrary, distinctly worldly, even ridiculous. They did not then know, what most of the world has since learned, that back of the noise and "circus" methods of this Army of Love lay a mighty, benignant purpose for the uplifting of the weak and fallen among mankind. Hence Round Hill laughed, the saloon keepers especially, but later these last showed their teeth in different fashion.

Digitized by Google

Nat Shandon was passing, on his way to his engine, that first evening, and paused a moment to see what was going on. Three persons, fronting a crowded sidewalk, were singing in gleeful fashion. Two of the singers were girls, and each of these rattled a tambourine. The third was a middle-aged man, clean-shaven and happy-looking, but with the tracery of outlived dissipation thick upon his face. At times he beat a bass drum with force and unction. Each was habited in the uniform of the Salvation order.

Shandon's initial impression was that street fakirs were selling Wizard Oil, Herbs of Wonder, or something after that sort, and he began cracking jokes as he laughingly looked over the heads of the crowd toward the singers. Even when the three strangers knelt, and the man's voice rose in prayer, the crowd, and Shandon as well, continued to laugh and jest. But a moment later one of the girls stepped upon a box at the edge of the sidewalk, and looked round on the torch-lit faces of the curious concourse. Instantly Shandon was a serious man.

The young woman was small, and had a brown look, a face thin, faintly olive in tone, delicately featured, with big, dark, sorrowful eyes that dominated the countenance. As she looked down on the faces of the crowd a little smile ran about her lips, an engaging, yet pathetic gleam of appeal which somehow mingled friendship and pity curiously. Shandon felt the look and the spirit of the face enter him as something that passes to the heart of matter and leaves no sign or wound. He drew in a deep breath, glanced up at the clear stars overhead, dropped his eyes to the crowd, and made a movement as if to go. His world had suddenly changed. Then he turned toward the face again. "Shut up!" he said to a noisy fellow at his elbow, unconsciously ending the gruff command with an oath.

The girl was speaking. Shandon listened a moment, then pushed on round the crowd and in nearer the speaker. Her voice was thready from hoarseness, yet sweet with sympathy and tenderness. She was telling why they had come among the people of Round Hill, of the work of love they hoped to do, of the friendship and help they craved. Then, with lifted eyes, she began to tell the story of the crucified and risen Lover of all life. Rapturously, with ineffable appreciation in look and tone, she told of His compassion and the uplifting, saving power that came to men from loving Him. She told it, not as priest or preacher might, but as only a delicate girl could, with a subtlety of feeling and a spiritual intuition impossible with men.

Many in the crowd grew quiet, others continued stirring about, scraping such merriment as they could from the odd situation. Shandon listened, looking at the girl with level, earnest eyes. Old as was the story, he felt it as something almost new, the beautiful resurrection of a tale worn well-nigh threadbare and meaningless in his childhood years. Still to Shandon the personality of the speaker was far more than the story. Her delicate form in plain brown; her pathetic, tender face, in its frame of black bonnet and dark ribbons, tied under the chin, sent something like a cry of pity through his great frame. He had felt the charm of more than one woman, but it had never been as with this one. Why should she subject herself to such publicity? Why should brutal people be permitted to jeer at her? A tipsy brakeman a few feet from him was interrupting the speaker with loud remarks and drunken gestures. Shandon, with sudden fire in his veins, reached in, and drew him out in a tiger-like clutch. With an angry grip on the nape of the man's neck, he whirled him about, and pushed him roughly from the crowd, and almost flung him into the mouth of a dark alley near by. The girl paused, and looked after them oddly, pityingly. The crowd roared with laughter.

Shandon looked down a moment at the outline of the fallen man. "Get up and go t' your boardin' house!" he growled. "Don't you disturb the—the meetin' again." He turned, and came toward the crowd, but passed around it, and paused in the middle of the street and looked toward the speaker. The girl stepped down from the box, and took her tambourine from the hand of her sister worker, a blonde young woman wearing the insignia of a cadet, while the lieutenant, the man who had beaten the drum, mounted the box and began speaking. He mentioned "their little captain, who had just spoken," and said that "Cadet Wilson would sing 'The Cleansing Blood of Jesus' set to the tune of 'After the Ball is Over,'" when he had finished telling them what salvation had done for him.

Digitized by Google

The little brown captain drew toward Shandon a few steps, and lifted her sorrowful eyes. Then she came nearer to him, and put out her hand. He took it timidly, feeling himself suddenly touched with a kind of trembling. Bystanders were grinning and nudging each other, but he did not consciously see them. The face of the girl, sad though faintly smiling, and the big appealing eyes, looking out of a shadowy half-circle that told of overwork and shaken health, enthralled him. "I want so much to thank you, but I shouldn't," she said. "It wasn't right to use the man roughly, to take him away. It is such as he that Christ is seeking; poor, blind soul, he is so much to be pitied!" There was something like tears in her voice.

The big engineer looked confused, shifting from foot to foot as he looked down upon her. "I didn't know—I didn't understand—I'm—I'm sorry," he stammered. "But, Miss," with a sudden clinching of his fists, "you can't expect a man to let any one disturb or insult you. I won't stand that; 'tain't right and proper."

"The Saviour didn't mind such things," she said, softly. "He loved the erring; when they maltreated Him, He strove the more to help them. We try to feel as He did."

"Well, I'm not—not religious; I don't understand the feeling; 'tain't hardly human, seems t' me. Anyhow, no—no man shall break up your meetings when I'm 'round," he said, with a flame in eyes and cheeks.

She put out her hand again, and it clung a moment in his, while a gratitude she could not suppress shone in her eyes. "Then you'll come to our meetings? God bless you," she said, her tone both a benediction and caress.

"I don't know; may be," he stammered, and hurried away toward the round-house.

When he had gone a hundred feet or more, he turned and listened an instant. The lieutenant was telling how, after years of dissipation, he had elected to end all in suicide, when the Salvationists brought him to know God's love, and that had freed and saved him. "Hallelujah!" came the voice of the little captain, and she and the cadet broke into pealing song.

"Hallelujah—little Hallelujah," murmured Shandon, as he went onward, and again, "little Hallelujah," tenderly, wistfully, as he crossed the main track and saw his engine steaming down toward the station.

"You said you was comin' round to look the machine over, Nat, 'fore I brung her out of the house, but I couldn't wait," said the hostler, as he jumped to the ground from the gangway of the engine.

"She's all right," said Shandon, absently, as he swung himself up the step, but whether he meant the mighty 990 or "little Hallelujah" was not apparent.

"Something wrong with Nat," muttered Ridley, the fireman, an hour later, as they rolled away through the mountains.

Shandon's face was grave, yet with a kind of light in it. His grimy left hand, always on the throttle lever, seemingly did its work involuntarily. As they rushed into the echoing gorges he aroused himself, and looked keenly ahead and back at the swaying string of glowing coaches. But in the long open valleys the dreamy light stole back into his face, and he looked up wistfully to the great dome of stars and the moon ploughing the silver fields of snow on distant mountain tops. Something new had come into his heart; he felt, but could not analyse it, a holy kind of tenderness that had the little captain and the seeming hardships of her life at the core of it.

He wished that she had not given herself to such unwomanly labour, had not offered herself as a target for ridicule, gibe, and sneer. She was one who ought to have her life in a warm home-nest, with a true man's love as a shield between her and the brutal world. But in what fashion was it his affair—he, big, rough, sinful? His questionings and solicitude were preposterous, he admitted; yet they clung in his consciousness sweet, disturbing, insistent.

Digitized by Google

When he pulled into Round Hill on the return trip the following evening, he had his mind made up to let the little captain and her meetings alone. But he did not. He passed down through Main Street was preaching. He stopped some distance away, and listened, a gloomy, brooding look in his eyes. At the end of ten minutes he shook himself together and went onward. In the morning, with an when he might have gone to his lodgings by a shorter route. He found the Salvationists, with a larger and somewhat more respectful audience, labouring at the point of their first attempt. "Little Hallelejah" odd throb of dismay, he found the little captain and the cadet seated opposite to him at the breakfast-table in the dining-room of his boarding-house. Later he learned that the Salvationists had secured a small hall on Main Street, which was to constitute "the barracks," and that the lieutenant, like a true soldier, was bunking on the floor of the hall with no more easeful thing than a blanket about him. The "lasses" would camp there later, in a little room partitioned off at the rear. They had come to make a campaign against sin in Round Hill. The fight promised to be long. When Shandon sat down at table, the little captain inclined her head to him in recognition, but was quiet and reserved, only at times her big brown eyes wandered to his face, leaving a queer tremor at his heart.

WITH A GASPING MOAN . . . SHANDON LEAPED IN AND GATHERED THE SLIM FIGURE IN HIS ARMS.

Digitized by Google

After that events went quietly through four evenings. Then a storm of opposision broke upon the heads of the Salvationists, the three soldiers sent into the mountains from that strange Army of Love which has covered the planet with its camps. The saloon men were in a rage; the meetings of the Salvationists drew the drinkers from the bars. Hired roughs began to pelt the girl-warriors and the lieutenant with mud and divers sorts of offensive missiles. Shandon fought two bloody fights in the streets of Round Hill in their defence. Barrett discharged him, but Superintendent Joy at once reinstated him, and Barrett resigned, only to find that Joy would not accept his resignation. In the faces of the three Salvationists grew a happier glow, their preaching was more loving, their songs more spirited, their prayers more fervid. They were fighting to save men; the battle was full of joy.

Then there came a terrible night. A great crowd stood in a faint mist of rain listening to the little captain's impassioned pleading. The lights glimmered along the saloon and store fronts, the flame of the army torches wavered and smoked near the girl's head, the lake of faces about her was full of glinting eyes. With yearning and pity in every gesture and tone, she poured out her message of love. Shandon stood not far away, pale and suffering dumbly. Then there came a rush of heavy feet, men lunged yelling through the crowd, people were overthrown, there was surging and confusion, missiles whistled through the air, and the little captain suddenly toppled and fell backward from the speaker's box, a bleeding wound on her forehead.

With a gasping moan in his throat, Shandon leaped in and gathered the slim figure in his arms. He rose up holding her as one might a child. His face was dead white, and he swept two blazing eyes over the confusion of faces about him. "If I only knew the man that did this—you mob of cowards!" he cried, with hoarse, shaking voice. "This girl is an angel—she fetches you a message of love—you stone her in the street! I'll whip you man by man as I find you—you that are puttin' up this outrage!"

He turned about, and utterly unmindful of what might be thought or said, strode across the street and down the opposite sidewalk toward the boarding-house. "Little Hallelujah—poor little Hallelujah," he muttered, as he looked down upon her face lying pallid and bloodstained against his shoulder. When he came to the house, he set the door open with a big impetuous foot, and pushed his way into the hall. The landlady came out of the sitting-room with sudden paling countenance. "They've killed her—they've stoned her," said Shandon, chokingly. "Where shall I lay her?"

They placed her on a bed in a room off the parlour, and Shandon rushed away for the company's surgeon. When he returned with the physician, the blonde cadet and the lieutenant, with several other persons, were in the room. Shandon went out, and stood on the porch by the main entrance. At the end of half an hour the surgeon came out. He looked at Shandon understandingly. "A pretty bad concussion—stunned her—but she'll be all right if kept quiet," he said. "She's a soldier, sure enough. As soon as she came to she wanted to go back to the street and speak." He ended with an odd grunt of laughter.

Shandon's lips moved, but he did not speak. An aching lump sprang into his throat, and he turned away and strode off to the round-house.

At sunset the next day he came softly into Hallelujah's room. The girl lay propped up among her pillows, wan and weak, a white bandage about her brow. She laid a Testament, which she had been reading, on the counterpane before her, and looked up to Shandon with a welcoming smile. The big engineer stood through a breath or two awkwardly turning his hat in his fingers, a swift surge of emotion visibly sweeping him at sight of her. "I wanted to see you—to find out how you was gettin' along," he said, with apology in the tone.

Digitized by Google

"You are kind, so kind. Bring a chair and sit here, won't you?" she said. Her voice was sweet and cool, and grateful to hear.

He drew a chair near her by the bed, and sat down. She put out her slim hand, and laid it on his. "You are a good friend, and I thank you. There is something growing in your heart, I think —something that concerns me, but I don't want you to—I am not worth it—there is something so much greater, so much sweeter—you understand, don't you?" She turned her eyes to his appealingly.

Shandon returned the look steadily, yet his hand shook under hers. "I only understand that I—that I love you," he said. "I want to take you away from this thing you are doing—to marry and protect you."

Her eyelids fluttered shut, and she lay in silence a little time, but she did not take her hand from his. "You do not really know who I am—what I have been," she said slowly, with eyes still closed.

"I do not care," he said.

Her lips moved. "Human love is a blind, strange thing—sometimes it is good and saving—sometimes. I have tasted it —it is sweet." Her eyes opened on his again. "I am older than, perhaps, you think. I am twenty-six. I am the daughter of a minister. I revolted against the seeming tyranny of the—the higher duty. Afterward I loved a man — worshipped him—he led me astray. Both he and the child are dead."

Shandon's hand closed on hers quiveringly. "Poor little girl—how bad you've been treated! Won't you come to me—I love you so?" he said huskily.

"I have drained that cup—personal love. You—your love - would be different, I know. I would like to taste it; but large as it seems, it is a little thing besides the Great Affection, the impersonal love that yearns for all mankind. Cannot you understand?—to fix the heart on only one —it is a toy beside the splendour of a planet!" Her big eyes, luminous with the thought and the ecstacy of it, dwelt upon his face.

He sat looking down, a kind of numbness creeping upon him. "Then I am as the rest—to you? I am but a part, an atom of the whole."

Her fingers tightened on his hand. "I would sin by saying that were true," she said caressingly. "Yet can you ask me to take the cup? Once it would have satisfied me, now it would not. I have drunk at the fountain of Universal Love, the great God-cup; it is strangely, inexpressibly sweet."

He fell flaccid, hopeless, gazing at her dumbly.

"You would marry me, would try to make me happy, only me. How much sweeter, more unselfish, to work for the salvation and joy of all mankind. The object would be infinitely greater, your reward of happiness infinitely larger. You understand, do you not?"

He stirred restlessly. "I seem to see—somehow—a little, but I cannot feel it," he said, desolately. "I want only you."

"You must enter into God's love. It will fill you, and then you will love as He loves, caring tenderly for all life. Love grows by use; even Jesus, I believe, kept Himself from sin only by constantly doing good. Let me help you a little, let me lead you just—one—step."

Her eyes closed, and she began praying for him, plaintively, simply, softly. When she had finished he arose, a struggling sob in his throat. She took his hand in both hers, and each looked at the other through tears. "You will be good," she said, "you will be great in the best sense, won't you? I am so little—only one—almost nothing. Think of the thousands of sick, the unsaved, the fallen. Forget me in thinking of them, because it is better for you, and because I might lose myself in loving only you."

"I—will—try," he struggled to say, and turned and went out, shaken to the soul.

That evening he passed along Main Street on the less frequented side. A larger crowd than ever was at the old point of meeting. In their midst he saw Hallelujah on the speaker's box, a white bandage across her forehead, preaching with a glow of light on her face. The town marshal stood not far from her, a cordon of big-fisted men from the railroad shops stood about her, men who had sworn that Round Hill should not be again humiliated by having a woman stoned in its streets. Shandon tried to listen, but could not for the tender, aching, strangling thing at his heart. "God bless her; she is greater than any man," he faltered, and went onward, out through the town into the still valley, under the big white stars, facing the sphinx of silence in the moonlit fields. At seven in the morning he mounted the 990, and took the express east, and the drama of Muley Fork was played under that span of the sun.

Digitized by Google

It was a stage for tragedy, that region where the Muley River bored through the mountain bases and met the Grand, eighty miles east of Round Hill. At the first step the larger river bent round a cliff's bottom, and flowed eastward through a gorge. The track, looking from the west, approached the gorge on the right side of the Grand; but at the mouth of the pass crossed the river by an iron bridge, and curved eastward at the cliff's base. A half-mile east of the bridge the cañon widened, a sloping mountain lifting on the left, a towering wall of rock beetling on the farther side of the river. At the foot of the steep slope the little town of Midgley clustered, above it the broad, slanting bosom of the mountain. On this beveled sweep, which ran upward thousands of feet, were dark green clots of pine, dents that were valleys, and mighty snags of rock, poured round with gleaming rivers of snow. Two mines opened mouths in the mountain's white face, thrusting out dark tongues of trestle-work and trailing gray beards of waste. Between and a little above the mines fell a depression of the earth, closed in the foreground with a dam thirty feet high and nearly 200 feet in length. Behind the wall hung ten acres of water, force for the machinery of the mines and the stamp-mills and supply for the town. On that day, at the warm end of February, a thin sheet of water a hundred feet wide flowed over the top of the dam, and every heart in Midgley was uneasy. Just east of the town, less than a quarter of a mile from the railroad station, the opposite range opened ruggedly, letting Muley Fork into the Grand through a narrow gorge. Fronting the opening through which the Muley came, on the railroad side of the Grand, the cañon broadened, leaving a clear half acre or more through which the track went eastward.

This was the stage, with a setting of stupendous scenery; uprushing walls of chaotic stone, gigantic cleavage here and there, soaring, silvery necks of distant peaks, white, sloping mountain-shoulders, breasts of crags shaggy with forests, and tiny Midgley down in the cañon with 10,000 tons of water hanging above it.

SHE PUT OUT HER SLIM HAND AND LAID IT ON HIS.

The land had been warming for a week, and we in the despatcher's office, and the crews of the road, had been dealing with annoying earth and snow slides, not large, but ominous of disasters. Upon a hundred mountains—perhaps a thousand, great and small—snow lay softening; the frozen streams began to break; down in Midgley gorge and over in the Muley's bore there were popping and crunching noises throughout a day and night; then came the morning of Shandon's eastern run.

Digitized by Google

As he sat at the throttle his aspect was that of an older man; within a few days his rollicking boyishness had gone. Without understanding why, Ridley, the fireman, looked at him with increasing respect. Grave, but alert, Shandon watched the track ahead. On the way to the Grand several bridges, spanning swollen streams, had to be inspected before crossing with the train, and the 990 plowed through two mud slides, leaving gravel and stones wedged between the slats of her pilot. The sun seemed warm as in June, and the air had the balm of late April in it. Here and there on distant mountains Shandon saw broad black streaks, showing the way of avalanches. Early in December rain and sleet had fallen, leaving a steely coat from which the melting snow now slipped, when unrestrained by natural dams, sweeping to cañon and valley in boiling torrents.

Shandon went carefully. His train should have been at Midgley at eleven-thirty; it was two in the afternoon when they made the Grand. A chaos of ice lay piled against the centre pier of the bridge. Shandon got down and walked across. Momentarily tremors ran through the iron structure, but it seemed firm. Above the bridge the river had a heaped, swollen look, and was filled with grinding masses of ice. Shandon mounted the engine and pulled slowly across. The last coach had hardly left the eastern span when, with a tearing crash, the span broke from the crumbling centre pier and plunged into the flood.

At Midgley they found a red signal out, and a freight train on the siding. Looking eastward they saw the cause; Muley Fork, mad with its burden, was pushing a moving, grinding ridge of ice clear across the track into the northern cañon wall. Looking up the mountain-side, they saw the whole front of the reservoir streaming, a long veil of glittering glass. Would the dam hold? What if the snow on the steep, open slope to the left of it should break and sweep into it irresistible in force, incalculable in weight? Here and there were small, black spots like spear-heads on the white gleaming slope, starting drops of the avalanche. The Grand, freed in a measure at the bridge, was climbing its banks, momentarily backing up from the ice gorge at the mouth of Muley Fork. Midgley and the express and the freight lay in a frightful trap.

Shandon got down and looked about him. The conductor came running forward. There was crying and hysteria along the track. A hundred people or more, the populace of little Midgley, were waiting for the train. Six or seven sick persons, on improvised stretchers, lay on the station platform. There were three sick people on the train. What was to be done? The hale and strong might possibly escape up the mountain; but the reservoir and the snow, the women and the children, and—the sick!

"We must clear the gorge, and take 'em over Angel Pass into Peace Valley," said Shandon, half to himself. "Lot of folks goin' to lose their lives here. She said to think of the sick and helpless, and any sort of people in trouble. Say, Phil," he shouted to the engineer of the freight, "run down ahead, and let me kick my train in on the siding; then you hook onto the coaches, and stand ready to follow me through. I'm goin' to cut the ice-pack in two."

The conductors of the freight and passenger both protested. Nothing but destruction for the engine and death for the man who drove her could result, they declared. But Phil Lyon, chewing hard on a piece of tobacco, said coolly, "All right, Nat; only you'd better let me buck the ice first."

"No, I have the right of way; it is my duty, not yours, Phil. Pull down quick, and let me kick in. There will be forty feet of water in this gulch in twenty minutes if that gorge ain't broken," said Shandon.

Then there was wild hurrying, the clashing of drawheads and the hissing of steam, rough shouting and shrill crying, and moans from the sick who were being carried aboard. The Grand was lipping the rails of the main line, its waters heaped with groaning and grinding windrows of ice, as Shandon backed the great 990 for the charge. He sent her back clear to the fallen bridge before he reversed for the terrible plunge. Ridley had gotten off at the station, and Shandon sat alone in the cab. There was a babble and clamour of echoes through all the cañon. He drew in his breath, and held it an instant, then threw the throttle wide. The huge machine leaped forward with a roar from stack and exhausts. Beautiful and mighty she swept down the perilous stretch, her iron skull set for the mounting ridge of ice. What the people heard as she passed was a long roar of thunder; what they saw was a glimmering monster flash by with a grey iron face at a window. Then there was a booming crash, a great gush of water and ice blocks in the air, and the monster was gone.

Digitized by Google

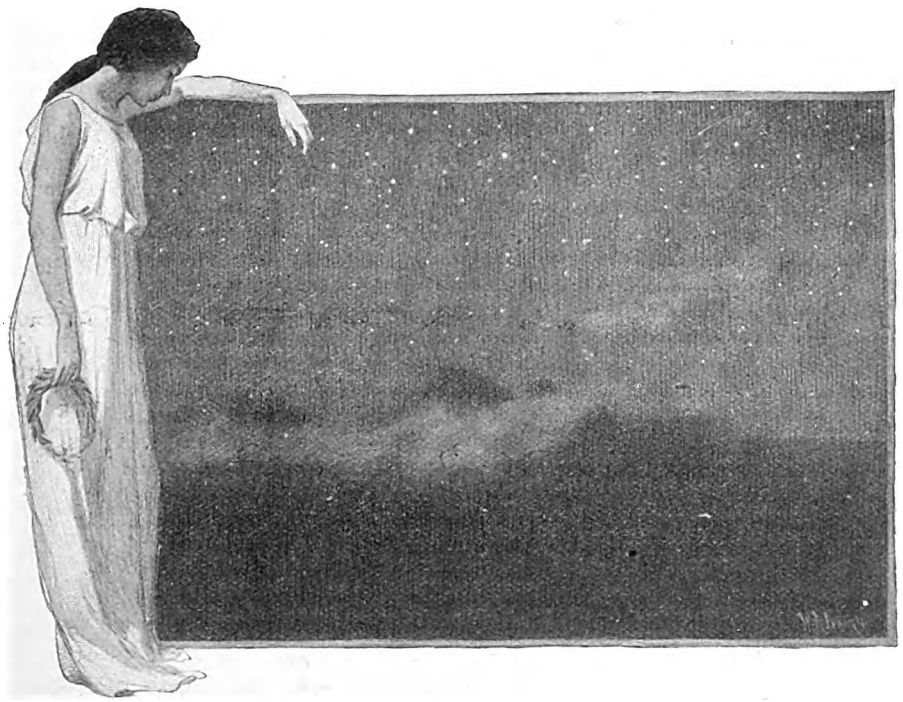
Lyon opened his engine's valves, and the express rushed after her, plowing onward through water and crashing ice into open ground. What Lyon did not see some on the rear coaches saw, a sublime and terrifying spectacle on the mountain-side—the smoking rush of a thousand tons of snow into Midgley reservoir. With the impact half the water of the inclosure seemed to gush outward over the dam's crest like a gigantic silver banner, bending downward as the structure burst. And tiny Midgley? Well, no human life was there.

They found the 990 three hundred feet beyond the ice-pack, lying on her side. Stack, bell, sand-tank, cab—everything was gone. Battered and stripped she lay, a hissing wreck. They pulled Shandon from some wreckage rearward from the engine. He was hurt beyond mortal help. As he hung in Lyon's arms he spoke but once. "Tell Hallelujah," he murmured, "the little captain—back in Round Hill—you know—tell her I tried to love and save 'em all—but I—loved—her—the—best."

That was all. They laid him on cushions in the baggage car, and pulled onward around the curve, up Tudor Gulch, over Angel Pass, and down into Peace Valley.

He was buried there.



Digitized by Google

Albert Edward, Millionaire.

THE PRINCE OF WALES AND HIS MONEY.

WRITTEN BY ARTHUR MEE.

ROYALTY and riches do not always run together. There have been kings who have pawned their crowns, and queens who have begged their bread; and there are those who speak of England, the richest country in the world, as if it were mean to its monarchs. While the Czar of all the Russias, and even the Red Sultan, count their wages in millions, the Queen of the British Empire receives, as we used to be told at school, only "a thousand pounds a day and £20,000 on her birthday." The Queen's official income of £385,000 a year is half a million less than the Emperor of Austria's, £200,000 less than King Victor's, £100,000 less than the Shah of Persia's, and only half as much as the Kaiser's. But there is no doubt that Her Majesty has got along very well on the £24,000,000 which she has received from the British people since her accession. A hundred and seventy tons of English sovereigns is a handsome life-salary, even for the Queen of the greatest empire ever known, and however lavishly other peoples may shower their wealth upon their sovereigns, a nation which, in sixty years, has presented to one lady enough English sovereigns to make a golden pathway round the world, can hardly be said to be mean.

It is popularly imagined, for some reason or other, that the Prince of Wales is poor. Poverty is, after all, a purely comparative term. This man may be poor with a thousand a year, that man may be rich on a pound a week. So that there is nothing inherently impossible in being a poor prince on £3,000 a week. But is it true, taking the broadest definition of poverty, that the Heir-Apparent is poor?

It is not difficult to understand how the fable of the Prince's poverty got abroad. The special grant of £36,000 a year in 1889 probably had something to do with it. But we owe it chiefly, no doubt, to the Prince's well-known sympathy with the race of Israel. H.R.H. has always been on excellent terms with the Jews, and it is an open truth that his sympathy has been misinterpreted. When he attended a Rothschild wedding in 1881, there were not wanting those who deliberately misunderstood his presence in the synagogue, where no other prince had ever been since the first decade of the century. It was maliciously imagined, and openly suggested, that the Prince had particular reasons for being friendly with the race of money-lenders, and the talk of his being up to the neck in debt became so general that the Prince thought it worth while to contradict it. Sir Francis Knollys, the Prince's private secretary, declared that H.R.H. had no debts worth speaking of; that he could pay every farthing he owed at any moment; that there was not a word of truth in the tales of a mortgage on Sandringham; and that the whole thing was a fabrication, on a par with similar tales representing the Prince as being assisted by financiers of more or less doubtful honesty.

There is a story that when travelling incog. in France at the end of the Franco-German war, the Prince of Wales, with his equerry, General Teesdale, was obliged to pawn his watch to pay his hotel bill; but such stories are told of every monarch. They may be true enough, but nothing would be more absurd than to imagine that they indicate anything more than absent-mindedness or lapse of memory.

Digitized by Google

Yet it is on foundations quite as shadowy that the pile of gossip and scandal about the Prince of Wales's poverty has been built up. Those who want to be as near the truth as they can will dismiss all such tales as old woman's gossip, and nothing more.

The truth is that from the moment of his birth the Prince of Wales has been splendidly rich. He was born, as the Irishman would say, with sixty thousand a year in his pocket, and from that day to this the Duchy of Cornwall has yielded him that magnificent sum. At twenty-two the Prince married, and Parliament gave him Marlborough House and a wedding present of £40,000 a year. That, too, has come to him regularly since 1863, year in and year out. In 1889, when the Prince's family ran away with his money, Parliament once more came to his aid and nearly doubled the grant he had received since 1863. From 1889 the Prince has been relieved of the anxieties of a father for the financial welfare of his children by a special grant of £36,000 a year, which comes to him in quarterly instalments of £9,000. So that the public income of the Prince is £136,000 a year. That is what it is worth to be Prince of Wales.

But even that huge sum is much within the mark of the real income of H.R.H. It has been stated that the Prince has a private income of a hundred thousand pounds a year, which would make his total income something like a quarter of a million; but, not having the authority for that statement, we may leave it out of our reckoning. We know, however, that the Prince has at least two private sources of income—his estates and the Turf. The Heir-Apparent to the British throne wins £120 a week on the racecourses of England. Six thousand pounds a year represents the Prince of Wales's winnings on the Turf during the last ten years. And Sandringham, which he purchased out of his early savings, has a rental of £7,000 a year, bringing his income, as we know it, to within a thousand of £150,000 a year.

That is the minimum—though probably not the maximum—income of the Prince of Wales. The man who would be poor on £150,000 a-year would be poor on a million. The House of Commons, when the Prince was receiving £100,000 a-year, increased his allowance by £36,000, but the grant was by no means unanimous, a fact which shows that a considerable section in Parliament regarded the Prince as sufficiently rich. The grant was made, it may be remembered, to prevent repeated applications to Parliament for Royal children, a quarterly payment of £9,000 a year being allowed out of the Consolidated Fund, from which the Prince would be able to "make such assignments and in such manner to his children as H.R.H. should in his discretion think fit." Though the proposal was strongly recommended by a Select Committee, and supported by Mr. Gladstone, there was a strong opposition from some whom Mr. Chamberlain called the "Nihilists of English politics"—among them Mr. John Morley and Sir William Harcourt. There had been considerable opposition, too, in the House of Commons and in Hyde Park, to the public payment of the expenses of the Prince's Indian tour. The Prince spent seventeen weeks in India, and the bill came to over £1,000 a day. The Admiralty spent £52,000 in connection with the voyage, the Indian Government spent £30,000 on the reception, and Parliament gave the Prince £60,000 to spend himself.

We are now able to form some idea of the amount of money the Prince of Wales has had at his disposal during his lifetime. He was born with £60,000 a year, set up housekeeping with £100,000 a year, and since 1889 has had £150,000 a year. Parliament gave the Princess of Wales £10,000 a year on her marriage in 1863, which totals up for the thirty-seven years to £370,000. So that we can now ask, and answer with some approach to accuracy, how much money the Prince of Wales has had at his disposal. Totalling up all his Parliamentary grants, his revenues from the Duchy of Cornwall, his rental from Sandringham, and his winnings on the Turf since 1890, we find that he has had enough to make him a millionaire many times over if money, being round, had not a habit of running away. The account stands, in round figures, something like this:—

	£
From the Duchy of Cornwall	3,480,000
From Parliament...	1,936,000
From Sandringham Estate	260,000
From the Turf in ten years	60,000
Total	£5,736,000
Payments to Princess of Wales ...	370,000
Grand total	£6,106,000

Digitized by Google

Six millions of money! Roughly, it is an income of £100,000 a year through the whole of his life. Every day the heir to the British throne has had an income of £274 5s. od.; every hour £11 8s. 3d.; every minute 3s. 9½d. Every time the clock has ticked since the light of Albert Edward dawned on the world, his wealth has grown by three farthings. It looks undignified enough brought down to farthings, but £6,000,000—forty-five tons of English gold, more than the Mint makes in a year—is an income to be proud of even in these money-worshipping days.

But it is not to be supposed, of course, that H.R.H. is a millionaire six times over. If being a prince means much taking, it means much giving and spending too. The Prince of Wales is not likely to go down to posterity as a great philanthropist. But he has given away more money than many people know, and everybody knows that he is generosity itself in his private life. It is said that he never gives a "cabby" less than half-a-sovereign, and everywhere he dispenses what we may call his "pocket patronage" on the same generous scale. He pays, contrary to popular belief, for all his boxes at the theatre, at the usual library tariffs; and, again contrary to popular belief, he pays for all his telegrams, letters and parcels. Telegrams and stamps cost the Prince £1,000 a year. Like ordinary citizens, too, H.R.H. pays his taxes regularly for Marlborough House, which, though it is the official residence of the Heir-Apparent, is a private house for taxation purposes. The Prince pays over £1,000 a year in taxes to St. Martin's parish.

We get some idea of what it costs to be a Prince of Wales from the fact that the Prince's military wardrobe is valued at £15,000 and is fully insured for that amount. Every army title the Prince possesses requires four complete uniforms — full dress, undress, mess-dress, and overcoat. His private saloon carriage at Boulogne, in which he usually travels on the Continent, cost £7,000; and his stables at Marlborough House cost £25,000. On his marriage, the Prince bought a silver dinner service, which is always used on Derby days, for £20,000. The expenses of Marlborough House and Sandringham are, of course, enormous, and—at the London house at any rate—every money transaction is indexed and care is taken that no tradesman sending in duplicate accounts is again patronised.

Sandringham, with its rent roll of £7,000 a year, was purchased for the Prince by Prince Consort, who took care of H.R.H.'s income during his boyhood. The accumulated revenues of the Duchy of Cornwall, before the Prince came of age, were about a million sterling, and out of what had been saved of this, Prince Consort bought for his son the Norfolk estate, costing £220,000. It is said that the Prince has for thirty-five years spent the whole of the rental of the estate on improvements, and if this is so he has spent in this way £245,000. An unexpected expenditure became necessary in 1891, when fire did £15,000 worth of damage at Sandringham. The Prince caused great satisfaction by placing all the orders for repairs with local tradesmen. The Prince has travelled a good deal, but his greatest tour, that to India, was an excellent business transaction. His personal expenses were paid by Parliament, and, though he took with him £40,000 worth of presents for the native princes, the Prince brought back gifts valued at half a million sterling, all of which are now at Sandringham or Marlborough House.

A glance at the Prince of Wales's donations affords an interesting study in royal charity. The Prince's charity is, as a prince's charity should be, as cosmopolitan as it well can be. The subscription list of the Prince of Wales is broad, if it is not quite so long as one would expect. There is nothing about it suggestive of narrow-mindedness. As a boy of fifteen, the Prince sent a drawing to Burlington House in aid of a war fund, which profited to the extent of fifty-five guineas by the royal artist's contribution; and he has been giving to this, that, or the other charity ever since.

There is no official record of royal charity, and it is not possible, therefore, to present a complete return of the Prince's philanthropic expenditure. But we are not quite in the dark concerning this demand upon his income. His public donations, his annual subscriptions, are common knowledge—buried away in newspaper files, but, at any rate, not so secret that the left hand does not know what the right hand doeth. In the first twenty-five years of his married life just over seven hundred donations by the Prince of Wales were recorded, amounting in the aggregate to something over £40,000—an average of about £60. That, however, takes no account of annual subscriptions, which are reckoned only once. The Prince's annual subscriptions, as we shall see, number at present between eighty and ninety, with an average of about £22 10s. If we suppose that this average was maintained for fifteen years of the period under consideration—many of the subscriptions being, of course, of comparatively recent date—we shall have to add something like 1,200 subscriptions and £27,000 to our figures. This brings the total up to £67,000. Now the minimum income of the Prince of Wales from 1863 to 1887 was two and a half millions sterling, so that the demand upon him for charity and public services was less than one thirty-seventh of his public income—not quite 3 per cent. In ten years the Prince of Wales has won back again on the turf nearly all the money he gave away in a quarter of a century—so far, be it always remembered, as his public giving is concerned.

Digitized by Google

It is interesting to know how H.R.H. distributes his charity, and we may classify this quarter-of-a-century's list of donations under certain heads. We find, then, that the list stands like this, merely giving round figures, and making no pretence to absolute exactness :—

	£
Benevolent Institutions	9,710
Educational and Intellectual	7,450
Religious	7,130
Social, Moral and Physical Improvement	5,900
Hospitals and Infirmaries	3,280
Asylums, etc....	1,820
Orphanages	1,320
Commerce and Agriculture	990
Foreigners in Distress	710
Relief of Children	680
Women's Agencies	670
Deaf and Dumb	260
Convalescent Homes	240
Blind	80
Total	£40,240

In the same twenty-five years H.R.H. contributed £3,083 towards 52 memorials and statues, besides giving £10,000 towards the mausoleum at Frogmore He built Wolferton Schools, too, and presided at scores of dinners and festive gatherings in the interests of charity. The Prince of Wales, Mr. Rhodes would say, is the greatest asset in the world as a chairman. At a Freemasons' dinner over which the Prince presided a collection was made of over £50,000, the biggest Freemason collection in the history of the world, and there are dozens of instances which might be quoted to show that the presence of the Prince acts like magic with men's purses. It is probable, indeed, that the Prince has done as much for charity by his example as by his purse.

The Prince of Wales, like the Archbishop of Canterbury, is the patron saint of a thousand little worlds. It is one of the penalties of being a prince. There is more in a name than Shakespeare imagined, when the name is that of a prince, and the Prince of Wales, in lending his name to a thousand causes, is really making a great contribution to them without sacrificing himself. The number of causes to which the Prince actually and regularly subscribes, is probably fewer than most people would expect, and so far as we have any record of them, the annual subscriptions of H.R.H. do not reach a very astonishing sum—less than £2,000, in fact. It is interesting to see to what causes, and in what proportion, H.R.H. devotes his "fixed" charity. Here is a list of his annual subscriptions :—

	£	s.	d.
St. James', Piccadilly, Charities and Schools	25	0	0
St. Martin's Charities and Schools ...	30	0	0
West Newton Clothing Club	7	10	0
Cornwall Royal Agricultural Association	10	0	0
Egham and Thorpe Agricultural Association	5	0	0
Norfolk Agricultural Association ...	31	0	0
Norfolk and Norwich Horticultural Society	1	1	0
Norwich Fat Stock Show	21	0	0
Royal Agricultural Society	5	0	0
Royal Counties' Agricultural Society	1	1	0
Royal Dairy Association	1	0	0
Royal East Berks Agricultural Association	10	0	0
Rupture Society...	10	10	0
Sutherland Rifle Association	10	0	0
Tenth Hussars Band Fund	30	0	0
Warspite Training Ship	25	0	0
West Norfolk Foxhounds	40	0	0
Hospital for Women and Children ...	10	10	0
City of London Artillery Company ...	20	0	0
Cornish Volunteer Association ...	15	15	0
Honourable Artillery Company ...	20	0	0
National Artillery Company	21	0	0
Norfolk Artillery Militia	105	0	0
St. Mary's and St. Peter's District Schools	20	0	0
St. Paul's Penny Schools, Vauxhall...	5	5	0
Toxophilite Society	5	5	0
Windsor Free School	10	0	0
Wolferton School	100	0	0
Working Men's Club, Vauxhall ...	3	3	0

Digitized by Google

	£	s.	d.
Society of Foreigners in Distress ...	21	0	0
Lock Hospitals (Male and Female) ...	21	0	0
North Staffordshire Infirmary ...	5	5	0
South Bucks Agricultural Society ...	10	0	0
Wraysbury and Horton Agricultural Society	5	0	0
Hunstanton Convalescent Home ...	5	5	0
Cambrian Archæological Association	1	1	0
Cornwall Royal Polytechnic Society	5	0	0
Dersingham School	15	0	0
King's Lynn Museum	3	3	0
Lambeth Day Nursery...	2	2	0
Royal Academy of Music	10	10	0
Royal Asiatic Society	3	3	0
Royal College of Music	26	5	0
Royal Naval Female School	5	5	0
Sanscrit Text Society	2	2	0
Cambridge Asylum for Widows ...	10	10	0
Fakenham Nurses' Home	5	5	0
Gordon Boy's Home	10	10	0
Dorset Royal Yacht Club	2	2	0
East Cowes Regatta	5	0	0
Highland Rifle Association	20	0	0
Hunstanton Regatta	5	5	0
King's Lynn Regatta	5	0	0
Marine Society	25	0	0
Norfolk County C.C.	5	5	0
Portsmouth Royal Corinthian Yacht Club	2	2	0
Portsmouth Royal Dockyard Regatta	5	5	0
Royal Amateur Orchestral Society ...	5	5	0
Royal Cornwall Yacht Club	26	5	0
Royal Victoria Yacht Club	6	6	0
Paulton Memorial Hospital	5	5	0
Women's Hospital, Waterloo Bridge-road	10	10	0
Shepton Mallet Hospital and Dispensary	5	5	0
University College Hospital	10	10	0
Yeovil Dispensary and Hospital ...	5	5	0
St. Mary-the-Less Mission Chapel ...	3	3	0
St. Mark's Mission Buildings, Kennington	3	3	0
Braemar Highland Gathering ...	5	0	0
Cornwall Royal Geographical Society	20	0	0
Cowes Town Regatta	10	0	0
Guards' Industrial Home	5	0	0
Royal Cornwall Sailors' Home ...	5	5	0
All Saints' Charities	5	0	0
Clergymen's Widows (Norfolk) ...	2	2	0
Cornwall Royal Institution	20	0	0
Dersingham Friendly Societies (2) ...	2	10	0
Lambeth Charity Organisation Society	5	5	0
Mendicity Society	15	15	0
Royal Agricultural Benevolent Institution	10	10	0
Royal General Theatrical Fund ...	10	10	0
Sandringham District Charities and Schools	600	0	0
Total of H.R.H.'s Annual Subscriptions	£1638	8	0

But we must not forget to allow for special calls. Indian famines, war funds, hospital appeals, every great calamity, every occasion of great distress, means that the Prince of Wales must put his hand into his pocket. In the first twenty-five years of his married life, these special calls accounted for £40,000, and if we reckon them since 1887 at the same rate, we find that they roughly double the annual subscriptions. We may reckon, therefore, that the Prince gives away something like £3,200 a year in public philanthropy. Such is the annual burden of charity on the Heir-Apparent. It is barely more than one week's income. It cannot be said that the public demands on the Prince are severe financially, however they may tax his physical strength.

Totalling up his charity since his marriage, we find that, assuming that it has maintained the same average since 1887 as before that year, it reaches rather less than £110,000, barely a whole year's income, and less than the Prince's present annual income. Even if we add £200,000 for Sandringham, accepting the statement that the Prince has spent the thirty years' rental on improving the estate, the total is £310,000. The average income of the Prince of Wales since 1863 has been—reckoning only the income which is public knowledge—£115,000 a year, and the Prince's philanthropy has cost him slightly more than £8,000 a year. Taking the thirty-seven years, the figures stand: Income, £4,260,000; charity, £310,000. Taking the whole life of the Prince, and allowing as much for private charity as the Prince has given in public, there is still five millions sterling—an income of £86,000 a year from the year of his birth—left for other purposes.

It is impossible to believe that the Prince of Wales has spent £230 every day of his life, apart from all demands of public and private charity. If he has done that, and has no private income that we know nothing of, he may be poor. But even a prince can be rich on much less than £230 a day for personal and household expenses, and most people will probably be more inclined at the end than at the beginning of this article to believe that H.R.H. should be ranked among our English millionaires.

Digitized by Google

Illustrated by E. A. Pike.

YES, it was assuredly distant cannonading.

The old woman, for the first time for ten years, got out of bed without assistance and crept to the window, which she pushed wide open. The brisk air of the dawn came in, sweet with the thousand balsamic odours of the fields and hedgerows in summer time. She leant on the sill and looked about her, a prey to great anxiety. But everything wore so peaceful an aspect, that she experienced a sudden relief. Surely she had been mistaken? She held her breath and listened for the sounds that had alarmed her a few minutes before; and as she heard nothing she became convinced that she had been a victim of imagination.

But at that moment her eye was attracted by a melancholy group which had just appeared at the bend of the lane. It consisted of a peasant neighbour of hers with his wife and three little children. They were advancing in frantic haste. From time to time they cast terrified glances behind them. All were burdened with household articles, such as would be picked up indiscriminately at the beginning of a panic-stricken flight. The youngest little girl clasped a kitten to her breast, and as she trotted forward by the side of her parents her tears fell upon it.

"What is the matter?" said the old woman, when they had reached her.

"It's those Prussians," said the peasant, without stopping. "Haven't you heard the guns? They're only ten miles off, and coming fast. You clear out of that, mother. All have gone." And he went on with added speed, bending double beneath a pyramid of furniture and bedding roped together.

The old woman trembled. The momentary energy that had sustained her threatened to give way, and she was obliged to seek her bed again. She lay there exhausted, feeling the helplessness of her position acutely. Ah, if her boy had only been with her! She began to divine that, in the egotism of fear, her neighbours had taken flight without bestowing a thought on her, and that she was left alone to endure hunger and thirst and the brutalities of an invading army. She was overcome at the reflection, and refused to entertain it seriously. But when hour after hour had slipped by and there was no appearance of the neighbour who for the last five years had regularly come to help her to dress and to prepare her breakfast for her, she was forced to realise the truth.

This brought a great calmness upon her. She blamed no one. After all they could have done her no real service by rousing her with the evil tidings. They were all poor people, and penury has to go afoot. How could she have accompanied them—she, who found it a cruel labour to creep from her bed to the door seat?

Towards nightfall hunger forced her to exertion. She got up and managed to light a fire, at which she warmed herself a little soup that remained from a previous meal. The effort occasioned her such keen suffering that she thought the pangs of starvation would be preferable.

Since the early morning she had not heard the sound of artillery, and this gave her a glimmer of hope. No doubt those cursed Prussians had been beaten back to the frontier by the victorious armies of France. The return of the fugitive peasantry would follow in a little time, and life for her would resume its old aspect. But could she hold out? She must.

Digitized by Google

She lay awake half the night devising means to lighten the labour necessary in the preparation of her sustenance. The little patch of vegetables at the side of the cottage would supply all her wants; but she shuddered as she anticipated the bodily torture that each meal would occasion her. Still she must live. And now that those filthy Prussians had been sent to the right-abouts ——

She woke the next morning with a start of fear. The air seemed full of dull rumblings, which were foreign to her experience and thrilled her. She struggled into a sitting position and gazed out of the window. A portion of the main road which ran on the side of the hill opposite was visible to her yet keen eyes through the little aperture. As she looked, she saw pass at a mad gallop what seemed to her to be long, low carriages drawn by four horses, with a driver for each couple, and crowded with men in dark coats and brass helmets. Instinctively she knew she was gazing at artillery; and there came to her recollection something she had heard about the Bavarians wearing helmets like the firemen of her own country. A shudder passed through her, and for a moment she closed her eyes.

Nearly an hour elapsed before the last of that terrifying procession had swept by. Then she breathed more freely. But her anxiety was still excessive. Only her intense patriotism, cruelly lacerated by the sight she had just witnessed, referred it now in part to a less selfish origin.

About noon she put on her clothes, and, in spite of frightful suffering, crawled into the little garden to gather something to put in the pot.

She was bending over the soil when she heard herself addressed. She looked up and saw a stranger beside her—a tall, resolute-looking fellow of middle age, dressed in the blue linen blouse of her own class, and with a bundle over his shoulder. Her heart gave a jump of rapture; here, at least, was one of her countrymen who had not joined the general flight. Surely he would take pity upon her in her helplessness and isolation?

"It seems the Prussians haven't frightened you away, missus?" said the man, leaning on the fence and smiling.

She explained why she was there, and added:—

"And you?"

"Oh, the beggars won't touch me," he said carelessly. "I'm a non-combatant, you know—that is, one who doesn't carry arms and fight against 'em."

"I have a son," said the old woman, slowly; "we've been parted for years and years, and whether he's alive or dead I've never heard. But I feel that we'll meet some day, and the thought keeps me alive. Ah, he was a bonny lad——"

"Yes?" said the stranger—for she had paused, lost in some happy recollection of the past.

"Well," continued the old woman, with energy, "if that boy was to come back to me now and refuse to shoot down some of those filthy pigs if they came in sight, I'd show him the door and tell him to begone."

The man shrugged his shoulders.

"Shoot at an army! You'd pretty soon see your 'bonny lad' with his back against the wall here and a squad with their chassepots before him. A fine sight for a mother, that. But look here, missus. What do you say if I stop with you a bit and look after you? I might as well be here as elsewhere, and I rather think you'd be the better for me."

The old woman thankfully accepted the offer, and he promptly entered upon his new duties. He lifted her in his arms with the ease with which a child lifts a doll, and, carrying her indoors, deposited her in her armchair. Then, hearing that she had not yet broken her fast, he prepared a meal. While they ate they talked about the war, and he amazed the old woman with the extent of his knowledge of the situation. She was furious when he confidently predicted the overthrow of France.

This statement, delivered, she thought, with secret satisfaction, when coupled with his evident familiarity with the movements of the combatants, excited her mistrust, and she began to think he was not what his appearance would seem to indicate. She slyly questioned him about himself, but got little satisfaction. His name, he said, was Robert Billot. He was a field labourer by calling; but times were bad, and he was tramping a bit. And as for his knowledge of war matters, why, he was something of a reader, and could put two and two together as well as another. Beyond this he would say nothing.

Digitized by Google

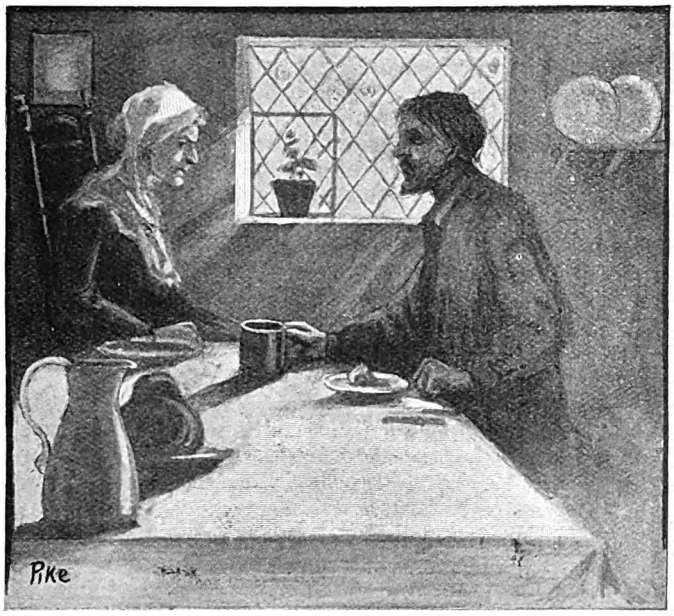
When dusk came and the old woman had lain down, all dressed as she was, on her bed, Billot slipped out of the cottage. Several times during the night she awoke and scrutinised the shake-down Billot had made for himself near the door. But it was not occupied. Shortly before daybreak she heard the door opening cautiously, and Billot entered with deft steps, and sank upon his couch with a sigh of weariness. In a moment he was asleep.



THEY TALKED ABOUT THE WAR.

The next day was tempestuous with heavy showers. Billot displayed great restlessness. Now and again he left the cottage, and the old woman watched him climb the high lands which commanded a view of the surrounding country, and stand with his face persistently turned towards the west.

To her eager questions as to whether he saw anything, he shook his head, or returned a curt "No."

Shortly after nightfall a tap came at the door. Billot quietly rose and opened it and passed outside. Then the old woman heard him conversing with someone whose French had a gutteral quality. Like a flash it came to her that a traitor was beneath her roof.

Ten minutes later he re-entered the cottage. He stepped up to the candle, and, as he snuffed it with his fingers, he remarked indifferently:

"Some news for you, mother. The French and Prussians have had a bit of an engagement this morning at Deuville, a place twenty miles from here, and the Prussians had to fall back."

"Heaven be praised!" exclaimed she, fervently. "Ah, the filthy swine! They are getting their beating at last, are they? I knew it would come sooner or later." She added, in a meaning tone, "Now, we'll see what those who are false to their country have to say for themselves."

Billot screwed his mouth into an enigmatical smile, and pronounced the syllable "Puh!" Then he extinguished the light, and threw himself upon his improvised bed.

The sleep of both was fitful. The old woman was wide awake long before dawn. She lay watching the gradual appearance of objects out of the gloom as the east brightened. Now and again she turned her eyes in Billot's direction, and her face grew hard and contemptuous.

Billot slept. But all at once he sprang to his feet, as wide awake as though he had been seared with a red-hot iron. With the rising of the sun a furious discharge of artillery had broken out. It appeared to be close at hand. A shell crashed into the wood opposite the cottage and burst with a frightful detonation.

Billot dashed into the open air, and scanned the neighbouring heights with an anxious eye. An exclamation of fury escaped him. He ran back into the cottage and seized his bundle and stick.

Digitized by Google

The old woman was standing in the middle of the floor, supporting her tottering limbs by a chair back.

"The Prussians," she stammered. "Are they upon us?"

"No," said Billot, rapidly; "it's the French. They are swarming over the hills on all sides. They must have come up under cover of the darkness. The Prussians have fallen back towards the frontier."

He made for the door. "Good-bye, mother."

She arrested him by a gesture.

"What! you fly from your own countrymen?" she said, almost in a whisper. "You're a Frenchman, aren't you?"

"Yes; I'm a Frenchman."

"You are something besides," cried the old woman, shrilly, shaking her fist in his face in an outburst of concentrated passion. "You are a traitor and a spy."

Billot paused.

"You're about right, mother," he said, quietly. "But before you condemn a man you should learn his history. However, I've no time for talking; think what you like."

He moved to the door. But he had scarcely reached the threshold when he slunk back with an imprecation, staring.

"Lieutenant Melier, by God!" he muttered, and his weatherbeaten face became set and angry.

The old woman, peering under his arm, saw a number of French infantry coming quickly up the glen towards the cottage. A fierce exultation made her heart throb. The spy was completely caught in a trap.

Billot shut the door and drew the wooden bolt. Then he turned to the old woman and said hurriedly, while he wiped his glistening forehead:

"I've done you a trifle of service during these last few days. Pay it back now, mother. You know what'll take place if these men lay hands on me, since you know what I am. They may pass or they mayn't. If they don't I am going to hide behind the bed here, and you must act as though you were alone. You agree, don't you, mother?"

She listened to his appeal with a bitter smile, but made no reply.

He stepped to the little window and peered out with indescribable anxiety. The squad, with an officer at its head, was advancing as directly as though the cottage was its objective point. But at a distance of fifty paces away it broke into irregular order and began to clamber up the hill side.

Billot gave a sigh of relief.

"Saved!" he said aloud.

The old woman heard him, and understood what had occurred. Furious at the escape of this man she hated with an unappeasable enmity, as the betrayer of her country, she tottered to the door, and, before Billot could prevent her, she had thrown it open and screamed out:

"Here, my lads, here! Seize this Prussian spy!"

Billot clutched her in his powerful grip, and dragged her back into the cottage, grinding his teeth with fury. He rebolted the door with one hand while with the other he clutched her throat mercilessly. Nothing was spoken. For a moment they looked into each other's eyes.

Then all at once the bitter defiance in the old woman's gaze was replaced by the most utter amazement. With a frantic movement she pushed up Billot's hair to disclose the left temple, on which was the mark of an old wound. She uttered a terrible cry, beyond the orthography of any language to express—a compounding of wonder, love, and thankfulness.

"My son! my son!" she cried in rapture. "My little Jean has come back to me at last!"

She drew his now powerless hand to her bosom and covered it with adoring kisses, uttering exclamations of ecstacy in the midst of sobs. Her cheeks were flushed. Somehow her wrinkles became less obtrusive; the bliss of the moment seemed to renew her youth.

"Yes," said Billot in a hoarse whisper, my name's Jean, sure enough. And yet——"

"I knew you first, my child, by one of your eyes being blue and the other grey," she said in an eager, fondling tone. "Then that gash that old Dr. Leneaux stitched up on your bonny brow. Don't you remember falling from the top of the rain tub? Ah! it was a naughty boy, always in mischief. Yes, that told me I wasn't mistaken. After all these weary years my lad's come home to the arms of his old mammy. Eh, how happy we'll be!"

"My poor old mother," said Billot—as he called himself—in a choking voice. "I sought you in the old place, and they told me you had gone away and had died long ago, and I believed them. Thank God, I see you once again."

Digitized by Google

He lifted the old creature bodily in his arms, and kissed her fervently.

"My Jean, my Jean!" murmured she, tenderly. "Ah, how happy I am!"

At that moment a storm of blows fell upon the door, and a stern voice demanded admittance.

The old woman started, and then, recalling everything, grew livid as death.

"It's the French," said Jean, in an unemotional whisper. He added, without bitterness, "They come to seize the spy."

With pallid lips she stammered out:

"Spy! My God, you are no spy!"

"I am," said Jean, quietly, "and the officer here knows it well. He had me in his clutches once before, but I escaped and left my mark upon him. I am as good as a dead man. Kiss me good-bye, old mother."

For a moment it seemed as if the poor old creature was about to fall at his feet. The blow was overwhelming, but love for her son sustained her.

"Listen," she said in a hoarse whisper, freeing herself from his encircling arms. "Hide under the bed. They know nothing. I will deny what I said, and send them away. Quick! quick!"

Jean hesitated. He felt certain that he had been seen by the soldiers when he dragged his mother back into the cottage. Still, there was a doubt, and it would be madness not to embrace any chance of salvation, however slender it might appear.

Fortunately the bed occupied a favourable position: he could crawl to it without being seen by the lynx-eyes that he knew were peering into the room through the little window. He fell on his hands and knees, and in a moment or two had disappeared in his hiding-place.

THE LAST OF THAT TERRIFYING PROCESSION HAD SWEPT BY.

Digitized by Google

The old woman then tottered to the door, which was shaking under the heavy blows, and drew back the bolt, saying:

"Gentlemen, gentlemen, what is the matter?"

The door was pushed open with such violence that she nearly fell. She was appalled at the fierce countenances that confronted her in the opening, and instinctively drew back towards the bed to interpose her body between them and her son.

The lieutenant in command of the party, a stout man with the delicate complexion of a girl, but with wolfish eyes, pushed his way into the room.

"Now, then, old woman," he said roughly, "what's this about a spy?"

"Spy?" said she, meeting his inquisitorial gaze steadily, though her lips trembled. "I don't know what you mean. I'm a poor old woman all alone. There is no spy here.

"You cried out 'Seize this Prussian spy,'" said the officer, frowning. "What did you mean by that?"

The old woman shook her head.

"No, captain, I said nothing of the sort."

The lieutenant swore.

"You lie, you old witch; I heard you myself. Come, now, if you don't want this place pulled about your ears, explain yourself. I am a bad one to joke with, I can tell you."

"Sir," she said vigorously, "I'm a true Frenchwoman, and adore my country, and hate the Prussians like death or pestilence. If I knew of a Prussian spy hiding anywhere I'd tell you to enjoy the sight of his hanging. Before God, I'm speaking the truth."

The lieutenant looked perplexed.

"Well, this is all deucedly strange," he said, half to himself. He stood in the middle of the room, and sent his fierce glances right and left. Then, with a shrug, he strode to the door.

"The old crone is evidently doting. We waste time here," he said curtly.

A murmur came from the men. The old woman did not catch what was said, but the lieutenant turned like a flash.

"Where is the man who was with you two minutes ago?" he demanded, with a ferocious look. "The man who dragged you back into the cottage while you were calling for us."

The mother felt all was lost.

"There was no man with me," she stammered. "He—he was not—he went away long ago."

"You lying old witch," said the officer, with a venomous look. "He was here two minutes ago, and must be here now. I'll swear he's——"

"There's a man under the bed, lieutenant," interrupted one of the soldiers who had caught sight of Jean.

"Ah!" said the lieutenant, with savage satisfaction. "Out with him, my lads."

Pale as a spectre, the old woman threw herself before the advancing men.

"It is my daughter," she said in a strangled voice. She was afraid of you and hid herself. She is in ill-health, and if you touch her it will be her death. Oh, protect her, my captain!"

"Your daughter has a beard," said the lieutenant, stooping. "I see the fellow. Drag him out, boys."

"No, no," said the mother wildly. "You shall not touch him. You shall kill me first."

"By ——," said the lieutenant, showing his teeth in a bitter smile. "We're going to have some fun, it appears."

"Have pity!" cried the mother in anguish, as the soldiers pressed upon her. "He is my son, my only child. He's never done you any harm. He is innocent, I declare to you before God."

"Innocent men don't hide under beds," said the lieutenant sharply. He added, impatiently, to his men, "Push the old Jezebel aside and let us see this fellow."

They laid hands on the old woman, and, despite her struggles and wild appeals, drew her to one side. In a minute Jean was dragged from his hiding-place. He made no resistance, but allowed himself to be assisted to his feet, then boldly confronted the lieutenant, whose jaw fell at the sight of him.

"Jean Couvet!" he ejaculated, and his face flushed a deep red.

"That's my name, Lieutenant Melier," said the spy quietly.

The lieutenant's eyes sparkled with vindictive joy. He raised his fist and shook it in the captive's face, struggling in vain to give voice to the thoughts which crowded upon his tongue. Then he turned to his men, and said hoarsely:

"Take this scoundrel outside, and let him be shot."

The old woman heard this order without emotion She stood between a couple of soldiers with her hand pressed to her brow, looking straight before her with wild eyes that appeared to see nothing. But when Jean had been dragged through the doorway she seemed to awake from the species of stupor that had mastered her. With an agile movement she eluded the grasp of the men beside her, and darted after her son. She saw that he stood with his back to the cottage wall, and the soldiers were beginning to fall back, some of them looking at their chassepots in a sinister way.

Digitized by Google

The mother ran to Jean, and convulsively threw her arms about him.

"My God! my God!" she said hoarsely.

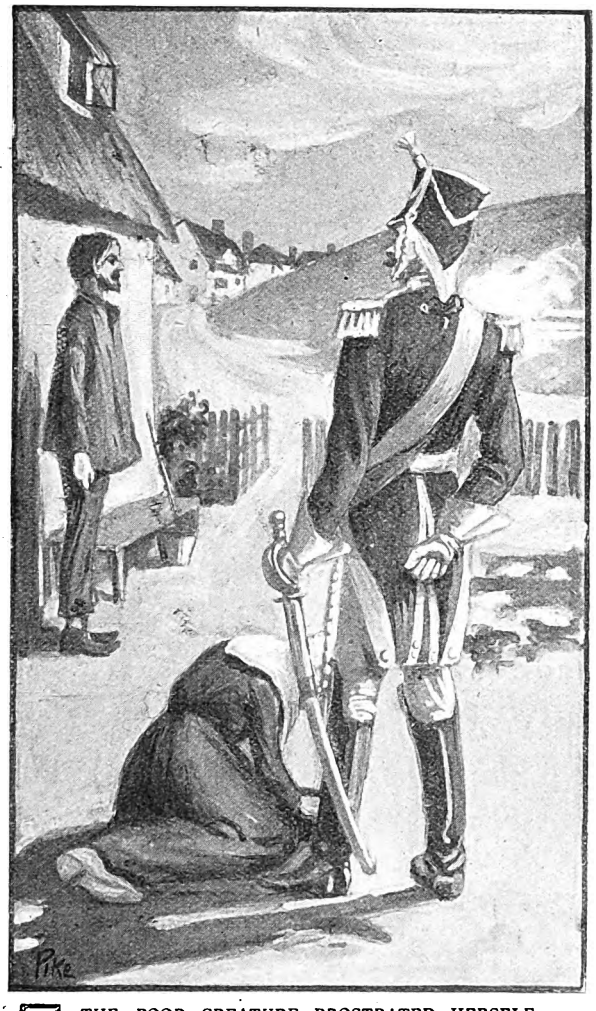
"Pull that woman away," shouted the lieutenant savagely.

Two or three approached to execute the command. Jean, fearing their violence, endeavoured to release himself from her tenacious clasp.

"Come, old mother," he said tenderly; "leave go. You can do no good. Stand on one side, and let us show these dogs what brave stuff we're made of."

The poor creature said frantically:

"Oh, no, no, no! They will never dare to fire while my arms are around you. I am protecting you, my child. Don't you see that?"



THE POOR CREATURE PROSTRATED HERSELF TO THE EARTH.

One of the soldiers laid a hand on her shoulder. But she turned her head and looked at him with such active hostility in her contracted pupils and half-displayed fangs that he drew back in dismay. Then, ashamed of his cowardice, he gripped both her wrists, and endeavoured to pull her arms behind her. A comrade came to his assistance, and between them the death-like grip of the old woman was loosened.

"My son," she said faintly, as she felt her strength giving way, "they are taking me from you."

Jean bent down and kissed her white face, and in doing so left tears upon it. He murmured some tender words of farewell, then moved some paces away from her and folded his arms with a disdainful glance at the lieutenant.

"Fall back six paces," ordered the officer.

The firing party obeyed. A further command was interrupted by the voice of the old woman.

"Sir," she said to the lieutenant in a tone of infinite agony, "I beseech you have mercy upon my child. Oh, surely his fault is not so terrible as to call for death. Just think. How awful it is! You are a gentleman, and just and good. Have pity! have pity! He's my only child—the only being in the world left for my old heart to love. And you would take him from me. Oh, such cruelty would make a savage blush."

"The law has condemned him," said the officer shortly.

Digitized by Google

"Do you know what it is to be a parent?" continued the old woman in a hoarse and rapid voice. "Has God sent you one of his little ones that you might gaze into its wide-opened eyes and learn something of the angels? Have you held it in your arms and smiled down at its toothless laughs, and felt its little soft fingers wander over your face? Recall such moments, and then picture your child as mine is now—awaiting death. Isn't it a bitter thought? And yet what is your love to mine—a mother's? Man, man, pity me and have mercy! I've borne that child in my bosom, and fed its little lips with my milk. I've watched it growing day by day, and many a time found comfort in its sunny looks for the bitterness of a hard life. Spare him to me, I beseech you. Ah, you will when you know that we've just met again after twenty-five years of separation. The good God has led him back into my arms to bless my last days. You won't oppose God's wishes? Ah, no. There's something like tears in your eyes that speaks of pity. See! I kneel to you. I implore you, as you hope for God's mercy, to have mercy now."

The poor creature prostrated herself to the earth.

The lieutenant was very pale. He averted his eyes from that suppliant form, and called out in a husky voice:

"Present. Fire!"

A loud fusillade followed the words. A faint white smoke rose slowly into the sweet morning air.

Like a machine, the old woman slowly lifted herself by one hand and looked behind her. Jean lay on his right side, with his legs drawn up. A deep red patch, slowly expanding, defaced the breast of his workman's blouse. A scornful smile still hovered over his lips.

The lieutenant's sharp voice rang out:

"Fall in there. Fours left. Quick march."

The column moved onward.

As the soldiers began in silence to climb the steep hillside, heads were anxiously turned towards the scene of the execution. They saw that no change had taken place, save that the mother had fallen forward with her face to the turf. She lay as motionless as though the bullets that had pierced her son's heart had pierced hers also.

Again and again they glanced downward. The immobility of the old creature filled them with a sad satisfaction. The most reckless were subdued. They conversed in whispers.

At length the brow of the hill was reached, and the descent began. Many turned to the valley for a last look. The two tragic figures still preserved the same restful aspect; and as they turned away an old sergeant murmured to those near him:

"I reckon yon poor creature hasn't been parted from her lad after all."

Digitized by Google

THE BOY PIPERS AT THE ROYAL CALEDONIAN ASYLUM.

THE ROYAL CALEDONIANS.

By KATHERINE CARSON.

A YOUTHFUL Scot who had just found his way to the Metropolis was applying for a post. On stating the object of his call, he was met with the query, "You're Scotch, aren't you?" "Is that anything against me?" he retorted quickly, nettled by the tone of his questioner. "No," drawled the Cockney, "but there are rather too many of you in London." The Scot smiled. Understanding where the shoe pinched he could afford to be generous. The number of Scots in the Metropolis is many. Probably that Cockney did not know how many, and it is more than probable he knew nothing of the most interesting Scottish colony in London, known to history and fame as the Royal Caledonians.

To make the acquaintance of this colony, you must pay a visit to Holloway, Islington. In the busy thoroughfare of Caledonian-road, which takes its name from the colony, stands the Royal Caledonian Asylum, the home, for nearly a century, of this colony, consisting of a cherished but ever-changing band of Royal Caledonians. A solid home-like building standing in two acres of ground and adjoining Pentonville Prison, the Royal Caledonian Asylum is one of Holloway's old landmarks belonging to the days when this district was open country and known as Copenhagen Fields, because of a still older colony—a colony of Danes—who at one time had made their home in the neighbourhood.

Digitized by Google

The Danish association with this part of London is altogether a matter of history. The Caledonian association is to-day as much in evidence as ever, for the youthful Caledonians when they take their walks abroad on business or pleasure bent, the boys in kilts and the girls in frocks of Royal Stewart tartan, though an every day sight in Caledonian-road, never cease to attract attention.

It may be, however, that ere very long the Royal Caledonians' association with Holloway will also become a thing of the past, for a movement has been on foot for some years to find a more suitable locale for what is neither more nor less than a good boarding school run on distinctive Scottish lines for the orphan children of Scottish sires. There is, however, no hope for the Cockney with a grudge against Scotsmen, as the school will still continue to minister to the demand in the Metropolis for the really capable Scot, and will ever be associated with the City of London in a very special way.

Happily for the Scot, and the Metropolis too, the Cockney referred to is not at all representative. At one of the events of the season, the annual dinner of the Royal Caledonian Asylum, the Sheriffs of London and other magnates honour and are honoured at the festive board of the one London Scottish institution for the sons and daughters of Scottish sires. A visit to the school, which shelters, in the heart of the dingy and busy thoroughfare of Caledonian Road, seventy-seven Scottish boys and fifty-two Scottish girls, is all that is needed to rouse the enthusiasm of anyone interested in such institutions, and in a cosmopolitan age will be an education even to many Scots. The phrase "such institutions" is, in this instance, rather misleading, for the Royal Caledonian School is an altogether unique foundation. Its counterpart is not to be found from Land's End to John o' Groats. It is a school of which Scotsmen may well be proud, representing as it does a glorious page in Scotia's history of the brave. It is a monument to the kilted Scottish regiments, the fighting Scots, who distinguished themselves in the bloody wars which marked the end of the last and the opening of the present century. As Ireland's sons have earned a nation's gratitude in the recent war so did the Scottish soldiers in that great struggle which culminated on the field of Waterloo and Napoleon's historic residence in the island of St. Helena, recently called into requisition for an end-of-the-century warrior.

SOME OF THE BOYS AND GIRLS.

Digitized by Google

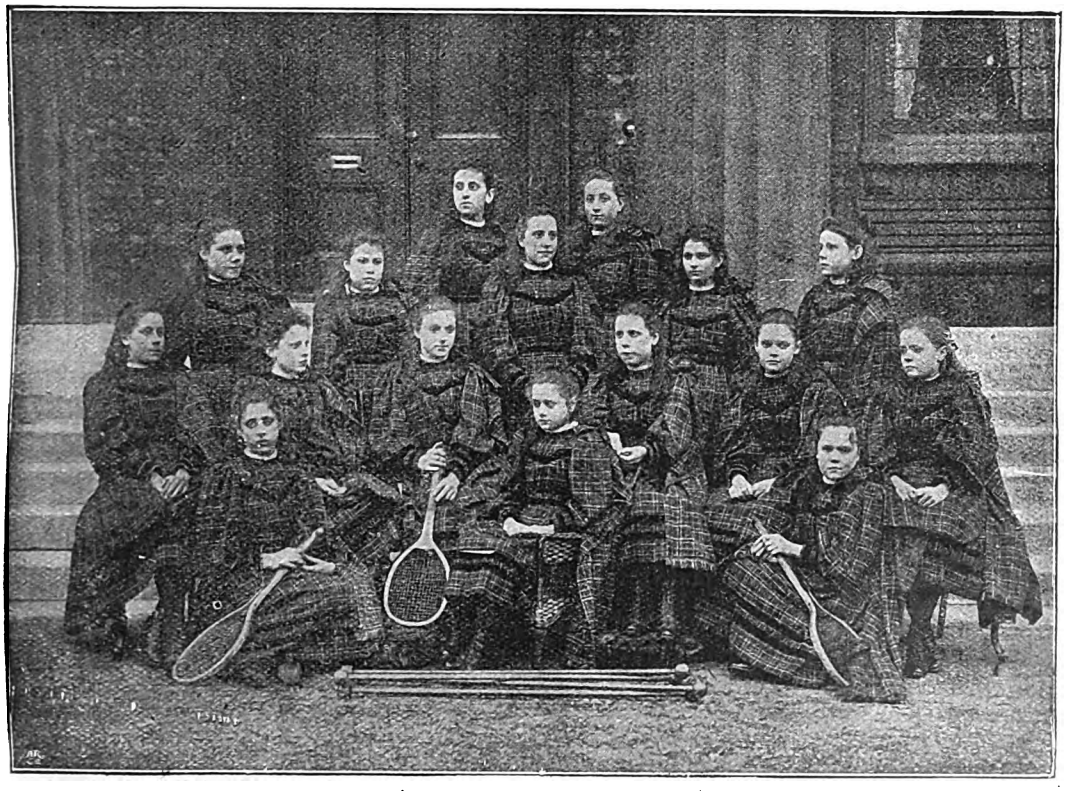
Then as now the cry of fatherless children was heard in the land, and then as now the atmosphere of the home land breathed a noble patriotism hallowed by the sacrifice of countless precious lives. Then as now the cry of the bereaved met a generous response, and then it was the Royal Caledonian Asylum had its birth and this unique colony came into existence.

The fact that its promoters, a band of patriotic Scots under the ægis of the London Highland Society, chose the Metropolis for the locale of the school, has a significance specially worthy of note at the moment when we are hearing so much of Imperialism. To the dark troublous days when Europe's tyrant set his heart on taming the British lion may be traced the beginning of the great welding process which made for the Imperialism we now know as a living reality.

The Englishman and the Scot fighting side by side as Soldiers of the King and Sons of the Empire, tasted then the first fruits of the larger life which breathes in the end-of-the-century Imperialism. An Act of Union and a Union of Parliaments did little to bind the hearts of the men of the North and the South. A common danger threatened their island home, a tyrant menaced their freedom, and Englishmen and Scotsmen learned in times of war what they never would have learned in times of peace. The promoters recognised this, and so it was this national monument, erected to the heroes of Caledonia, found a resting place in the capital of the Empire, and may be said to mark an early stage in the development of the Imperial idea.



GIRLS OF THE ROYAL CALEDONIAN ASYLUM.

Digitized by Google

Associated in its origin with the bloodiest page in national history the traditions and sympathies of the Caledonian School, as may be expected, have always been military. Its rank as a military school was determined, for all time, last autumn, when our much loved and gracious Queen consented that the school should henceforth have the right to "using and bearing colours," thus placing the school on a level with the Duke of York's and the Royal Hibernian. This act of grace on the part of Her Majesty is much appreciated by all interested in the welfare of the Royal Caledonian School.

The donor of the colours and the initiator of the scheme to definitely place the school on a level with other schools of a like nature, was Mr. Alexander Littlejohn of Invercarron, and the occasion of the presentation of the colours was a historic one in the annals of the Royal Caledonian School. At the invitation of Mr. Littlejohn, a contingent of boys and girls, last summer, paid a visit to the land of their fathers to receive the colours on Scottish soil, with full Highland military ceremonial. At Invercarron Gathering, within the policies of Invercarron House, surrounded by a distinguished Scottish audience, the donor's daughter, Miss Littlejohn, presented the colours—the Queen's colour and the School colour—to the representative contingent of Royal Caledonians. The colours will ever be considered one of the school's most precious possessions. In their texture and their colouring they tell the story in the language of heraldry both of the Queen's honour to the school and the school's Scottish foundation. The Scottish motto, "Nemo me impune lacessit," embroidered on the school colour is one which the youngest child in the establishment can interpret, and history records one which the boys of the Royal Caledonian School are throughout life ever ready to vindicate when occasion requires. Mr. Littlejohn is one of the Institution's most ardent supporters, and the presence of the children at Invercarron was part of his scheme for rousing Scottish sympathies and so forwarding the movement set on foot by himself to raise funds North of the Tweed for the building of a new school amid brighter and healthier surroundings than those it now knows in Holloway.

I said a visit to the school is all that is needed to fire the enthusiasm of anyone whose heart, as Byron's did, "warms to the tartan." The boys in their kilts and the girls in their dresses and plaids make a picture that nowadays can only be seen at Holloway, for the Royal Caledonian School is the one institution in the kingdom where the Scottish national dress is preserved in all its entirety, and Scottish music and dances taught as part of the curriculum.

The children do not go out professionally, as the directors have no need to make capital in this way, but they are very frequently asked to lend their services at entertainments for philanthropic purposes. Their dancing is highly appreciated wherever they go, though the skirl of the bagpipes, even a Scot must allow, is not heard at its best at a drawing-room meeting. It needs the deck of a castle liner or a Scottish glen to know something of the inspiration of their music. Five Royal Caledonians—youthful pipers—were of the party, invited to do honour to Mr. Gladstone on the occasion of the Tantallon Castle's special trip to Denmark for the opening of the Kiel Canal in 1885.

The visitors' book of the institution is valuable for its autographs of distinguished visitors. Their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of York record, below the signature of "George" and "Victoria May":—"We have been very pleased with our visit and are delighted with all we have seen. The children appear to be well cared for and happy." The occasion of the visit was the week prior to the Duke of York's presiding at the annual dinner of the institution in 1898. On this occasion the Duke, following in the footsteps of his father and his great-grandfather, made an eloquent and touching appeal to his supporters on behalf of the Royal Caledonians' new building fund, with the result that a sum of £4,000 was then and there contributed. What the Duke said on that occasion still applies, "Much more money is wanted and must be obtained" if the object the directors have in view is to be accomplished, that of again placing the Royal Caledonian Asylum mid green fields and country sights, and what is still more, in a purer and healthier atmosphere.

In the days when the present school was erected, Islington was a delightful suburb and the site of the Caledonian School an ideal spot. Since then, buildings and streets have grown up around the school, closing it in on every side. Pentonville Prison is its next door neighbour. This latter association is not a happy one. The old building does not lend itself readily to the improvements necessary for modern sanitary requirements. Altogether, a radical change is necessary, but ere this is possible, kind friends must "pay, pay, pay" to the extent of something like £10,000. Major-General Hector A. MacDonald, last year, during the short interval between his Egyptian Campaign and the present one, visited the school and presided at the annual dinner, when he also made an appeal for this special fund of the school in which he is much interested. "Fighting Mac" was also present at the Invercarron Gathering, and was delighted that the school should receive its latest honour—its colours—in Ross-shire, his native county. Above his signature is written, "The general arrangement of the Asylum seems to leave nothing to be desired, and the cleanliness of the establishment is most remarkable. The boys and girls look the picture of health, and their smiling faces denote complete satisfaction. The drill exercises and dances were remarkably well executed, and Highland regiments might take a lesson from the exhibition of the sword dance by the little girls." To give all the tributes paid to the school by distinguished personages since its institution would fill a big book, for the Royal Caledonian Asylum has been favoured among schools.

Digitized by Google

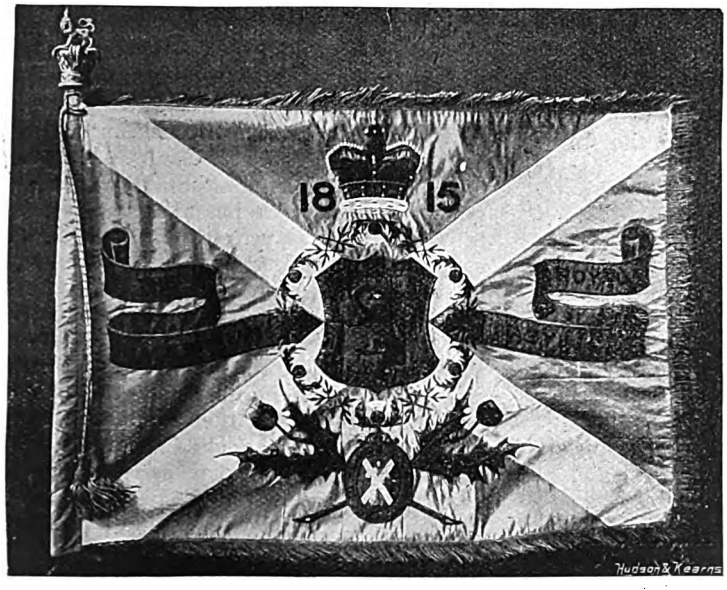
THE QUEEN'S COLOUR.



THE SCHOOL COLOUR.

Royalty has ever delighted in honouring it. In 1815, the year of its incorporation, H.R.H. the Duke of York and Albany presided at the institutory dinner, supported by the Queen's father, the Duke of Kent, together with the Duke of Sussex and Inverness. At this historic banqueting table every nation in Europe was represented by its Ambassador, met there to do honour to the memory of the Scots who had done so much to restore peace not only to a nation but to a continent of nations.

Digitized by Google

A glance at the twenty toasts on the list of this historic dinner would fill the end of the century temperance reformer with horror. There were giants in those days—the days of the four-bottle men—when the highest born and the bravest of our own and other lands drank to the newly-born Caledonian Asylum and "The Offspring of the Brave."

In all, in the present year of its history, eight members of the Royal Family afford the school their Royal patronage, while eleven members of the Royal Family are life Governors. Each of the Queen's sons, and, indeed, nearly every male member of the Royal Family have presided on different occasions at the Anniversary Festivals, and have expressed their delight at doing so. All of Scotland's noble families have, at one time or other, actively interested themselves in the welfare of the school, and famous Scots in every walk of life have held it an honour to associate themselves with the Royal Caledonian Asylum. Carlyle's great friend, Edward Irving, was its first Chaplain. Byron, "half a Scot by birth and bred a whole one," as he describes himself, was deeply interested in the efforts which led to the foundation of the school. He it was composed the following little-known stirring verses for the Committee of Managers in the early days when they were struggling to give the school birth :—

Who hath not glow'd above the page where fame
Hath fix'd high Caledon's unconquered name ;
The mountain land which spurn'd the Roman chain,
And baffled back the fiery-crested Dane :
Whose bright claymore and hardihood of hand
No foe could tame—no tyrant could command!
That race is gone—but still their children breathe,
And glory crowns them with redoubled wreath.

Oh! pass not by the northern veteran's claim,
But give support—the world hath given him fame!
The humbler ranks, the lowly brave, who bled
While cheerly following where the mighty led—
Who sleep beneath the undistinguish'd sod
Where happier comrades in their triumph trod,
To us bequeath—'tis all their fate allows—
The sireless offspring and the lonely spouse.

'Tis Heaven—not man—must charm away the woe,
Which bursts when Nature's feelings flow,
Yet tenderness and time may rob the tear
Of half its bitterness, for one so dear ;
A nation's gratitude perchance may spread
A thornless pillow for the widow's head ;
May lighten well her heart's maternal care,
And wean from penury the soldier's heir.

The Ettrick Shepherd, too, lent his muse, and composed a song for the institutory dinner.

The Royal Caledonian School, it will be seen, may fairly claim to be no ordinary charity school. Round its foundation hovered the grandest sentiments of which men are capable. Not pity, though it is akin to love, but pride and gratitude, and a sense of a deep debt to the brave who fell fighting for their country were the feelings that gave it birth, and so it is the Caledonian boy feels he is no charity boy in the ordinary sense of the words. The foundation to which he belongs, with its glorious traditions, is a heritage of which he is justly proud. The usage he meets with in the school, the respect and admiration his foundation commands wherever he goes, the enthusiasm kindled by the "Garb of old Gaul" which he proudly wears, and the distinguished gathering in which he takes an important part every year, kindle in him a sense of proud responsibility in the honour and welfare of his foster-home and the land of his Scottish sires.

The school was founded and exists for the benefit of the children of Scottish sires, soldiers and sailors, who have died or been disabled in their country's service, and also for the children of London Scots, who through some cause or other have gone under in the battle of life. The children receive a sound, general education, are instructed in moral and religious principles, and in addition to the usual course of subjects, and moving with the times, shorthand and typewriting have recently been added to the curriculum for the boys. Needlework and domestic duties are the girls' special subjects. Outdoor exercises are much indulged in, and a swimming-bath was added some years ago, so that both boys and girls are now taught swimming, and benefit greatly by this healthful exercise.

Digitized by Google

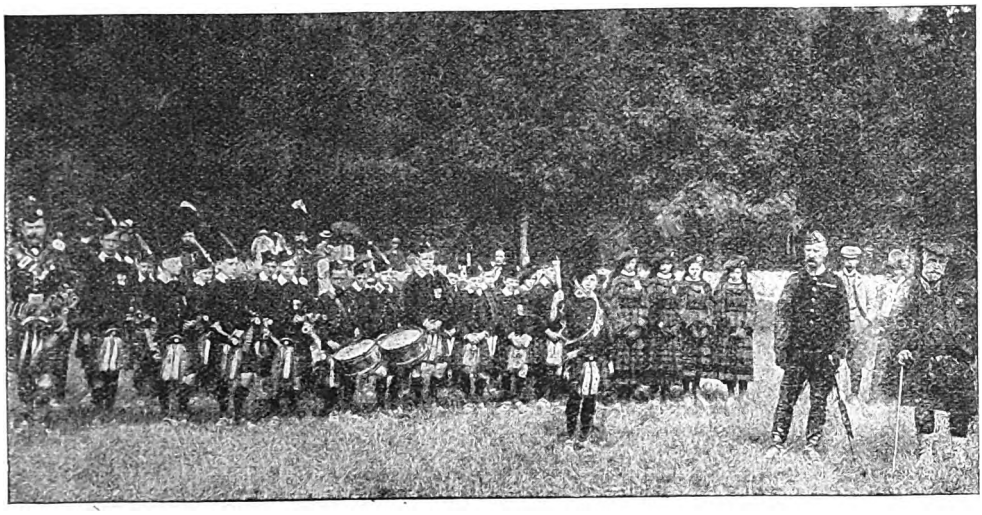
Children are admitted into the institution by election or payment. A donation of a hundred guineas gives the donor the right to place a child in the school without election. The directors also reserve the right in special cases to admit children without either election or payment. When the Drummond Castle went down three children of Scotsmen who lost their lives in this disaster were admitted to the school without the formality of election. Early in the present war a special resolution was passed by the directors agreeing to admit without election any eligible children of Scotsmen who may fall or be disabled in South Africa. In terms of this resolution two children have already found a home in the Asylum, one the child of a Sergeant of the Gordon Highlanders who fell fighting at Elandslaagte.

Since the origin of the school 3,000 children have owed to it their education and start in life, and in nearly every case have done well, for the directors keep in touch with their old protégés as long as possible.

The greater number of Caledonian boys on leaving the school take to commercial pursuits, and positions are found for them by the many friends who interest themselves in the school. The records of "Old Boys" include several who have distinguished themselves in the world of art and literature. Charles Mackay, the well-known poet and journalist, father to the late Eric Mackay, the poet, was a Caledonian boy. James Thomson, the author of "The City of Dreadful Night," received his education in the school. The late Donald Mackay, piper for twenty years to H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, gained his proficiency in Highland music during the years spent in the Royal Caledonian Institution. Caledonian boys have risen to place and fame in almost every colony of the Empire, and in the City of London to-day there is more than one Caledonian holding a high place in the business world. The army and the navy have been recruited from the school, and Caledonian boys have served in nearly every famous Scottish regiment. A Caledonian boy has recently chosen his life work in the Mission field, so that practically the sphere of labour open to a "lad o' pairts" who has been lucky enough to be educated in this school, is an unlimited one. The limit age at which the boys leave behind them their Caledonian School days is fourteen. The age limit for the girls has recently been raised to sixteen; for many years it was fifteen.



THE SCHOOL GATHERING IN ROSS-SHIRE.

It would almost seem as if I were neglecting the Caledonian girls. Well, this is precisely what the Caledonian School did do for a quarter of a century. From the year 1819, when the first establishment in Cross Street, Hatton Garden, opened its doors to twelve boys, down to the year 1845, it was a boys' school. When the question of the claims of the daughters of Scots was raised in 1843, it was taken up heartily, and in 1845 the necessary addition to the original building in Caledonian Road was completed, and the school opened its doors and offered its hospitality to the daughters of Scotsmen. Now they not only share equal rights and privileges, but are allowed to prolong their stay a year after the age at which the boys make their start in life on their own account. During the later period of a girl's school life domestic duties take a fairly large place, but here again the Directors give a good deal of latitude and leave much to the discretion of the teaching staff. For most of the girls homes are found with good families, and in the service of such they find a useful and congenial sphere. No girl, who might find such a life uncongenial, need necessarily make this her career. If her needle be her favourite tool, she may be apprenticed to dressmaking or millinery. The present assistant teacher, an old Caledonian girl, recently won her Queen's scholarship, and is happy to continue her labours in the home she has known for years. Though I have dwelt most on the school as a boy's school like "Fighting Mac," it was the room packed with bonnie lassies dressed in their cosy-looking tartan frocks that impressed me most, both with the music of their sweet young treble voices and their eager bright faces that afford the visitor such a hearty, unsophisticated welcome. The youngest girl in the establishment amused me much by emphatically disclaiming any connection with Scotland. It turned out her mother was English, and the little one insisted on claiming her mother's nationality.

Digitized by Google

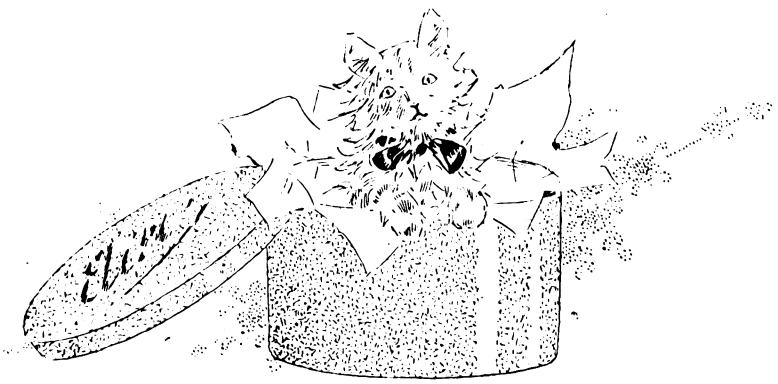
There is yet another member of the establishment who was neither elected nor placed in the school, and for whose presence there a yearly tax must be paid. This is Gwen, a handsome Scotch Collie, who found her way one cold, raw morning, several years ago, to the door of the Caledonian Asylum. Gwen was, as she evidently expected to be, admitted, and elected to stay, and now takes the entire establishment under her charge. Whence this foundling came, no one knows, but unlike the baby Caledonian girl who insists she is English, Gwen evidently knew her nationality, and in some way got to know the one place in London where she could trust to find, and had some right to make, a permanent home. She is a credit to the school, and seems to thoroughly understand this. One of her self-imposed duties is to escort visitors over the establishment. With the help of her tail she says as plainly as need be, whenever a halt is made, if everything doesn't please the visitor it ought to.



Digitized by Google

A HIGHLAND COMMUNION.

. By .
J. MACLEAY.

IT was grey dawn on a Thursday morning when we left Ardachullin to spend the Communion season at Lochmalash. Thirty miles is the distance between Ardachullin and Lochmalash, and our conveyance being a cart we looked forward to a late arrival.

It was grey dawn, I have said, as we left. Dense chilly mist hung low in the Big Strath. The air had a keen edge, only mitigated by the shrewd fragrance it bore us of the rich grass, the bog myrtle, and the belt of birches on Maldie side. The strath is empty as an evicting laird can make it, and for many miles the silence of our journey was only broken by the clanking of the cart, the clatter of Nancy's hoofs, and at regular intervals the alien call of the cuckoo. There is always a Sabbath stillness in the Highland glens, and those who have not felt the joy of peace and that silence which means intimacy with God should spend a season among the mountains. No wonder that the Gael is a man of mystery, full of reverence for that which is seen and unseen.

As we proceeded the mist cleared, trailing through the corries and from off the mountain peaks before a soft west wind, but here and there in sheltered places swathes lingered till the sun demolished them. The early chill died, and in the sunlight what was sombre became glad. In the hollow of the strath the sedate summer colours of a Highland landscape revealed themselves, and the grim mountain sides almost condescended to smile.

Out of the great open strath we turned into the Pass of Spears, with its birch-clad dripping precipices and its roaring burn. After the sunlight, the shade, the moist rocks, the luxurious greenery were a great refreshment, the more so since the road was soft to the wheels as a cushion.

For two miles does this dark pass extend—two miles memorable in history for a great fight; then we emerged into an undulating cultivated land. We passed townships of crofters, here and there a big farm; all over it seemed a district of reasonable prosperity. Such was the country till we reached Lochmalash.

A Highland Communion is far-reaching, and as we proceeded the road became busy with pedestrians and vehicles, all making for the Fast Day preaching at Lochmalash—the well-to-do farmer, the poor crofter, wives in a blaze of country finery, cailleachs in black shawl and spotless white mutch.

Lochmalash is a street of two dozen houses, with a smithy and a couple of general merchants' shops. Before we arrived the street was crowded like a fair, along the sides being rows of carts and carriages, from which the horses had been unyoked, and it seemed, judging from the number we had passed on the road, as if the stream of incomers were to continue for some time. Housing our horse and cart, we got what dinner we could at a relation's, with whom we were to stay over Sunday. The service had begun when we got to Cnoc Fraing.

The preacher occupied a movable box pulpit on a patch of green at the foot of the hill, and on the slope in front of him the congregation was seated. A picturesque scene must this big assembly on the hillside have appeared to the eye of a stranger. At the outskirts of the congregation was a shifting fringe. The preacher's voice did not reach that length, but even if it had the ceaseless muttered conversation on topics not exclusively religious, the snoring of some for whom the sun and a long journey were too much, would have effectually drowned it. From nearer the preacher, indeed, occasionally a man would rise and make his way to the outskirts for a drink of water or a smoke.

Digitized by Google

The service was in Gaelic, and everything connected with it was distinguished by length. The prayers seemed unending, and the old custom of chanting the line of the psalms seemed designed to fit in with the general tendency. But it was very beautiful to hear so many sweet homely voices at the old tunes. Here let me, as one who has lived much in England, utter a warning to Presbyterian ministers in that country. Their congregations are mostly composed of Scots folk, and yet, in my experience of their services, neglect of the metrical psalms and paraphrases and the old beautiful tunes is almost general. How often have I longed to hear "Ballerma" sung, to hear "Martyrdom," "Irish," "Rest," and many more splendid melodies hallowed to all who have known Scottish homes by innumerable memories. Your chanting of prose seems to me unfitted to your service; to have a large congregation pattering after a choir, rushing a dozen words into a bar or less is both pitiful and irritating. On this sunlit day it was glorious to hear the old tunes sung. We Highland folk sing in slow time, but that gives the old folk a chance to join in the praise, and that alone is a grand thing. To hear at the close of each line the thin solemn aged voices is to think of year-laden souls, glad in faith, for all that the inward fires are dwindling.

The preacher was an Argyllshire man, with the deep, rich voice which that country seems to produce. He was past middle age, yet abundantly vigorous, and his sermon lasted two hours. It was divided into eighteen heads, but, though that gives an impression of order, its matter was mightily comprehensive. There was little left untouched; the advice was robust, the admonition pointed, and the picture of punishment black as a brooding mind could make it. But the Highlander is not averse to strong meat, and he gets it. Almost personal attacks are too common on the West to call for remark. Even in an east coast town I have heard recently a congregation of grey beards called "brats of hell" by a young man fresh from Edinburgh, and not very long ago a certain Parliamentary candidate was denounced to his face before a large congregation by a leading Highland minister; this occurred in a town which I had better not mention.

It was evening when the service closed, a cloudless evening with no wind. But the quiet was disturbed by the departure of the people. The houses in the district were crowded with visitors for the Communion season, but all within reasonable driving and walking distance left.

Next day (Friday) was the "men's" day. "Speaking to the question" by "the men" is a dying institution. It consists in certain men of wide repute and ripe experience in religion speaking on a certain text, and Friday is allotted to this exhibition of lay eloquence. During recent years some of the most remarkable "men" in the Highlands have passed away, and it is because of the difficulty of filling their places that the institution is in process of decay. On this Friday, the weather being still fine, the service was again held in the open. A minister presided, and gave out the subject on which the men were to speak. That was about the last we heard of it. After some preliminary remarks on the text laid down, the "men" glided naturally into long impassioned harangues on vexed questions of theology and Church policy. The burden of it all was a lament for the backsliding of the age; the Higher Criticism, hymns, organs, certain Free Church professors, Principal Rainy, etc., were denounced in Gaelic language often more forcible than polite. One aged worthy launched into a tirade on Home Rule, the land question, and the discussion of a local right-of-way dispute. The manner in which he attempted to connect these extraneous topics with the subject for the day was solemnly ingenious. There was no protest on the part of the listeners. The other day a young minister pulled up one of the "men" for digressing; the satisfaction he got was bad thanks. The fact is the "men" like to talk and the people like to listen. By their discussion of current topics the "men" add piquancy to their addresses. To listen to and to watch these "men" speak—the remark applies to all the older class of Highland speakers—is exceedingly curious and to the stranger even comical. When they warm to their subject their utterance becomes like a chant, with a sing-song rise and fall that is broken only now and then by a groan, a grunt, or a sigh. It is a common thing too to see a speaker burst into tears and continue blubbering like a child for a considerable period of his discourse. One minister I knew never preached without crying, and as he had a round red face his appearance was exceedingly funny. There were sing-song utterances and crying on this Friday, and it was with unmistakable signs of a satisfactory experience that the service ended late in the afternoon and the people dispersed.

Digitized by Google

On Saturday there was another service, but clearly all were looking forward to the morrow. Then the Rev. W. Kerr, of K——, was to preach, and that meant an ingathering of the people from half the county. The Sabbath morning broke brightly, and a dusty and thirsty congregation began to assemble early in the forenoon. By midday, when the service began, there was an immense crowd. The hillside was packed, tier rose above tier, and on the outskirts, this time more remote than on the former occasions, was the same shifting fringe. I say again, with no intention to scoff, that length was a distinguishing feature of the service. The Highlander is not yet educated to short sermons. Even in the advanced burghs of the east coast, which regard the west as the "Hielans," length is often a saving quality. I remember how at communions in Inverness we used to take a pocket full of toast with us to munch when hunger attacked our young stomachs, and a lady of my acquaintance on turning to look at the church clock—it was five in the evening, and the service had lasted since twelve—was remonstrated with sharply from the pulpit: "Never mind the clock, my good woman," said the minister addressing her directly, "never mind the clock; you're in good time yet."

For all its length, this service was singularly beautiful, and to Highlanders an experience to cherish in remembrance. Mr. Kerr was as one inspired. He prayed with great feeling, and with a rich poetry of language which English cannot provide. And his sermon of an hour and a half, with its numerous heads—what shall I say of it? Excrescences it had doubtless, such as a south county congregation might rebel against, but its eloquence reached a lofty height. It was a sermon on the great solid lines of the old preachers; it revealed a man of deep insight, of sincere piety, of remarkable oratorical powers, and of strong prejudices. Nor was there wanting a shrewd practical humour, displayed in the choice of illustration, which was apt and easily comprehended. That he moved his hearers was patent, and if some dozed and some sly ones slept under sheltering bandanas there was sufficient excuse in the heat of the sun and the early start many must have made. It was interesting to note later on the various appreciations of the sermon. Most were acute and just in their praise; others belauded just those things which were trivial. For, when a Highlander grows to like a preacher, criticism is seldom indulged in, a remark which is borne out by a story I once heard. At a summer communion in an east coast town the doors of the church were left open so that the crowded congregation after their long journeying in the morning might cool themselves. After a while, however, the draught became so noticeable that the minister shouted in Gaelic to the beadle, "Shut the east door." When that was done he shouted "Shut the north door," and so with the west door. At the close of the service one old woman was heard to say to another, "An' wasn't he gran' aboot the doors!"

As is most often the case, there were several "tables" that day. They were "fenced" by a most solemn and touching address by Mr. Kerr. The elements were spread on a small table beside the preacher, the elders sitting round. The communicants came up almost reluctantly. The Highlander views with awe the breaking of the bread and the drinking of the wine; the small number of communicants in the Highlands is one of the most painful aspects of church life. Even if he be a church member the Highlander is often loth to go forward, and this day you might have seen the elders among the congregation arguing with some greybeard or some aged woman, whose sense of sin induced a needless humility. The hush which fell on the congregation during this part of the service was profound, and above Mr. Kerr's subdued voice you could hear the tinkle of the burn near by, the weird cheep of a stonechat, and the cackle of hens at the village.

The day dwindled to evening, and the sun was sinking into the bed of the western hills ere the last psalm was sung and the benediction pronounced. Then, however, was no time wasted. Then was a hurrying home of pedestrians, and those with carts and carriages set briskly about yoking their horses, and again was the peace of the twilight broken by the crunching of wheels and the clanking of hoofs.

Digitized by Google

Next day another service was held. It was, however, sparsely attended. Thursday and Sunday were the great occasions. To the Highlander these were memorable, and to a stranger they must have been memorable also, but curious as well. Ere long these great communions—feasts of preaching, religious carnivals—will seem curious to Highlanders themselves, for a new generation is rising; the old preachers and the "men" are passing away, and many old habits once cherished have now become of secondary concern in the heart of the young Gael.

THE HOSPITAL COLLECTION.

"Where are you going, my little maid?"
"I'm going c'llecting, sir," she said;
"But not for me," she added; "it's all
For the poor sick folks in the hospital."

I followed her down the garden walk;
I saw her smile, and I heard her talk.

"Pansies, have you some seeds to spare?
Thanks! How happy and good you are!

"Poppy, your box is full, I see,
Plenty for you and enough for me.

"And oh, you 'Sturtiums! Sure's I live,
You've two three four seven seeds to give!

"No seeds in your pockets, O Fleur-de-lis?
Why should you hide them, dear, from me?

"Sweet Peas, you darlings, you never hide;
You carry your pockets of peas outside.

"Next May I will scatter them here and there
And hit-or-miss in my garden square;

"And after a while the flowers will call:
'We're ready to go to the hospital.'"

Mary A. Lathbury.

Digitized by Google

MODEL VILLAGES.

By GEORGE A. WADE.

WE hear a great deal nowadays about the slums of our large towns and of the necessity for clearing them out and making more sanitary abodes for their densely-crowded people. But Corporations are proverbially apathetic, and it may be taken as certain that few of them will do anything towards the latter desirable object unless compelled. For too often the very members of the Corporations themselves own no small portion of those slums and fatten upon the tribute of blood and life that is annually paid by the inhabitants thereof to squalor and vice. Moreover, the Corporations are continually bewailing that they do not know how to improve such spots; that they are waiting to see how this or that scheme turns out.

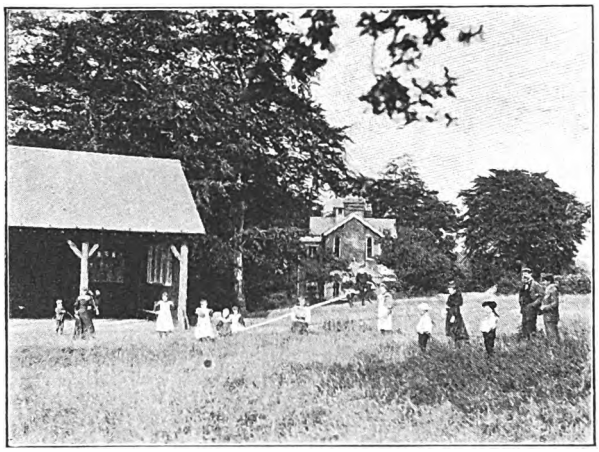
But there is no need to wait. There are at this very moment several "model villages" throughout our land of which we may be reasonably proud, where good and philanthropic men and women, using their wealth nobly, have shown what splendid homes working people may have to live in, and at no great cost either, where sanitary matters, pleasant surroundings, and charming attractions are all that one can desire. And it is my intention in this article to bring before the reader a few such spots, which if he has never seen I strongly advise him to visit some of them at the first opportunity.

Let us look first at Bournville, near Birmingham. This delightful village owes its origin and extension entirely to the magnificent efforts and kindness of the Messrs. Cadbury, the noted cocoa firm. They have here bought an immense estate and laid it out, built fine cottages for their workers, and given them, men and women, every pleasure that can be derived by any very wealthy men. The houses are of several varieties of architecture, so as to better please the eye; some are plain, some are finely ornamented with carving. But all are built after the best sanitary models, and gardens are attached to them all. Messrs. Cadbury allow the tenants to purchase them by a special system, if the latter wish, and many have taken advantage of this concession.

The roads are splendidly kept and arranged, and are named after trees in them. Thus we get Beech Road, Hazel Road, etc., which is a vast improvement upon the fantastic names of many town streets. And there are pretty parks for tired workers; there are almshouses for the aged who have grown old in the firm's employ; there is a magnificent old mansion, Bournville Hall, set apart entirely for the use of the girls of the cocoa mills. Here you may see them, happy and gay, playing tennis, sewing, walking leisurely amid the flower-beds in the hours of rest and recreation. Happy girls, I thought, how great the contrast between your lot and that of the women who forge chains not many miles away in the dark district of the Black Country!

ALMHOUSES AT BOURNVILLE.

Digitized by Google



BOURNVILLE: "SLUM" CHILDREN'S HOME OF REST.

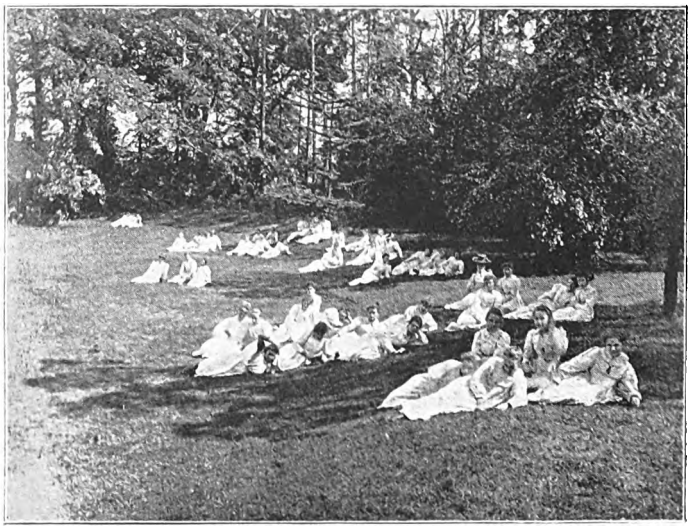
Then the village has a lovely cricket-field for the men, and a swimming-bath that would make a river-side club envious. For the cyclists of the firm there is a model track laid out, whilst a pretty brook that runs through the parks suggests all sorts of thoughts of peace and happiness to be found in lazy rambles along its meandering banks. I must mention also "The Beeches," a grand old house which has been dedicated to the children as a holiday home for the little ones from the Birmingham slums who come in relays during the summer, whilst in winter the same house does noble duty as a "Home of Rest" for the women-officers of the Salvation Army.

And all this wonderful village has cost the firm the sum of £200,000; at least that was stated lately by Mr. George Cadbury as the value of the estate at present. Fancy what can be done, therefore, for a quarter of a million pounds! Here it has made a village with 420 houses and shops; a village where life is delightful, healthy and pleasant. And yet our big town corporations go on squandering money ruthlessly, in millions, over miserable schemes of little or doubtful benefit to anybody except men with axes to grind; whereas for one single million pounds used after the style of Bournville, they could provide for nearly seven thousand people from their town slums, and place them in an earthly paradise!

Let us leave Bournville to visit a village of another kind, which is a model of what a sensible Board of Guardians can do. Thank God there is one such sensible Board in our country to-day, and let us pray there may soon be more such! The Chorlton Board of Guardians a year or two ago came to the conclusion that it was useless to go on talking about the evils of bringing up children in the workhouse as paupers, unless somebody "belled the cat," and made a beginning at taking them away from such pauper environment, and at training them to recognise themselves as respectable and responsible members of society.

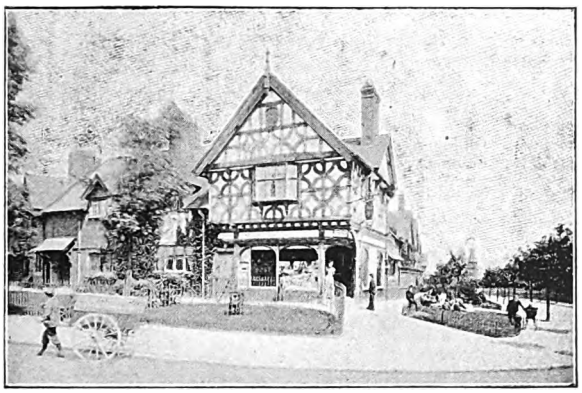
So the Chorlton Board of Guardians resolved upon a great scheme, which was no



BOURNVILLE: MID-DAY REST.

Digitized by Google

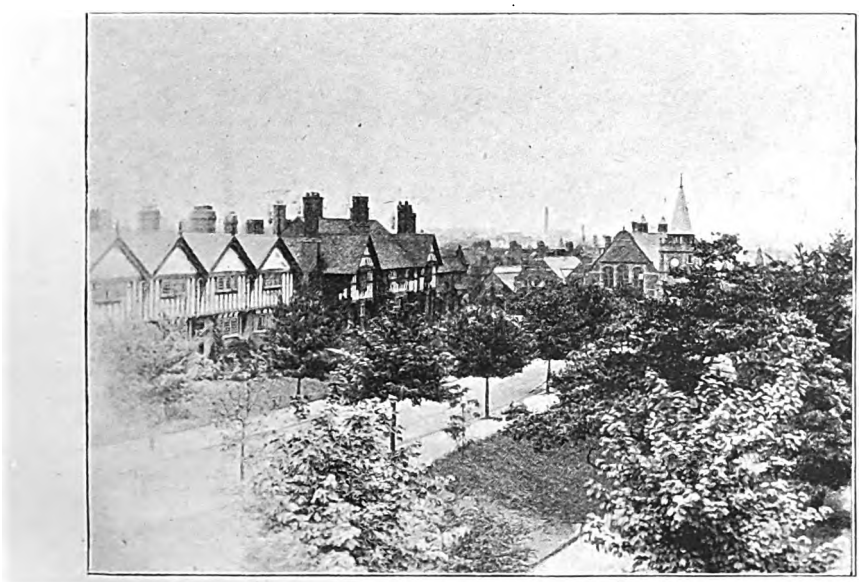
less than the making of a whole "model village" at Styal, in Cheshire. And bravely and well did they carry out their project. Go there and see what can be done with workhouse bairns, who have hitherto been the scorn of cynical folks, more's the pity. It cost £50,000 to do it, but never was money better spent, and Chorlton deserves the thanks of every Briton for its enterprise and its exhibition of what can be done by one sensible Board of Guardians.



POST OFFICE AND VILLAGE SHOPS, PORT SUNLIGHT.

There are some sixteen houses, twelve of which have twenty little ones in them, and the other four have ten. Each home is under the direct care and supervision of a kind, motherly woman, whom the children call by the name of "mother," and whom they dearly love. There is a lodge where newcomers are kept on probation for a fortnight before being drafted into one particular home, so that they may be placed in the house best suited to their individual characteristics. A large swimming bath is there also, and every child is taught to swim. Then a fine school, capable of accomodating about 500 children, is erected not far away, and it is intended that other boys and girls from the neighbourhood shall be allowed to go to this school, so as to keep the little charges of the Chorlton Board of Guardians in absolute touch with the busy world outside them.

The whole estate bought by the Board comprises fifty acres, and it is, I believe, the intention of the Board that the lads in the village shall use a good portion of the land in an agricultural capacity (thus learning a trade, if we may call it so, besides gaining health and strength), under capable instructors, and have the chance to become useful gardeners or farm-workers.



PORT SUNLIGHT.

Digitized by Google

Bravo, Chorlton! How much better and grander is all this than that wonderful system we know so well of keeping boys and girls in Oliver Twist fashion, and making them walk in the streets with those little Scotch caps and short corduroy jackets that have become as much the recognised pauper garb as has the broad-arrow suit that of the convict! Let us hope that many towns will send deputations to see Styal village, and then follow our Lord's advice to the lawyer, and "Go, and do likewise."

Whilst we are still near the River Dee let us look at a model village, which may well be termed a "wonder of later days." Here, only twelve years since, there was a long bare strip of land by the Dee which was supposed to be useless and was disregarded. Yet it is to-day a thriving town whose inhabitants number thousands, and who live in a charming place that might well be the envy of folks whose riches runs into the four figures very high up. The transformed strip is now "Port Sunlight."

ILFORD VILLAGE.

Here, as in Bournville, it has been wisely deemed important to select the names of the streets with some regard to appropriateness. Hence we have such as Greendale-road, etc. It may be of interest to state that the length of wide roadways alone in Port Sunlight is over three and a half miles, and when one remembers that every few yards of these roads are planted with sycamore, poplar, chestnut, and elm trees, one easily sees how much such streets resemble the boulevards of Continental cities of renown.

The model cottages are of red brick, with red tiles, and lattice windows that give that look of country life so peculiar to such English cottages. And then the delightful gardens, with the clumps of yellow lilies, mignonette, and lupins, and their beds of geraniums, calceolarias, and begonias, what pictures of ease and comfort they are? The rent, too, for such a pretty house would make the average Londoner stare in wonder. You can get a capital cottage, with room, kitchen, four bedrooms, and bathroom, for from four to five shillings a week. Lucky and happy are the dwellers in Port Sunlight, and rightly has that spot been named.

In this model village there are allotment gardens; a man with a desire for a garden to grow his own peaches or cabbages, can have ten perches of land, with water laid on, for five shillings a year! Pretty and clean as Sunlight can make them, also, are the village shops. In the words of a North country phrase, "You could eat off the floor!" These village shops are managed on a special system by a company, and even of the profits the residents of Port Sunlight get some benefit. Lawn-tennis grounds and charming walks have been laid out by the owners of the place, Messrs. Lever Brothers, for their employees, and such adjuncts to community life as a girl's institute and day and Sunday-schools are there in the shape of buildings that would be a credit to such large towns as Newcastle or Plymouth. The Central Hall of the schools, a splendid apartment, is open each Sunday for religious services, and is lent alternately to ministers and evangelists of various denominations. Crowded congregations are the rule, for men and women go to church with pleasure and thankful hearts when their lot is cast in such pleasant spots as these.

Digitized by Google

SALTAIRE : ALMSHOUSES.

There is a lovely little dell on the estate, as dear a little spot as any lovers could wish, and this is known as Sunlight Park. The firm has recognised that lovers will always exist, and it has made this dell a favoured place for charming walks. And no artist or cyclist ever passes through Port Sunlight without being struck by the prettiness of that "little bit" where the village post office stands at the corner of what is called Park Road.

Like Messrs. Cadbury Bros., the Lever firm intends its employees to have time to enjoy all the good things provided for them, and so everybody on the estate works only eight hours daily unless there is some very occasional special reason for doing otherwise. For winter there is the large Gladstone Hall, opened by the late famous statesman, and here theatrical performances, concerts and important lectures are given. Happy workers who can live under such model conditions!

A STREET IN ILFORD VILLAGE.

Shall we now travel quickly to another lovely model village, this time only just well away from London's smoke, yet a revelation to the impotent Boards of Guardians and similar bodies in the Metropolis, would they only once awaken from their lethargy and really care for the poor and the children instead of feasting? Look some day at

Digitized by Google

Ilford, and you will see the most pathetic and beautiful sight you can ever hope to see, if you view it with the right eyes. Here is Dr. Barnardo's village-home for girls who have been the scum and sweepings of the streets of our big cities. But you cannot recognise them as such when you see their beautiful, bright happy faces on this June morning at Ilford. It seems incredible that every one of these 500 girls came from homes where the father, very often, was a villain of deepest dye or where the mother was a terrible drunkard and sometimes even worse. What homes to be born and brought-up in these girls had before they came here! Oaths, blows, sin, and crime were their daily environment. Now, look at them at Ilford. Clean as new pins, nicely behaved, well-spoken, polite, educated, bright, cheerful, and taught to become happy and respectable workers in various fields of labour as they grow up—what a village this is!

There are thirty cottages on the estate, with a house for the governor. All these enclose a large rectangular plot of land, where are a grass square and shrubbery. Each house has, of course, its own garden and courtyard, and over each house is a "mother" just as at Styal, whose arrangements were somewhat modelled on those at Ilford. The cottages here at Ilford are each named after some flower; hence we get such pretty titles as "Myrtle," "Ivy," "Bluebell," and other "Cottages." Then there is the school, the laundry, the church, and many other adjuncts to a village of this kind, such as the hospital. But how well it speaks for the sanitation and healthiness of such a spot that not 2 per cent. of these children suffer serious illness after coming here; yet recollect they come from London's deepest slums, from Birmingham's worst districts, from Bristol's vilest streets. Pale faces and crippled limbs often disappear almost as by a magician's wand, rosy looks and straight bodies take their place.

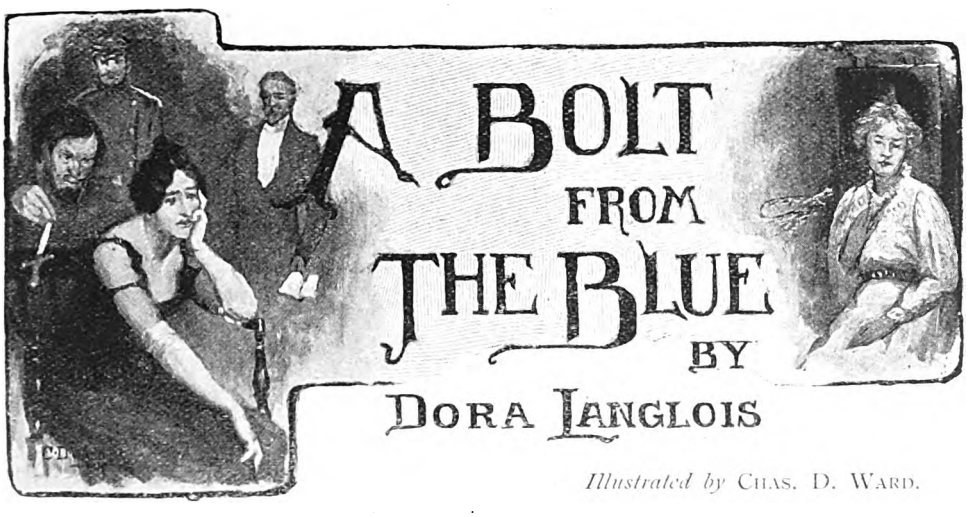
Plenty of room for each dwelling, plenty of fresh air, plenty of water for personal and domestic use, plenty of food, good and strengthening, perfect sanitation; these are the foundations of all "model" villages, and Ilford has them in abundance.

And we cannot omit mentioning the first "Model Village" built in this country, though now it has blossomed out into a town, it is so large. I refer, of course, to Saltaire, near Bradford. When the late Sir Titus Salt, the great Yorkshire philanthropist, first conceived the idea of building a village where his workmen could live under conditions equal to those that surrounded himself, he little dreamt what a revolution he was beginning. Nor did he foresee what a great place his village on the River Aire was destined to become. Salt-Aire he named it, after himself and the river, and he little expected to see it develop as it has done. He built everything his workmen could desire to make life happy and pleasant. And he built everything well and pretty. Lovely almhouses; a charming set of schools, which are now amongst the first in the country for "higher education"; a splendid chapel; delightful cottages; a pretty park; what more could any worker want at his master's expense?

Wide streets and excellent sanitary conditions; plenty of room and healthy surroundings; these were the mottoes of Sir Titus Salt. And he saw his own neighbours raise a statue to him whilst living, which is what only two or three Britons have ever done. His was the real original "Utopia" that Sir Thomas More dreamt of in "Model Villages"; the forerunner of such others as I have been describing in this article.

There are several other places in our islands that deserve a passing notice, and are worth quoting as model spots in these or other respects. There is Whippingham, in the Isle of Wight, on her Majesty's estate, where our Sovereign sees that each house is what it ought to be to insure health and comfort. There is Castle Howard in Yorkshire, where the well-known philanthropic Countess of Carlisle has acted as woman-guardian, school-board member, and in other capacities, but is best known as one who sees that her village is a "model" one in so far as she can make it so. The Isle of Man may be also quoted as a model in two things; it has no pawnbrokers and no "Sunday" public-houses. Would we could say the same of England and Wales, of Scotland and Ireland! We should be happier for it.

Digitized by Google



A BOLT FROM THE BLUE

BY

DORA LANGLOIS

Illustrated by CHAS. D. WARD.

SYNOPSIS OF OPENING CHAPTERS.

Frank Osborne, a rich man with socialistic ideas, has become entangled with a certain Helga Katiskoff, who passes for a widow. His sister Maria and his cousin Eva are in Paris with him at the time. Eva is in love with Frank herself, but stifles her feelings, and endeavours to help him with Helga, who is avoided by persons in good society. Though Frank does not know it, Helga's husband is still alive, in an inebriates' home. She herself is a member of a formidable secret society, and has in the past plotted against Russia for the liberation of Poland. The members of the society look upon her entanglement with Frank Osborne with dislike, as in case of marriage she would be lost to them.

CHAPTER V.

FRANCIS OSBORNE and his sister Maria had brought their young relative, Eva Rayne, to Paris to complete her course of art studies, and after Paris she was to go on to Rome. No one seeing the girl, so shy, quiet, and even simple, would have given her credit for the power she really possessed. Maria frankly called her ambition "all moonshine," but regarded her art-work as a safety-valve for a romantic disposition. Her brother, on the contrary, had abundant faith, and it was to his encouragement that Eva owed her success, for without him she would never have dared to persevere.

On the morning, however, on which Miss Osborne had got rid of her that she might have an opportunity of giving her brother "a piece of her mind," Eva was not doing well.

"It will not do," she said, despondently, falling back from her easel with a sigh. "It is as flat as a pancake and as hard as nails. I cannot paint it to-day."

She lifted the canvas down and began to wipe her brushes, then slowly turned to a corner cupboard, unlocked it, took out another unfinished work, and set it before her on the easel.

"One can only paint what one feels," she said to herself, "and this—this—— I should have less power than I have if I could make this hard and unreal."

She took up her brushes again and fell to work, at first slowly and critically, then with an eager intentness, a complete absorption, in her subject, a male head which, even in its unfinished state, was an excellent portrait of her cousin, Francis Osborne; a portrait, too, that was not crude and laboured, but full of suggestion and sentiment.

"Oh! you are at that again, Eva. Well, you may as well leave it, it won't be wanted yet."

"Not wanted?"

"No, not wanted," Maria, who had entered, reiterated. "It was to be a present to the bride, wasn't it? Well, Madame Katiskoff will not require it, I fancy."

Eva turned round, her eyes, usually so gentle, blazing fiercely.

Digitized by Google

"So," she said, "you have repeated that wretched story, and separated Frank from the only woman he cares for."

"Naturally I've done it. I'm always to blame. No, my dear, you needn't excite yourself. Frank, it seems, knew all about it, and——"

"Frank knew?"

"Yes, and he's just as big an idiot as ever over the woman, with this difference, that now his folly is almost criminal."

"Don't talk to me like that," Eva retorted. "I don't like it. And please go away, Maria. I can't work with you about, you fidget me."

The elder lady moved to the door. "Of all the ungrateful girls in all the world," she said, "I think you are the worst," then, shutting the door with a bang, she retired.

Lest the point of her remark might escape the reader, it will be as well to state at once that Miss Osborne thought Eva ought to have been grateful to her for the bitter opposition she had displayed towards her brother's union. That brother's very existence was the chief of all her grievances. Not only had he robbed her, as she considered, of their late father's estate, but his known age (thirty), so to speak, proclaimed hers within a year or two, as the late Recorder had been ten years a widower before he espoused his second wife.

"You little fool!" she said, as she stood outside the door, apostrophising the absent Eva. "You little fool! Do you think I'm as blind as Frank is? Do you think I don't know? Do you think I haven't heard you crying your heart out every night? Why, you're head and ears in love with him, and with your baby prettiness and your great eyes you might have caught him. You might catch him yet; and there you go playing sister to this adventuress, and missing your best chances. Well, wait till he runs away with her, and then let us see how you'll like it. I shan't regret it for one thing, for it will just serve you right."

* * * * *

The bright summer day had faded into dusk, and Helga Katiskoff was again waiting for the advent of her lover. She had made herself strangely, almost weirdly beautiful to receive him. But he did not advance towards her; his greeting was cold and constrained.

"Have you news for me?" she asked, lightly, determined not to notice his change of manner. "Have you succeeded?"

"No," he replied, "I have no news—at least, none that will be news to you; but I am in a position to hand you something which you may be able to return to its proper owner."

He was holding in his hand a paper. As he extended it to her, she saw that it was a portion of a letter, and that it was covered with her own writing.

Her very heart turned cold. What was this? What dead leaf of the past had the winds of fate blown to this man's feet? Yet she extended her hand and took the paper calmly, read it, and as calmly put it down. She was too wise to snatch at it or to seek to destroy that which convicted her, in spite of the impotent rage and despair which had seized her and was consuming her heart.

"Ah!" she said; "you have read this?"

He nodded.

"I thought better of you," she remarked. "Come, let us destroy it and forget such bagatelles."

He did not heed the last part of her speech, but retorted on the first in a tone of deep reproach:

"You thought better of me? You! When it reached my hands addressed in a cunning facsimile of your writing I thought it came from you and read it in good faith. You thought better of me! No, by Heaven, it is I who thought better of you! A man who has been allowed to offer such a love as mine to such a woman as you has been wronged—yes, wronged and outraged, too."

She dropped into a chair and arranged her draperies with a swift turn of her wrist.

"I took your love as I found it," she answered. "I did not make it."

"No, but you accepted it without letting me have an inkling of the truth."

"Most women do that, and all men," she answered, "otherwise Heaven would have few marriages to make."

"What do you mean?" he demanded.

"What I say," she retorted. "Have you told me every step of your past career?"

"There is nothing in it that might shame me," he answered.

"Possibly not," she said. "For men and women the standard is different. Be reasonable, my friend, do not make me a jealous scene. Granted, I am unworthy of the respect you gave me. I admit it. Why, then, argue the question? We are all unworthy when found out. Still, I love you, and I am only yours. Put that precious document in your pocket. It is a manly thing, much loved of your sex, to have some little whip manufactured by the past with which to lash a loving woman. For does it not give you the advantage when you wish to play truant yourselves?"

Digitized by Google

"A loving woman!" he repeated, fiercely catching up the letter. "A very loving woman, who, on the day, some six weeks since, on which she consented to become my wife, wrote thus to another man."

"A pretty phrase," she said, nodding her head, "but meaningless, in one sense. I never loved the man, though he loved me far better than you do."

"A pretty phrase, indeed!" he persisted, determined not to let her lead him into side issues, "coming from a woman newly betrothed to another." And with cutting irony he read the words the paper contained: "'Adieu, my friend, or rather au revoir. On the long journey which lies before you carry as a talisman upon your heart the memory of the brief fortnight which we spent together at Naples, when life was to both of us a poem.—Yours until death, HELGA.'"

"'Yours until death,'" she repeated, calmly, "Well, the man is dead."

"Like your husband?" he queried, sarcastically. "How many others are there, Helga, who are dead to you—that is to say, forgotten?"

"I could wish," she murmured," that my husband might be even as that man is."

"Still, as you bid him not good-bye but au revoir, my only resource is to retire lest he should return to life as suddenly as he has quitted it. Believe me, I neither desire nor intend to dispute supremacy with any man."

HE SAW HER STANDING LIKE A STATUE.

In his excitement he had turned up the Persian prayer-rug which she had thrown over the wine stain on the carpet left by that strange libation of theirs to fate.

She advanced upon him, terrible in her beauty and passion as a fallen angel, pointing downwards to the mute emblem of their compact.

Digitized by Google

"It that means that you would break with me," she said, "consider. Because you have fallen into an error of judgment, does it excuse a breach of faith?"

"An error of judgment?" he echoed. "Say rather that I was deceived. What man not steeped in vice could have believed——"

She was drawing nearer to him, intent on bringing him to her feet again.

"I am what fate has made me," she said. "If I deceived you, if I accepted what you offered, it was that I might not pain you with the truth. It was for love, the first, as it will be the last, of my life. I deny nothing, I only ask for pardon. I am no longer your equal; I am nothing but the woman who loves you."

Putting her away with a motion of the hand, he answered, "I care for no love on which I cannot depend. And as for yours, it would seem that this man to whom you wrote has a prior claim."

When he set her aside, and looked for the first time coldly on her beauty, she felt her cause was lost; but with the boldness of despair she continued—

"That letter was written to a man who bored me insufferably. I was forced to take him to Naples on an errand which was pressing. It was necessary, no matter why, that he should go there. He would not go unless to follow me. I went, he followed, and——"

"Managed to transact your business and still spend a fortnight of idyllic bliss?"

"Bah! A fortnight of utter weariness! driven there and kept there by the fear of those men from whom none but an Englishman can ever save me."

She had touched the right chord at last. For the first time he wavered. He looked with pity on her, and pity, she dared to hope, would be the stepping-stone back to love."

"Ah! That fortnight, that hateful fortnight!" she muttered between her teeth.

"You do not so name it in your letter," he said, turning his eyes from her, and trying to steel his heart.

"What foolish reiteration!" she cried. "You have seen one portion only of that letter, I will tell you of the rest. I was forced to write it. When we returned from Naples another errand was found for him. He would not obey the brotherhood. I and I only could bid him go. That letter, that verbal sugar-plum, which you, my friend, find so hard to swallow, was the bribe which paid his services to others. He went, he did his duty. He will never return to ask for further recompense. He will trouble us no more."

"It is only six weeks ago," he murmured, in an awe-struck whisper, "and you can speak of him without remorse."

"Pity! Remorse!" she cried. "No, my pity is for myself. Why should his folly have made of me an unwilling tool?"

She looked more noble in the abandonment of her despairing energy than ever before. But a new horror had fortified his heart against her.

"Where did you send this man?" he demanded.

"You torment me," she answered. "There are some things even a jealous man should let alone. I might tell things I would not have you know for worlds, for I love you, and knowledge is not always power; it is sometimes slavery or death."

"Where did you send him?" he reiterated, his eyes searching hers.

"Let us say to the North Pole," she answered. "In truth, the place is far enough from here. He is dead; let that suffice."

He laid his hand upon her firmly, touching her for the first time during their interview, but not with a lover's touch.

"Deal honestly for once," he hissed. "The man is not dead, he is on his way to Siberia."

"Who knows?" she answered trembling. "He may have reached his journey's end by now, Heaven, Hell, Siberia. No matter, he is gone. I would that I might so be rid of all the tangled and unhappy past."

"That can never be, Helga," he insisted. "What! Can you contemplate a life of love while he is trudging over plains of snow in chains?"

"Why not?" she cried. "I—I, too, have risked that to which I sent him."

He shivered and drew from her. "Never with me, then," he said, slowly. "I could not bear such a spectre on my hearth. Good-bye, and may God forgive you."

"Your oath!" she panted. "Your oath!"

"I'll keep it," he said, firmly. "Have no fear that I shall forget. Now that I know what a woman can do, what she can confess without a blush, without a heart-pang, I shall have little enough desire to make any woman my wife. Come, let me go," he added, for she had laid a trembling hand upon his arm. "Some day I may forget the wrong you have done me."

Digitized by Google

"So be it," she answered, slowly, unclasping his arm and drawing back. "I release you; go! I shall suffer, but so too must you. God alone knows what lies before me, but that is no longer anything to you. Go, leave me. Love if you can or dare, you will but find my kisses on other lips. The past is dead, but it lies above ground unburied. Adieu, my friend, or rather au revoir. Believe me, we shall meet again."

He reached the door. Turning he saw her standing like a statue, her hands clasped on her bosom, her long robes falling round her white as a shroud. He closed the door and went his way bearing the memory in his heart, but little dreaming that he should ever see her thus again in the self-same robe, her hands thus crossed upon her bosom, her face as chill and cold.

He was gone, and she was alone.

"Darkness, darkness!" she cried. "Let it cover my loss!" And with a swift impulse she touched a little button and shut off the light of the electric lamps which had shone upon her degradation, then flung herself upon the Persian prayer-rug, and lay there in her despair.

How long she lay there she could not tell, but at last the door opened, and she heard the footfall of a newcomer. Someone half-stumbled over her, then passed a hand over her face and figure inquiringly.

"Comrade, how is this?" It was the master's voice.

"Let me be," she answered, sullenly. "You and you only could have saved that letter when all the rest were burnt. You sent it on its mission. This is your work."

"All work is good that is done for the cause," was the gentle reply.

"And could you have found no other work for me," she cried, "than that errand to Naples? Did I not offer you my life, and risk it, too? Was not that enough? Why, why should you also have demanded the sacrifice of my honour?"

"Honour!" the master answered, calmly. "Honour? There is no such thing. Honour is a word, a phrase, invented by the tyrants against whom we fight, that with it they may persecute those who have it not according to their code."

"Who says their code is wrong?" she demanded, hotly. "I had it till you made my beauty a snare for fools. I had it and have lost it, and with it my eternal happiness."

He was silent for a moment before he answered, slowly, "Granted that such a thing exists, and that you owned it once, it was not yours, it belonged to the cause. Humanity is our cause, the world is our cause. Therefore what you gave, seeing that it never belonged to you, you did not lose, neither is it extinguished. It is now as much yours as ever it was, inasmuch as you yourself are part of that human race to which you surrendered it. There was surrender but no sacrifice; there can be no sacrifice in duty, comrade. The blind multitude sacrifice to pleasure, to avarice, to self-esteem, but duty only claims her own. As for eternal happiness there is no such thing; for there is no eternity."

"I tell you," she said, "that I had found happiness enough for me. You have robbed me of it. Denounce me to the three as a renegade; I will never more do your bidding."

"You forget," he replied. "I am master of the ten. All others must denounce the one who wavers or deviates never so little from the path. Mine is the right to hold my peace and pluck the brand from burning. I will never denonnce you, comrade, while your glorious ability remains to be saved for us."

"It is useless," she said. "My past has ended. To-night I died."

"To him," he persisted, "but not to the cause from which he would have seduced you. What! Did you dream that I would let you be his wife to breed hereditary enemies to us?"

"Humanity is his cause as much as it is ours," she retorted. "He works in his own way, but he uses other weapons."

"He who is not with us is against us. Forget him, comrade. He has left you. Ask your reason can you ever bring him to your side again? You know you cannot."

Slowly the woman raised her head, and, dashing the tears from her eyes, extended her hand to him in the darkness.

"Take me," she said, "do with me as you will. I belong now and for ever to the cause."

CHAPTER VI.

Private view at the Royal Academy, a function not designed for any appreciation of the year's harvest of art, but as a grand display of spring millinery, and a gathering together of social forces on the eve of the great summer campaign.

Digitized by Google

"There's positively nothing worth seeing this year," remarked one not particularly gorgeous female, who seemed rather out of place in the crush of smart people. "It's very disappointing; I can't see anything new at all."

"Disappointing! Do you think so, my dear?" remonstrated her companion, a large woman in black satin and jet sequins, who looked as if she had been melted down and poured into her tight-fitting gown.

"I was referring to the pictures," the other explained.

"Oh! The pictures! There never is anything new. There are Mr. So-and-So's cows, and Mr. So-and-So's sheep, and somebody's else's sand bank and weeds, and the other man's mountains with mist on them; and, of course, a host of undressed figures—one knows exactly what to expect in the pictures. Thank Heaven! I haven't got to do them," and the lady dropped her pencil and swept the crowd again with her lorgnette.

"Who is the girl in white—that very young thing who looks half frightened?"

"Don't know her, my dear; don't know her from Adam! She must be an artist, I suppose, or something of that sort."

The lady's tone implied that "something of that sort" meant a very inferior kind of biped uninteresting to the student of social zoology.

"The man she is with seems to attract a good deal of attention."

The lady journalist wheeled round, intent on capturing a male celebrity with whom to vary her paragraphs on petticoats.

"I declare it's Francis Osborne!" she said. "I must find out who the girl is."

"But who is Francis Osborne?"

"Oh, he is not of any great importance, but people are interested in him. A line about him would not be out of place. You've positively no idea how careful we have to be in this sort of work; to give a line to anybody not positively in the swim is mortally to offend all the other people whose names you have down; besides, it lowers the tone of one's journal so. Still, Mr. Osborne will do. I'll risk him. They say that Lady Emilia Datchet is head and ears in love with him."

"Perhaps his companion is Lady Emilia?" suggested the country mouse, with roused interest.

"Gracious! No, my dear. Don't you think I should know Lady Emilia?"

The loquacious lady turned away to seek information, just as Francis Osborne, with the object of her speculation on his arm, passed by. The twelvemonth that had gone since that night in Paris when he broke his chains had aged him in appearance; he had lost his boyish air and fined down in some way difficult to describe. Still, there was nothing gloomy in his bearing; it was only more subdued.

"Don't look at your catalogue, Frank," his companion was saying. "Don't look at it yet. I've something to tell you."

"I was not going to look at my catalogue, Miss Marplot," he answered, looking down at the girl beside him with a smile. "Observe that I am carrying it religiously closed. I was making straight for a certain picture (No. 506, I think it is), and, arrived before it, I was going to strike an attitude, and exclaim: 'By Jove! The best bit in the gallery! Who is the man?'"

"I sent it in," the girl went on hurriedly, "never thinking it would be successful. When it was accepted I hardly believed it, and felt sure that its fate would be to be crowded out."

"Is it so very big then?"

"It looked big in the studio. I daresay it looks like a cabinet photo here. I don't know; I didn't come to see it on varnishing day."

"Upon my word, Eva, you look like some feminine Eugene Aram, compelled to visit the scene of your crime! Are you afraid of seeing the work beside those of your big brothers in art?"

"Oh, no, I'm not afraid of that."

"Then what is it? Why don't you look gay? You are certainly not the typical young artist before the shrine of new-born success."

"I—I only want you to be pleased, and I am not sure you will be."

"Am I such a stern critic then?" He spoke lightly, his eyes roving over the walls for the figures in the corner of each frame. Suddenly he arrested himself, and stood with the girl on his arm before a moderately large canvas, hung but little above the line.

"Ah, this is the picture!"

Digitized by Google

"Yes." The girl cast one hasty glance at her work, and then fixed her eyes on her companion's face as he stood steadfastly regarding it.

It was not daringly original either in treatment or in the selection of the subject; but it had a tenderness and grace which spoke for it. The lines which gave a title to the work, and followed the number on the catalogue, were those familiar to the world,—

> The stately ships sail on to the haven under the hill,
> And oh! for the touch of a vanished hand and the sound of a voice that is still.

Under a shimmering sky on a wooded promontory, beyond which gleamed an inlet of the sea, a woman in widow's weeds sat with her head resting on her hands. That was all the picture contained; a suggestion of the joyousness of nature, in bright, clear atmosphere, verdant foliage, and sparkling water, and on the woman's face traces of passion burnt out, and the lassitude of an unutterable loss.

"You have done well, Eva; your picture deserves its place." The man spoke at last gravely and slowly.

"Ah! But you do not forgive me for having painted it."

They had both turned away, as if by mutual consent, and had mingled again with the crowd.

"Forgive? I have nothing to forgive. Just for a moment the resemblance struck me into silence, that was all. You see, you had told me nothing; I did not expect to see that face here. When I get used to the idea I shall go back and look at it with pleasure. It is not fair to rob you of your well-earned triumph."

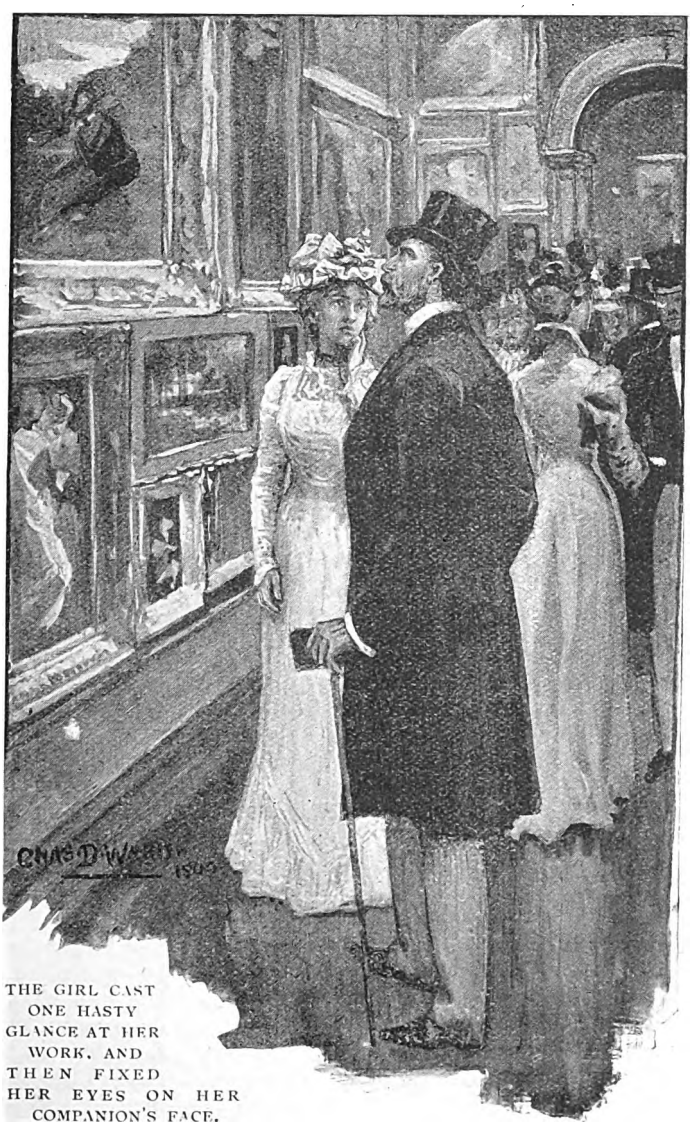
"Frank, you are trying to comfort me, but I believe I have made your heart bleed. My triumph is dust and ashes."

"I have spoilt your joy, and I blame myself."

"Take me away, Frank. Let us get away and go home."

He led her down the broad stairs, placed her in his little victoria, and took the seat beside her.

"I could not help it, Frank. The resemblance to Helga came into the picture without my meaning it. One tries to paint beauty, and one unconsciously paints what one has seen. And then when



THE GIRL CAST ONE HASTY GLANCE AT HER WORK, AND THEN FIXED HER EYES ON HER COMPANION'S FACE.

Digitized by Google

Maria noticed it, I said to myself, 'Why not? If Frank has ceased to care he will not grudge me the loan of her beauty, but if his heart reproaches him for anything he has done, perhaps this may help him to listen to its pleadings.' Hearts may be widowed, Frank, without either marriage or death; the truest widows sometimes have neither ring nor weeds."

"My heart, Eva? For God's sake don't appeal to that! Your picture has gone too near already. This is no case of pride or pique or prejudice. The barrier between Helga and myself must not be removed. Every day of all these weary months I have had to rebuild the breaches my untutored nature has essayed to make."

The girl made no reply, but, heedless of the throng of vehicles and the crowd about them, burst into tears.

"Eva, forgive me! I feel as though I had murdered a child of yours. It was not your painting her that cut me; it was not even the suddenness of the thing. It was that you painted her like that.

He broke off, and passed his hand across his brow, recalling the cold, defiant ring of her voice when she spoke of the unknown lover whom she had sacrificed to the cause.

"You do not think she suffers then apart from you?"

"I did not think so."

His answer showed that his conviction had at least been shaken. He was asking himself was it possible that her face could wear that still expression of absolute hopeless, endless grief?

There was silence between them for a little space, and presently he woke from his vague and troubled day-dream to consciousness of the fact that someone was hailing them from the pavement. He made a sign to his coachman, and the victoria drew up; then casting a hurried glance at Eva, who had mastered herself, and was sheltering her face with her sunshade, he extended his hand to the foot-passenger who had stopped them.

"Oh, Mr. Osborne, Miss Rayne! How awfully jolly to see you again!" exclaimed that individual, a very young man, little more, in fact, than an overgrown schoolboy. "Of course, you won't remember meeting us in Paris. Mother and Diana and me, you know."

"On the contrary, I remember you very well, Mr. Trevor," Osborne answered. "How are you all?"

"Very well, thank you, and it's awfully jolly of you to say so; about remembering us, I mean. We've heard that Miss Rayne's got a picture exhibited, and we're going to see it to-morrow. We're awfully pleased. By George, we are! No chance for us at the private view. You've just been, I suppose?"

The boy stammered a little, and grinned a good deal.

"Yes, yes, we have just returned," Osborne said, casting a hasty glance again at Eva, who had turned her head away.

The boy turned red. "Perhaps the picture is crowded out, or skied, or something," he thought, "and I have made a fool of myself." Redder and more uncomfortable he grew every second, and at last made a desperate plunge again into conversation.

"We've been abroad again; mother and Di and I. Rome, Vienna, St. Petersburg, and lots of places; and that reminds me, we saw Madame Katiskoff there, and she wasn't looking over well."

"You saw Madame Katiskoff! Where?"

"Oh! Didn't I say? At St. Petersburg, of course. And we thought, that is mother and Diana thought, that she wasn't looking——"

"How long ago was that?"

"Why—why, in M—March," stammered Bertie Trevor, "but per—perhaps she wasn't looking ill a—a—after all."

"Give our compliments to your mother and sister, Mr. Trevor, and——"

"Good—good morning. Mustn't detain you. So—so sorry," and poor Bertie, hot and confused, he scarce knew why, melted away into the crowd as the little victoria rolled on.

A heavy groan escaped from Osborne's lips. "In St. Petersburg!" he said. "In St. Petersburg! My God! How awful."

Eva turned to him a startled, appealing face. "Frank," she said, "what is it?"

"Heaven knows," he answered. "Heaven only knows. But I fear, I fear——"

He interrupted himself to lean suddenly forward and take her hand.

"Eva, help me," he said. "Once before I appealed to Maria, and she refused. If she had consented then, I might never have learnt what it would have been better for a human soul never to know. It is a case of life and death now. Will you help me?"

Digitized by Google

"Frank, tell me what must be done, and I will do it."

"O God! To think that a plain English spinster like Maria might with hardly an effort have averted what may prove a national calamity, a—a terrible crime. But no, no; it was two months ago; nothing has happened; perhaps she is no longer there."

"What do you intend, Frank? Are you going to seek her?"

"Yes. I must; I must."

"And if you find her, you will forgive?" The girl's voice was very low and faint.

"No," he answered firmly. "Not in your sense."

"Frank, she will accept nothing less of you."

"She would not have accepted in the old time; but now, perhaps, she may."

"I doubt it."

"I never offered it. We parted in anger. Because my own soul was full of wrath, resentment against her, and rebellion against what had to be, I never saw my duty. Eva, my burden is a heavy one. I must find her and bring her to England. She must live always near me; she must never wander, as it were, out of arm's reach; and yet, save for this silent watch which must not be relaxed, the circle of our lives must never meet. I don't ask you if you understand this; I ask you to accept it without explanation."

"I understand nothing, but will accept it."

"It will be misunderstood, and generally misconstrued. Maria, who might be our greatest strength, will be our greatest stumbling-block, but you will promise, if I bring Helga back, to be our friend, to make the hard life I propose at least possible for both of us? Can you, young as you are and happy, with all the world before you, make such a sacrifice?"

"Yes," she said, firmly. "I can, and will."

In speaking of sacrifice, he meant the sacrifice of her time, the sacrifice of placing herself in opposition to public opinion; but when she accepted the trust it was something infinitely more than all this which she surrendered, and the surrender was all the more complete because he for whom it was made did not know how much it cost.

CHAPTER VII.

"So Miss Rayne is to be a celebrity after all?"

"It seems so," Maria Osborne answered, grimly. "I must say no one has been more surprised than I. I never expected it, myself."

Of course she had not; whoever does expect the coming of fame to a near relative? Is not the world's first emotion always one of surprise, when it wakes up one fine morning to find that it has entertained—or more probably given the cold shoulder to—the angel of celebrity all unawares.

Miss Osborne was speaking to her greatest friend and crony, an ex-schoolfellow, who had committed matrimony and the additional folly of having five unmanageable and unmarriageable daughters.

"By the way, my dear," inquired her friend, stifling a weary yawn, "what has your brother been doing this season? I've hardly seen him anywhere."

"For pity's sake, don't ask me what Frank has been doing," responded Miss Osborne, peevishly. "How should I know? I did think that now Eva has ceased to drag us about the Continent in pursuit of art, he would have settled down; but no, he comes up for a season for the first time in several years, and leaves us suddenly for some whim to go to St. Petersburg. He has been there and back three times already. He came home yesterday. I was quite alone, for Eva has been with some friends; she returns today, and then we shall leave town. Let me offer you some tea. One of the maids will serve it. You know our peculiar domestic arrangements, and the footman is off duty till the dinner-hour."

"Mr. Osborne has been to St. Petersburg, you say? What a peculiar idea! St. Petersburg is horrid in the summer, all dust and flies; but, by the bye, Lady Emilia Dachet is there with her sister, the Princess Benkindorf."

"Indeed!" responded Miss Osborne, tartly. "I don't think that has anything to do with it. What a time that girl is taking, to be sure!"

"Poor dear Maria," mused her friend, with a certain malicious enjoyment; "that would be an end to her reign, certainly, for Lady Emilia would stand no rival near the throne."

The fact was Mrs. Leggett, though she had always known that none of her daughters had a ghost of a chance with Francis Osborne, had never quite forgiven his sister for hedging him so carefully from attack.

Digitized by Google

The door had opened, and a neat maid presented herself with the tea equipage. Mrs. Leggett, absorbed in the pleasant reflection that her dear friend would some day have a bitter pill to swallow, was startled at hearing Miss Osborne exclaim sharply to the maid :—

"Go to your room, and look at yourself in the glass."

"She has forgotten her cap, it would seem," remarked Mrs. Leggett, as the girl retired with a toss of the head ; "or is this some new regulation?"

"Certainly not. It's right down impertinence and rebellion."

"Rebellion? That's a strong word, Maria. What has gone wrong? Ah, Mrs. Leggett, how are you?"

It was Osborne himself who had entered.

"Hand Mrs. Leggett her cup, Frank," his sister returned, acidly. "Later on you must interview the new maid, Ellen, yourself. You saw her ; she had no cap on."

"Fortify me with some tea first then, Maria, like a good soul ; but remember, if I must interview the girl, I have no legal ground for insisting on the cap. I find no mention of that article in our bond."

Miss Maria breathed hard, but kept her temper because a stranger was present.

"We can always dispense with her services," she said. "Ah, there's the bell. I believe it's Eva returned."

Osborne sprang up eagerly to meet the newcomer, and they clasped hands for a brief minute in the hall.

"Frank! You returned before me? What news have you?"

"None, Eva. And no news is good news. So far as I and my agent could learn, she was not in St. Petersburg. The Czar left for Moscow the day before I started for home ; and we received authentic information of his safe arrival ; so I came away, leaving my agent there. He is a clever man. How he gets his information, I do not know, but there is scarcely anything of importance stirring in the capital of which he is ignorant."

No word of explanation had passed between them. Eva had not asked a single question ; but Helga's nationality, Osborne's horror at the idea that she should be in the Russian metropolis, his departure for St. Petersburg on this last occasion simply because it was rumoured that the Czar, contrary to custom, would spend a fortnight there before the commencement of the season, all suggested much to her ; and Osborne seemed content that she should guess the truth.

"Lady Emilia is in Russia," he continued. "Her sister's husband is Governor of a Finnish province. Lady Emilia has great influence, I hear. My agent tells me that if I must at any time have help or information, she is the person to apply to ; but, unfortunately, we are such mere acquaintances."

"I do not think that would stand in your way, Frank," Eva answered, with a quiet though rather sad smile. "One thing rejoices me : you look better."

"I am leaving my nightmare behind me," he answered almost gaily. "I believe that that which I have feared will not come to pass," and then together he and Eva joined Miss Osborne and her guest.

Half an hour later he was seated in his study getting through his arrears of correspondence, when a timid knock startled him.

"Come in! Ah, Ellen, is it you?" he said, as the new maid, red and flustered, wearing a cap hastily pinned on—but pinned on awry, as if in protest—entered, and stood before him. "Now what's the difficulty?"

"Please, sir, I was took in when I came here," was the reply given by the young woman, who stood nervously fidgeting with the corner of her apron.

"You were taken in, were you? How's that? Sit down and tell me."

The girl took a seat as far away from her employer as possible ; and, sitting on the extreme edge of it, as though she did not consider it decorous to be comfortable, answered :

"They told me you was a Socialist gentleman."

"Perhaps they told you a little too much," he said. "I am in no particular hurry to find a name for myself yet, Ellen ; but you say they told you so? Well, what of it?"

"Only that when I came to your house I didn't think I should be made to wear caps."

"So that's the difficulty? You object on principle to the wearing of caps? Well, if that's so, take your cap off, and make a bonfire of it; but first tell me what's the objection to the cap?"

Digitized by Google

"It's the badge of servitude, sir," the girl answered, with so much earnestness and force that her objection was not without a certain dignity.

Osborne's brow contracted with that troubled air which was becoming only too common with him.

"You mean," he said, "that it is a badge of servitude to me; a personal affair, implying that you are in some way my inferior, a piece of commoner clay than I."

"It's degrading, sir," was her reply. "Yes, that's what it is; and I can't abear it."

"Very well," he said, after a moment's consideration, "if you honestly think it degrading, put it away. I will be no man's stumbling-block, nor woman's either. Personally, I look on your cap merely as an indication of your calling. There are many such badges in the world; soldiers, sailors, policemen, firemen, all wear them."

The argument was possibly double-edged, for Ellen's sweetheart was a policeman.

"Uniforms is different, sir," she retorted.

"Are they? Well, possibly you have gone deeper into the matter than I, and know best. To me any badge or uniform is simply the emblem of certain duties undertaken for the general good, and in that the bootblack and the scavenger may stand in line with the general and the admiral. The only badge that seems to

"MR. OSBORNE, I BELIEVE?" HE SAID AFFABLY.

Digitized by Google

me degrading is the purple and fine linen of an utterly useless and futile life. But we won't go too far afield. We'll stick to your case. That cap, which you are at liberty to wear or make a bonfire of, is certainly not in my eyes a mark of inferiority to me, or to any person in my house. Now, why do you think it 'humiliating'?"

"Because it is," the girl cried hotly, "and everybody knows it, if you don't, sir. It's meant to make us different, and keep us so. They'd have us of different flesh and blood if they could; but they can't, and so they've only got the cap, and they stick to that. If it wasn't meant to be degrading, why does every woman that can have a maid at eighteenpence a week insist upon it?"

"Hush, hush!" said Osborne. "Perhaps the lady with the eighteenpenny maid really cares nothing about the cap, but is afraid of violating the custom. I warn you that even to me, who care nothing for the custom itself, this new departure will bring trouble.

"I'm very sorry, sir."

"There's no need. Remember every hour of the day that work is noble after all. Believe me that that conviction is the only thing that can sweeten the dull round of toil."

The girl slipped out of the room, looking far more sober than elated over her triumph; and Osborne turned again to his desk.

"Well, Frank, you've settled that little matter, and discharged the girl?"

It was Maria Osborne at his elbow.

"No, Maria, I have not discharged her," he replied, nerving himself for the inevitable battle.

"Then she will do as she is told?"

"I hope so; but she will not be told to do this particular thing."

"You have given her leave to go about——"

"Without her badge of servitude? Yes, that's what it amounts to, Maria."

Miss Osborne regarded her brother with such a look of mute, unspeakable horror, that he added—

"Come, now, don't look so shocked! It's only three inches of cambric from a girl's head; and, to see you, one would think I had given her leave to go about in the light and airy get-up of a Kaffir domestic."

"That's not it. Don't quibble, Francis," she retorted, sinking into a chair with an expression of acute vexation. "If you've really permitted such an unheard-of innovation, you've shown an utter disregard for my feelings which astonishes me."

"No, no, don't say that; don't think it," he cried, appealingly. "You wrong me, Maria—indeed, you do. You think that I cannot enter into and understand your feelings; but I both can, and do. It is the curse of my life that I can always see things from both sides, for it makes whatever I do, even from conviction, seem a struggle. The one-idead man with narrow views is the only fellow who is always comfortable, always sure that he is in the right."

Miss Osborne had never been able to estimate her brother's character at its true worth; any exhibition of feeling on his part she regarded as a sign of weakness, and, like many other women, who lose their power by the same tactics, she invariably put the screw on.

"In this case," she said, "when a mere hireling's feelings have been weighed against those of your own flesh and blood, the latter have kicked the beam."

"No, no; but consider—these are my servants. Is the question of a butterfly piece of cambric to endanger the mutual goodwill between me and mine, which I have so long sought to establish?"

"You asked me to live with you as the head of your house; remember that, Frank."

"I did and I will do all in my power to make your life with me happy; but this girl says that the cap is degrading. I can't see it myself, but she says it, and she thinks it; and I know that she has learnt to hold that opinion through the conduct of those above her. Tell me, now, would domestic servants detest the cap which the hospital nurse puts on with pleasure if they did not know that we draw a line between ourselves and them almost as broad as that which divides the leper from those who are clean and whole?"

Miss Osborne, with her nostrils quivering, declined further combat, and walked to the door.

"Take your own way, Frank," she answered. "I have only one other word to add. You intend to be this girl's friend, of course; but people are sure to remark on the favouritism shown to this particular maid, and the inferences which will be drawn are not likely to be beneficial to her character, I assure you."

Digitized by Google

Osborne broke into a laugh. "You evidently know my neighbours," he said, "and do full justice to their powers of imagination. But, by all means, let me save my character," and he seated himself at his desk and began to write.

"What are you going to do?" she demanded.

"I am going to take your valuable hint," he responded, "and, by having this posted in the servants' hall, do away with all idea of favouritism."

As he spoke he handed her the sheet of foolscap on which he had been writing in bold characters.

She took it, and read the following sentence :—

"Cap-wearing is not compulsory in this establishment."

Before she could utter a word of protest a footman, bearing a cablegram on a salver, entered. Osborne took up the former, and, with a few words of direction, handed over the sheet of foolscap. A moment later he had torn the envelope and read the message it contained.

"What is the matter?" his sister asked, struck by the sudden pallor of his face.

"Nothing," he answered. "Nothing to worry yourself about, Maria," but, as he spoke, he laid his arms upon the high mantelshelf, and dropped his head upon them.

Something in his attitude warned Maria, or possibly touched some tender spot in her nature, for she silently withdrew and left him alone. In the clenched hand on which his forehead rested was the crumpled cablegram, which read as follows :

"There is reason to believe that the person we are interested in is now in the State prison of Schusselburg, near St. Petersburg."

CHAPTER VIII.

In Lady Emilia Datchet's suite of rooms on the Nevsky Prospect there was the usual stir and bustle which proclaimed that her ladyship was "at home" to her friends.

"Where is General Bazaroff?" inquired one dame of another, as she glanced round the assembled groups. "I thought he was always here."

"Perhaps she is tired of his devotion and has given him a hint to stay away," was the reply. "His sister, the Duchess Maya, gives a ball to-night, and he is there on duty."

"Who, then, takes his place as chief priest at the shrine of beauty?" the first speaker demanded with a malicious little smile.

"That is as it may be. But whoever he is he is coming to-night assuredly, for see how animated she is. Ah! Who is the man who presents himself at the moment?"

"Possibly the new devotee. Observe, she has frozen all over. Her manner to him is icy, doubtless because she expected him and he has come."

It was Francis Osborne, weary still from the effects of his long journey to St. Petersburg, whose arrival had attracted the Russian dame's attention. He had reached the Czar's capital only that morning, and acting on his agent's advice, had immediately written to ask Lady Emilia's permission to present himself in the evening.

"You here, Mr. Osborne? What brings you to this unbearable city?" she asked, naïvely, as she offered him her hand.

"No city can be unbearable which is honoured by your presence," he answered, making an effort to offer her the homage she was used to.

"That is very well," she said to herself, "from a man who was here before and never came near me. No matter, he is here now, and has courted his punishment."

"I hope you left all well at home?" she said aloud. "You will find plenty of people here whom you know, I daresay. Later on you must give me news of your sister, and your charming cousin, Miss Rayne," and, with a little wave of the hand, she dismissed him to what she knew would be a penance—an aimless dawdle through rooms which contained no friends, possibly not even an acquaintance.

Osborne drifted away into the interior of the salon with no very enviable feelings. "I thought so," he said to himself. "With her many distractions she just remembers my name; that is all. How can I expect among all these gad-flies to get half an hour's serious conversation with her? How, even if I get it, hope to move her heart or rouse her sympathy. And yet I must attempt it, for that agent fellow says that she alone can get me the information I must have."

Digitized by Google

His reflections were cut short by a tap on the shoulder, and turning he found himself face to face with a plethoric, red-faced man of the English type which is so mercilessly caricatured by foreigners, and which lends itself so easily to the cartoonists.

"Mr. Osborne, I believe?" he said, affably. "My name is Porcher, Samuel Porcher. I haven't had the pleasure of making your acquaintance formally, but as semi-public characters we may say, I suppose, that we know each other?"

Francis Osborne looked straight into the eyes of the stranger and answered:—

"Yes, I believe, Mr. Porcher, that I may say I do know you." He had not made any movement, however, to grasp the hand that was extended to him.

Mr. Porcher was not allowed by nature the privilege of turning red, that being his normal condition, but the bags of skin under his puffy eyes became a faint purple as he said, a trifle uneasily:—

"My place is in Warwickshire, you know, next to Miss Wilfred's; and as they say she has willed her estate to you, some day we shall be neighbours, you know."

"I can only say that I hope that day may be long delayed," Osborne replied, his quiet glance pointing his speech with a significant double meaning as he turned coldly away.

"I'll remember you for that, my boy, if you ever get the Wilfred estate," muttered Mr. Porcher under his breath. "Sam Porcher is a good friend, but a deuced bad enemy, as you may learn some day to your cost."

As for Osborne, he had hardly taken a couple of paces when he found himself face to face with his charming hostess.

"So, Mr. Osborne," she said, with a little imperious gesture, "you have the temerity to object to one of my guests?"

"I'm afraid I must plead guilty, Lady Emilia," he answered, in some confusion. "But if you will permit me to explain——"

"Not now," she interrupted, her eyes dancing with a mischievous sparkle; "many of my guests are leaving. I will give you an opportunity later on to offer me the abject apology I require. Do not go yet," and she moved away, leaving him bewildered, wondering whether she was annoyed or pleased.

The crowd was, as she said, thinning rapidly. At the end of half an hour she was bidding good-bye to the last of her other guests, and immediately afterwards she faced round on him.

"Now, Mr. Osborne," she said, with a half-amused, half-cynical smile, "I may as well relieve your mind by telling you that I owe you a debt of gratitude for snubbing that odious individual. He is building railways for the Czar, and my brother-in-law, Prince Benkindorf, is officially polite to him. But that gives him no right to be here. Why, the man's father was a navvy, and his mother kept a little all-sorts shop! Still, it is surprising that the snubbing should have come from you. It makes one ask, 'Is Saul among the Prophets?'"

"I am afraid he is not," Osborne answered, feeling painfully uneasy in view of the grave business which had brought him. "I object to Mr. Porcher solely because I regard him as a knave—a successful one, no doubt, but still a knave, Lady Emilia. If I might tell you the private history of some of the companies he has floated——"

"Oh, but you may not, you know," she cried. "That would bore me horribly. I should yawn in your face, and then we should part with a mutually poor opinion of each other. Besides, quo animo since we both object to Mr. Porcher? There are so many guinea-pigs nowadays that if one were driven to study the habits of the animal and his history one would have to cut half one's friends."

Osborne stood in silent confusion, his eyes on the ground. Lady Emilia burst into a soft musical laugh.

"Do you know," she said, "you look horribly shocked."

Osborne pulled himself together with an effort. "If I have been unfortunate enough to offend you," he said, "I have not only done wrong, I have been excessively foolish, for I came here to ask an immense favour of you."

She gave him a swift glance from under her half-veiled lids. "Ah!" she said. "Then you did not come here merely for the pleasure of seeing me? How many men would confess as much by way of moving me to a compliant mood?"

"I am afraid you must attribute it to that fatal habit of mine," he said, humbly.

She was undeniably a handsome and alluring woman, this Lady Emilia, with her ash-blonde hair and her gold-brown eyes.

Digitized by Google

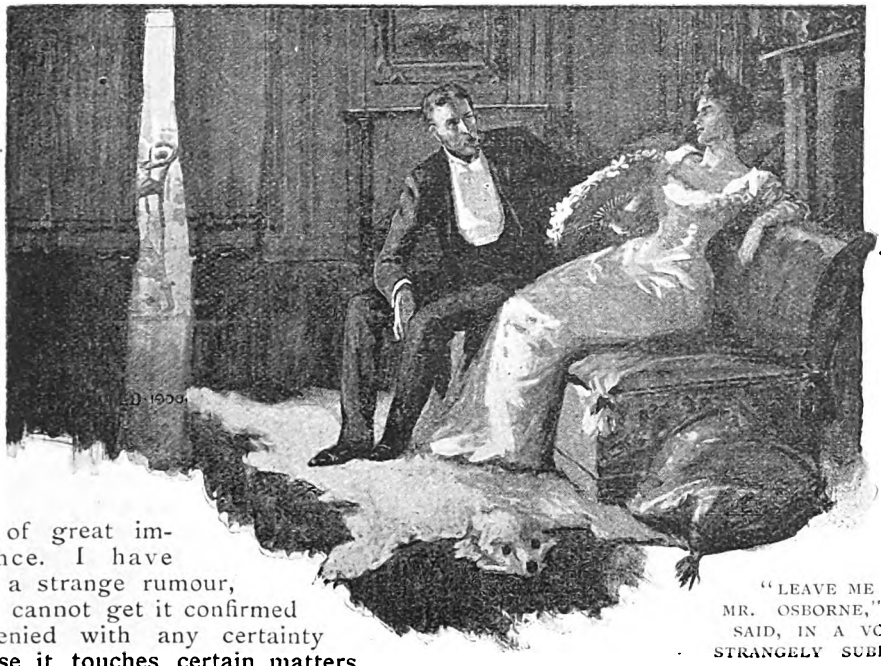
"Come," she said, "you had a purpose. "Take the plunge, Mr. Osborne, and let me know what that purpose was."

"Lady Emilia, it is in your power to do an act of mercy," he began.

"Ah, now you are going to impose on my good-nature," she interrupted him. "That's always the way with you philanthropists. Give you an inch and you take an ell. Never mind, what can I do for you, Mr. Osborne? You have not told me yet."

"That is very quickly done, Lady Emilia. I am seeking information on a point of great importance. I have heard a strange rumour, but I cannot get it confirmed or denied with any certainty because it touches certain matters which are supposed to be known only in the highest Imperial circles."



"LEAVE ME NOW, MR. OSBORNE," SHE SAID, IN A VOICE STRANGELY SUBDUED.

"Stay, Mr. Osborne, you are wandering into politics, and I must tell you once and for all that you cannot interest me in any set of discontented people either here or at home. I am positively too lazy to work up an interest."

"Lady Emilia, I am myself the discontented person in whom I seek to interest you."

"Upon my word your audacity deserves success," she retorted. "Who told you you could interest me? I said only that I found you amusing."

Francis Osborne looked across at her in vague uneasiness and bewilderment. He noted that her eyes were brighter a hundred times than they had been when her other guests were present. "May I go on?" he asked.

"Yes," she replied, lightly. "I sometimes relent towards the individual when I care nothing for the cause; go on. You say you wished to get information on a matter known, or supposed to be known, only in the highest official circles. My dear Mr. Osborne, I am not in those circles; why do you come to me?"

"Because," he answered, "I believe that you know, or at least might know, anything you desired."

"It seems to me," she said, "that you have formed a very poor opinion of the discretion of certain members of those official circles."

"I regard them, Lady Emilia, as mere mortal men."

"Upon my word," she said, "I shall have to revoke that opinion of mine! Mr. Osborne, it appears, understands the art of flattery by inference."

Power was the breath of life to Lady Emilia, and it was very sweet to her that he should acknowledge her power over others, though he might not feel it himself.

"Tell me the rumour. What have you heard?"

Digitized by Google

"I am told that there has recently been an attempt on the Czar's life."

"Is that all?" she cried. "My dear Mr. Osborne, you cannot prove official leakage by a thing like that."

"I fear this is no mare's nest, Lady Emilia," Osborne replied gravely. "I would to God I could think it one. I speak of no chimera of the police officials' vivid imagination, but of a design carefully formulated; every detail of which was successfully carried through. Russia would now be in mourning for her Emperor, I am told, but for the fact that it was poor Tourganoff and not his master, who was poisoned in the Imperial Pullman on the recent journey to Moscow."

"Tourganoff! Is he dead?" Lady Emilia cried, her cheeks suddenly blanching. "Great Heavens! Is it possible?"

"Ah! Then there was such a person."

She bit her lips. "You have surprised me into an admission," she said. "Yes, I may as well confess it. Tourganoff was known to me. And he is dead, you say?"

"So I have heard."

She lay back in her chair and drew a deep breath. "Poor faithful fellow," she said. "He has paid dearly for his fictitious splendour, his borrowed plumage. Your news is news indeed."

"It is true, then," Osborne inquired, "that the Czar's ex-valet, a born mimic, bearing a strong personal resemblance to his master (which, with the addition of a little make-up became absolutely complete), was allowed to personate him on various public occasions?"

"It is quite true," she answered. "The late Czar Alexander II. met a horrible death in 1881. His son has been a stern ruler; he has never conceded reforms lest they should be attributed to fear. Personally, Alexander III. is a brave man, but his counsellers and his wife prevailed on him to employ Tourganoff, and he acceded. For years the imperial policy has been to overawe would-be conspriators by a show of confidence and even carelessness, and Tourganoff's devotion made the thing possible."

"If that is true," Osborne said, heavily, "I fear that the rest of my informant's story is true also; and that we may take it for granted the poor fellow has been assassinated."

"I cannot guess how you came to know all this, Mr. Osborne. I do not speak of the assassination, but of the ruse itself. The thing is regarded as a profound State secret."

"I know it, Lady Emilia, because I have a paid agent here. The rouble will do almost anything in Russia. This profound secret——"

"Is known to both of us, of course," she interrupted; "but I must forbid you to ask me how I come to know it."

"I should not think of asking such a question," he replied.

Her ladyship was now regarding Osborne critically. "But you," she said, "you who know so much, what can you possibly desire to learn from me?"

In spite of himself the colour mounted to his brow and his fingers locked themselves together nervously, as he answered, "I wish to know who have been arrested for this crime, and what the fate of the prisoners has been, or is to be?"

"You are interested in all these prisoners par example, or in one only?" There was a certain metallic ring in her ladyship's voice as she put the question.

"In one only," he answered, in broken tones. "That is to say, I am interested in one individual who may possibly have been arrested."

"Let us narrow the field of inquiry," she said, with a sudden touch of impatience. "Is this person whom you seek a man or a woman?"

"A woman, Lady Emilia. God help her!"

There was a slight pause. Her ladyship's face had undergone a complete transformation. No one to see her now would have recognised the Lady Emilia of half an hour ago. The reckless flow of raillery, the graceful abandon of pose, the glances pointed with inarticulate challenge were all discarded. "I have been in danger of making myself ridiculous," she said to herself.

"It seems to me," she remarked presently, "that one part of the inquiry which you propose I should undertake must be very futile. The fate of all those arrested is a foregone conclusion, is it not?"

"Siberia? The mines?"

"Oh, no."

"But there is no capital punishment in Russia."

She laughed a hard pitiless laugh. "No one is ever condemned to death, of course," she admitted. "But there is the knout and the 'blow of grace' which is sometimes purchased by relatives of the prisoner on the understanding that it is the first blow to be administered, sometimes given as a final coup on a hint from the presiding official. It falls on the body below the ribs, curls round it, and lays opens the viscera."

Digitized by Google

Osborne uttered a hollow groan and buried his face in his hands.

At sight of his distress her ladyship's manner softened again. "It is useless to indulge in false hopes," she said. "If this person was on the spot at the time of the crime, or if by communication after the event with any person directly concerned she obtained knowledge of that State secret of which we have spoken, it is absolutely certain that she has been silenced already; she would not have been allowed to take her knowledge even to Siberia; but in Russia for every political crime of which one man is convicted, half a score are sent to Siberia on suspicion. Sometimes their fault is called one thing and sometimes another, it matters very little so long as they are removed; and they are not as harshly dealt with as the others. This may have been your friend's fate. Describe her to me."

Osborne did not answer at once, he was striving to master himself.

"Your hesitation is not very flattering, Mr. Osborne," she said. "You ask me to induce a man to risk his life by giving me certain information, yet you hesitate to place this woman in my power."

"No, no," he answered; "I am sure you will be careful, for if not yet arrested a description of her would be a dangerous weapon, but it was not that; it was not that. I was only struck by the fact that I myself know so little. Her name, the very name by which she was known to me, may have been a false one."

"Names are of no consequence, conspirators have so many. What is she like?"

"She is tall and dark, Lady Emilia," Osborne said, hoarsely. "Her face is beautiful; her figure very like your own; and she is a little more than a year my senior."

"Is she of the peasant class—a woman from the gymnasiums?"

"No! Oh, no! She has moved in the society of half-a-dozen capitals, I think."

"Her birth, parentage, and condition in life? What do you know of them; or, rather, what did she tell you?"

"By birth she is a Pole, of good family, I believe. She was married in St. Petersburg to a Russian."

"Is the husband living?"

"That I do not know. I have no information about him, except that he was a sot and a debauchee, who persecuted her for resenting his vileness."

"And if I do what you ask, if I succeed in the task you would set me, what then, Mr. Osborne?"

"Any certainty is better than doubt. You would have earned my life-long gratitude."

"But should I discover that this person has been drafted to Siberia ——?"

"I should endeavour to follow her there."

"You would carry your devotion as far as that?"

Osborne's brow flushed.

"There is not the personal element you suggest in this affair," he said, in a low voice; "but there are responsibilities which do not cease with the mere waning of a sentiment. Such a responsibility is mine."

Lady Emilia's eyes were cast down, her foot was softly tapping the carpet. For the first time since her early girlhood this worldly woman, this cynical beauty, was in the grip of a genuine emotion.

"Leave me now, Mr. Osborne," she said, in a voice strangely subdued. "I will do what you ask; at least, I pledge you my word to attempt to gain the information you require, and my sincere prayer for you is that I may fail."

He bowed over her hand, too much moved even to attempt to formulate his thanks, and left her.

She dropped her cheek into her palm, and sat there motionless as a statue.

"To Siberia!" she mused. "To Siberia! Over the snow, and the mountains, and the desolate places for the sake of a dead passion. Is it possible? But to go, to go at all, to suffer, to exile oneself! That woman, whoever she is, has been loved, and I—I, the relict of George Datchet, what should I know of an unselfish devotion?"

She sprang up feverishly, and rang the bell. "Make me presentable," she said to the maid who answered her summons. "I am going for half an hour to the Duchess Maya's ball."

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

The Mission to Lepers in India and the East.

By STEPHEN STAPLETON.

ON my way to Exeter Hall, the London headquarters of the Mission to Lepers in India and the East, I read on the contents bill of a weekly review displayed outside a newsagent's shop the query, "Should our missionary work cease?" I think that anyone who listened for half an hour to Mr. John Jackson, the able and earnest organising London secretary of the Mission to Lepers, on the splendid results of the philanthropic and religious labours of that Society must answer the question in a decided negative. The objects of the Mission are to preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ to the lepers, to relieve their dreadful sufferings, and minister to their simple wants, and to provide homes for the untainted children of leprous parents. And the text for the sermon in good works which has been preached by that Mission for more than a quarter of a century is, "Jesus, moved with compassion, put forth his hand and touched him, and said unto him, I will; be thou clean."—Mark i., 41.

But before I attempt a description in detail of the labours of the Mission in the Far East let us first try to obtain some idea, however faint, of the nature of leprosy—that most hideous and most repulsive of all human diseases, for which medical science has, in despair, almost given up the hope of obtaining a remedy.

Happily, we know nothing by actual experience of leprosy. It is now more than a century since a leper has been seen in this kingdom. We are acquainted with the disease only through Biblical and secular literature. And is there in all history, ancient and modern, a more pathetic being than that social outcast, the leper?

There is the Hebrew leper, to whom we are introduced in the Bible, who with rent garments sits by the highway uttering his melancholy, despairful cry, "Unclean, unclean!" The foul disease is said to have been introduced into Europe by the Crusaders on returning from the East. In mediæval times in our own England the leper was expelled with a solemn and awe-inspiring religious ceremony from towns and cities. Beautiful reference is made to it by Tennyson when the Leper's Bride moans out her sorrow:—

> . . . O, the grief when yesterday
> They bore the Gross before you to the chant of funeral hymns.
> "Libera me, Domine!" You sang the Psalm, and when
> The Priest pronounced you dead, and flung the mould upon your feet,
> A beauty came upon your face, not that of living men,
> But seen upon the silent brow when life has ceased to beat.
> "Libera nos, Domine." You knew not one was there
> Who saw you kneel beside your bier, and weeping scarce could see.

A HOMELESS INDIAN LEPER.

Inns and churches and bakehouses were then closed to the leper. He was forbidden to eat with healthy people or to touch them. He was not permitted to walk on narrow footpaths. Arrayed in a long grey gown, with the hood drawn over his face, he roamed through the country with a clapper to announce his approach, and at that dread sound every one fled in horror from the outcast. The repulsive appearance of the unhappy being afflicted by this terrible scourge explains the terror with which our forefathers regarded any contact with him. The first indication of this incurable constitutional disease is the appearance of brown spots on the skin. As the malady develops large round reddish moles appear on the face; the bridge of the nose falls in, and the other features, becoming puckered, the leper assumes a fierce, morose, and forbidding expression. The sight also becomes dim, or is altogether destroyed. Then horrible ulcers appear on the feeble and emaciated frame of the leper, emitting an overpowering smell, and the fingers and toes drop off joint by joint. Thus the doomed being, hopeless of recovery, dies by inches a lingering, long drawn-out and loathsome death.

Digitized by Google

A LEPER VILLAGE.

Leprosy is endemic, or peculiar to, India, China, and Japan. It has existed in these countries from the remotest ages, and is due, no doubt, to the filthy habits and the unwholesome food of the unfortunate people. In these three countries, which comprise the sphere of this Society's philanthropic and religious efforts, there must be at least over a million lepers. India is said to have 500,000, China probably as many, and Japan has 200,000 registered cases of the disease. Here is a fact which should stir profoundly every heart capable of sympathising with human misery at its deepest deeps. Remember the fate of our fellow creatures who in these countries are afflicted with this most loathsome and incurable disease. The moment leprosy appears on any man, woman, or child banishment from the home is irrevocably decreed. There is no pity or compassion for the lepers. Men or women, young or old, they are turned adrift as unclean foul things on the highways and byways, homeless wanderers, dependent for subsistence upon casual doles of food thrown to them from afar, and which their mutilated fingers are scarcely able to pick up. In India the leper loses caste, which is regarded as the worst of all dooms. In Japan the native name for leper means something no longer human at all—something outside the pale of humanity altogether—and he is accordingly treated with the greatest cruelty. It is the same in China. The leper there is often put to death by fire without compunction, and even his religion has not a ray of hope for him in the next world. Something is done by the Government in India to provide refuges for the leper, but in China and Japan his sad lot is utterly without alleviation from the State. His only chance of physical relief and religious salvation is through the Missions.

The founder of the Mission to the Lepers is Mr. Wellesley C. Bailey, the Society's Secretary and Superintendent, who resides in Edinburgh. In 1869 Mr. Bailey was attached to the American Presbyterian Mission at Ambala in the Punjab. The Mission had a leper asylum, consisting of three rows of huts under some trees, and here it was that the young missionary was brought, for the first time, into contact with these most wretched outcasts of humanity. "They were in all stages of the malady," Mr. Bailey says, "and very terrible to look upon, with a sad, woebegone expression on their faces—a look of utter hopelessness." He continued to visit the asylum at Ambala regularly for three or four years, when he returned home to Ireland on furlough. His descriptions of the sad condition of the lepers in many parts of India deeply touched the hearts of a few personal friends in Dublin, and it was resolved to try, with God's help, to do something to relieve their sufferings. For this purpose a sum of £30 annually was promised, and thus was founded in 1874 the "Mission to Lepers in India." The publication by Mr. Bailey of a little pamphlet entitled "Lepers in India" awakened public sympathy, and by the end of the year the £30 had swelled to £600. In 1878, when the income had risen to £900, the Mission was placed upon a broader basis, and a committee was formed to manage its affairs. The public support of the Society continued to extend, and with it, of course, its beneficent operations. The committee was enlarged in 1888, and the Marchioness of Dufferin and Ava (who during her husband's Viceroyalty in India had shown a warm interest in the welfare of the lepers) became patroness, and, as the society was formed in Ireland, Dr. Plunket, the Archbishop of Dublin, became the president; an office which is now filled by Dr. Alexander, the Primate of Ireland.

Digitized by Google

The methods of the Society are—(a) The establishment and maintenance of asylums for lepers and homes for their untainted children; (b) grants in aid of asylums in connection with other missionary societies; (c) the maintenance of Christian instruction in asylums where it it not otherwise provided. With regard to its religious as apart from its philanthrophic work, the Society does not send out missionaries of its own, but utilises existing agencies by providing the missionaries of these agencies with the means for carrying on Christian work in connection with the leper asylums of the Society, or among the lepers outside these institutions, and it is thus working in fifty-six stations in India, China, and Japan through the agents of twenty missionary societies of all Protestant denominations. The Society has eighteen leper asylums in India and Burma, four in China, and two in Japan, or twenty-four in all, entirely supported by its funds; while fifteen similar institutions under other control are assisted by grants of money. The homes for the untainted children of lepers supported by the Society are fourteen in number, twelve being in India and two in China.

The following extract from a letter received from a lady missionary at Sumatra, India, helps us to realise the treatment often accorded the lepers by their relatives and neighbours:—

I have told you about my poor leper, Nai Haseja, whom I used to visit regularly. I believe she did trust in the Saviour, though her notions were very confused. She lived alone in a little hut made of bamboo with straw roof. Her neighbours were very frightened of her and wanted her to go away, but she refused. Last week Brother S. rode past there and saw smoke rising. He went closer and saw a terrible sight, the hut and the brushwood burnt to the ground, and the bones in the midst.

The people were standing round, amongst them Nai Haseja's son, who was crying, but Brother S. heard a man scolding him because of his tears. "He ought to be thankful that his mother was now dead." If they had only done it at night when she was fast asleep she wouldn't have suffered so much, but this was at 5.30 p.m. She was awake, but hadn't yet left her hut, and her boy told me she had been begging for mercy. It is better not to try and picture the scene; it is over now, but it sickens me to see the burnt trees which grew round her hut. I passed by there this afternoon. It is hardly five minutes from here.

Yet this is not all. Our girls told us that only two days before another leper had been killed quite near here. Six men had set his hut on fire. He, being a strong man, had tried to flee, but had been thrust back into the fire with spears. This is the fourth leper who has been burnt alive during this last year in Lagnbots alone! And we knew nothing about it at all. Those lepers were all heathen and unknown to us. If I had not visited Nai Haseja, and Brother S. known her, no one would have told us.

LEPERS AND THEIR HUTS IN CENTRAL INDIA.

Digitized by Google

The lepers are not considered to be neighbours any more, and even the Christians don't think it so very bad to kill them, though no Christian would do so. In old time a father would burn his own son, and once the chiefs got all the lepers together in one village and burnt them all.

We, of course, directly went to the Government official about it, and asked for justice and for protection for the living lepers, but got the answer that the murderers, whose names are all known and who are quite proud of their deed, said they had better do the same to all the others too. They could not be punished, because this burning was an old custom of the Battas!

Brother S. asked the official if the Government couldn't do anything to establish a leper colony. He said it would cost two much money, but the Mission ought to do something. He promised, however, to make a law to forbid further burning of live people. You will understand that this affair has been, and is, very much on our hearts. There are so very many lepers here, and they are a great danger to others.

The Mission to Lepers, affected by this touching account of the terrible sufferings of the lepers of Sumatra, made an arrangement with the Rhenish Missionary Society to give aid, both spiritual and temporal, to these unhappy outcasts. The official organ of that Society contains a letter, from which the following is an extract:—

I feel much joy in my work amongst these poor lepers. Nor far from here is a village in which eight of these unhappy people have settled. This settlement of lost ones made a very great impression on me, with their bamboo huts and their banana and vegetable plantations. These people cultivate rice-fields and rear poultry. There are five men and three women, still pagans. The lot of the poor lepers here is sad beyond measure. Any one burning them in their huts boasts of it as if he had killed a tiger, for they are no longer considered human beings. It was a teacher himself who said to me, "Why do you go near those people? Such creatures should not be approached." The poor things are delighted if one takes an interest in them, and the hours that I have passed among them are some of the happiest in my life. It is, of course, an indescribably sad sight at first to see these poor people with their crippled limbs and unbandaged wounds, but one gets use to everything in time, and now we get on happily together.

One of the inmates, a woman, found great difficulty in eating with her decayed fingers.

I brought her a spoon (the missionary continues), and still laugh when I think of the solemn reception this useful article received. First the woman took it and placed it seriously in her mouth, then she examined it carefully. It next travelled from mouth to mouth—every one wanted to taste with it! It seemed to please them extremely, and they all said they could not eat any more with their fingers, and so we just had to procure one for each of them. They have, of course, very small needs, and we are always very glad when we can cheer their sorrowful lives in any way. One thing they were specially anxious for was shoes. They insisted that they could walk much better in them, so as there seemed less fear of infection with shoes I begged some old shoes from the missionary for them. Now our healthy Christians insist that the lepers are very proud since they have worn shoes. General feeling is, as I have said, much against lepers. One day one of the lepers met a baptised acquaintance in the field and said to him, "Now we pray also to the Lord Jesus," and received this answer, "As if the Lord Jesus would hear such as you!"

These touching records show the intensity of the suffering and misery which the Mission to Lepers seeks to alleviate. The poor afflicted creatures are gathered together in the asylums established by the Society. These institutions are not splendid buildings, with extensive grounds like the hospitals and asylums we often see at home. An asylum for lepers in India generally consists merely of a few low houses or native huts grouped together, with a house for a caretaker, a couple of store-rooms, a room for a dispensary, and a little school or church. The inmates, however, have a shelter from the inclemency of the weather; they are comfortably clothed; they receive daily rations, and each is supplied with a set of cooking utensils. They are also taught the Gospel, and in time many of them receive the truth in all sincerity and become Christians. "I have often received the Communion with these poor Christian lepers," says Mr. Bailey, "and it is certainly one of the most touching services I have ever engaged in. Those of us who were pure from the dreadful disease received first, and then the bread was put from our plate on to a plate which the lepers kept for the purpose, and in like manner the wine was poured from our cup into a vessel of theirs; then they handed both about among themselves, as, of course, we could not partake from the vessel that they did. It was, however, spiritually the one bread and the one cup." The helpless, hopeless, and forlorn condition of these poor creatures is, indeed, terrible to contemplate. They cannot work, many of them, as their fingers have dropped off; they cannot very well walk, as their toes are generally all gone; and the stench from their sores alone makes even their own relatives and friends reluctant to go near them. They are attacked by swarms of flies, against which they are, as a rule, helpless to defend themselves. They have no sensation in their mutilated limbs. As one of them said, "The rats come and gnaw us at night, and we don't know anything about it till we see the blood in the morning, or we move too near the fire in our sleep till we are badly burnt and never feel it."

Digitized by Google

A LEPER VILLAGE IN SOUTH CHINA.

The station of the Mission at Purulia, Bengal, which was established in 1888 by the Rev. H. Uffmann (whose daughter died of leprosy) is the largest leper asylum in India. Including the home for untainted children, which is attached to it, there are six hundred inmates, and there is a leper church of nearly four hundred members. The success of this institution in comforting and saving the outcast leper has received official endorsement. In the report of the Leprosy Commission appointed by the National Leprosy Fund, under the presidency of the Prince of Wales, the lines on which the Mission works—of isolation of lepers and separation of untainted children—were warmly approved. The members of the Commission who inspected the large asylum at Purulia in 1891, entirely maintained by the Mission, reports as follows: "We were much pleased with the excellent arrangements made for the lepers. Their houses were very clean, they were well clothed and apparently well fed, and appeared to lead happy and contented lives. The Rev. Mr. Uffmann, who exercises the most careful personal superintendence, may be congratulated on the entire success of the asylum—one of the very best we have seen during a lengthened visit to such institutions throughout India. The children of leprous parents are kept apart, and they appear to be extremely happy and comfortable." The inmates of the asylum recently sent to England the following touching expressions of gratitude to the Mission: "We, the men and women in the Leper Asylum at Purulia, send you a thousand thanks. We have now good houses to dwell in, and a doctor and medicine to heal our ulcers. We have teachers and pastors who instruct, guide, and comfort us. All these advantages we owe, next to God, to you, our benefactors and friends. Our nearest relatives have abandoned and forsaken us, and there was no place left on earth where we could rest and stay without molestation. People seeing us from a distance shouted 'Begone! begone!' Ah! that was hard. Please remember us in your prayers, and continue to help and succour us, your suffering brothers and sisters, the Lepers of Purulia."

Here is the story of Dayamony, one of the inmates, told in her own words, which is typical of many cases in the institution:—

From my childhood I have had to fight with much distress. When I came of age according to Hindoo law, I was married. Soon after I was overtaken with this disease—and what an acquaintance! I tried medicine to cure it, but in vain, and the result was my husband turned me out of doors. I went to my father and was advised to go to the house of the god Siva and worship there. I went, and was lying on the ground for twenty-six days, spending day and night in fasting and prayers, crying as far as I understood to the gods for mercy. Every sunset I took a mouthful of dry corn; that was all I had for twenty-six days, but I got no answer, nor did the god Siva appear to console me. I left that place much disappointed and went home, but when my family found my pilgrimage had been useless I was told that for such people as I was homes had been built at Purulia and I had better go there. With great sorrow I received this news, but took my only child in my lap and sheltered for four days under a tree, then with a broken heart and a sorrowful face I started alone for Purulia. When I arrived I was very kindly received, as others here are. Here it was that I first heard the name of Jesus our Saviour, here I learnt the great difference between Heathenism and Christianity. I know I cannot thank the great God in this world as I should do, but I hope to do so with my whole heart when I arrive in heaven. Please pray for me.

Digitized by Google

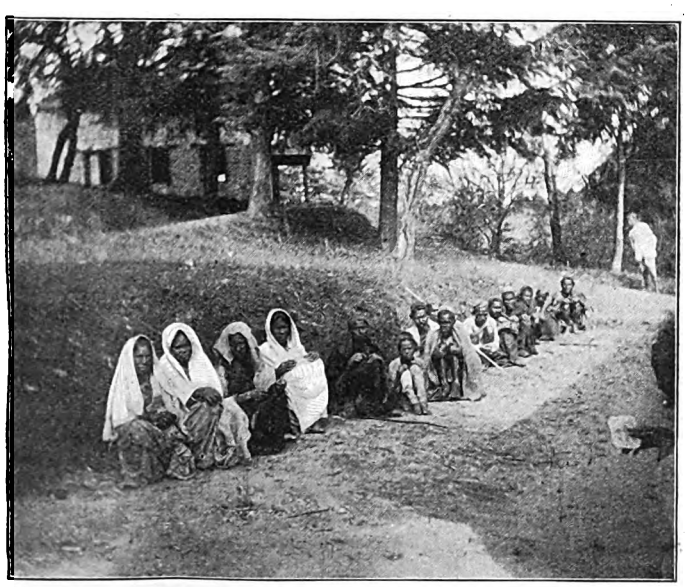
Another fine institution is at Chandag on the Himalays, which shelters nearly one hundred lepers, the majority of whom have become Christians. The asylum is conducted by Miss Mary Reed, an American lady, whose story, as told by Mr. John Jackson in his book "Mary Reed, Missionary to the Lepers," is as striking, thrilling, and pathetic as that of the heroic Father Damien, the leper martyr, which moved the whole civilised world some years ago. Miss Reed is not only a missionary to the lepers but a fellow sufferer with them. She fell a victim to leprosy while working as a Zenana missionary in India. When it became clear to her that her ailment was the dread disease, she applied to the Mission for a sphere of work, and the committee gladly appointed her superintendent of the asylum at Chandag. There, at her lonely post in the mountains, Miss Reed devotes herself, with zeal and enthusiasm, to succouring with much needed care and charity her fellows in affliction and suffering.



A GROUP OF LEPER CHRISTIANS.

In a recent number of the little quarterly magazine of the Society entitled "Without the Camp," I find some interesting descriptions of recent accessions to the leper asylum at Almora, in the north-west province of India. Of one, a lad of eighteen years, named Kauntia, it is written :—

He came to us through hearing of the asylum from some friends of Baura, another inmate, who had visited him and saw how contented and comfortable he was in the asylum. Doti, from which Kauntia comes, is about one hundred miles away, but hearing the glad news of a pleasant home for such as he was, he set off to find it, and after a tedious and painful journey reached us on February 18th, 1899. He was a piteous sight, maimed in hands and feet, and disfigured in face, dirty and weary, and miserably clad. He soon settled down to our routine, and brightened up, and became as cheerful as his condition would permit of. Think of his eight years' suffering and privation, and you will not wonder that gratitude filled his heart when he found such comfort and peace as we had to give him. He set about learning to read, and is already able to do so fairly well. The first day he arrived he attended the service, and had his thoughts stirred by what he heard of the Saviour. It was so different from what he had been taught about Devi Thul, the goddess he had been in the habit of worshipping, whose spirit he was afraid of, as bringing down upon him all sorts of terrible evils, and whom it was almost impossible to propitiate, even by superhuman effort. She was known only for her cruelty and oppression. This was all the thought poor Kauntia had of God till he came to the asylum and learnt how much God loves all men and forgives them. His thought now is "Jesus saves, Jesus saves me."

Here is another case which throws a vivid light on the contrast between the helpless lot of the leper as a wandering mendicant and the comfort and ease of mind and body which the outcast feels within the sheltering walls of the Society's asylums :—

Champha was a woman of the Rajput class. She comes from a village which is also a long way off, called Jagoli. She is about forty years of age, and has been suffering for more than seven years; but came to us only last

Digitized by Google

May. She was led to do so by hearing from Jogiani and Hira of the comfort and peace they were enjoying in the asylum. She had met them in her wanderings. It is a long time now since she heard of her husband and son and three daughters, who are, so far as she knows, still alive. All her children were born before she got ill, and no one else among all her relations has ever suffered from the disease. She used to worship Mahadeo, and offered goats, and grain, and flowers, and made pilgrimages, but never received any benefit bodily or spiritually. She is a great sufferer, and feels keenly her sad lot. Soon after coming to us she grasped the truth that Jesus is the Son of God, and she has been striving to maintain a constant and earnest discipleship ever since. Her one thought is cleansing in the blood of Jesus.

A most important and beneficent part of the work of the Society is the rescue of the children of lepers who have not as yet contracted the disease. If, as decided by the latest scientific Congress on Leprosy (that at Berlin in 1897), leprosy is "contagious, but not hereditary," it is of the utmost urgency that the many children to be found in leper villages and settlements, as well as in native asylums and other places, should be removed from their surroundings of grave physical and moral danger. Surely no condition can be more terrible than for young and helpless children to be in daily contact with leprous parents and have their young lives blighted by the degrading surroundings of a leper village or an asylum whose every inmate is a centre of contagion. The fact that in the fourteen children's homes of the Mission to Lepers there have been in many years only one or two authentic cases of the children of leprous parents developing the disease is certain evidence that the disease is not hereditary, and is the strongest possible testimony to the value of this department of the Society's work. The number of children in the homes of the Society, according to the latest report, is over two hundred. Fully four thousand lepers are supported or helped by the Mission, and there are two thousand Christian lepers in connection with it. The receipts of the Society in 1899 amounted to £12,936 15s. 9d., and the sum expended was £10,335 10s. 6d. The work is entirely supported by voluntary contributions

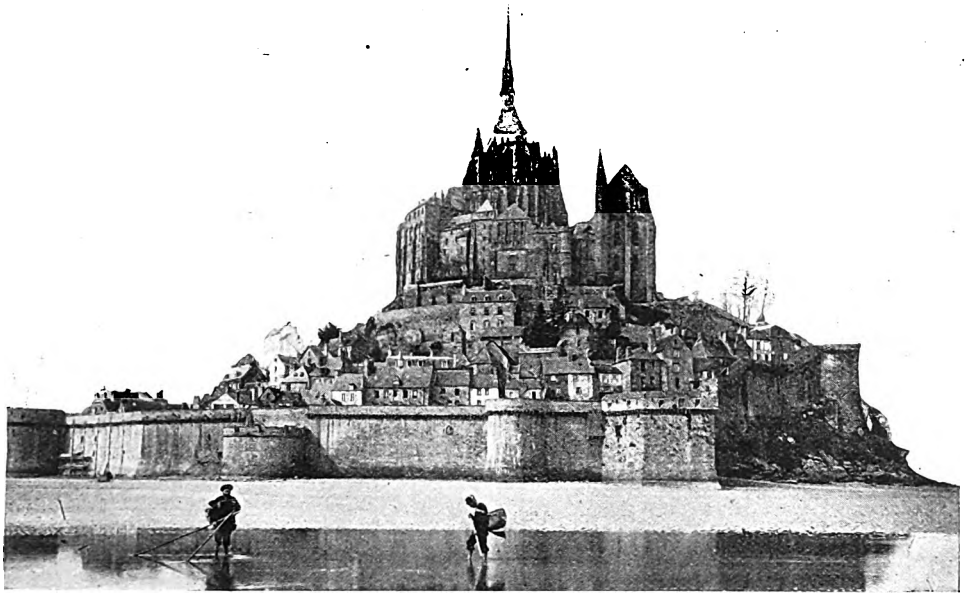
FLEETING.

Fleeting on, forever fleeting,
Like the spirit of the wind;
Still the years roll on, repeating
Echoes of the year behind—
Naught the mystic chain may sever,
Present now and future ever.

On, forever, onward speeding
Down the long-drawn vale of tears;
Still the fading past, receding,
Beckons to the future years—
Flitting onward, resting never,
Present now and future ever.

Clarence Hope.

Digitized by Google



MONT ST. MICHEL FROM THE EAST.

The Palace of the Angels.

By J. A. HAMMERTON.

IT was in Evreux, while cycling through Normandy this summer, that my wife and I met three "new women," who were also touring the country awheel. Their route was for the most part the reverse of ours, but not so extended, and in discussing the country with them I asked how long they had spent at Mont St. Michel. "Oh, we have not gone there," was the reply, "we were told it wasn't interesting, and so we have kept away from it." We were shocked to find that three rational English women, and especially of the advanced type, could know so little of the monuments of France as to accept the irresponsible opinion of some one-eyed tourist that Mont St. Michel was not worth visiting.

Not interesting, indeed! There is not in the whole of Normandy, in all France, in historic England even, an example of so much interest concentrated in so small a space. An enthusiastic Frenchman has described it as the eighth wonder of the world. Victor Hugo has said that Mont St. Michel is to France what the Pyramids are to Egypt. Large and deeply interesting volumes have been written about it. It will form a theme for writers for generations to come, and artists will employ their pencils here so long as a vestige of the wonderful buildings remains.

There is a strong temptation in writing of Mont St. Michel to fall into the style of the junior reporter who will blandly tell you that a thing is indescribable, and immediately proceed to describe it. One is persuaded that this marvellous monument of the Middle Ages cannot be adequately described in plain prose, however apt the pen, yet one is equally desirous to make the attempt. But I shall promise my readers on this occasion to make no effort at an elaborate description, which, indeed, the space of a magazine article renders impossible, and to attempt no more than a general sketch of the most noteworthy features of the Mount.

Digitized by Google

To begin with, I take it for granted that the reader, if he or she has not already visited Mont St. Michel, is at least aware that it is situated in the bay of the same name, near the point where the coasts of Normandy and Brittany unite, and thus some forty-three miles south-east of Jersey. The story of Mont St. Michel, even if the hand of man had never reared upon it one of the most remarkable structures which the human mind has conceived, would have been interesting. During the Roman occupation of France, or Gaul as it was then called, the great stretch of sea which lies between the Mount and Jersey to-day was then a vast forest, through which some fourteen miles of Roman military road were constructed. But in the third century the invasion of the sea compelled the Romans to alter the course of their road, and in the next century both the Mount and the small island of Tombelaine, which lies scarcely two miles away, were isolated at high tide. So on from century to century, the sea has gradually eaten away this part of Normandy, until now some three hundred square kilometres of land are entirely submerged at high tide. This alone is sufficient to invest the Mount with a peculiar interest, for one can stand upon it to-day and, gazing far away to sea, contemplate the absolute mastery of Neptune, whose ravages have left of all the great forest of Scissy nothing more than a handful of trees growing sturdily among the rocks on the north side of the Mount.

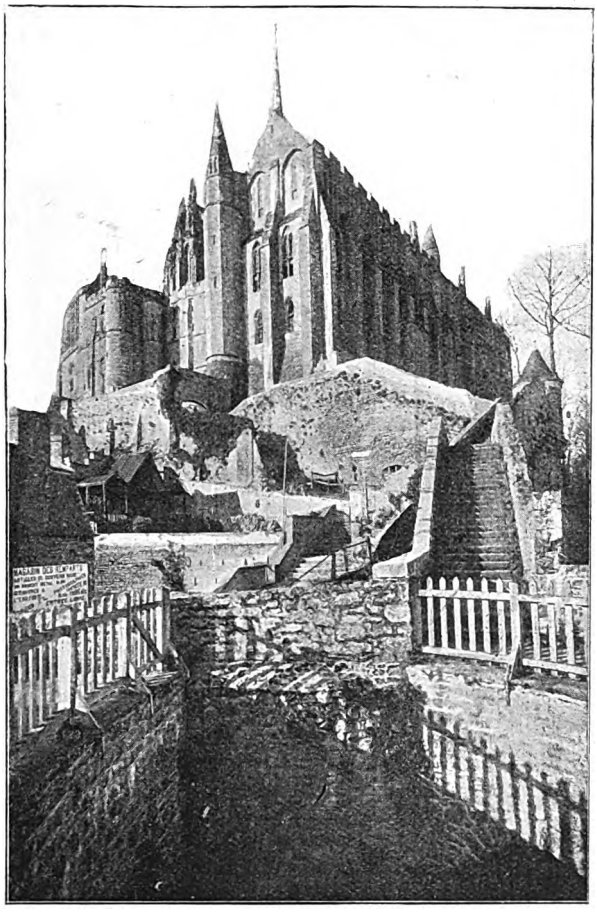
But it is the human interest attaching to Mont St. Michel that outweighs everything else. The rock is steeped in religious lore, and in the annals of war there is no place in France more historic. Originally a monastery, it became in time an impregnable fortress as well; the rough warrior lived side by side upon it with the studious monk, and there the clash of battle was as regular an occurence for years on end as the mass and vespers. In its old age it became a prison, one of the most dreaded in a land of terrible prisons, and just as it had been absolutely impregnable to attack (the English without success besieging it for eleven years in the fifteenth century) so was it an inviolable prison, only one man ever having been able to effect his escape, and even in his case escape would have been impossible but for the facilities which were unconsciously placed in his hands by his gaolers.

The first thought which comes to the visitor as he views the Mount from the shore is, What could have induced anyone to choose so difficult a site for the foundation of a monastery? But here legend conveniently steps in and explains all. In the eighth century Aubert, the Bishop of Avranches, one of the most pious in an age of piety, was in the habit of retiring to the Mount for rest and meditation, and during one of his visits there the Archangel Saint Michael, the Prince of the Armies of the Lord, appeared to him and told him to build on the top of the Mount a sanctuary in his honour. From which it will be seen that even the angels in those days were not above self-advertisement. But Aubert, though a bishop, was "even as you and I," and when he awoke in the morning he had some doubt as to whether he had been dreaming or had really entertained the Archangel; so he prolonged his stay in the hope of receiving another visit, nor was he disappointed. A few days later Saint Michael appeared to him once more, and rather sharply repeated his command. But even now Aubert was not convinced, and he determined to give Saint Michael a third chance, which the Saint was nothing loth to accept, repeating his instructions in a most peremptory manner. He also touched the bishop's head, leaving a hole in the skull "for a sign." We have heard of a surgical operation to introduce a joke, but this is the only case on record where a saint has found it necessary to perform a surgical operation for the introduction of a command into the head of a bishop, and Aubert, like a sensible man, concluding that one hole in his skull was sufficient, immediately set about the building of "the Palace of the Angels." Aubert's skull is still preserved in the Church of Saint Gervais at Avranches, and the startling effect of Saint Michael's touch may be seen to this day!

That is only one of the innumerable legends which surround the origin of the

Digitized by Google

Abbey. Another is worthy of mention, illustrating, as it does, the advantages of co-operation with an angel when one is performing so difficult a task as Aubert took up. On the top of the Mount were two large rocks which interfered seriously with building, and could be moved by no human efforts. Saint Michael, therefore, appeared to a devout peasant who lived on the coast and bore the familiar name of Bain, telling him to take his sons to the Mount and move the rocks. Despite the Caledonian flavour of his name, Bain did not wait to have his skull perforated by the Archangel, but went forthwith together with eleven of his children and tried to move the rocks. They could not stir them one hair's-breadth however; whereupon Aubert asked Bain if he had brought all his children, and the good man explained that they were all there except the baby, which was with its mother. The Bishop then instructed him to go at once and fetch the infant, "for God often chooses the weak to confound the strong." The child was brought and at a touch of his little foot the rocks went tumbling down the Mount, in proof of which one may be seen to this day with a little chapel to Saint Aubert built on the top of it.



THE MERVEILLE.

One more of the many miracles associated with the beginning of the great work should not be left unmentioned. Saint Aubert was naturally much exercised as to where he should rear his sanctuary, the pinnacle of a lonely rock being an unusual place to build on even in those unusual days, but here again the Archangel, who had manifested so much personal interest in the work, came to his rescue and caused a heavy dew to fall on the Mount, leaving a dry space on the top. Upon this dry space was the church to be built.

In 709 Saint Aubert had practically completed the structure, and the church was dedicated to Saint Michael after two precious relics (namely, a piece of a scarlet veil, which the Archangel had left on the occasion of his famous appearance at Monte Gargano in Naples, together with a piece of the marble on which he had stood) were placed in a casket on the altar. Not a vestige of the oratory built by Saint Aubert, nor of the church erected in 963 by Richard, remains. The oldest part of the buildings now existing represents a church founded in 1020 by Richard, second Duke of Normandy, and constructed under the direction of the Abbot Hildebert II. The transepts, the greater part of the nave, and the crypts date back to this period.

The whole scheme of the wonderful memorial which fascinates the eye of the latter-day tourist owed its conception to this eleventh century abbot, and surely no saintly architect ever conceived a more audacious plan. His project was not merely to occupy the limited space on the summit of the Mount with his religious buildings, but to start far down the sides of the rock, and, by utilising the Mount just as the sculptor makes use of a skeleton frame whereon to place the clay in which he models his statue, so to rear upward gigantic walls and buttresses which at the top would carry a huge platform to hold the superstructures, thus creating a collection of vast buildings with the live rock thrust up in the centre for foundation. It is to the glory of St. Michael that for no less than five centuries this colossal scheme of Hildebert's was carried out with absolute unity of purpose by his successors; an achievement only possible amongst religious workers. The result was that this lonely Mount gradually became clothed with a series of most beautiful buildings, which to the eye of the beholder seem to have grown by some natural process out of the rock itself.

Digitized by Google

THE RAMPARTS (XV. CENTURY) TOUR DU NORD.

To the student of architecture it would be impossible to mention any monument more worthy of study than this. Not only do we find within its innumerable cloisters, crypts, and halls, specimens of the purest Gothic that exists, but at every corner we are presented with structures which conform to the very highest ideals of art, in being at once useful and beautiful. There is not a single buttress, not a window, not an arch, not a pillar, which does not discharge some duty and the removal of which would not weaken in some degree a part of the scheme.

The best way to secure an intelligible idea of the work of these monkish builders is to walk round the Mount at low tide and study the buildings from the outside. The feature which will most impress one in following this course is the wonderful north side of the Mount, known as the Merveille, which rears its massive walls sheer from the rock face, supported along its entire length by enormous buttresses that spring with a fine suggestion of strength and permanency from their rocky base. The principal buildings, apart from the church, are contained within these massive walls. To the west we have in three stories, the Cellar, the Salle des Chevaliers, and above the latter the open Cloister, the most perfect example of its kind in the world. The eastern part commences with the Almonry, above which is the Salle des Hôtes, and on the top of that the Refectory.

The whole effect of the Merveille is superb, yet what is it more that a great wall held up by mighty buttresses, pierced in different ways to light the chambers within and make each suitable for its particular office? The most perfect economy has been observed throughout, the buttresses are terminated the moment their services are not required, and the Refectory, which carries a light wooden roof, is lighted by means of long narrow lancets which give to the wall, now supported by buttresses, far more strength than would have been possible had it been pierced by wide windows; still the lighting within is perfect. In brief, the Merveille, apart from the numerous other buildings which went to form the monastic and military establishment, is enough to send an architect into raptures, and might if he knew not the dangers of the incoming tide, which has to cover nine miles of land at the rate of a race horse, induce him to tarry over long in feasting his eyes on this marvellous achievement. It is beautiful beyond description, and yet we may be certain that its builders never thought of mere beauty in its construction, but built purely to meet the exigencies of the situation and to provide the best possible accommodation for the inhabitants of the monastery and their dependants. As one writer has put it, "the beauty just happened." It is only when we find builders striving after effect that we are face to face with decadent art.

Digitized by Google

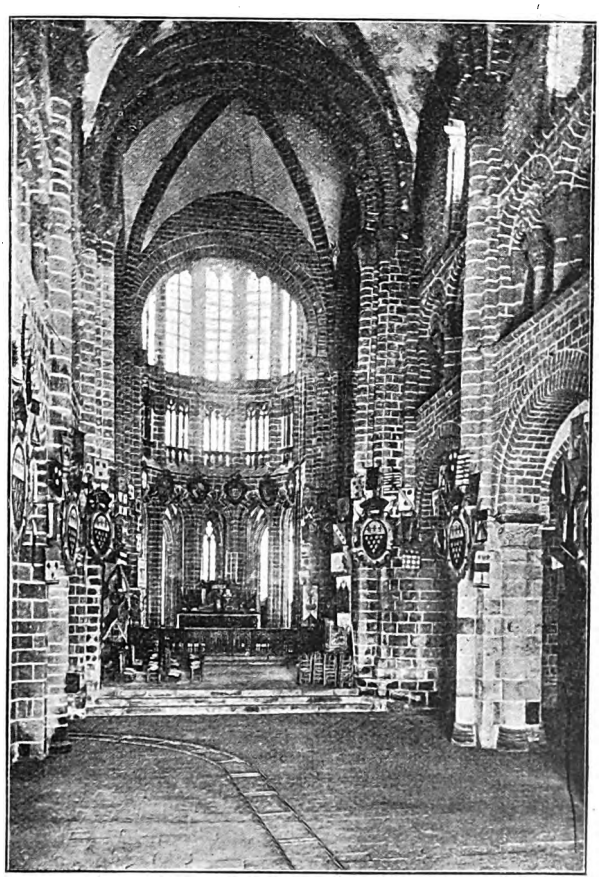
Continuing our walk round the Mount on those sands which have been the scene of many a bitter battle, we pass under the ramparts of the Mount, commencing with the Tour du Nord at the eastern end of the Merveille. Here, again, the beautiful union of art and nature is observed, this magnicent tower seeming to be but the natural growth of the shelving rocks at its base. It is no surprise to know that through the ages which knew not the Maxim or the 100-ton gun the splendid fortifications successfully resisted every attack of the envious English, the Bretons, and the Huguenots. The modern town is huddled picturesquely between the ramparts and the Abbey along the east and south of the Mount.

Having completed the tour around the Mount, the visitor should next proceed along the ramparts, and reach the entrance to the Abbey by the staircase known as the Grand Degré, which leads into the Barbican, and through the massive and beautiful Châtelet into the more ancient entrance of the Abbey, known as Belle-Chaise, where are situated the Guard Room and the Government Room. Here the guide will take us in hand, and march us from point to point of interest in the interior. But it is impossible in the space of a magazine article to attempt a description of this, which would follow in any detail the stipulated round of the apartments that at present are shown to the public.

Suffice it to say that you will first be taken to the Church, which is now, and likely to be for many years, in the hands of the restorers. Only four bays of the seven which went to the making of the great Norman nave remain, and these have had to be much restored, but here it is a pleasure to record that the restoration is being carried out with perfect taste, so that when the Government has discharged its self-imposed task, the latter-day visitor



INTERIOR OF ABBEY CHURCH.

Digitized by Google

THE STREET, MONT ST. MICHEL.

will have an excellent idea of the Abbey and its dependent buildings as these were in the hey day of Mont St. Michel's prosperity. From the Church we shall enter the Cloister, already mentioned as being the topmost of the three western stories of the Merveille. Here was the recreation ground of the monks, and nothing could be more exquisite than the elegant proportions of the slender pillars which support the vaulted roofs of the double arcade. From the Cloister we visit the Refectory, where many a strange gathering of monks has taken place in days of old: for it is one of the interesting things in the history of Mont St. Michel that, while in its earlier ages it was a centre of learning and genuine religion, it became corrupt and scandalous under the commendatory abbots, who were men neither of morals nor religion and who allowed all sorts of abuses within these sacred walls. At one time, indeed, the Abbot of Mont St. Michel was the five-year-old son of Louis the Just. In the south-west corner of the Refectory is the pit which formerly contained a lift whereby provisions could be hauled up from the bottom story, and the leavings of the monks sent down to the Almonry for distribution amongst the poor.

The Salle des Chevaliers, which will next be visited, is described by a learned writer as "perhaps the finest Gothic chamber in the world," and is believed to have been built as a great workroom for the monks, but received its present name either from the fact that the first investitures of the order of St. Michael were made herein, or that it was the lodging of the 190 knights who came to the Mount to defend it against the English. In this beautiful apartment, lighted and ventilated in a way that is a model to present day builders, the monks wrote and illuminated the manuscripts which gave to the abbey the title of "The City of Books." Reached from this room is the Salle des Hôtes, wherein the grand visitors were entertained by the Abbot in a style befitting their rank, as under the rule of St. Benedict it was forbidden for laymen to enter the apartments reserved for the monks. Like all the other buildings, however, it has served many another purpose than that for which it was originally designed, and at one time was actually used as a Plomberie where the lead was worked for roofing and other purposes connected with the Abbey.

The Cellar is, in its way, as beautiful as any of the other apartments, although nothing was attempted by its builders but to provide a capacious store room for the inhabitants of the Mount, and to secure in its strong pillars strength to support the buildings rising above it. The provisions were hauled up from the sands by means of a great wheel and a rope, the latter being carried out on a little drawbridge to enable it to drop clear of the rocks. This arrangement, by the way, is associated with one of the most audacious attempts to secure the Abbey during the wars of the Huguenots. A traitor within arranged with two Huguenot leaders that on the day of St. Michael, in September, at eight o'clock in the evening, in the year 1591, he would haul up their men by means of this rope and introduce them to the Cellar, while the monks were engaged in devotions, so placing the Mount at their mercy. But he proved a double traitor, for after seventy-eight men had been so hauled up and, with one exception, quietly killed by the soldiers of the garrison as they arrived, the leaders below became suspicious of a trap, and asked that a monk should be thrown down as evidence that the plot was successful. The Governor immediately had one of the murdered Huguenots dressed in the gown of a monk and thrown down, but the Sieur Montgomery was not satisfied with this, and he called up that one of his men should come out on the drawbridge and assure them below that all was well. So the Governor sent the one man he had spared and instructed him to answer down that the Huguenots were masters of the Abbey. He was faithful to death, however, and called down that they were betrayed. Instead of being immediately killed, the Governor was so impressed with his courage, that he spared him, and the Huguenots hastily rode away.

Digitized by Google

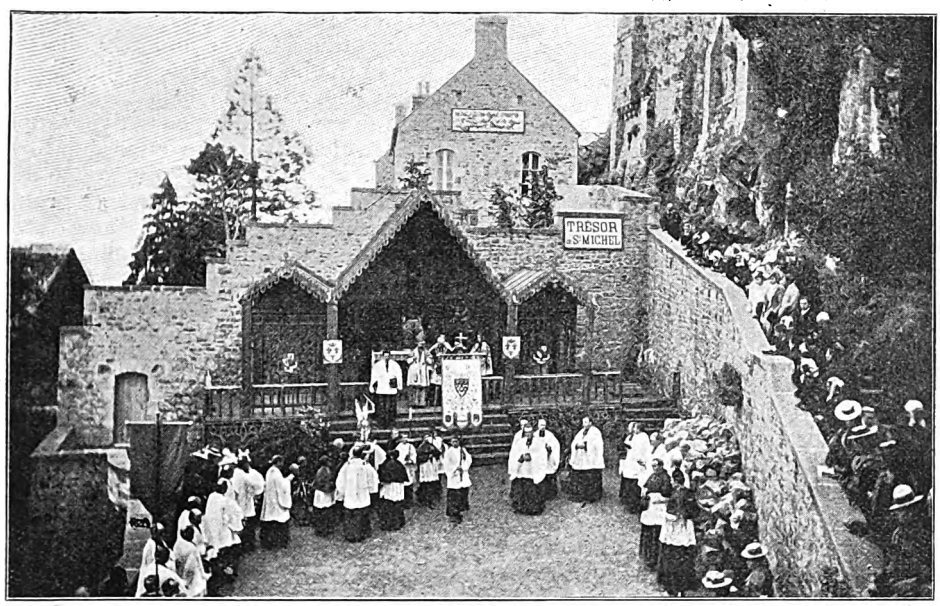
The Almonry is the last of the great apartments which are contained in the Merveille, and it is from this that visitors make their exit into the courtyard of the Abbey; but many other interesting chambers are shown to visitors, such as the Crypte de l'Aquilon, the Charnier, the Promenoir or ancient cloister, and the famous Crypte des Gros-Piliers, which is also known as l'Eglise Basse, or the Lower Church, its pillars of enormous girth being designed to support the heavy masonry of the Abbey above. The Cachots, or prisons, are also an important item of the sights described by the guide, and many harrowing tales are told of famous prisoners who went mad during their incarceration in these awful dungeons. But it is really a pity that this part is shown at all, as the recollection of these hideous holes is likely to confuse many visitors' impressions of the place.



THE PROCESSION OF ST. MICHEL.

Here, then, is a very brief and a sadly-imperfect sketch of this rare gift which the Middle Ages have left to lucky France. It need only be added that not one visit, nor two, is necessary to an adequate appreciation of the beauties of Mont St. Michel; several days, instead of several hours, as is too often the custom of the breathless tourist, should be spent on the Mount. There is accommodation in plenty, for the three hotels, all kept by members of the same family (and each at daggers drawn with the others), give splendid entertainment at moderate rates; and practically all the houses are annexes to one or other of these establishments, so that, except during August and September, accommodation is never difficult to obtain. Nor are the buildings of the Abbey and the Merveille the only things of interest on the Mount to-day, for though it is a strangely-different scene from that in the olden days of pilgrimage, it is, perhaps, as interesting if we choose to regard as pilgrims the countless tourists who swarm here from all the ends of the earth, and we shall find amongst them even more material for study than was afforded to the monks in ages past. Then if rain should keep us prisoner for an hour or two at times, we need not weary sitting at our window, watching the carriages and bicycles arriving at the entrance to the Cour de l'Avancée, where they are immediately besieged by representatives of each of the hotels, and probably a simple Briton, innocent of French or the ways of this curious community, will find himself divided into three, his luggage being captured by the representative of Poulard aîné, his bicycle being taken by the tout for Poulard jeune, and he himself being led captive by the buxom female who canvasses for veuve Poulard.

Digitized by Google

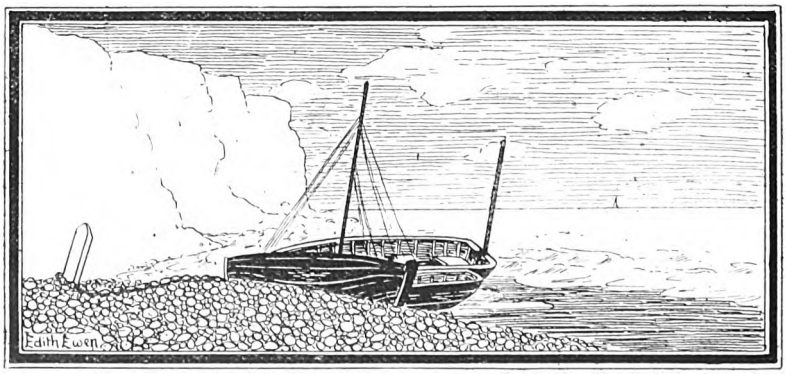
We remember one occasion when, at a high tide, which necessitated the use of a boat for debarking visitors, a lonely English female, of the type so properly satirised by French caricaturists, arrived by the diligence, and was rowed in lonely state through the entrance to the outer court. As the boat grounded she stood up, an angular vision in drab, with dark-blue spectacles and a straw hat. In answer to the enquiring shouts of the hotel representatives, she innocently replied in the one word she knew, "Poulard," and there was a rush for her, in which the elder Poulard, thanks to exceptional height and strength, was able to dispose of his rivals and lift this representative of British womanhood bodily into the kitchen of his hotel. She would probably be as much surprised as most of us were on visiting the place for the first time, to discover that after leaving this kitchen and ascending two stairs in the hope of arriving immediately at your bedroom, the maid calmly opens a door, and you find yourself in another street, which rises step after step for 100 yards or so, and brings you to one of the dependencies of the hotel, where probably you may have two or three stories to climb. You have a feeling all the time you are on the Mount that somehow you are living on the top of slates, as the houses look down upon each other, and in many cases you can walk from the top flat out on to a street at the back.

In a word, Mont St. Michel is unique. A stay here is an experience unlike any to be had elsewhere in Europe.



Digitized by Google

By MRS. D. A. FLETCHER.

TIME was when the lady farmer was an unknown quantity in the land.

Farming, so far as the fair sex was concerned, was restricted to the wives, daughters, or widows of the ordinary agriculturist, the lady at the hall or at the rectory possibly interesting herself in a few favourite chickens or ducks, but never entering the public agricultural arena.

To-day the "farmeress" is a recognised feature of country life. Some are to be found amongst the great châtelaines of the land, whose names are as familiar as household words. Others are merely quiet home-keeping gentlewomen, who have taken up the work either for pleasure or for profit.

Every branch of agriculture has now its lady exponent—stock-breeding, dairy farming, poultry-rearing, honey farms, and egg farms, are all included in the female curriculum, and success frequently crowns their efforts with every possible laurel from the world of shows. It has been said of the initiation of lady fanciers into the poultry world that many erstwhile corrupt practices have almost ceased with their advent. Possibly there are corrupt practices also in farming generally which their interest may help to slay. Anyhow they are fast becoming a very formidable set of rivals to their male colleagues, and I think one very probable reason for this is that it is the nature of women to attend more to details, to be saving of expenditure over little things which men, taking, or being credited with taking, the larger issues of life, are scarcely prone to do.

Before mentioning any others it must not be forgotten that Her Majesty and the Princess of Wales are both proficient "farmeresses." They take the deepest interest in all matters agricultural. The Queen frequently wins honours with her Shorthorns and Herefords. The Princess is equally famous for her poultry at Sandringham. Perhaps some day it may be our good fortune to be more familiar with these Royal farmyards.

As a rule ladies seem to find the most profitable and pleasurable delight from Guernseys, Jerseys, and the dainty Dexter Kerries, but there are exceptions to this as to every laid-down precept.

Miss Alice de Rothschild, who may truly be said to be one of our foremost lady farmers, goes in, like our Sovereign, for such cattle as Herefords, Shorthorns and Polled Angus, and there are few ladies, with the exception of Her Majesty, who have done better in this way. The Jerseys are also very notable at this beautiful Buckinghamshire estate, where the sister of the late Baron Ferdinand de Rothschild is maintaining all the best traditions of Waddesdon Manor.

Digitized by Google

Everything is so perfect here that it would be indeed difficult to conceive a greater paradise for the animal inhabitants. Not only does the utmost cleanliness, orderliness, and absolutely wonderful supervision prevail, but there is blended with the farm life of Waddesdon such an element of beauty that it is a pleasure to be able to spend a day within its precincts. Roses, wisteria, laburnum, creepers, and ferns of all sorts clothe every building and run riot down every wall. Besides the cattle already mentioned, Miss Rothschild breeds Oxford Downs sheep and Shire horses. In the poultry pens there are Andalusians, Wyandottes, and Dorkings, and many strange birds and beasts have found a home at this most exquisite of English estates. Miss de Rothschild's triumphs in the show yards are so numerous that it would be useless to attempt to describe them.

ON THE WAY TO THE MILKING.

From Bucks to coal-seamed county Durham seems a far cry; nevertheless, in the interests of farming, we have to transplant ourselves that distance, for at Wynyard Park we find Lady Londonderry going in extensively both for horse and cattle breeding. She has really three special herds under her management, or at least under her direction, for, both in matters of farm and stud, Lady Londonderry is a very noted connoisseur. She has for dairy purposes some crossed Angus and Shorthorn cows, and her Aberdeen Angus are equally well known for stock purposes, the pure Shorthorns being also a noted feature at Wynyard. The brood mares are a great matter in the farming life of this Londonderry estate.

Unlike many other lady farmers, Lady Londonderry is not at all keen on entering the show yard; she is content from year to year with a thoroughly good home account, only very rarely making an exception in favour of a more public tribunal The home farm at Wynyard is known as Salter House, but contrary to many canons of farming the Orpingtons and the Dorkings have their pens at some distance from it. The dairy is built in exact imitation of the house itself, the front having the same graceful Corinthian pillars and the walls clad with the flowers of the successive seasons. The interior of course reflects, from shining white and turquoise blue walls, the latest of dairy improvements and the best of modern implements effectual in the making of butter and cream.

The Hon. Mrs. Cecil Howard, of Dutchlands, Great Missenden, is a very famous Buckinghamshire lady farmer, with a herd of prime Jerseys. Everyone interested in these charming beasties attends the summer sale at Dutchlands, and the milking qualities of the herd are well known. Berkshire pigs also interest this lady, and in 1899 she carried off the champion prize for them at Aylesbury. Ponies she also goes in for, and, in fact, for general farming. Mrs. Howard is by no means a dilettante farmer, taking it up at one season and dropping it at another. She is thoroughly wrapped up in the work, and she even denies herself the pleasures and many allurements of society in order to devote herself entirely to the work she has in hand.

Mrs. McIntosh, of Havering Park, Essex, has quite a show herd of Jerseys on her lovely farm, which consists of 730 acres in one of the prettiest quarters of the country. This lady, adopting the principle of the real island owners of these cattle tethers them out all during the summer months, but their winter haunts are as dry and comfortable as forethought and ingenuity can make them. Besides her Jerseys Mrs. McIntosh keeps about two hundred sheep and some Highland cattle. A great Guernsey cattle owner is Mrs. Montefiore of Worth Park, Crawley, Sussex; Lady Tichborne, at her Hampshire home near Alresford, keeps the same; whilst Lady de la Warr's tastes run to the Kerry Dexters, dear little creatures, whose Swiss bells make music on the slopes above Bexhill-on-sea, where the old Manor House belonging to Lord de la Warr stands. Lady de la Warr has very practical notions as regards her cattle, and she is quite competent to judge of them and understand all their points. Lily, Duchess of Marlborough, the Hon. Mrs. Murray Smith (of Gumley Hall, Market Harborough), the Countess of Abingdon, Mrs. Walter Barron, Miss Emily Moore (of Leatherhead), and Lady de Rothschild (of Aston Clinton, Tring), are all Jersey cattle owners, those at Tring being very well-known favourites. There are about ninety young heifers kept, and all the original stock were bought in England and not in the Channel Islands.

Digitized by Google

MRS. PRESCOTT-WESTCAR.

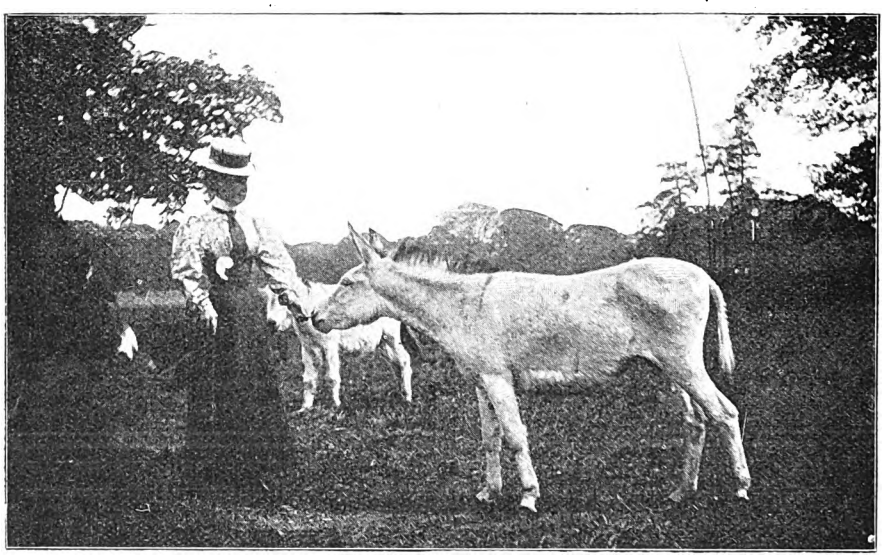
Aston Clinton is an ideal spot for farming, or indeed for any branch of outdoor life, for it is one of the most beautifully wooded parts of Hertfordshire. All the farm books are kept in the most methodical way, the Sandringham record sheet for testing the milking qualities of each cow being always in use. The yards and buildings are very large, and the Jerseys have a dining-room all to themselves. Quite a novelty here is the calf house, with accommodation for fifteen baby Jerseys. The late Sir Anthony took a great deal of interest and pride in his farm and all that appertained to it, and Lady de Rothschild is very particular to keep it up in a similarly perfect way. Pigs and poultry, chiefly the Sussex table birds, Cambridge bronze turkeys, and some Minorcas are allowed the freedom of the leafy venues of Aston Clinton, and a small number of Shire mares are kept. The dairy, which somehow one always expects to find a prominent feature in feminine farmland, is situated near the old manor house, where Lady de Rothschild's agent makes his home. Mention should also be made of the Shropshire sheep, which graze in the meadow-land round the house, and which often figure prominently at the Smithfield and other shows.

LADY G. VERNON.

Digitized by Google



LADY TICHBORNE AND HER EGYPTIAN DONKEYS.

Mrs. Prescott-Westcar, of Strode Park, Herne Bay, is a very successful dairy farmer, managing four farms herself. At one time she ran a tea-room and dairy in Herne Bay, and she now provides much of the milk for the numerous visitors to the seaside resort. At present Mrs. Westcar keeps about one hundred milking cows, chiefly Suffolk Red Polls. She is quite famous for her butter, which is said to be absolutely pure, but in spite of this qualification, she does not think that butter-making is a profitable branch of farming, as the British dairy farmer has so much to contend with in foreign competition. The poultry include some of the pretty Houdans and Buff Orpingtons.

A capital all round lady farmer is Miss Courtauld, of Knight's Farm, Colne Engaine, Essex. Her farm consists of 243 acres, and she manages it entirely by herself. She buys and sells her own stock, personally sees to the disposal of her fattened beasts, engages, pays and superintends all the hands, and is in fact her own general factotum. The house is a charming one, the orchard of eleven acres lies near the house, and both in blossom and fruit season the view is a delightful one. Black Galloways, Jerseys, Suffolk sheep, Berkshire, Tamworth and Essex pigs, crossed Indian game and Dorkings, besides Toulouse geese, are amongst the successes at Knight's Farm, whilst the work in the fruit orchard in the summer is no inconsiderable portion of the farming programme. Like many ladies who are interested in agricultural matters, Miss Courtauld is a member of the local Parish Council.

Lady Georgina Vernon is a famous cheese-farmer, and in her dairy at Hanbury Hall, Droitwich, she makes all kinds of cheeses of a fancy nature. She studied this art in the various farmhouses in Normandy, and she thoroughly understands their preparation, Brie, Port de Salut, Pont Evéque, and many others finding ready purchasers all over the country. Several ladies are making quite comfortable incomes with bee-keeping, which may safely be included in farming generally, and others again find it profitable to keep sufficient poultry and a few good milking cows to stock a stall on Saturdays in the local market.

Digitized by Google

Part of the Problem

By Oswald Chambers

WHAT a prelude! The evening was perfectly alert, but still, as if consciously wrapt in the worship of God. It was January too. Bare-barked trees had thrown into the grey twilight wonderful traceries of fantastic trunks and branches and twigs—but all was still, still and defined as if you saw it all through a stereoscope. The hills loomed up in the distance, a bank of darker gloom in grey twilight.

In the soul of the man who stood there in the night, amid one of those rare silences, which the whole creation seems to have after one of her spells of groaning and travailing in pain for some divine event, was a spell, not of stillness but of growing tumult and distress and pain.

He knew not where he was.

How soft were those hands—that sweet presence, it lingered round him drawing forth his nature as if in inspiration—to kiss those lips, to fling the strong arms of his manhood around that woman whom he loved far far more than life—something held him back from doing it for a while—a thrill ran through him, he bent forward, he whispered "Darling!"—then, Oh the soft radiance of those eyes, the yield of that whole woman to him was wonderful, wonderful; in silence they stood with just that lingering kiss and that unspeakable bliss of love returned full and deep and complete. But to-night he was alone; those hands, that figure, that kiss, that whole woman were only in his brain; he was alone.

Feebly he clutched at the old rustic paling, then grasping it in a grip of iron bowed his soul to the agony.

Passion stormed its way through his nature; he would have given his soul, all the spiritual inheritance gained for him by Jesus Christ, if he could but have had her, the woman he loved—Oh those brute teeth how they gnashed on his poor soul—no woman's softness came to him.

The soul struggle calmed from him and in a dull stupor he bowed there—how long? a whole turn of evolution?

When he moved cold and stiff, the moon was shining and a breeze weirdly sighed over the loch and died in the trees. He had fought with the beast alone, and now angels came and strengthened him. Jesus Christ spoke to him, by that glorious communion known only to those who know it—he knew this time was but a stage, the consciousness of another world grew in him and his heart burned within him, the spirit of Jesus kissed his spirit and a cool strength entered all his life.

* * *

In his tiredness another memory seized him in unutterable sadness, on his homeward way.

He had said he must go, and when he had hat and coat ready and they stood in the brilliantly lighted doorway, he wanted to take her to himself and kiss her—but he just went out with a cold good-night. Yet he saw the impulse of pain that passed in a spasm over her face. It went out into the night with him, and dazed his brain and he staggered as if he were drunk, he was half insane with the pain and the sorrow of it.

All this he told again for the hundredth time to his ever listening Saviour. Then he remembered a talk—he and she alone.

A rare calmness was with them both that evening, their spirits seemed inspired to speak strong words of wisdom. Yes, she knew there was consumption in his hereditary line and perhaps something worse was discoverable further back in those mysterious deaths of his aunt and sister—he remembered that when the talk was almost done, how she stood up before him and smoothed his hair from his forehead and said steadily and clearly with the love light in her eyes :—

Digitized by Google

"You know how I love you—Hector! there is the highest for you and for me, and if we refuse to obey the heavenly vision—but we cannot—there—is another life in God's time—it will be closer there holidays, and there was a good deal of chaffing and laughing at Hector's expense. But I knew we all thought differently when we smoked alone in our "digs," for Hector McLeod had got many a chap out of a hole and comforted many another who was out of the running. We were all Art students together.

Any way at the awards at the Academy that year my statue took the "cake," and I got a medal. There was a good deal of criticism about it in art circles and among our set; most of them thought it was an than—marriage here—Oh!" Then she faltered and those glorious eyes filled with tears—"I wish"!——

A WOMAN ON HECTOR MCLEOD'S GRAVE.

And in one of the sacredest moments passed by mortals on this earth these two parted until the day dawn and the shadows flee away.

* * *

I KNOW, in thinking it over, that this is what the man passed through. But of course I just told the fellows that Ross and I had seen Hector's home during the attempt to express in clay what should have been done in painting. But Ross knew that I didn't care whether I got the award. He was with me that night after we landed from a row on the river, and had seen that figure in white vanish up the avenue, in the dusk, to McLeod's cottage. We both heard the old psalm sung at worship, the two feeble quavering voices and the clear sad one leading. Ross was with me during the greater part of that night in old Malcolm's house while the old chap snored and we rummaged over Hector's drawings and sketches, which were in copious supply in the fisherman's hut. And then we went out just before dawn into the little winding path that leads to the churchyard on the hill—there we both had stirred within us what you must endeavour to imagine, for I can only tell you of the occasion.

Digitized by Google

I was wandering in the dark aimlessly enough, when Ross suddenly clutched my arm; and I saw a figure crouched on a grave, but the face was thrown up and out and the hands clasped all loosely on her lap. Ross forgot me (he told me afterwards) and I forgot him. I wanted to pray first, then I was seized with an almost painful desire to lie on the cold earth and expire.

Well, we watched there until the dawn broke in the East—and between us and the dawn was that figure of a woman on Hector McLeod's grave. That was the model for my Academy statue.

You will see it erected as a tombstone on the spot where the girl sat. There is something on the tombstone about how Hector met his death. I forget, although I gave the tombstone and all that sort of thing. But for your satisfaction Hector McLeod in trying to release a tree that had fallen across the Lynn and was hindering the salmon nets, slipped and the swift water sucked him under its glassy smoothness and he was delivered from the deep treacherous river many yards below quite dead.

SUNSET SOLITUDE.

Alone upon the cloud-swept hill;
Whence the slender moon glides placidly
Down world-long avenues of evening glow,
Like an echoless fall, or the soundless roar
Of countless waves on an endless shore;
Here sunset's solemn symphony
In silent tones of blue and gold pipes low.

Alone upon the cloud-swept hill;
Where the river's murmur, lone and dread,
In its onward sweep holds the song of the sphere,
While faint and small to the fading skies,
Like bells of peace, far voices rise,
And the call of the nightbird overhead
Cuts the brooding air like a cry of fear.

Alone upon the cloud-swept hill;
With the night's vast breathings over my brow,
Day's parting steps ring endlessly,
While one lonely star drops a slender beam
From the heart of the sky to the soul of the stream—
Like a memory thread 'twixt the Past and Now;
Like a ray of hope to Eternity.

Clarence M. Case.

Digitized by Google

IN THE PUBLIC EYE

Men and Women who are Helping to Make the World Brighter and Better.

THE woman of society has, within very recent years, entirely established her right to be taken seriously; as something more in the scheme of things than just the pretty butterfly that custom had, heretofore, accepted her to be. Amongst many notable and charming women of society, who have abundantly proved themselves to be possessed of high intelligence and an aptitude for hard work, we may mention the Hon. Mrs. Arthur Henniker. This lady, the daughter of the first Baron Houghton and wife of Mr. Arthur Henniker, is well-known as a novelist of individuality; and her energy, in the midst of social engagements, has made her responsible for a number of clever novels that have appeared since her early success with "Sir George" in 1891. "In Scarlet and Grey" and "Sowing the Sand" are two of her more recent works that have added much to the reputation she has already established. Mrs. Henniker is greatly interested in the widening field of woman's work, and kindly undertook the duties of President of the Society of Women Journalists in the year 1896, some exceptionally useful lectures being given for the benefit of the members during her term of office. The Hon. Mrs. Henniker is delightfully modest about herself, and it is only with difficulty that she can be persuaded to talk about the work that she has done or is doing.

MRS. ARTHUR HENNIKER.
Photograph by Army and Navy Auxilliary

Digitized by Google

MRS. W. CARTER.

MRS. WILLIAM CARTER is one of those people who shrink from publicity in connection with their work. Therefore very little is known about her. In Dorsetshire, however, she is known and beloved by all who come in contact with her. Her life is almost given up to working for others. Her first attention is given to the workmen and their families belonging to the pottery works, which are not far away from their residence. Near by is a room set apart for all kinds of meetings. There Mrs. Carter arranges teas, mothers' meetings, concerts, entertainments and other recreations both for old and young, and the room contains a piano, an organ, and all kinds of arrangements for the purpose of giving pleasure. Her own tennis-court was turned into a football ground for the use of the young employés. Mrs. Carter's work amongst her own people convinces her of the need there is for scientific temperance instruction, and she is working hard for that subject to take its place in the schools in which she is interested. Being a member of one large district School Board she has partially succeeded in the accomplishment of her aim in some of the schools. The Temperance movement as a whole has her keen and earnest sympathy, and she represents Dorsetshire on the Executive of the B.W.T.A. Mrs. Carter's work is not confined merely to these objects. All religious, social, and philanthropic work in her neighbourhood is helped. She is a woman of wide sympathy and generous nature, and never refuses help to any good cause if that help is needed.

THE "cry of the children" is heard nowadays and its piteous note often gains help. All kinds of organisations are at work to relieve the sorrows of the little ones, and amongst them is that of the "Waifs and Strays." This is a Church of England society, engineered by a pleasant-voiced man who sits in an office not far from the river Thames. The Rev. E. de M. Rudolf has his hands full with the multifarious duties of his post. There are cottage homes, invalid homes, and diocesan homes scattered about England. Their sheltering portals receive the little desolate waifs of humanity who otherwise would be left to the tender mercy of promiscuous charity. Fatherless children are also taken in. A good education is given to them and they are taught some trade. The invalid children are carefully nursed and in many cases their last hours are rendered easier and happier by the attention they receive. The work is often carried on through many difficult circumstances and the constant necessity of keeping in touch with all the different branches makes it exceedingly arduous. The society refuses to accept any child who could be more properly dealt with by the existing machinery provided by legislation. The preference is always given to children who are absolutely homeless and friendless. Nearly 600 boys and girls—the waifs and strays of our towns—were taken into the homes last year.

REV. E. DE M. RUDOLF.

Photograph by Brown, Barnes & Bell.

Digitized by Google

AMONG those who are helping to make the world brighter and better none rank higher than the women who bring thought and devotion to the development and application of domestic science in the homes of the working classes. To this great end Miss Fanny L. Calder, of Liverpool, has dedicated a quarter of a century of her life. After a long experience in various religious and philanthropic efforts on behalf of the people, Miss Calder was especially distressed by the deterioration in the ideals and the realisation of home-life among working people, arising more from ignorance of the simple elementary duties of home management than from poverty or want of time. Hence this practical lady concluded that the best way to ameliorate some of the frightful resulting conditions—intemperance and degradation—would be to educate women and girls in the housewifely occupations that naturally belong to the "maker of the home," a branch of instruction that had up to that period been almost entirely overlooked in the modern scheme of national education. Miss Calder set herself to the development of all branches of domestic work in the best lines of education, and, as the "domestic sciences," worked to obtain their acceptance by the Board of Education at Whitehall and by the Technical Education Committees of County and City Councils all over the United Kingdom. As Hon. Secretary of the Liverpool Technical College of Domestic Science, now in its twenty-fifth year, Miss Calder has had exceptional opportunities of gradually carrying out these ideas. Now the Committee has the satisfaction of seeing the scheme of domestic science education, including cookery, laundry work, household sewing, home dressmaking, domestic millinery, and housewifery accepted everywhere as essential elementary or technical education. Four years ago a day school was opened as a branch work of the College, the first of the kind in her Majesty's dominions, where a six months' course is provided of nothing but domestic science at a cost within the reach of the daughters of the poorest working man. A great feature of the work has been the issue of simple, but accurate and efficient, penny manuals to aid each learner in carrying her newly-acquired skill into daily operation. Miss Calder was also instrumental in founding the "Home Arts Association," chiefly to give lads and young men some interesting

MISS FANNY L. CALDER.
Photograph by Mowll & Morrison, Liverpool.

Digitized by Google

home occupation in the making of articles that would be useful and decorative in their own dwellings.

WHAT will become of the disabled soldiers on their return from active service in the Transvaal is the problem that is troubling the minds of some of the philanthropists of to-day. The Rev. Dr. Paton, whose name is a household word in Evangelical circles, is trying to find some way in which to solve the question. He and others associated with him suggest that similar colonies to the Industrial Farm at Lingfield should be established in order to provide suitable work for invalid and crippled men. The colony at Lingfield has been an almost unqualified success, and at Dr. Paton's earnest appeal men of high character are now being trained there in order that they may be able to fill such posts as those of prison warders and attendants in asylums. Dr. Paton has been known to the public for years as the founder and Hon. Secretary of the National Home Reading Union, which seeks to instil into its members the desire for reading good books. The Union takes in all classes, ages, and conditions of people. Elementary school children, high school girls and boys, young and old, men and women are admitted into its ranks, and some of the great educationalists of the day have testified to its efficient help. Dr. Paton is also keenly interested in the establishment of recreative evening schools and in social institutes. Of the latter Union he is the hon. secretary, and associated with him in the work are several bishops, the Archdeacon of London, and many well-known men and women. This Union was formed in order to utilise Board Schools and similar buildings during evening hours as centres of pleasant social life and popular education for working people. This Union has made rapid strides owing to its practical working by the hon. secretary. At the present moment Dr. Paton is using all his influence in trying to gather together the whole of the Evangelical Church ministers of the English-speaking world in a union of special prayer as they enter on the new century. With this in mind he addressed the ministers of the Free Church of Scotland a month or two ago, when they were assembled in Edinburgh, with most cheering results. All who know anything of Dr. Paton and his many good works must wish him "God speed."

Photograph by J. Dennis & Co.

REV. DR. PATON.

A MONTH or two ago the work of the Travellers' Aid Society was described in the columns of this magazine. This month the portrait of its energetic and devoted secretary is reproduced. Miss Jessie Gordon is responsible for the work carried on, both in town and country. She has occupied her position for over six years, and is thoroughly interested in the work. She considers that the Society has been of much benefit to all classes of working girls, and was overjoyed to hear the testimony of the station-master at one of the big London termini a short time ago. He told Miss Gordon that since the Society was started and its workers were to be found constantly on the platforms, he had noticed a marked difference. Before that time he often used to see people hanging about and speaking to girls to whom they were evidently unknown, but that now such a thing rarely occurs. The railway officials have great confidence in the Society, and they often send girls to the office in Baker-street to be taken care of until their friends can be communicated with. Miss Gordon is well fitted for her work—kind, courteous, friendly, and considerate, with a bright smile and pleasing manner ; she inspires all who come into contact with her and gains their confidence. All kinds of girls are sent to her—bad as well as good. The secret of her success is in the fact that she believes in them, and shows that she trusts them. She considers that often when they are perverse, it is from distrust and want of sympathy on the part of those who are over them. Miss Gordon is deeply interested in girls, and before she took up this work used to teach ; and, therefore, has come into contact with numbers of girls of all ages.

Digitized by Google

MISS JESSIE GORDON.
Photograph by G. Ridsdale Clare.

ONE of the busiest men in Liverpool at the present time is, undoubtedly, the Rev. Charles Garrett, the untiring Superintendent of the Wesleyan Mission at that important shipping centre. The Mission had its beginning there in the year 1873, when Mr. Moody, commenced a Revival Mission which stirred the whole city to an extraordinary degree. The Rev. Charles Garrett tells that during an all-day meeting, towards the end of this Mission, he was required to speak upon the subject, "How to reach the masses," and seized the opportunity to impress his hearers with the necessity for establishing "public houses" at which no intoxicants should be on sale. The suggestion attracted much popular support, and the needful capital for the building and upkeep of such houses was rapidly subscribed. Very shortly the scheme was in full working order, and the directors of the company—rightly believing that the man who suggested it would be the best man to carry it onward towards success – prevailed upon the Rev. Charles Garrett to abandon other plans, and accept the superintendentship of the Mission, which was established in the lower neighbourhoods of Liverpool. In Liverpool he has, therefore, lived for twenty-five years, during which lengthy period he has had the pleasure of seeing the Mission increase in popularity and importance. It now maintains eight halls in the city, four ministers, fourteen lay missionaries, four homes for boys, three for girls, and one for working men. With regard to the British Workman Company, which was inaugurated at the Wesleyan Mission in 1873, it is interesting to note that it has proved a financial as well as a social success, so that it has already established over sixty houses, which take nearly £100,000 per annum; the shareholders receiving a comfortable eight per cent. interest in return for their early enterprise in endeavouring to do battle with the peculiar "demon" of the people. The Rev. Charles Garrett can look back upon a splendid record of hard work since he began his ministerial life in 1847; one of the busiest seasons being that of 1860, a year made memorable by the terrible cotton famine that resulted from the Civil War in America. He was then in Preston, and, together, with the late Mr. Joseph Livesey, whose name is prominently associated with the teetotal movement, he spent himself in efforts to relieve the sufferings of the unemployed. Sad though that time was there were many gleams of brightness to lighten the blackness of distress; the unselfishness even of the sufferers themselves; and Mr. Garret relates that he found a workingman had given himself, heart and soul, to the task of raising a fund to supply clogs for the many orphan children in the distressed district. At that time Mr. Garrett initiated a fund from which has risen the magnificent orphanage in which Preston now rejoices. From Preston the Rev. Charles Garrett was removed to Hull, and from thence to Manchester, where he was instrumental in starting the Manchester and Salford Mission, which now has a splendid headquarters in the well-known Central Hall. Always a staunch upholder of the virtues of teetotalism, Mr. Garrett has employed spare moments in writing some useful papers on the subject near his heart.

REV. CHAS. GARRETT
Photograph by J. W. Thomas, Colwyn Bay.

Digitized by Google

MRS. G. P. FULLER.
Photograph by Friese, Greene & Co.

VARIOUS are the ways in which men and women are trying to work for the betterment of humanity. Although some of these methods are not in connection with any phase of religious thought they are none the less accomplishing good work. Education is one of the things that uplift people. It gives them a better chance in life, and Mrs. G. P. Fuller is one of those keen educationalists who believe that proper teaching results in skilled labour. She devotes a great deal of her time to the cause of technical education in Wiltshire, and is one of the very few women who have a position on County Council Educational Committees. She occupies the post of chairman of the Committee of the Wiltshire School of Cookery and Domestic Economy, and takes a great interest in its work. A training home for friendless girls also claims her attention, as does the elementary school at Neston, Mrs. Fuller being chairman of its managers. Not content with all this, Mrs. Fuller takes a prominent part in the scheme for boarding-out London pauper children in the country. She is the President of the Corsham Committee, which has received eighty orphans from the East of London and secured their bringing-up in respectable cottage families in the neighbourhood.

Digitized by Google

MR. H. BURDETT-COUTTS, M.P.
Photograph by Cardinali, Ajaccio.

MR. BURDETT-COUTTS, who has lately, for the second time in his life, been the most-talked-of man in England, has done a great deal that the world knows little about to make the world better and brighter. It has fallen to his lot to see the naked horrors of famine and war, to move about distributing relief in the wards of military hospitals and of famine-stricken peasants; and he has won the gratitude of the poor of London by a great effort on their behalf which is not commonly known. Hidden away in the obscurity of the mean streets of East London is Columbia Market Hall, one of the finest halls of commerce in the whole world. It is a monument to the philanthropy of Baroness Burdett-Coutts, who has spent three-quarters of a million of money on this magnificent hall, more like a cathedral than a market-place. But the tyranny of the Billingsgate ring crushed this effort to give the poor cheap food, and to-day Columbia Hall stands idle, an architectural waste. Mr. Burdett-Coutts has made a gallant effort to reopen the hall, which he purchased for the purpose. He bought a large fishing fleet in the North Sea, and did all that one mortal man could do against a great monopoly. But it was in vain, and the hall is closed to-day. It is largely due to the persistent efforts of Mr. Burdett-Coutts and the baroness, however, that great markets have been opened at all the principal railway termini in the metropolis.

AMONG the pioneers of market gardening as an industry for women is Miss Magdalen Mitchell, born in Shropshire, and daughter of the Rev. J. Mitchell, of Newbury, Berks. Long before Swanley Horticultural College for Women was started, Miss Mitchell turned to profitable use a private garden by growing and selling lettuces, peas, etc. About six years ago she thoroughly studied and learnt the art, and then began her market gardening on an extended scale. She speaks enthusiastically of her occupation. She says: "It is most delightful work. To grow large quantities of everything and to cater for the public taste have fascinations for me."

Market gardening under glass Miss Mitchell considers peculiarly suited to women, though there is no work, except the very heaviest, for which a man can always be kept, which cannot be done by a woman of average health, strength, and

MISS M. MITCHELL.
Photograph by Owen, Salisbury.

Digitized by Google

intelligence. To start on a large scale capital is necessary, but much can be done in a small way if a local market is sure, or a good sale to a shop secured. The scene of Miss Mitchell's worthy enterprise is "Glencune," St. Mary Church, Torquay, where, besides cultivating largely, she takes pupils, teaching them the theory and practice of gardening. Her ambition is to found a co-operative settlement of women gardeners, each with her separate house and plot of ground. This scheme she hopes to achieve ere long. Miss Mitchell grants that patience is certainly required to combat bad weather, insects, and other pests, but in her enthusiasm exclaims: "How one is repaid by the growth and beauty of flowers, fruits, and vegetables! How lovely they look! One's own rearing and bringing up! One's children!"

MISS DOROTHEA ROBERTS.
Photograph by Elliott & Fry.

MISS ALICE AUGUSTA GORE has recently become the pastor of a mission church at Stockton-on-Tees. She has been chosen for the office by the congregation, who have had experience of feminine leadership under the late Mrs. Goddard, by whom the church was founded and successfully carried on for nearly twenty years. So that, although to outsiders the appointment has the aspect of a novel experiment, it is not without precedent on the spot. Neither is Miss Gore without qualifications which promise well for the work she has undertaken. She is the daughter of Dr. George Gore, F.R.S., whose electrical researches have brought him a larger share of honorary distinctions than of wealth, and has been for some years an active worker in religious and philanthropic movements—chiefly in connection with the Congregational body—in Birmingham. She has had a good deal of experience as a preacher and public speaker, and her capacity as a leader and organiser has been well tested as secretary of one of the largest and most successful Christian Endeavour societies in the Midlands. Miss Gore was one of three ladies elected to the first Council of the Young People's Union in connection with the Congregational Union of England and Wales. Temperance work and Dr. Barnardo's Homes have also benefited by her advocacy. In going to new work in the north of England Miss Gore modestly says: "I cannot expect to fill Mrs. Goddard's place. . . . I do, however, hope to maintain the spiritual power and extend the aggressive work of the mission church she founded."

MISS A. A. GORE.
Photograph by E. B. Mowll, Birmingham.

Digitized by Google

IN the Rosses, County Donegal, knitting is one of the chief industries among the women. To the fostering and expansion of this living occupation Miss Dorothea Roberts has for many years devoted her time and energy. At one period—very hard times they were on that wild sea-board of Ireland—the market price for knitting a pair of socks was one penny. Things have much improved since those days, better prices are given for better work. Through the good offices of Mr. Balfour, who visited the coast in 1890, orders were obtained from the War Office, and since then each year has brought a contract for from 13,000 to 14,000 pairs of Army socks. The work is prized, for it is easy work, and it can be counted on, so long as there is someone to finance the business for these poor people. "But after all these years," says Miss Roberts, "we aspire to also knit garments more elaborate than our socks. We begin to be proud of our patterned vests for both men and women, our jerseys, our children's suits, our gloves, and our women do knit uncommonly well. They only ask for work and fair payment for it. We are proud to have never begged in the big, bare parish of the Rosses." Since Miss Roberts first gave out a few hanks of wool in 1882, a light railway to Glenties has been laid, which lessens the carriage of bales from forty to sixteen Irish miles; but what is most wanted is better sea carriage, but up to the present, though asked for, no small subsidy towards freight of Government goods has been forthcoming.

MISS C. S. BREMNER.
Photograph by G. Alvino & Co., Firenze, Via Nazionale.

TEACHING being woman's great profession, the outlet for almost all middle-class feminine energy until quite recently, it is safe to conclude that three out of every four educated women have, at some time in their career, been teachers. Miss Bremner is no exception to this rule. She now devotes herself to writing. In 1897 appeared her "Education of Girls and Women," a work which has been most favourably noticed, and is stated to be the only reliable and extended treatise on the education of girls and women in any country. She is at present engaged in a work on education in Ireland. Miss Bremner complains that there is little general interest in education. The mass of parents have no standard by which to judge education, and think their duty to their children in this respect duly performed if they can put them in the way of some money-getting occupation. Miss Bremner contends that the foundations of an Empire rest far less on the pillars of Hercules or the gates of Ind than on the right education of all classes and on the proper housing of the working-classes. The commercial pre-eminence of Britain in the world is dependent, in her opinion, on securing the best possible education for all classes, and not a whit behind education she places the decent housing of the workers.

THE portrait which appeared in the "Public Eye" of our September issue purporting to be that of Mr. George Tangye was that of Sir Richard Tangye, whose philanthropic work is well-known to readers of this Magazine.

THE ONLOOKER.

Digitized by Google

For THE BAIRNS.

Conducted by
THE REV. J. REID HOWATT.

THE CRUTCH-AND-KINDNESS LEAGUE.

This is true the poet sings—"Man wants but little here below, nor wants that little long." When we come to the essence of things a very small matter may give us more real enjoyment than we have been able to extract from bulkier affairs. Who of us all has not felt a touch of summer-happiness cling to him for days by coming into possession of a pen, say, which is a pen, and not a Sputtering, Metallic Irritation?—a pen which woos you to your desk, and softly beguiles you to scribble and scribble away for hours together, as a joy and not a mere cold duty? What artist has not carried his head an inch higher for quite a week by chancing on a pencil of a like friendly and docile spirit? These be small things, perhaps, but the boons and blessings bound up with them are not to be measured by the size of the small body in which they are enshrined. They are among the little we want and how much we have!—or the little we haven't, and how much is away! A youngster of mine put the whole philosophy into the nutshell of a thing "better left unsaid." A friend had given him some hours in her garden, along with a few other selected joys. When sending him home with flowers and fruit, she expressed the hope that he had enjoyed himself. "Oh, I have, he said enthusiastically, his eyes dancing with delight. Then—fearing possibly that he might be thought to have eaten too much, or gathered too big a bunch—he added apologetically, "But, you know, it doesn't take much to make me happy!"

The point and immediate moral of all this is—if we grown-ups can sometimes find so much real pleasure in things as small as a kindly pen or a friendly pencil, how much more must children find in scores of things we might be tempted to reckon as trifles? The world and all that in it is, is new to them still: they know nothing of the illusions we have left discarded on our track. A toy, a picture-card, a pencil with a score of sheets to scribble on ad lib.; a visit from the postman with a letter all to their very own selves, and in all the earth no king may be happier than they! And when the children are cripples, debarred the runs and romps of the healthy and the strong, made acquainted with suffering more than with glee—what funds of hope and interest and joyous excitement lie in the smallest surprise of pleasure anyone can give them! And how much more yet is this the case when the children are poor, to be left for hours alone in an all but bare room while mother is out to work for bread, with little or no butter for it. Yet this is the condition o thousands of poor wee cripples in London. There alone there are six thousand such cases of afflicted poor children under the care of the Ragged School Union, and the League of Crutch-and-Kindness has for its object the sending of little glimpses of light and cheer to these maimed and lonely ones. It is done in this way: the name and particulars of some child is given to each member, who then writes to his or her protégé once a month at least, or if happening to be too busy to write, sends a toy, or picture magazine, or anything else which will be for a little fillip to the frail one, making him or her a bit heartier for many days, as such tokens of kindness can do for children, aye, and for their wearied mothers too. This is the gist of the League's work, and who, young or old, rich or poor, far off or near, strong or weak, bedridden or free in bounding health, cannot do so much for pity's sake? A glance at the habitats of the new members whose names are given below will show that space is no hindrance to this merciful work; the members of the League are now in every part of the world, and their ages vary from six to eighty. There is, in fact, no one who has a desire to do some good in his or her day but may find the means through the Crutch-and-Kindness League. All further particulars, together with a beautiful card for framing, may be had for a stamp, not from me, but from Mr. John Kirk, Secretary, Ragged School Union, 32, John-street, Bedford-row, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

NEW MEMBERS FOR THE MONTH.

Miss Chapman, Windermere; Miss Ethel Mitchell, Newport; Miss A. Weaver, Bristol; Miss C. Rowlend, Hammersmith; Miss Mary G. Dixon, Huddersfield; Miss Dorothy Thompson, Penarth; Miss May Wadsworth, Miss Elsie Wadsworth, Leicester; Miss Alice Keens, care of Miss Underwood, Luton; Miss F. Tompkins, Southgate; Miss Sarah Ferguson, St. Andrews, N.B.; The Sunshine Co. of C. E., care of Miss Lucas, Sunderland; Mrs. Matthews, Caerwyn; Miss Mabel Schuty, Demerara; Miss Lizzie Young, Altrincham; Miss E. M. Stevens, S.S. Class, Huddersfield; Miss Amy A. Martyn, Miss Constance Martyn, Hoylake; Mrs. Lincoln Mills, Chippenham; Mrs. Morton, Wickwar; Miss Appleton, Liverpool; Miss G. H. Parker, Tunstall; Miss Ella Sharpe, Nottingham; Miss Bertha Barford, Luton; Mrs. Stavely, Ulverston; Miss Marie Larbalestier, Jersey; Miss Nellie Hines, Stoke-on-Trent; Miss Forbes, Beckley; Margaret Richards, Angus Richards, Croydon; Mrs. Pizzala, Tonbridge; The members of the Bethel M. N. C., Junior C. E., care of Miss Gibson, Hull; Miss Forman, Lough; Miss Mabel Flatt, Miss Ethel McCouchie, Miss Janet Johnston, Miss Alice Chapman, Miss Janet Easdale, care of Rev. J. Mackenzie, New Zealand; Master Cecil Palmer, Portsmouth; Mrs. Garrs, Bradford; Mr. Henry F. Caldwell, Pershore; Mr. Edwin H. Hillier, Bath; Miss N. Hope, Stroud; Miss Eleanor Lillie, Hampstead; Miss C. Wade, Manchester; Miss Olive Ogle, London; Mr. Joy, Bromley; Miss Burchill, Mr. W. Taffs, Miss Bodger, Miss D. May, Miss E. Shilston, Miss D. Shilston, Miss Waller, Mr. A. Sumner, care of Miss Amy Shilston, Ilford; Miss Emily Nathan, care of Miss Medway, Hendon; Miss K. M. Deane, Parkstone; Miss Barrett, Calne; Miss Olive Campbell, Argyll; Mr. T. Pearson, Hornsey.

"A SUMMER DAY'S RAMBLE."

(Prize Competition.)

I find I must compress even more than I have done the letters which have been received on this topic; otherwise, being so many, they would run on and on for some months, and these months being in winter the tales of the fine outings in the balmy summer would only fill the readers with sorrow over happy days that have drifted into the past to return no more!

There is a fine "caller" ring about the description Zillah Shields gives of a day in the west of Cheshire. "We started early in the morning, while the dew-drops were still on the grass. No sound could we hear save the sweet tittering of the early birds, or the merry whistle of the cowboy. On we went through the lovely green fields where dear little lambs were frisking about their mothers, and cows were lying on the soft grass quietly chewing the cud. Thus we went on till we came to a lovely, broad oak-tree, under which we rested. As we wandered homeward at last, laden with flowers, the thought came to my mind, 'Truly God made the country, though man made the town.'"

Constance Clarke, with sixteen others, had a day in small boats on a canal. "I had never been in a small boat before; there were six in ours, and the boys took it in turn to tow us along. After lunch we wandered about gathering flowers." How the kitten comes out in this closing remark—"The coming home was not quite so lively, because, you see, we were then with the elders!"

Ida Hony writes well, as this extract from a description of the Rocky Valley shows. "On the sides of the valley, rocks of grey granite with ivy creeping over their smooth surface showed out amongst the green. There was scarcely a breath of wind, and the air was heavy with the scent of the bracken. Owing to the heat of the sun we both began to feel very thirsty, so, making cups of our hands, we stooped down and drank from the stream. Oh, it was so delightfully fresh and cool; I do not think I have ever tasted more delicious water. When we had quenched our thirst we sat down to rest, the tall, purple loosestrife and bracken almost hiding us from view. We should both have fallen asleep, I think, if a moor-hen, flying noisily up from among the reeds, had not startled us, and we continued our journey. The valley had begun to change now; instead of the green banks were great black rocks, and in front of us lay the sea. The waves came rushing up the channel of the stream, rolling it backwards. I and my companion climbed on to a rock and watched the rising tide. The water was of that brilliant emerald hue which one so often sees on the north coast of Cornwall. Down beneath us we could hear the sea roaring in and out among the caves, and now and then a big wave dashed itself against the rocks, sending the white spray leaping high into the air. On a promontory near a number of puffins with their red, parrot-shaped bills were sitting, and round us the seagulls were wheeling, uttering their piercing shrieks. Everywhere on the rocks grew samphire, with here and there a clump of the beautiful sea-lavender."

Digitized by Google

Mary Ellen Abott had a good day down Torquay-way. "We climbed the rocks, and I picked a bunch of sea-pinks, which grew in abundance. Sometimes you had to jump over a large hole, and, on looking down, there was the deep sea beneath. On our way back such queer cottages were passed, all whitewashed, with thatched roofs, some of them tumbling down. I think the chief charm of Devonshire is the beautiful red earth which makes such attractive background to the mass of greenery on the cliffs."

Harriet Day, with four of her schoolmates, had a pleasant outing among the woods near Ipswich, including Wolverstone Park, gathering flowers and instruction too, for they kept a look-out for botanical specimens.

Edith Mary Littlewood, with her companion in the neighborhood of Sunderland, "jumped about just as if we were wild rabbits,"—which led to her tumbling down a bank, but without being hurt. Trying next to catch some small fishes in a stream, they both fell in and had to make for home to have their clothes dried, but another disaster awaited them there, for, as they were picnicking in the garden a hen flew on the table to get at the cake, so making havoc with the cups and saucers. It was a splendid day!

Florence Wild went to Elemore Wood, where she would have liked to pluck ferns, but "trespassers are prosecuted!" "When we came to a gate we stopped to have a ride, but were very careful to watch the little ones' fingers." While resting they told fairy tales, Florence's being "The Two Brothers: or How the Sea Became Salt." "We sang lots of songs, and went home quite tired."

Blanche Bertram rambled in the neighbourhood of Durham. "Such a change from the quiet lane to the bustle of the city! I quite longed for the peaceful lane again, and the sweet, pure air, but it was pleasant to see the different things in the shop windows. I saw the Castle and the Cathedral, grand old buildings: they were built in Norman times, so are very old." Then she had rather an exciting adventure. She thought they were to return by train, whereas it was to be by the trap, with the result that when night drew on, with tears and fears she had to walk the whole six miles along a lonely road home. It was a brave thing, well done.

Letters from the following were received a month too late for the competition: Ida Baker, Madge Baker and Fred. Hurnard Smith.

The following letter has been reckoned the best received in those alluded to this month; to the writer, therefore, a prize volume has been sent, and for the letters referred to last month (which were from the younger ones, who must have marks given them so as to balance ages and give 'em a chance) a similar volume has been sent to Olive Clara Eldridge, aged 8, Ivydene, Gilbert Road, St. Leonard's-on-Sea.

St. James' Vicarage, Bury St. Edmunds.

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—Have you never been for a ramble down some country lane, or over some sunny heath or woodland glen, on a bright summer's day? I am sure you have, or you would never have set us so delightful a subject upon which to write. Let us go out upon some wide-stretching common, fragrant with the scent of heather and wild thyme, the sun blazing down, adding beauty and warmth to the surroundings. Here is a clearance in the ferns and grasses in which is a seat formed by the encircling roots of an aged oak. Let us seize this opportunity of indulging in the delights of Nature's innermost bowers, and seat ourselves at the foot of this venerable plant. How beautiful everything seems; how it raises and elevates our thoughts. There is an indescribable something, an intensified fascination which we do not find in the crowded streets daily trodden by the foot of men. We are away from everything! We are free! We seem alone in the world. We have no companion but that of Nature itself. It is only in a situation such as this that we can hear the music, admire the art, and see the poetry of Nature. We hear the cries of the plover and the gentle singing of the lark overhead; we hear the bubbling and hissing of the stream as it lazily trickles over its tiny boulders. We hear the hum of the bees, truly symbolical of the human race, all intent upon laying in their golden store, little knowing that ere long their treasuries will be broken into by the still more grasping hand of man. We hear, too, perchance, the tinkle of the sheep bells, or the lowing of oxen far away on the distant hills. All this is music, yet who would compare these gentle strains, all in sweet harmony and sympathy one to the other, with the rasping notes manufactured by the weak and lowly hand of man? No Beethoven or Mozart has yet reached the grandeur of these melodies, showered upon the earth from the heavenly music of the Deity. We look o'er the open heath. For miles on this side we see nothing but the waving bracken broken here and there by clumps of fir and pine trees. In parts it is cultivated, and we see cattle grazing contentedly on the grassy slopes. On that side we see the village, a mass of quaint tumble-down cottages, the picturesque little steeple rising up from their midst. Is not this art? Is not this artistic? It is a picture that no Leader or Macwhirter has yet been able to depict upon the canvas. It is fresh from the brush of the Almighty Creator himself. Let us continue our walk. We see the shepherd lad looking after his sheep and the lambs frisking in the sun. Now we see possibly the curlew or the French partridge carrying food to their young, now a rabbit starts up from under our very feet and flies as though from some evil beast of prey. They, too, have learnt that man is a brute, but forget, or have never discovered, that he is also a benefactor. Perchance we are startled by a dragon fly, as with its outstretched pinions of gorgeous network it flutters by, and we watch him as we would the knight of old, admiring his plumage, but fearing his weapon. Now we come upon a group of rustic children, playing and tumbling about on the grassy downs, just like the tiny rabbits which are but a few yards ahead. Is not this poetry? Is not this poetic? It is more sublime, it is more magnificent than ever a Milton or Swinburne was able to describe. It is a glimpse of the blissful repose and tranquil rest of paradise. The vegetation has now become more fruitful, for we have drifted into a lane, affording a peculiar attraction for the botanist or the lover of nature. Upon the two banks, divided by the deeply rutted road, we can distinguish the scabius, heartsease, and the blue forget-me-not. Here the sweet scent of the briar is borne to us upon the refreshing breeze. There we see bright patches of toadflax and red poppies. The insects, too, have a particular charm for us, being, we take it, created for our admiration. We see the gilded flies, the moths in their garbs of sombre hue, the butterflies in their coats of many colours, the beetles and the caterpillars. And so we might go on enumerating them, but already the sun is sinking. How quickly the day has sped! We seem only a few minutes ago to have been setting out, and yet as many hours have fled. But why does all this affect us thus? Why does Nature, untrained by any hand, uncultivated by the plough, unreaped by the sickle, Nature, proud and dauntless, touch a chord so lofty? Why do the notes of the birds sound divine? Why does the brook inspire us with a feeling akin to awe and the breath of the flowers seem to enter our very souls? Is not this the way in which God reveals himself to man? Is not this the still small voice of the Creator speaking in Nature? What a lot we learn, and yet how few comparatively care to take this glance into the innermost recesses of Nature's workshops! I am afraid that I have been rather a long time in describing my "Summer day's ramble," but, as you said lately, a good prize is not to be won on a postcard.—Yours sincerely,

Digitized by Google

CHAS. HODGES. (Age 15).

THE NEXT COMPETITION.

Is there anything of the poet in you? Did you ever try to write poetry? I have—most people have—and very proud we have been of what we did, till the thing, having been put away and forgotten, turned up again; then, why, then, we haven't been always just so proud! Never mind, it's a good thing to try. So send me specimens of what you have done, whether grave or gay, long or short; and for the best poem—whether it is only four lines or forty—I shall give a handsome volume like those which have brought out the hearty thanks of so many competitors. All poems must be received by the 20th of this month, written on one side of the paper only, with name, address, and age of the writer (under 16), and be sent to Rev. J. Reid Howatt, The Crescent, Camberwell Grove, Denmark Hill, London, S.E.

Digitized by Google

When you see a particularly high lustre on a metal article, it means that GLOBE POLISH has passed that way, and left its signature.

USED IN THE HOUSEHOLD OF THE QUEEN.

GLOBE POLISH

Outshines, outlasts, outsells all others. Is the speediest, easiest, safest burnisher for all metals—silver, brass, copper, nickel steel, &c., &c.—in every-day use.

It does not injure the skin of the user, nor will it in any way scratch or damage the most valuable metal-work. Sold Everywhere. RAIMES & Co., Stockton-on-Tees; and Bow, London, E.

USED IN THE HOUSEHOLD OF THE QUEEN.

Digitized by Google

TO COLOUR GREY HAIR TRY ALEXANDRE'S SHADEINE

TRIAL BOTTLE 6D. Per Post, 7D.

SHADEINE colours grey or faded hair BLONDE, LIGHT or DARK BROWN, BLACK, AUBURN, and GOLDEN. It contains neither lead, silver, mercury, sulphur, nor anything injurious.

Guaranteed not to burn the hair, produce an unnatural tint, but to be permanent, washable, free from grease or stickiness, and

ABSOLUTELY HARMLESS.

A MEDICAL CERTIFICATE with every Bottle.

LARGE BOTTLE, 3/6; Post Free, 3/9. TRIAL BOTTLE, 6d.; Post Free, 7d. (Secretly Packed.)

Established 1867. (PARIS DEPOT: 28, Rue de Chabrol.)

T. M. ALEXANDRE, 30, WESTBOURNE GROVE, LONDON, W.

THE BEST AND QUICKEST REMEDY FOR

RHEUMATISM, GOUT, LUMBAGO, BRONCHITIS, SORE THROAT, NEURALGIA, &c.

SMEDLEY'S CHILLIE PASTE

Bottles, 1/1½, 1/6, & 2/9, of all Chemists.

Gives instant Relief. Does not Blister.

The most obstinate cases of Rheumatism, Gout, Lumbago, Neuralgia, etc., are soon cured by the outward application of SMEDLEY'S CHILLIE PASTE, together with an occasional dose of

LASCELLES' PILLS

Bottles, 1/1½ and 2/9, of all Chemists.

Sole Proprietors—HIRST, BROOKE, AND HIRST, LIMITED, LEEDS.

THE OLDEST AND BEST.

UNEQUALLED FOR ITS BRILLIANCE AND CLEANLINESS.

ADAMS'S FURNITURE POLISH

FOR FURNITURE, BROWN BOOTS, PATENT LEATHER, OILCLOTHS, AND ALL VARNISHED AND ENAMELLED GOODS.

THE QUEEN says: "Having made a fresh trial of its virtues after considerable experience with other compounds of the same nature, we feel no hesitation in recommending its use to all housewives."

VICTORIA PARK WORKS, SHEFFIELD.

METROPOLITAN

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS FOR BOOTS & SHOES

CREAM

W. CLARK, 528, Oxford Street, W.

"NEGO"

No Paper Required. THE FIVE-SECONDS FIRELIGHTER. No Waste of Cinders.

THESE Firelighters are a scientifically-prepared composition, with enormous inflammatory properties. All that is necessary when lighting a fire is to break the block into three sections and place in the stove, surrounding the same with coal. When ignited a steady fire will immediately result. One of these Firelighters is quite sufficient to boil a kettle in a few minutes. Sold everywhere in packets of 10, price 3d., or will be sent post free upon receipt of Three Stamps.

THE "NEGO" CO., GOOLE, YORKS.

A sample of these Firelighters will be sent post free on application.

No. 354.

Keystone Burgundy.

Light, rich, natural wine. Delightful flavour, pleasant aroma. Contains a small percentage of iron in an assimilable form. For table and sideboard.

Sold by licensed grocers, chemists, and wine merchants.

Flagons - -	2s. 0d.
Bottles - -	1s. 6d.
Half-Bottles -	10d.

Write for booklet to proprietors: Stephen Smith & Co., Ltd., Bow, London, E.

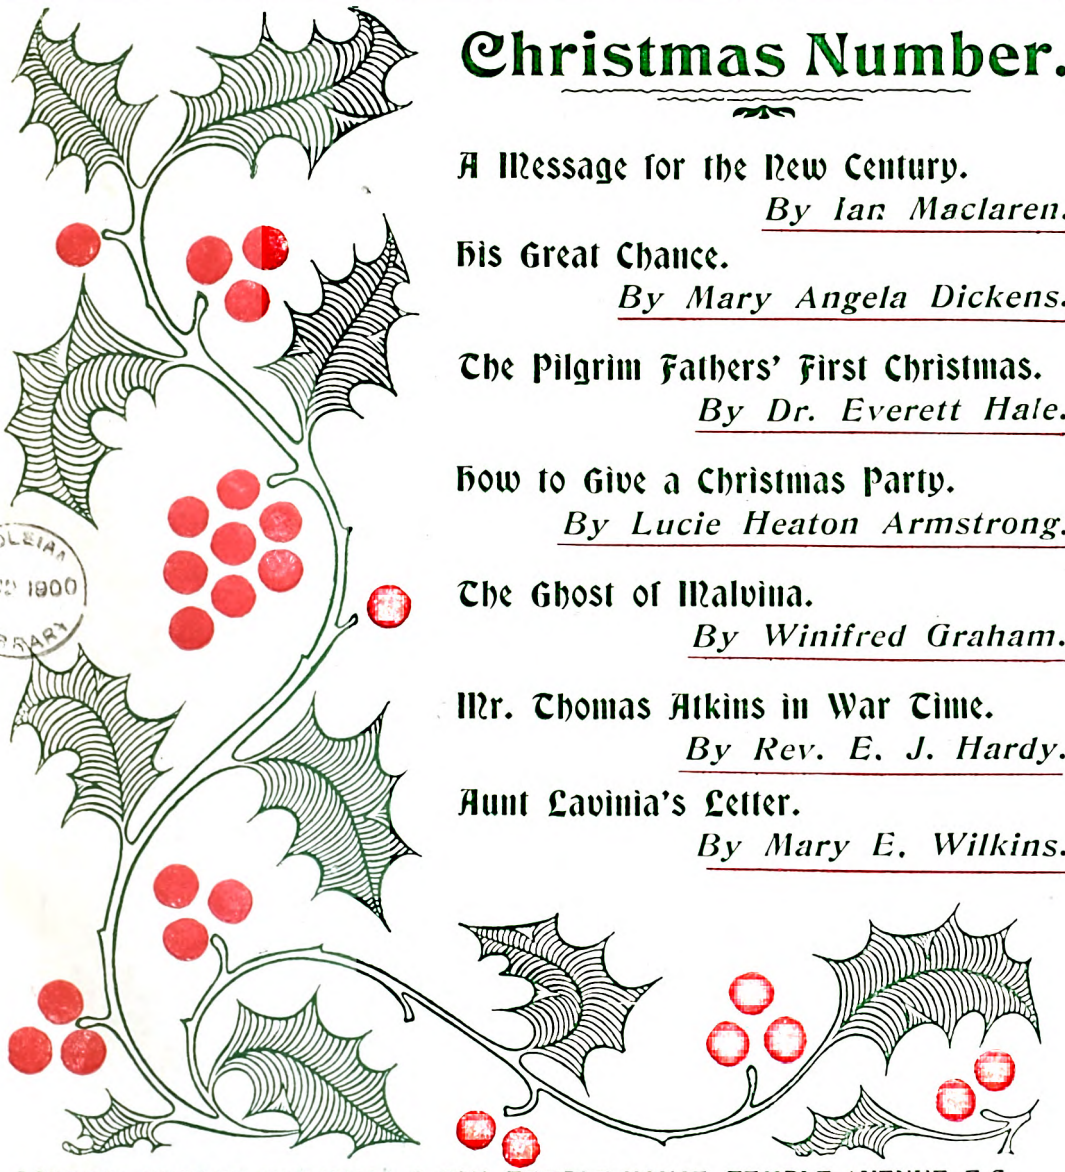
Agents for Australasia and the Colonies: R. A. THOMPSON & Co., Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane, Adelaide, Cape Town, etc.

LONDON: PRINTED FOR THE PROPRIETORS BY THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY, LIMITED, WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, CARMELITE STREET, E.C.

Digitized by Google

VOL. V. DECEMBER, 1899. No. 5.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE



Christmas Number.

A Message for the New Century.
By Ian Maclaren.

His Great Chance.
By Mary Angela Dickens.

The Pilgrim Fathers' First Christmas.
By Dr. Everett Hale.

How to Give a Christmas Party.
By Lucie Heaton Armstrong.

The Ghost of Malvina.
By Winifred Graham.

Mr. Thomas Atkins in War Time.
By Rev. E. J. Hardy.

Aunt Lavinia's Letter.
By Mary E. Wilkins.

BODLEIAN 11 NO 1900 LIBRARY

LONDON: HORACE MARSHALL & SON, TEMPLE HOUSE, TEMPLE AVENUE, E.C.

Cadbury's Cocoa

Absolutely Pure, Therefore Best.

"The Standard of Highest Purity." —The Lancet.

Digitized by Google

LINES

Each thing has its own business; most things attend to something else.

It is the particular business of Orain Tablets to cure Indigestion—they do that.

Dyspepsia and its uncomfortable family, Flatulence, Acidity, Heartburn, Pain, Weight and Fulness after Meals, etc., are bad lodgers. They require eviction at short notice. Orain Tablets will attend to this matter

Indigestion will make a man a misanthrope for years—Orain Tablets will make him love his neighbour inside a week.

Orain Tablets are compounded from the prescription of a fully qualified specialist of wide experience. This is a humiliating confession, but it has to be made.

A spoonful of truth is often taken with a grain of salt; sometimes it is not taken at all, which is foolish.

You must remember that there is a chance possibly in your opinion a long-odds chance, but still a chance—that, though this is an advertisement, its contents are in line with the truth; and if you have the misfortune to be dyspeptic, you don't need to be told that the merest chance of unloading your burden is worth more than an average risk. Orain Tablets are guaranteed innocuous, so that the risk in their case figures out at 1s.; that being the sum (in stamps) for which we will send you a bottle, post free. Is it too big?

THE ORAIN CO., LTD.,

8, CATHERINE COURT,

LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The

Allenburys' Foods.

A PROGRESSIVE DIETARY, suited to the growing digestive powers.

YOUNG INFANTS thrive and sleep well, and are contented and happy, being saved from the disorders and digestive troubles common to those fed on farinaceous foods, condensed milk, or even cow's milk.

Milk Food No. 1. Milk Food No. 2. Malted Food No. 3.

FOR INFANTS FROM

Birth to three months of age. — Three to six months. — Six months and upwards.

Pamphlet on Infant Feeding and Management FREE.

Allen & Hanburys Ltd., Plough Court, Lombard Street, London.

BORD'S PIANOS

25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (second-hand, 10s. 6d. per month) on the Three Years' System. — Lists free of C. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C. PIANOS EXCHANGED.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

These magnificent Pianos for Hire on the Three Years' System, at advantageous prices and terms.—List and particulars free of CHAS. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

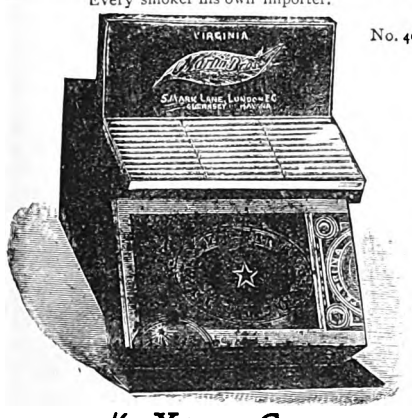
Every smoker his own importer.



5/6 Xmas Case.

Duty and post paid.
Contents: two original boxes.
1 box 25 cigars, "Le Prina" No. 4,
1 box 100 Virginia Cigarettes.

Particulars of 10s. 6d., 21s., and 42s. cases, also special Xmas offer, are given in our General List.

Please write for a copy. The Xmas cases contain the utmost value our system of supplying the smoker direct affords. Cigars direct from plantation without intermediate profits and expenses. Money refunded on all stock returned, no matter why.

MARTIN BROS. Office K,
5, Mark Lane, London, E.C.
Also at Guernsey and Havana.

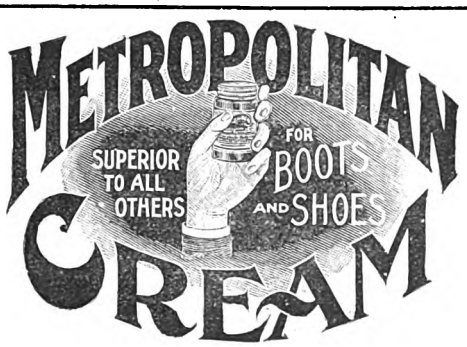
THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.



W. CLARK,
528, Oxford Street.

Digitized by Google

FOR MOTHERS AND DAUGHTERS.

QUEEN MARGHERITA'S HOME.

The decision of Queen Margherita to make Rome her future home has put the Royal family in a quandary, says a Rome correspondent, for they hardly know where to turn to find a suitable residence for her. The King wished her to take up her quarters at the Quirinal Palace, but, out of consideration for her daughter-in-law, she refused, and it is just as well, as no little difficulty would have been experienced in finding her accommodation there. According to a tradition of the House of Savoy the apartments of a defunct Sovereign are always kept closed and uninhabited for two generations, so that the quarters of Victor Emmanuel II., Humbert I., and Victor Emmanuel III. (the present King) take up all the available space. The Royal House for some time has been negotiating for the Villa Malta, which the King wishes to present to his mother. This is a charming place, embedded in roses and flooded with sunlight, but the noble owner asks 1,000,000 lire more than the valuation of the agents of the Royal House. There the matter stands at present. An item in the owner's bill is the rose trees, for which over £2,000 is said to be asked. This is, perhaps, not an exaggeration, for they are the loveliest in a city that boasts roses without rivals in the world.

Quite different from philosophic reflection, which employs the mediation of reasoning and the instruments of analysis, and arrives at its conclusions by methods of which it can render no logical account, that purity of heart which sees God, discerns Him by the immediate glance of sympathy.—James Martineau.

PAINTING A LITTLE PRINCESS.

Mrs. E. M. Ward, the well-known artist, has probably been more patronised by royalty than any other lady artist of our time. Mrs. Ward had a picture hung in the Academy when she was barely fifteen years of age, and for thirty consecutive years her pictures were so honoured. She has now passed her sixtieth birthday, but she is as wedded to her art as when she painted little Princess Beatrice, who has since then grown to womanhood and suffered the sorrow of widowhood. The Queen had been pleased by some portraits she had seen of the artist's own children, and asked Mrs. Ward to paint the little Princess. While she was at work one day her Majesty came in and "tickled Beatrice's toes," as Mrs. Ward puts it. Beatrice became unmanageable; not even her reverence for the monarchy was strong enough to prevent her revolting under such circumstances As gently as she could, but as earnestly as she dared, the artist pleaded for her little sitter, whereupon the Queen, turning to Mrs. Ward with a smile, exclaimed: "Oh! but I will do what I like with my own baby!"

AUTUMN CLOTHS.

West-end tailors are making up many lovely costumes of pale blue and rose-coloured frieze for the autumn. The sudden on-coming of the cold has made us fly to these warmer stuffs, and so capricious is fashion that we do not care in the least for satin-faced cloths, which were our delight last winter, but must have rough texture and hairy surface. The weather prophets are saying we shall have a severe winter, but in these cosy frieze costumes the most delicate woman can defy the frost.

Digitized by Google

FREE

Frolie Fortune Telling Calendar

FOR 1901.

AN AMUSING GAME

The Frolie Fortune-Telling Calendar is the Most Interesting of all Parlor Games.

THIS unique Combination Calendar and Fortune Teller is a distinct art production of 16 pages, 6 x 6 inches, beautifully printed on heavy cardboard in 14 colors. At once the handsomest calendar and most amusing and interesting game for everyone. Sent on receipt of 3d. in stamps for postage.

Address Dept. G. 3.

QUAKER OATS, Ltd.,

EASTCHEAP, LONDON, E.C.

For Improved Fortunes eat Quaker Oats

PAUL E. DERRICK ADVG AGENCY

Digitized by Google

The Most Remarkable Work of the Present Century.—Vide the Press.

PROFESSOR BOYD LAYNARD'S GREAT WORK,

"SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH, and LONG LIFE."

Published by HAMMOND, HAMMOND & Co.,
19, 21 & 23, LUDGATE HILL, LONDON.

The Publishers have much pleasure in announcing the issue of the great popular edition of PROFESSOR BOYD LAYNARD'S great work, "Secrets of Beauty, Health, and Long Life."

This remarkable handbook to the three subjects embraced in the title has been a long period in preparation by the Author; being in fact the labour of many years of diligent research and earnest investigation. The work is arranged in two books, fifteen parts, and 127 chapters, the whole of which (in the popular edition now offered to the public) is bound in one volume. The book, although published at Two Shillings, will, if ordered direct from the Publishers, be forwarded to readers of THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE, carriage paid, at the low discount price of

ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE.

Amongst the numerous subjects dealt with, the following are but a few; a complete syllabus showing the contents of the whole of the 127 chapters, enumerating upwards of 500 subjects and divisions of subjects, can be had free on application to the Publishers:

Analysis of beauty—Beauty a possible attainment—The way we make our own faces—Secrets of face transformation—Changeableness of beauty and its causes—Metaphysical secrets of keeping young and preserving a youthful appearance—The author's investigations into the causes why some individuals look younger than others at a certain age—Wonders of the skin—Relation of the skin to beauty—Effects of mental emotions upon the skin—Effects of heat, cold, and changes of temperature upon the skin—Bad complexions and their causes—Diet that spoils and diet that improves the complexion—General care of the complexion—Construction, growth, and wonders of the hair—Why hair falls out, and its remedy—Premature greyness: its causes and prevention—General care of the hair—Superficial hairs and how to treat them—Wrinkles: their prevention and treatment—Freckles, tan, and blackheads—Oily skin, dry skin, and loose skin—How the nose can be improved—Protruding ears and their treatment—Offensive breath—Anatomy of the teeth—Why teeth decay—General care of the teeth—Tallness and how to attain it—Round shoulders and how to cure them—How to acquire a full chest—Perfect form and figure; their proper proportions—Thinness and its treatment—Excessive stoutness—Care of the hands—Care of the feet—Physiognomy: or the art of reading character from the face—Mental influences upon health—Power of the mind over the body—Influence of the mind in curing diseases—How the mind can induce disease—How violent passions injure health—Laughter as a medicine—Ailments cured by laughter—Wonders of digestion—Relative value to our bodies of the principal articles of food—Fruits and vegetables as medicine: their various influences upon the physical system—Health preserving diet and its consistency—Diet favourable to mental exertion and intellectual culture—Influence of various foods upon our passions and propensities—The influence exerted by the mind upon the appetite and digestion—Some perilous articles of food—Light, and its influence upon health—Exercise, and its relation to health—Baths and bathing: their influence upon health—The way we breathe, and how it affects our health—The marriage state, and its influence upon health—Statistics showing the comparative vitality of married and single persons—100 professions, trades, and occupations: their respective influences upon health and long life—Sleep, and its relation to health—Conditions for healthy sleep—Insomnia, and its treatment—The eyes, and how to preserve them—The ears and hearing: how to prevent deafness—The voice: its cultivation and preservation—Memory, and how to improve it—Stammering, and how to cure it—Prevention of disease—Colds: their prevention and treatment—Constipation—Neuralgia—Nervousness—Headaches—That rebellious organ, the liver—Blushing: its physiology and treatment—Rules of life for attaining longevity—Compendium of the mental, moral, physical and external influences that lessen the years of our earthly existence—The mental, moral, physical, and external influences that are conducive to long life—How to live to a hundred—Premature old age and its causes—Short biographies of thirty modern centenarians, whose ages range from 115 to 185 years—Attainment of long life under physical disabilities—General principles that can be laid down for the anticipation of longevity—The eight signs of long life.

ORDER FORM 99756

To HAMMOND, HAMMOND & Co.,
19, 21 & 23, Ludgate Hill, London.

Please forward me Professor Boyd Laynard's complete work, "Secrets of Beauty, Health, and Long Life" (carriage paid), for which I enclose the sum of One Shilling and Sixpence.

Name.....

Address.....

DEMI-TOILET GOWN.

The most charming gowns are being arranged for table d'hôte wear—gowns, indeed, which, although somewhat elaborate in arrangement, are yet none too smart for wearing at afternoon "at homes" or musical gatherings. The skirts are, as a rule, arranged with a kind of double panier, each one being edged with string-coloured lace or black lace set over white, all of which must depend upon the colourings of the gown itself, while the bodice to such a gown is in almost every case quite full from the bend of the figure, and set into a yoke-piece of lace, which yoke-piece is clear for evening wear and lined with a contrasting and very dainty shade for afternoon occasions. The sleeves, of course, must show some kind of tucking, either at the shoulder or at the wrist, the former, perhaps, proving the smarter of the two, while the wrist-piece falls right over the hands, almost to the knuckles, and is edged with some kind of lace passementerie to match.

Before we passionately desire anything which another enjoys we should examine into the happiness of its possessor.

Digitized by Google

Gregorian Church and Chapel Organs

"A special word to the Church with limited funds having Cathedral-organ desires."

I have much pleasure in stating my opinion that the Gregorian is in all respects the most perfect instrument of its kind extant.

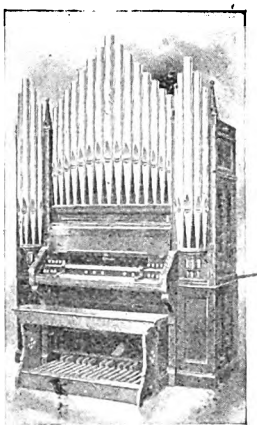
Each stop possesses a distinct individuality of its own, yet, when used in combination with others, they all blend most satisfactorily. The intonation is uniformly good, and the wind is distributed in a manner to insure prompt and perfect "speech" throughout the entire compass of the keyboards under all circumstances—a result never before accomplished in this connection.

The quality and tone is exquisitely pure, and so closely resembles that produced by "flue" pipes as to frequently deceive even the educated ear of an expert; and for this reason the Gregorian is an adequate substitute for a small pipe-organ. This attribute does not, however, detract from its value as a household solo instrument.

Faithfully yours,
FREDERIC ARCHER, Organist.

The Gregorian

system of organ-building enables us to build in compact form and at small cost organs which are veritable reproductions of the cathedral organ. Write us for Catalogue and any information desired regarding the instruments. Even should the outlook for an organ fund not be encouraging, if you need a new organ, write us. Nearly 4,000 Gregorian Organs now in use.



STYLE 22.

The Orchestrelle Company, 225 Regent Street, London, W.

The "Osman"

Turkish Towels and Bath Mats.

OF ALL DRAPERS.

Made by
BARLOW & JONES, Limited,
Manchester, London, & Bolton.

CONGREVE'S Balsamic ELIXIR

Admitted after 70 years use the world over to be the BEST REMEDY for

CONSUMPTION

CONGESTION OF THE LUNGS
CHRONIC BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, COUGHS, COLDS, INFLUENZA.
Sold by all PATENT MEDICINE VENDORS.
Congreve's book on Consumption, 6d. or 1s. post free from COOMBE LODGE, PECKHAM LONDON, S.E.

Eat

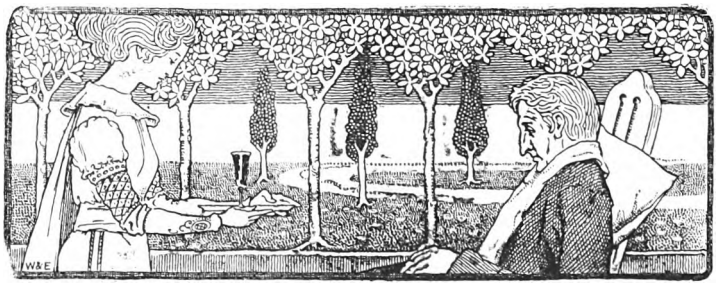
Hovis

at all Meals.

It is the nicest and most digestive of Breads. Most Family Bakers supply it. If not known our Local Bakers' addresses will be sent on application to HOVIS, Ltd., Macclesfield. Trade Mark—HOVIS.

Digitized by Google

No 439.



Hall's Wine.

When illness, worry, or age has nearly taken all the life out of you, Hall's Wine will revive and increase what strength you have left. It imparts immediate tone and vigour, and no reaction follows its use. Its recuperative and restorative power quickly tells in all cases of debility, convalescence, and depression.

3/- and 1/9

Bottles in two sizes

Sold by licensed grocers, chemists, and wine merchants. Write for booklet.

Stephen Smith & Co., Ld., Bow, London.

Digitized by Google

TURKISH BATHS AT HOME.

The CENTURY CABINET brings to your home all the benefits of the best Turkish Bath rooms. Not an essential feature is lacking. You save breathing hot air, save the risk of exposure afterwards, save time and expense. The cost is but 1½d. per bath.

For the cure of rheumatism, kidney and blood diseases, no other treatment can approach it. The hot air bath forces the impurities that cause the disease out from seven million pores at once. In all sanitariums the Turkish bath is the most important treatment. All who value cleanliness, complexion and health will eventually own one of these cabinets. The quieting, refreshing, invigorating effects of the bath are the pleasantest sensations possible. One bath will always stop a cold.

The CENTURY CABINET is a strong double-walled room, rubber-coated inside and out. When ready for use, the walls are rigid, yet by merely tipping the cabinet you fold it in a second into a 2-inch space. It has Face Steaming Attachment.

A patent spirit stove heats the cabinet to 150 degrees in five minutes. For a vapour bath, pour a pint of water into the vaporizer. For medicated baths, put the proper drugs in the water. We send 35 formulas with the cabinet.

PRICE, complete with Spirit Heater and Vaporizer,
25/- to 70/-
FREE—35 Formulas for Medicated Baths.

The CENTURY CABINET is in every respect the best one on the market. We do not compare it with the worthless affairs, too bothersome to use. We guarantee that it is better than the best of the good ones. We sell on trial, can be used for 15 days and returned at our expense if not found to be as represented.
Send to-day for Sample of Goods FREE, also our handsome illustrated catalogue, No. 71 and order from that.

AGENTS WANTED for unrepresented territory.

L.P., CENTURY THERMAL BATH CABINET, Ltd.,
Dept. 71, 203 & 205, REGENT STREET, LONDON, W. Please mention TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

BROOME'S MUSIC

See that the name "BROOME" is on every copy.

*938 For Liberty, March. Fabian Scott.
*956 Imperial Volunteers, March. [illegible]
*987 Night Attack. Fabian Scott.
*988 The Departure of a Troopship. Fabian Scott.
*992 Ladysmith March. Fabian Scott.
*993 Kimberley March. Fabian Scott.
*994 Mafeking March. Fabian Scott.
*995 Bloemfontein March. Fabian Scott.
*996 Pretoria March. Fabian Scott.
*997 Relief March. Fabian Scott.
1009 Pigtail Polka.
*1010 When the Boys Come Marching Home, March. Theo. Bonheur.
*1017 Chinese March. Ezra Read.
*1018 Pekin, Chinese Carnival. Ezra Read.
1025 Cock-a-Doodle, Schottische. m.
1026 Tearless Life, Sacred Song.
1028 Won't yer let me kiss yer? Coon Song.
1029 The Handy Man. Naval Fantasia. m.
1030 Follow Your Leader. Barn Dance. m.
*1031-4-5 Going to Table Bay. (Descriptive Fantasia on the War.) By Alan Macey. Post Free, 7d.
*998-9-00 March of Peace. d. Post Free, 7d.
*1001-2-3 " " e. "
1011-12-13 Blossoms, Waltz. m. "
1014-15-16 Suspense, Waltz. m. "
*1019-20-21 War on the China Sea. m. (Descriptive Naval Fantasia.) Post Free, 7d.
*1022-23-24 When the Boys come Marching Home, Song. By Theo. Bonheur. Post Free, 7d.

* War Numbers 2d. each; post free, 3d.

W. H. BROOME, 15, Holborn, London, E.C.

TO ASTHMA SUFFERERS.

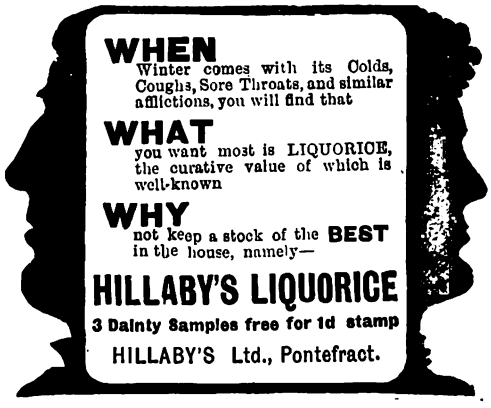
IMMEDIATE RELIEF in all cases of ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, CROUP, and WHOOPING COUGH is gained by the use of

POTTER'S DATURA ASTHMA CURE.

Sold by all Chemists and Herbalists, in Tins at 1s. each
Free Sample sent on receipt of Post Card to POTTER AND CLARKE, Artillery Lane, London, E.

Hair Destroyed.

Send me an envelope (stamped and addressed and I will tell you how to remove all superfluous hair free of charge. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Miss B. O. (Room 3), 105, Oxford Street, London, W.



WHEN
Winter comes with its Colds, Coughs, Sore Throats, and similar afflictions, you will find that

WHAT you want most is LIQUORICE, the curative value of which is well-known

WHY not keep a stock of the BEST in the house, namely—

HILLABY'S LIQUORICE

3 Dainty Samples free for 1d stamp

HILLABY'S Ltd., Pontefract.

Digitized by Google

WINTER TOQUES.

The enormous size of the ultra-fashionable toque gives a rather top-heavy look to a smart woman, especially if she is short in stature. It seems to be the very shortest women who wear the largest and widest toques. If they could see themselves in outline, without any of that partiality which is inspired by self-love, they would for ever after choose their headgear in better proportion to their own dimensions. The toques shown in the sketch show three gradations of size, the middle one being the largest. The uppermost is made of tucked cloth, and is trimmed with velvet, lace, black wings, and an ornamental buckle. The second is a large velvet hat lined with folded chiffon, and slightly raised at the left side by a band placed under the brim, with a bow of bright-coloured panne and a paste buckle. Mouse-grey is the colour of the model from which this hat is sketched. This quiet tint is extremely fashionable, and has a charm all its own when seen among bright red toques, pink, green, or blue. It is not so trying as any of these, and the necessary touch of colour can be introduced under the brim. The undulating shape is pretty. Black feathers and a folded drapery of black chiffon form the trimmings. The third toque is of a stiff and formal shape, often preferred by those whose organ of neatness is well developed, and who carry their liking for system and regularity into every item of their personal belongings. The hat itself is of glossy heliotrope felt, resembling beaver. It is edged with a band of velvet, matching the felt in tone, and has a band of velvet round the crown, with a large silver buckle in the centre. The two clusters of flowers are violets.

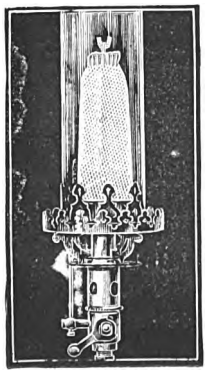
FOR LONELY GIRLS GOING ABROAD.

"A Friendly Warning to Young Women Leaving their Own Country" is a booklet written by Mr. William A. Coote, the secretary of the National Vigilance Association. It enumerates the difficulties and dangers to be avoided by those seeking employment abroad. The names of the German, French, Dutch, and Belgian Consuls are given, as well as the names of three hundred ladies and gentlemen of good standing in one hundred and fifty-three foreign towns and cities who are willing to help young ladies who are "stranded" abroad, and who apply to them. A copy of the booklet can be had free by writing to the National Vigilance Association, 319, High Holborn, London, W.C., and enclosing a stamped addressed envelope.



The Gas Self-Lighting Co.,
LIMITED.

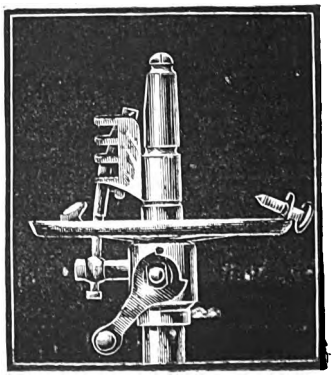
By means of this Company's valuable patents, the use of matches or tapers for lighting gas jets is entirely dispensed with, dispensing also with a bye pass jet continually alight (this saves the expense). A great source of danger from fire is thereby removed, and an annual expense far exceeding the cost of the Self-Lighter is saved.

THE SELF-LIGHTER.

A Simple, Effective, Economical Danger Remover. You turn on the gas and the Self-lighter ignites it. Invaluable to all gas consumers. Remit 3s. for Sample, or send for List and full particulars to:—

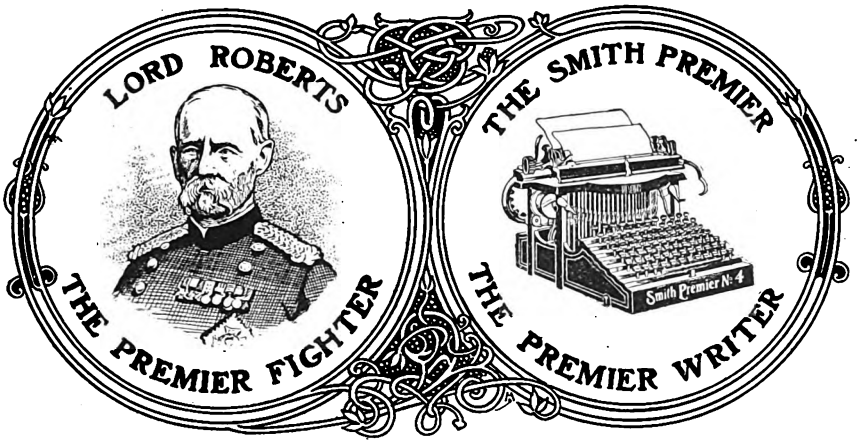
The GAS SELF-LIGHTING Co., Ltd.,
130, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.

Telegrams: "SPONGELET, LONDON." Telephone No. 5206, BANK.



Digitized by Google

TWO GREAT LEADERS



LATEST SUCCESS—GRAND PRIX, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1900.

Send for Illustrated Catalogue

THE SMITH PREMIER TYPEWRITER CO.

14, Gracechurch Street, London, E.C.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS.

New Six-Shilling Novels.

The Inimitable Mrs. Massingham: a Romance of Botany Bay. By HERBERT COMPTON.

"As a Watch in the Night": a Drama of Waking and Dream. By Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED.

The Fourth Generation. By WALTER BESANT, Author of "The Orange Girl." SECOND EDITION.

"As interesting as a fairy tale."—Times.

The Man that Corrupted Hadleyburg, &c. By MARK TWAIN. SECOND EDITION.

"Shows Mark Twain at his very best."—Black and White.

As Luck would Have it. By WILLIAM WESTALL, Author of "With the Red Eagle," &c.

"A capital book, pleasantly written, and never dull."—St. James's Gazette.

Philip Winwood. By R. NEILSON STEPHENS. With 6 Illustrations by E. W. HAMILTON.

"A most entertaining book."—Daily Graphic.

The Bag of Diamonds, and Three Bits of Paste. By GEORGE MANVILLE FENN.

"All highly sensational, and all excellently told."—Scotsman.

In a Cathedral City. By BERTHA THOMAS. SECOND EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth 6s.

"A pretty story. . . There is some very charming work in Miss Thomas's volume."—Athenæum.

New Three-and-Sixpenny Books.

The Small-Part Lady, &c. By GEORGE R. SIMS (DAGONET).

The Adventures of Tyler Tatlock, Private Detective. Related by DICK DONOVAN.

A Sugar Princess. By ALBERT ROSS.

"A bright and lively story, with plenty of roving adventure in it."—Lloyd's News.

The "Pretty Polly": a Voyage of Incident. By W. CLARK RUSSELL. With 12 Illustrations. Small 8vo., cloth gilt, 5s.

"As thoroughly enjoyable as any sea-loving lad can wish for."—Glasgow Herald.

Handley Cross; or, Mr. Jorrocks's Hunt. By ROBERT S. SURTEES. With 79 Illustrations by JOHN LEECH. A NEW EDITION. Post 8vo, cloth, 2s.

The Cloister and the Hearth. By CHARLES READE. (A LARGE-TYPE, FINE-PAPER EDITION.) Post 8vo, cloth, 2s. net; polished leather, 3s. net.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE COMPLETE AUTHORITATIVE EDITION

— OF —

GEORGE BORROW'S WORKS.

Large Crown 8vo. 6s. each.

THE BIBLE IN SPAIN. Edited with Notes and Glossary by ULICK BURKE. With Two Etchings, a Photogravure, and a Map, in One Volume. [Just Published.

"We commend it heartily to all lovers of Borrow as the best one-volume edition of the immortal 'Bible in Spain' yet published."—Manchester Guardian.

LAVENGRO. A New Edition. Illustrated. Collated with and Revised by the Original MSS., with the suppressed portions now for the first time restored, and the whole annotated by the Author of "The Life of George Borrow." With a Photogravure Portrait, and Eight Pen-and-Ink Sketches by PERCY WADHAM. [Just Published.

THE ROMANY RYE. A New Edition. Illustrated. Collated with and Revised by the Original MSS., with the suppressed portions now for the first time restored, and the whole annotated by the Author of "The Life of George Borrow." Illustrated with Seven Pen-and-Ink Sketches, and a Photogravure by F. G. KITTON. [Just Published.

THE GYPSIES OF SPAIN. Their Manners, Customs, Religion, and Language. [Nearly Ready.

WILD WALES. Its People, Language, and Scenery. In Preparation.

The Works of SAMUEL SMILES, LL.D.

SELF HELP SERIES.

Crown 8vo. Cloth. 3s. 6d. each.

SELF HELP. THRIFT. CHARACTER. DUTY.

INDUSTRIAL BIOGRAPHY. LIFE AND LABOUR.

MEN OF INVENTION AND INDUSTRY.

LIFE OF A SCOTCH NATURALIST (Thomas Edward). With Portraits and Illustrations.

JOSIAH WEDGWOOD, F.R.S., the Great Artistic Potter. With Portrait.

LIFE OF JAMES NASMYTH (Inventor of the Steam Hammer), with Portrait and Illustrations.

JASMIN: Barber, Poet, and Philanthropist.

A BOY'S VOYAGE ROUND THE WORLD. With Illustrations. 3*s.* 6*d.*

LIVES OF THE ENGINEERS: From the Earliest Period to the Death of the Stephensons. Portraits and Illustrations. 5 vols. Crown 8vo. 7*s.* 6*d.* each.

Vol. I. LIVES OF VERMUYDEN, MYDDELTON, PERRY, and BRINDLEY.
Vol. II. LIVES OF SMEATON and RENNIE.
Vol. III. LIVES OF METCALFE and TELFORD.
Vol. IV. LIVES OF BOULTON and WATT.
Vol. V. LIVES OF GEORGE and ROBERT STEPHENSON.

LIFE OF GEORGE STEPHENSON. With Portrait. Post 8vo. 2*s.* 6*d.*

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

Digitized by Google

From Mr. Murray's List.

Christmas in French Canada. By LOUIS FRECHETTE. With Illustrations by FREDERICK SIMPSON COBURN. Large crown 8vo., 6s.

The Land of the Long Night. By PAUL DU CHAILLU. Author of "The Viking Age," "Ivar the Viking," "The Land of the Midnight Sun," "Exploration in Equatorial Africa," &c. Illustrated by M. J. BURNS. Crown 8vo., 7s. 6d.

A Century of our Sea Story. By WALTER JEFFERY. Author of "The King's Yard," etc. With a Photogravure Frontispiece of LORD NELSON. Crown 8vo., 6s.

CONTENTS:—Ships at the beginning of the Century—Seaports and Dockyards—Officers and Seamen—The Sea Life—Naval Engagements—The Growth of our Sea Carrying-Steam—Customs of the Sea—The Wreck List of the Century—Exploration—Pirates and Mutineers—The South Seas—On our Coast—End of the Century Ships and Sailors.

A NEW STORY FOUNDED ON FACT.

A Sea King's Midshipman: an Episode in the Life of the famous Lord Cochrane (afterwards Lord Dundonald). By A. LEE KNIGHT. With Illustrations by MONRO S. ORR Large crown 8vo., 6s.

A BOOK FOR YOUNG PEOPLE.

Early Chapters in Science. A Popular Account of the Elements of Natural History, Botany, Physics, Physiology, Chemistry, &c., &c. By Mrs. AWDRY (wife of the Bishop of South Tokyo). Edited and Annotated by W. F. BARRETT, F.R.S., Professor of Experimental Physics at the College of Science, Dublin. With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo., 6s.

The Fables of Æsop. A New Version, chiefly from Original Sources. By Rev. THOMAS JAMES, M.A. With 100 Woodcuts by Sir JOHN TENNIEL and WOLF. Crown 8vo., 2s. 6d.

Puss in Boots. Illustrated with 12 woodcuts in colours. Royal 16mo. Paper Boards, 1s.

A Handy Book of Horticulture; an Introduction to the Theory and Practice of Gardening. With Illustrations and Diagrams. By F. C. HAYES, M.A., Rector of Raheny, Lecturer in Practical Horticulture in Alexandra College, Dublin. Crown 8vo., 2s. 6d. net.

THE LATEST 6s. NOVELS.

The Heart's Highway. By MARY E. WILKINS. Just published.
The Wordlings. By LEONARD MERRICK. Just published.
John Charity. By HORACE ANNESLEY VACHELL. Just published.
Parson Peter. By ARTHUR H. NORWAY. Just published.
A Gentleman. By the Hon. Mrs. WALTER FORBES. Just published.
A Vizier's Daughter. By LILLIAS HAMILTON, M.D. Just published.
A Princess of Arcady. By ARTHUR HENRY. Ready immediately.
On the Wing of Occasions. By JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS ("Uncle Remus"). [Ready immediately.

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

Digitized by Google

TUCKED CLOTH DRESS.

The illustration shows a green cloth dress strapped and tucked throughout. The collar and cuffs are gold braid on white cloth. The band matches them, and the buttons are enamel. The new skirt spreads out very wide and full about the hem, but is as tight-fitting as ever round the hips. This renders it quite an umbrella-shape, and also makes it rather cumbrous for walking in, especially when the lining is loose from the skirt itself, and as long as it is. But the garments of first fashion are not devised for pedestrians, but for the leisured ladies who have nothing to do but walk from their luxurious drawing-rooms to their smart carriages. Some of the new dresses are made with sheath-like straightness as far as the knee, whence they flow out with rather an abrupt change of line, which is inartistic. Some are pleated perpendicularly to the same point, and pleated or stitched horizontally below it. As to bodices, they are very much trimmed, especially in front, where the line of the figure is very often broken up by means of revers, bolero, or zouave. Every device is employed to lengthen the waist, from the pressure administered by means of the stiffly-boned corset down to the skilful manipulation of material by the ladies' tailor. The toque shown in the sketch is becoming to almost any face. It is made of black velvet and trimmed with feathers and a knot of brightly-tinted silk or ribbon.

GROWTH THE PROOF OF LIFE.

Dead things never grow. At best they crystallise into a mimic semblance of growth. But they possess no power of assimilation, of increase in strength and use, or of reproduction. The year's end finds them as its beginning did. But a living thing must grow, either harmoniously and symmetrically or otherwise. No man is the same, either physically or mentally, or spiritually, that he was twelve months back. He has grown either upward or downward. The good in him has increased, or the evil, and the increase of the evil means decay unto death. If he has grown, he is more solidly rooted in principle, more sympathetic with his fellow-men, more strict with himself, and more charitable towards others, more patient under irritations, more ready to render kindly service to those who need it.

Modesty is to merit what shadows are to a picture; it gives force and relief.

Wesley College, Sheffield,
BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL.
Head Master: Rev. V. W. PEARSON, B.A.
Gymnasium, Swimming Bath, Laboratory.

Digitized by Google

A STRAW BLOCKER AND

DR TIBBLES' Vi-Cocoa

"HIS MATES NOW USE VI-COCOA."

Mr. M. A. PEARCE, care of Mrs. Sygrove, Wheathampstead Road, Harpenden: "I feel I must let you know that I have been taking Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa with excellent results.

"I am a straw blocker at St. Albans, working in a very hot place, and used to be very easily knocked up. I used to drink a lot of beer while at work, but that did me no good. About two months ago I tried Vi-Cocoa, and after a week found I could work much better and longer, and I have used it ever since. I have also persuaded some of my mates to try it, and I think they are of the same opinion as myself. I feel a different man from what I used to when I have finished work.

"You can use this if you wish."

"UNDOUBTED PURITY AND STRENGTH."—Medical Magazine.

"IN THE FRONT RANK OF REALLY VALUABLE FOODS."—Lancet.

DR TIBBLES' Vi-Cocoa

FAVOURED BY THE HOMES AND HOSPITALS OF GREAT BRITAIN.
DAINTY SAMPLE TIN FREE TO ANY ADDRESS.

Address: DR. TIBBLES' VI-COCOA LTD., 60, BUNHILL ROW, LONDON, E.C.

DAINTY SAMPLE FREE.

Profitable Business.

This is what we all want.

You are probably making a good income, but you would like to make a better one.

How are you going to do it?

Can you answer this question? If not, may we help you?

We are business experts.

We know how to make any genuine article sell well.

It is no use having a really good article unless you can make the public realise that it is good, and want to buy it.

You can only do this by means of advertising.

Advertising has made many fortunes. It will make one for you if you handle it judiciously.

Many of our clients are now making thousands a year from an article which was unheard of a few years ago.

We helped them to do this, and we can help you in the same way.

Nothing is too large or too small for us to handle.

All you have to do is to write us a letter stating what your business is, and we will help you.

Our advice only costs a penny postage stamp, and it may lead you on to a fortune.

It is worth trying.

H. DAWSON & CO.,

34, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

AN AUTOGRAPH FAN.

In days to come, the world will crowd to see Madam Patti's autograph fan. Though comparatively plain, it is one of those few objects that gather value as time rolls on. Even now, many of the signatures written across this dainty piece of chicken-skin could not again be repeated. The late Empress of Austria, Alexander II. of Russia, the old German Emperor, William I.—to these three signatures now attaches a pathetic interest, the more so when it is remembered that the first two died by the hand of an assassin. Madame Patti was even fortunate enough to obtain not only the signature but a long sentence in our own Sovereign's beautiful flowing handwriting: "If King Lear spoke the truth when he said that a sweet voice was the most precious gift a woman can possess, you, my dear Adelina, must be the richest woman in the world."

TIPPET AND MUFF.

The sketch shows a brown velvet tippet, pointed back and front, trimmed with rounded revers of Irish lace edged with mink, and lined with Parma violet satin. Muff to match, with deep frills of velvet, and large bunch of violets.

TRUE APPROVAL.

What is this smile of the world, to win which we are bidden to sacrifice our moral manhood; this frown of the world, whose terrors are more awful than the withering up of truth and the slow going out of light within the souls of us? Consider the triviality of life and conversation and purpose in the bulk of those whose approval is held out for our prize and the mark of our high calling. . . . Ponder the share which selfishness and love of ease have in the vitality and maintenance of the opinions which we are forbidden to dispute. Then how pitiful a thing seems the approval or disapproval of these creatures of the conventions of an hour, as one figures the merciless vastness of the universe of matter sweeping us headlong through viewless space; as one hears the wail of misery, that is for ever ascending to the deaf gods; as one counts the little tale of the years that separate us from eternal silence. In the light of these things a man should surely dare to live his life with little heed of the common speech upon him or his life, only caring that his days may be full of reality, and his conversation of truth-speaking and wholeness.—JOHN MORLEY.

GOLD IN COSTUMES.

Whatever we may think of the note of gold introduced into the costume of the season, everyone seems to adopt it, says a fashion writer. As a rule it is becoming and effective, but to be successful it requires extremely careful handling. It is just one of those touches of fashion that are foreordained to a short life, because imitation and exaggeration are bound before long to make people of taste and refinement determined to have no more of it. What is charming is just a line or two of little gilded buttons. A touch of gold centre to a black flower on an evening dress. A swathed and fitted deep waistband fastened apparently with about nine tabs of velvet drawn through little gold buckles. The gold ought to have to be looked for. As with riches, if it is ostentatious, so is it vulgar! We saw the other day a dark velvet toque, the whole crown of which was covered with black and gold poppies. It looked exactly as if its owner had been busy with some liquid gilding, and had not succeeded in improving the aspect of affairs.

Never does a man pourtray his own character more vividly than in his manner of pourtraying another.—RICHTER.

Digitized by Google

CHRISTMAS CHEER!

The CHRISTMAS NUMBER of

The SUNDAY STRAND

PRICE SIXPENCE PRICE SIXPENCE

Is now selling, and is a literary and artistic treasure. No description can do justice to it, but the following selection from its contents will surely cause everyone who wishes to have

A Happy Christmas to Buy it! Read it! Talk about it!

CONTENTS:

CHRISTMAS: Its Meaning. By GEORGE CLARKE. Illustrated by five full-page reproductions of famous pictures.

A BETHLEHEM CAROL. Poem by NORA HOPPER.

"DADDY'S GIRL." The final and most soul-stirring instalment of L. T. MEADE'S beautiful story.

JOHN BULL'S CHRISTMAS BEER. An illustrated statistical article which will make people think.

LIFE OF JESUS CHRIST. The final and finest instalment of IAN MACLAREN'S great work.

A CHAT ABOUT CHRISTMAS CARDS. Beautifully Illustrated.

THE WORLD FOR CHRIST. A missionary article telling of the work amongst the Blacks in South Africa, who have been our friends during the war. The story is told by a missionary who has long worked in their midst.

THE BLACK PRINCE AND LITTLE CAPTAIN. By SARAH WINTER KELLOGG. A most pathetic story of Christmas among the American cotton-pickers before they were freed from slavery.

A SAINT OF CHRISTMAS DAY. By Rev. S. N. SEDGWICK. A wonderful story of the Early Christians.

THE "E" STRING. An enthralling story of a "Strad" violin, by F. M. WHITE.

THE WINTER PALACE. By E. M. JAMESON. A charming Christmas story for children.

Etc., etc., etc.

More Pages and Illustrations than any other 6d. Magazine except "The Strand."

GEORGE NEWNES, LTD., 7 to 12, Southampton Street, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

WORLD - TRAVEL

Organised by

HENRY S. LUNN, M.D., F.R.G.S.,

W. HOLDSWORTH LUNN,

AND

CONNOP F. S. PEROWNE.

CRUISES

On the Magnificent Ocean Yacht "ARGONAUT," Tonnage 3,254, H.P. 4,000. Electric Light. First-class Cuisine.

SAILING FROM Marseilles AS BELOW TO

Jan. 2nd, 1901.—Sardinia, Sicily, Naples, Capri, Ajaccio, Villefranche, and Marseilles. A 16 days' Cruise for 19 Guineas and upwards (Return Ticket, London to Marseilles viâ Dover-Calais included).

Jan. 18th, 1901.—Athens, Palestine, Egypt, and Naples. A 27 days' Cruise for 29 Guineas and upwards (Return Ticket, London to Marseilles viâ Dover-Calais included).

£10 10s. & £13 13s. TOURS TO ROME.

Extensions to Naples, Florence, Venice, The Italian Lakes, and the Riviera.

A WINTER'S VISIT TO ST. PETERSBURG.

A Fortnight's Tour for 20 Guineas.

£10 10s. SKATING AND TOBOGGANING TOURS.

A WORLD'S TOUR FOR 200 GUINEAS.

Full Particulars from the Secretary—5, ENDSLEIGH GARDENS, EUSTON, LONDON, N.W.

Digitized by Google

THE POWER OF PERSONALITY.

In all great enterprises the personality of the adventurer makes success or failure. He is different from every other man of his time, different from every man born before him, different from every man who will be born after him. Is he a great advertiser? Then he will defy all the rules of the psychologist, all the rules of the artist, all the rules of literature, apparently all the rules of common sense, and succeed nevertheless. The man who imitates him will fail. The man who criticises him will have to eat his words. The man who analyses him will have to look through the telescope of human sympathy, not through the microscope of psychology.

CHILDHOOD.

Love childhood; encourage its sports, its pleasures, its loveable instincts. Who among us has not at times looked back with regret to the age when a smile was continually on our lips, when the soul was always at peace? Why should we rob these little innocent creatures of the enjoyment of a time so brief, so transient, of a boon so precious, which they cannot misuse?—ROUSSEAU.

BRACELETS AND CHAINS.

Flexible bracelets are surely, if slowly, gaining a hold upon those who like wearing baubles upon their wrists. There is also quite a demand for "dearest" and "name" bracelets, in which stones take the place of letters. Slender chains with small lockets are still very fashionable, in company with a long chain or even without one. Pavé jewellery is much sold for hearts and lockets. As the name indicates, the stones are set close and flat, as if they paved the background.

BERLIN LADIES AND HOCKEY.

Berlin can now boast of two hockey clubs, and the ladies of that city are becoming converts to the game. At present they are but beginners, and have hitherto regarded hockey as another form of croquet. But they are disillusioned when they begin, at the invitation of their English cousins, to take part in the game, for it is the English ladies in Berlin who are encouraging hockey. Golf has not proved very attractive to the women of Germany yet, but tennis is in great favour among them. Only two ladies entered their names for the recent golf tournament of Germany.

A CHRISTMAS GIFT BOOK.

If you want to make a Christmas Gift to anyone of the BIGGEST, BEST & BRIGHTEST BOOK

OF THE YEAR,

Order VOLUME IV. of

"The Temple Magazine,"

WHICH CAN NOW BE ORDERED FROM ANY BOOKSELLER.

It contains 1,096 pages; has two long Serial Stories which cost Six Shillings each in book form; it has dozens of Short Stories; a hundred bright and instructive Articles; and 500 Illustrations. It is beautifully bound in cloth and is fully indexed.

No bound volume of a magazine is so large or so cheap. . . THE PRICE IS 7s. 6d.

Should you live in a village and want the Volume* at once, *send a Postal Order and your address to the Publishers,

Messrs. HORACE MARSHALL & SON,

Temple House, Temple Avenue, LONDON, E.C.

Postage of the Volume, 8d.

Digitized by Google

Never Fails.

Established 26 YEARS.

Have you a Cough?
A DOSE WILL RELIEVE IT.

Have you a Cold?
A DOSE AT BEDTIME WILL REMOVE IT.

Try it also for

Bronchitis, Asthma, Influenza, Whooping-Cough, Consumption.

WHEN YOU ASK FOR

Owbridge's Lung Tonic

BE SURE YOU GET IT.

"My wife had forty-two bottles of medicine and found no relief. For six weeks she could not get out of bed. I quite gave her up as she had wasted away to a mere skeleton. When she had taken one bottle of your Lung Tonic she could walk about with a stick. She is now getting on first-class, and can do her household work as usual." J. SUTTON, 45, Dacre Road, Hitchin.

"I feel bound to say it is a splendid remedy for sore throats, colds, &c., and if taken in time will completely stop what might have been a very bad cold." FRANK B. SCRIVENER, 12, St. Paul's, Canterbury.

Prepared by

W. T. OWBRIDGE, Chemist, Hull.

Sold everywhere
in bottles, at 1*s.* 1½*d.*, 2*s.* 9*d.*,
4*s.* 6*d.*, and 11*s.*

COPYRIGHT.

Digitized by Google

DAIRY FARMING IN SOUTH AFRICA.

The Countess of Warwick is indefatigable in seeking out fresh fields for the skilled agricultural woman. She is now making close inquiry as to the prospects of women dairy farmers in South Africa. Already the Hon. Mrs. Evelyn Cecil has given it as her opinion that fruit-farming in England's lately-acquired colony will afford profitable employment to trained women, and suitable also, because Kaffir labour can be utilised. There is no doubt that what to do with our daughters is a more difficult question than what to do with our sons, since there are so many more of the former than the latter, and so many branches of remunerative work are closed to women. Lady Warwick has already been instrumental in turning out women and girls who are happy and earning good salaries as gardeners and dairy managers.

CHILDREN'S FASHIONS.

There is nothing very new in the make of children's dresses. A pretty cut has a flounce round the hem, and waved gimp or braid in a triple row above; the bodice is trimmed as though it were low and filled into the neck, the V-shaped front bordered on either side with a straight band of ribbon gathered into the waist, a new and very becoming style. There are rosettes on the shoulders and a sash at the back; the yoke may be either plain or diagonally tucked. Double-breasted coats in all the new winter stuffs have square collars and revers in one, but sometimes they are triple, and piqué is inserted between the two layers of cloth.

LADIES' WATCHES.

It is believed that a new era will soon set in for ladies' watches. Of late years the wristlet and the corsage, or order, watch have been largely sold, but there has been rather a slump in ordinary timekeepers since the dressmakers refused to give their customers watch-pockets. Now, however, fashion is trending round to the tightly-fitting bodice, which will admit of a pocket either placed outside it or in the skirt waist-belt, where it used formerly to be found. Ladies will then take the trouble to care for their watches, and finding that they keep good time, will treasure them accordingly. The jewellers declare that wristlet and corsage ones cannot be expected to go as well as those that are worn in a pocket, particularly since women, who are fond of wearing watches simply as ornaments, only take the trouble to wind them up now and then, with fatal consequences to the machinery of the little baubles.

WIFE OF THE FOREIGN SECRETARY.

A daughter of the late Duke and Dowager Duchess of Abercorn, Lady Lansdowne was one of the group of sisters immortalised by Lord Beaconsfield in "Lothair." Her wedding took place jointly with that of her sister, Lady Blandford, in '69, and caused quite a sensation, the beauty of the brides and the high position of the bridegrooms exciting general interest. Lady Lansdowne was popular in Canada and India. Her receptions at Government House, Calcutta, were brilliant functions, and though she succeeded the fascinating Lady Dufferin, her popularity was immediately assured. She presided over Anglo-Indian society—in many ways the most difficile in the world—with unerring tact, besides doing all in her power to further philanthropic work. Tall and slight, Lady Lansdowne has perfectly formed features, and an eminently aristocratic air. She dresses well, though never extravagantly. She has some valuable pearls, and occasionally wears the long earrings seldom seen nowadays.

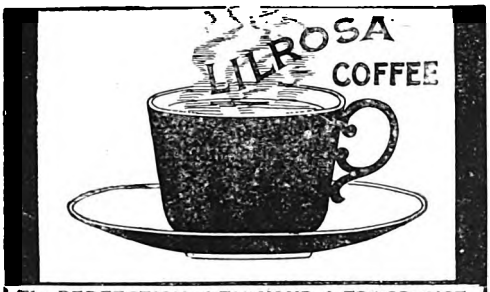
THE QUEEN'S READING.

Of the making of books, copies of which—one learns from duplicated paragraphs—"her Majesty the Queen has most graciously been pleased to accept," there is no end. As to whether the Queen reads them or no, no man knoweth, least of all the authors. But "John Oliver Hobbes" is in happier case. She has learnt from Miss Janotha, who has it in writing from Princess Beatrice, that one of the latest books the Queen has been reading is "Robert Orange." Moreover, Miss Janotha has been told by the Princess that the Queen was much pleased with the novel. By the way, Miss Janotha, the favoured intermediary for this scrap of literary news, is a musician whose career has been most interesting. She is a Court pianist to the German Emperor, and is a kinswoman of the last King of Poland.

MEN'S OCCUPATIONS.

No occupation is low if it be consistent with what is just and honest. We are all—everyone of us—living by ministering, in some way or other, to each other's necessities and comforts. The whole world is but a great shop in which all are sellers and buyers in turn, and in which each is expected to do something useful for the general well-being of the concern. Honour and shame, as Pope has observed, arise from no particular condition in life; true merit consists in the correct performance of our part, whatever that may chance to be.

Digitized by Google



The PERFECTION of FLAVOUR & FRAGRANCE.
Absolutely pure. Sold ground and packed in ½lb. tins at 1/4 per lb.; or the whole bean in 5lb. cotton bags. Carriage paid on parcels of 5lb. upwards.
THE LILROSA COFFEE, 101, Leadenhall Street, LONDON, E.C.
FREE Sample by post on receipt of post-card mentioning this Mag.

"KNOW THYSELF," AND OTHERS.
A NEW REVELATION.
The Scientific and Natural Evolution of the Self. A most delightful system of self-culture insuring mental and physical vigour, and the accomplishment of the otherwise impossible.
Our grand book of over 200 pages will be ready January 1st. Price 6/-. All orders sent in at once will be filled for 4/6, and you will also be entitled to a series of seven other splendid books. Don't miss this opportunity. Send at once. Circulars free. Dept. T.M. 120. SELF-CULTURE SOCIETY, 256, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

TOO STOUT.
I was for years; by chance I came across a simple home remedy that reduced me from 17st. to 10st. 12lb., and I will willingly send particulars free to any sufferer enclosing stamp.
MRS. A. P. FELL, 195, OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.

PLEASE LET US KNOW
whether you would care to receive a dainty Tasting Sample of the most delicious Sauce existent, and we will forward it you by return of post.
FARDONS' SAUCE
is alluded to, of course, as it possesses characteristics unknown to any other Sauce, and is an invaluable flavouring with all kinds of Soups, Fish, Meats, etc. If you prefer to purchase a sixpenny bottle locally, we will refund the cost upon your sending us the outside wrapper of the bottle with your name and address written across it. This offer holds good to 28th February next, but not more than one sixpence will be refunded to the same address.
If your Grocer will not supply you with FARDONS' SAUCE, send us your order direct, giving his name and address, and we will see you are supplied.
FARDONS' VINEGAR COMPY., Ltd.,
BIRMINGHAM.
Please mention this Magazine.

An Organ in Miniature
WITH 2 FULL SETS OF REEDS AND 3 BEAUTIFUL STOPS.
for 35/-

DRAPER'S CELEBRATED ORCHESTRAL ORGANETTE is built upon the principle of a full sized Cathedral Organ, and is productive of the most delightful harmony. To folks who have never before heard it, the Orchestral comes as a surprise. It is beyond compare as an ideal Musical Instrument for the home. It requires no teaching,— at sight and perform as brilliantly as the most finished musician.
A CHILD CAN PLAY IT
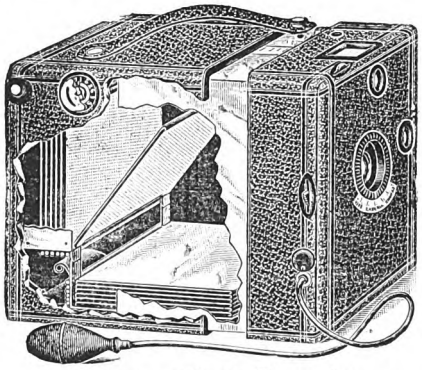
PRICE 35/- A price that brings it within everybody's reach. Money refunded at once if not satisfactory.
ALSO SUPPLIED UPON EASY TERMS.
WE OFFER FREE
to all who ask for it a copy of our handsome Illustrated Catalogue of Watch, Plate, Cutlery, Jewellery, &c. A complete buyers' guide.
J. M. DRAPER, Dept 103, ORGANETTE WORKS, BLACKBURN.

Digitized by Google

VIVE

New

M.P.C. Vives.



With or without Focussing.

Every Camera Guaranteed.

Before buying elsewhere send for our Art Catalogue and Illustrated Brochure Free. Embossed mounted photo, 2 penny stamps extra.

Guinea Vives.—Largest pictures (4¼ × 4¼, adaptable to any smaller size) for plates, cut films, or roll films.

VIVE CAMERA CO., MANUFACTURERS,
No. 15, Regent House, Regent Street,
LONDON, W.
NEW YORK.
CHICAGO.

CAMERAS

LEAD EVERYWHERE

CLOTH COSTUME.

The walking costume illustrated in the sketch is made of fine glossy grey cloth, and is trimmed with chinchilla and silk cords and tassels. This arrangement makes the little coat very smart. It is worn over a green silk blouse and a waistband of folded spotted panne black spots on dark green. The lace tie is one of those that fold three times round the neck, falling in ends without any loops or bows. The hat is black chiffon with folds of white laid over it, and a long feather at the side.

A MODERN AMAZON.

That her Majesty the Queen and the German Empress hold honorary positions in the army the world knows, but the fact that a woman has been given the title of "General" by reason or her own individual deserts and her personal leading of an army into the field will be news even to the advance guard of women. She is General Ageja, and during the Filipino rebellion she won a commission in the revolutionary army, and organised a force of 2,000 men, whom she frequently led against the Spaniards.

Digitized by Google

IF YOU ARE LOOKING FOR A

CHRISTMAS GIFT

FOR HUSBAND, WIFE, FRIEND, SCHOLAR, BOY, OR GIRL,

Or a Volume for your own Reading, please ask any Bookseller to show you the

These books have been carefully read by Members of the Society's Committee and by the Editors. More than 1,000 Books from 6d. upwards are on the Society's Gift Book List. They may be safely selected for presentation without the time and trouble of preliminary reading by the donors.

Please ask for those published by the Religious Tract Society, 56, Paternoster Row, London.

CHRISTMAS CARDS. . . .

RESIDENTS IN, or visitors to LONDON, are requested to call at the ST. PAUL'S BOOK SALOON, 65, ST. PAUL'S CHURCHYARD,

(Opposite the Northern Entrance to the Cathedral).

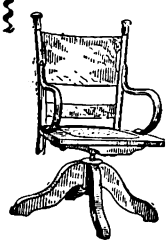
 Please ask any Bookseller to show you the R.T.S. New Books.*

Digitized by Google

IDEAL CHRISTMAS GIFTS!

THE

"DERBY" Roll-Top Desk.



The "Derby" Desk is quite the Finest in the World. Every portion is made under the personal supervision of the Originator. We both recommend and guarantee it. It has a Roll-Top, which locks all the drawers automatically when shut down; full of convenient pigeon-holes, etc. Elegant, Useful, and Durable! Invaluable in the Private Study and the Office.

A large variety of Specialities in Library and Office Appliances always in Stock. All Goods are of Superior make and Device.

Elastic Bookcases, Revolving Bookcases, Flat-Top Desks, Ideal Filing Cabinets, &c., &c.

FREE.—Any reader of THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE can have one of our Handsome Illustrated No. 92 Desk Catalogues on application.

THOMAS TURNER (Leicester) LTD.,
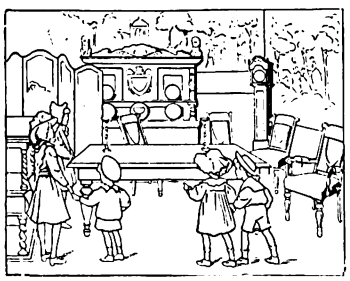
44, HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON, E.C.
Birmingham, Leicester, & 19, Market St., BRADFORD.

A REVOLUTION IN FURNISHING
BY MONTHLY PAYMENTS.



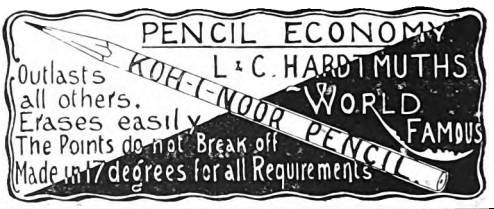
LADY'S PICTORIAL:—

"The system, in a word, has found such favour that not only has the business increased as though by magic—a large guaranteed percentage being amongst former customers and friends recommended by them, but even TRUTH, a critic never content to commend without good reason, has expressed its approval of the Company's instalment and insurance system."

N.B.—Cash Buyers are also given a Free Life Insurance Policy (for 2 years) equal to the amount they have spent.

NORMAN & STACEY,
LIMITED,
118, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C.

Moderate Prices.
Free delivery Town or Country. Call and view Stock before Furnishing locally.

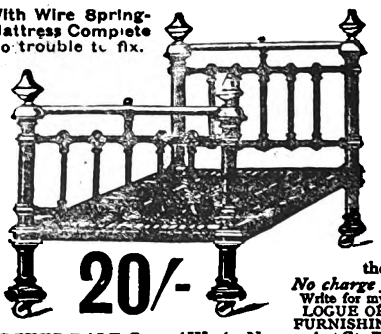


DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done, with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. E. C. (Room 8), 195, Oxford Street, London, W.

The 'Newmarket' Bedstead.

With Wire Spring-Mattress Complete No trouble to fix.



4ft. by 6ft. 6in. 1in. Pillars Brass Mounts. Brass Knobs. Strong and well finished. Gold decoration. Cheapest and Best Bedstead ever offered

20/-

With Wool Overlay Mat tress, Bolster, and Pillow the lot for 30/-

20/-

No charge for Packing.
Write for my NEW CATALOGUE OF COMPLETE FURNISHING. Post Free.

ARTHUR DALE. Central Works, Newmarket St., Birmingham

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1900.

Waterman's Ideal Fountain Pen is the perfection of manufacture; for style, easy writing, and general excellence stands pre-eminent. Makes an Ideal Gift.

Prices from 10/6 upwards.

"F" booklet FREE to Readers of TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

L. & C. HARDTMUTH, Golden Lane, London, E.C.

Of Dealers: if difficulty, write as above.

and NEURALGIA CURED

(Free Test offered to you)

by a Simple, Safe and Speedy Remedy. A Zox Powder can be taken anywhere, at any time, and with any liquid, with wonderful results. Guaranteed free from injurious substance.

H. P. B. Adams, Well House, Beech Estate, near Alton, Dec. 9th, 1899.—"Having found great benefit from your Zox Powders, I have given most of the last box away. Enclosed is 2/6 for the larger box."

Two Free Sample Powders to any reader of TEMPLE MAGAZINE sending stamped addressed envelope for same.

THE ZOX CO., 11, Hatton Garden, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS FOR DECEMBER, 1900.

			PAGE
I.	Winter	Frontispiece
II.	The Ghost of Malvina Illustrated by Jas. Durden.	Winifred Graham	189
III.	A Message for the New Century	Ian Maclaren	198
IV.	His Great Chance Illustrated by R. Pannett.	Mary Angela Dickens	201
V.	Christmas in the Home Illustrated.	Helen Merriman	207
VI.	Aunt Lavinia's Letter Illustrated by Frances Evan.	Mary E. Wilkins	210
VII.	A Bolt from the Blue. Serial Story. Chapters IX.-XIV. Illustrated by Chas. D. Ward.	Dora Langlois	217
VIII.	The Toy Shop of the World Illustrated.	J. A. Hammerton & E. C. Middleton	237
IX.	Penthony's Sweetheart Illustrated by J. Barnard Davis.	E. Burrows	247
X.	How to Give a Christmas Party	Lucie Heaton Armstrong	256
XI.	Mr. Thomas Atkins in War Time	Rev. E. J. Hardy, M.A.	259
XII.	The Pilgrim Fathers' First Christmas	Rev. Everett E. Hale, D.D.	262
XIII.	A Chat about Christmas Cards Illustrated.	Helen Marion Burnside	265
XIV.	A Charming Christmas Guest		268
XV.	In the Public Eye Illustrated.	The Onlooker	269
XVI.	How the Moon Astonished the Sun. A Story for Children	Bertha Harrison	276
XVII.	For the Bairns	Rev. J. Reid Howatt	279

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All manuscripts and drawings must be accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes, or the Editor cannot promise their return. They must be addressed, THE EDITOR, "TEMPLE MAGAZINE," WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, CARMELITE STREET, E.C.

Contributions accepted for "In the Public Eye," are paid for at the uniform rate of 5/- per paragraph including portrait. All photographs, which must be non-copyright, are returned.

Business Communications and Orders must be sent to MESSRS. HORACE MARSHALL AND SON, TEMPLE HOUSE, TEMPLE AVENUE, E.C.

Letters relating to Advertisements must be addressed to MESSRS. H. DAWSON AND CO., 34, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, W.C.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE will be sent by post each month, to any address, for an Annual Subscription of 8s. Binding Cases can be purchased from the Publishers for 1s. 6d.

"NEGO"

No Paper Required. THE FIVE-SECONDS FIRELIGHTER. No Waste of Cinders.

THESE Firelighters are a scientifically-prepared composition, with enormous inflammatory properties. All that is necessary when lighting a fire is to break the block into three sections and place in the stove, surrounding the same with coal. When ignited a steady fire will immediately result. One of these Firelighters is quite sufficient to boil a kettle in a few minutes. Sold everywhere in packets of 10, price 3d., or will be sent post free upon receipt of Three Stamps.

THE "NEGO" CO., GOOLE, YORKS.

A sample of these Firelighters will be sent post free on application.

The only

GOLD MEDAL

Awarded for Milk-Chocolate at the Paris Exhibition, 1900, was gained by

PETER'S

MILK-CHOCOLATE,

The Original and Best.

Sole by all Confectioners and Grocers.

Sole Agents (trade only), S. J. MACKENZIE & CO., LTD., LONDON, E.

Digitized by Google

THE FINEST CHRISTMAS NUMBER

For the Home and Family

— IS THE —

Christmas Double Number of

THE QUIVER,

PRICE 1s.

The attractions of this unique Christmas Number are of exceptional importance. They include

FIVE MAGNIFICENT PLATES

1. A Large Rembrandt Photogravure of Mr. Stanhope Forbes' Celebrated Picture "NEWS AT LAST."
2. A Rembrandt Photogravure of "THE CHRISTMAS DOLE," by Joseph Clark.
3. A Beautiful Reproduction in Colours of the Picture by Mr. W. H. Margetson, entitled "A GARLAND OF LOVE."
4. A Splendid Reproduction in Colours of Mr. Yeend King's Picture, "CHRISTMAS WAITS OF LONG AGO."
5. A Rembrandt Photogravure of "HOME AT LAST," by G. G. Kilburne, R.I.

A Complete Story, of One Volume length, entitled "The Honourable Peggy," by the Author of "Lady Jane's Companion."

Complete Stories by Katherine Tynan, Christopher Hare, and Mrs. Herbert Marten.

Special Articles by the Bishop of Ripon, Sir Lewis Morris, Coulson Kernahan, Ian Maclaren, Dean Farrar, Rev. Mark Guy Pearse, &c., &c.

Two Serial Stories: The Furnace for Gold, by John K. Leys; The Maker of Headville, by M. Bradford Whiting.

The Pictorial Embellishments of the Number are fully equal to its literary excellence, the Number being Profusely Illustrated throughout by leading artists of the day.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED, LONDON, PARIS, NEW YORK, and MELBOURNE.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

THE GHOST OF MALVINA

BY WINIFRED GRAHAM.

Illustrated by JAS. DURDEN.

I.

"GOT it, mother!" cried a big, burly man with a fine open countenance as he burst noisily into the room.

An elderly lady looked up over her spectacles.

"Got what?" she asked, her good-natured face breaking into smiles.

"Why, Cavendish Hall, to be sure. One of the grandest old mansions in Warwickshire. I have taken it furnished from the De Crespignys for Christmas."

"The De Crespignys are very great people," said Mrs. Smilie, awed by the name. "Is it possible they are willing to give up their house to us?"

"Rather," laughed Bill, slapping his overcoat pocket in which some loose coins jingled. "Even the De Crespignys' door can be opened by a golden key. Lady De Crespigny is losing huge sums daily at Monte Carlo. All the family are gamblers. Cavendish Hall does them no good standing empty."

Bill Smilie, the rough, unpolished colonial millionaire, sat down and stretched his legs with a satisfied chuckle.

His wealth had been lately accumulated by daring speculations, and he was only just beginning to enjoy the fruits of success.

He looked affectionately across at the queer figure opposite. Though elaborately gowned, his mother could not disguise her plebeian origin. Following Dame Fashion she had adopted auburn hair, and appeared to be balancing her up-to-date coiffure with considerable discomfort. Her fingers were thickly ringed, diamonds gleamed amongst her laces, yet onlookers instinctively felt she had scrubbed floors since her girlhood, and half-expected to see her kneel down and clean out the grate from sheer force of habit.

"I suppose you have twigged my little game," Bill said. "I'm on the look-out for a wife, and I thought a house-party at Christmas would be a capital idea. We must ask a lot of nice girls down, and then I can take my pick; that is, if any one is willing to throw in her lot with an untutored fellow like myself. I know I am not a lady's man, but if I got hold of the right sort of girl I believe I could make her happy. I have already invited some men, the most ineligible lot I could find, so they won't cut me out as far as prospects are concerned, though they're good chaps enough. You must write to the girls. Here is a list for your approval."

He handed her a crumpled sheet of hotel writing paper.

"Bella Wilson!" exclaimed Mrs. Smilie. "Why, Bill, she's only a chorus girl!"

"But very good company for all that. I am not in with the swells yet, so can't pick and choose. But read on, mater, read on."

"Ruth De Crespigny! Good gracious, who's that?"

"A relation of the Cavendish Hall people," he replied, triumphantly; "the same family, the same blue blood, and she has promised to come, she and her sister Cynthia. I only know Ruth, for the sister is abroad and won't be able to get to us till Christmas Eve. Ruth De Crespigny is one of the nicest girls you could meet on a day's march. We were introduced at a dog show; she was reporting for a newspaper. You see, dear, Miss Ruth De Crespigny is a poor relation. The girls have to make their own living, and for that reason the stuck-up set at Cavendish Hall won't have anything to do with them; so I thought it was just splendid to take the place and ask her down. She first told me it was on the market. The name will look so well in the society papers, for I have paid highly to be well chronicled."

Digitized by Google

"A De Crespigny!" murmured Mrs. Smilie, under her breath. "How proud I should be if my boy——" But she broke off shortly and turned her attention again to the house-party list.

II.

"He makes an excellent host," said Bella Wilson, enthusiastically. "I call him quite a dear, don't you, Miss De Crespigny?"

Ruth was arranging a wreath of holly on the head of a statue at the foot of the fine white marble staircase, with balustrade of alabaster.

She did not answer for a moment, then replied: "Oh, yes," in vague, abstracted accents.

"It's such a joke," Bella continued. "Stupid old Mrs. Smilie let out to me the other night that her son Bill is wife-hunting! He has asked us all down to see if we suit, like horses on trial."

"You should not take any notice of what Mrs. Smilie says," replied Ruth. "She talks such a lot of nonsense. Now, I don't believe for a moment Mr. Smilie has any thought of the kind. I hope you won't mention it to Cynthia when she arrives, it would make her mad. Cynthia takes after the De Crespigny side of the family, and is awfully proud and high-spirited. She hopes to be a singer, and has been studying abroad. She is as good as she is pretty."

"Oh, a perfect model, no doubt." laughed Bella. "But, do you know, I should not mind this place myself, and I believe they would sell the whole estate. It would suit me down to the ground, ghosts and all. I rather fancy having a try for Mr. Bill Smilie."

A slight curl of the lip only showed that Ruth had heard.

"I suppose," continued Bella, "you are aware the house is haunted?"

Ruth gave a little shudder, and her eyes travelled round the great hall, growing dusk as the day faded. Outside the ground lay white with snow, inside huge log fires made patterns on the tapestried walls.

"No," she said. "Who told you?"

"I heard it from old Mrs. Pottle, the housekeeper. She is horrified at all of us, calls us 'the furnished let,' and speaks under her breath of 'desecration.' She considers we contaminate these ancestral halls, though your presence is some consolation to her shattered spirit. 'It is enough to raise the ghosts,' she says, 'strangers making free and easy with the place.' None but De Crespignys have been in possession here for years, and it is the beautiful Malvina De Crespigny who haunts Cavendish Hall."

Ruth turned a shade paler. "There is something uncanny about the house," she owned. "But what does Malvina do?"

"Oh, she glides about with a tiny King Charles spaniel in her arms. It was the cause of her death. She loved the dog dearly, and her horrid little husband grew jealous! One day he killed the dog, telling Malvina what he had done on her return from a ride. So great was her anger and despair that she struck him a blow on the forehead with the knob of her weighted riding-whip. He fell with a groan at her feet, never to rise again. Realising the worst, hot-headed Malvina took poison, and the dog was buried with her in a suicide's grave."

"What a gruesome story," said Ruth.

"Of course it all happened a very long time ago," Bella continued. "On Christmas Eve, oddly enough, so we shall be here for the anniversary. Mrs. Pottle declares that is why the De Crespignys are never at home for Christmas. This time of year the ghosts are always more restless. I am not superstitious, and I believe the old woman said it just to try and drive us out of the place For my part I should like to see Malvina, she is so wonderfully good-looking."

"How do you know?"

"By her portrait in the picture gallery. If you look you will find her between a painting of Queen Elizabeth and one of Napoleon."

Digitized by Google

Ruth felt sufficiently interested in Malvina and tired of Bella's society to stroll away in the direction of the gallery. She passed through the new corridor, walled by hundreds of prints, every one an artist's proof. Then, ascending some steps, she found herself in the great gallery of art, where hung the last picture painted by Sir Edward Burne-Jones. But she did not pause to look at this, for, far ahead, she espied the huge ruffle of Queen Elizabeth, near which was Malvina's portrait.

Ruth glanced neither to the right nor to the left, but remained in a kind of dream, staring fascinatedly at the striking picture. The name "Malvina" stood out in large gold letters under the frame.

Certainly Malvina was beautiful. A wealth of rich gold hair, large startled blue eyes, fringed by long brown lashes, and a proud little mouth parted as if to speak protestingly. In her delicate white hands she held a cringing King Charles spaniel, which appeared to be pressing itself against her, as if terrified of someone. She was dressed in an old-fashioned riding suit, with lace at the neck, and braided capes. It seemed to Ruth that the figure was strangely lifelike, and merely needed an encouraging word to step forward into the silent gallery. Perhaps the gathering shadows helped the illusion, for surely the rebellious lips trembled, and tears glistened in those magnetic blue eyes.

"Oh, how like! How weirdly like!" Ruth said, aloud, in answer to her own thoughts.

Somebody in the window-seat opposite the picture moved, coming quickly forward with an eager question:

"Have you seen her? Have you seen that woman here in the house?"

Ruth turned to find herself facing Bill Smilie. He was paler than usual, and the customary merriment had vanished from his eyes.

"Oh, no!" gasped Ruth. "What do you mean?"

He looked confused.

"Are you nervous?" he asked.

"I—I don't think so."

He drew her to the window recess, bidding her sit down.

"It's this way," he said. "I've seen that young woman, right enough!"

A chill sensation crept over Ruth; she nodded her head, but her lips moved without sound. She was not looking at her host, for instinctively she stared at Malvina's portrait, now half hidden by the growing gloom.

"Seen her just as she looks there—so frightened and beautiful, holding the dog fast. She's a daisy of a girl—a real daisy!"

Bill spoke in a whisper; his honest face shone with suppressed excitement.

"That's why I'm always hanging about this gallery. I can't get the look of her out of my head. I dream of that picture o' nights; it regularly seems to have got inside me, if you know what I mean. See those eyes! Stunning, aren't they?

"I HAVE TAKEN CRESPIGNY HALL FOR CHRISTMAS."

Digitized by Google

No, no—in the picture, I mean," as Ruth glanced nervously round. "She won't appear now; don't scare yourself. I always know beforehand. The air gets sort of cold, and there comes a sound, like a dog panting. The mater has found me once or twice staring in an absent-minded way at the picture, and now and again she jokes me about 'Malvina.' Poor old soul, she little guesses how it jars! But there! I don't know why I'm telling you; it just popped out—and I know you won't give the show away."

Ruth promised to keep his secret, and was glad when the chance came to escape from the haunted gallery back to the lights and the music of the Swan Drawing-room, so called because the design on the red carpet consisted of two huge swans, fighting with outstretched wings.

Bella had just started singing: "I'm a Little Feather," at the top of her voice, while tea was being brought in.

A tremulous sigh of relief from Ruth, and a forced appearance of joviality in Bill, were the only signs which might have betrayed their hidden emotion.

III.

That same evening, when the ladies were cosily chatting after dinner, the subject turned on winter amusements.

"I think you girls ought to get up some tableaux vivids," Mrs. Smilie declared, as she smoothed out the folds of her gorgeous red satin skirt, wrought with silver and black. "Only for home amusement, you know—some little diversion for Christmas Eve."

"Tableaux vivants, you mean," corrected Bella. "Why not represent some of the pictures in the gallery as a surprise for Mr. Smilie?"

The idea was taken up at once, and Bella flung herself into the scheme with all the energy of her theatrical training.

"I have got a quite too delicious notion," she declared; "one that will set old Pottle's hair standing on end, and scandalise every servant in the place. You know, Christmas Eve is the anniversary of the Malvina murder and suicide. Why not portray it in three scenes: the husband's jealousy, the wife killing him in her rage, and, finally, her self-destruction? What! You have heard nothing of the story?" as Mrs. Smilie confessed her ignorance. "Oh, it is quickly told."

Bella rattled off the narrative in a few brief words.

Mrs. Smilie loved anything creepy, and listened open-mouthed.

"The best of it is," Bella concluded, "old Pottle showed me hidden upstairs the very costume worn by Malvina De Crespigny in the picture. I know where to find it at the bottom of an oak trunk. It will be tremendous fun to steal it for the occasion, and keep up our bad reputation with Pottle. She calls us all 'a set of barbarians,' and I must get my knife into her for that, though personally she rather fancies me!"

In the midst of the general discussion which followed, Ruth raised a feeble protest.

"Perhaps Mr. Smilie might not like them to act Malvina's tragedy. Would it not be better taste to keep to other subjects?"

"Oh, Bill would revel in it;" Mrs. Smilie declared. "He is quite cracked over the portrait of that minx."

"Who shall we cast for the rôle of Malvina?" asked Bella.

"Why, Cynthia, of course, if it must be done. Cynthia, and no one else," cried Ruth, forgetting her prejudice in the excitement of the moment. "Did I not tell you, that picture of Malvina is the very image of my sister Cynthia? I saw the likeness directly; it quite startled me. Cynthia has the De Crespigny features, colouring, expression, and build. In Malvina's dress she will be Malvina—her ancestress to the life!"

"Good!" cried Bella. "And I can play the jealous husband, in high boots, with a long tail coat. I will get my costume from London, and a King Charles spaniel, too, for the matter of that. My aunt breeds them for sale. I mean to make a success of this; and I think you will see we shall startle the household on Christmas Eve!"

. . . . . .

For the next few days secret preparations for the tableaux were in full swing. Mrs. Smilie was almost too engrossed to notice her son's pre-occupation, and the fits of unaccountable abstraction which frequently enthralled him now, though once or twice she did remark: "Bill didn't seem quite himself."

One day, when the thought recurred to her, she made her way to his room before dressing for dinner.

Digitized by Google

"May I come in, Bill? It's early yet," she said.

Bill was sitting over his fire, staring at the glowing coals. He pulled a chair forward courteously.

"I don't take three-quarters of an hour to shift," he said, "like those other chaps. But what is the matter, mater?" Anything gone wrong?"

"Oh, no; but I am a bit uneasy about you, Bill. You don't seem to be having much of a time, or making the running with the ladies. Can't you seem to take to any of them?"

"No."

Bill shook his head despondently.

"Well, all I can say is, you are a hard fellow to please. Should you want fine looks, there's Bella, ready to jump down your throat; for blue blood, Miss Ruth, with a pedigree as long as your arm. If you care for more riches, try one of the Miss Snookers, not forgetting the further advantage of their dear pa being made Mayor of his town, and knighted by her Majesty the Queen!"

"Oh, stop, mater! I know well enough there are scores of good women, pretty women, rich women, poor women, only waiting for some man to come along and make them happy; but they are all alike to me now. I can't seem to cotton on to one of them since I came to this place. I only care for that blooming picture of the lass Malvina, with her bit of a dog in her arms! They say she walks of a night; but don't believe that, mother—don't believe that! Still, the face haunts me. I can't get it out of my brain. You may throw the whole boiling of marriageable girls clean at my head, and I shan't look at one of them, for I've gone and fallen in love with a darned ghost!"

Mrs. Smilie gave a little scream. "O Lor!" she said, wiping tears from her eyes, yet laughing at the same time. "Did anyone ever hear the like? And you the last, as a rule, to be taken with romantic notions. Several of the girls have passed remarks on your stand-offish manner since I told them you were looking out for a wife this Christmas."

"You told them that?" gasped Bill.

"Why not? Bless your heart, it did not bind you in any way! I merely said: 'My boy is wanting to get married, so now's the time to make the running!'"

"Oh, horrible!"

Bill literally groaned at the thought of his mother's gauchery; but the good soul, unconscious of offence, went calmly on:

"And then I said——"

"Mother, I would rather not hear," guiding her to the door, and thrusting her into the passage with firm though kindly hands. "It is time you trimmed up for dinner," he added by way of explanation, and turned the key.

THE RIDING SUIT AND HAT FITTED HER SLIM FIGURE EXACTLY.

Digitized by Google

At heart Bill Smilie was a gentleman. He hated being made to look a fool. The knowledge that he was no longer "on the marrying tack," as he called it, made him feel somewhat of an impostor.

But the blue eyes of the pictured Malvina, and the shadowy wraith of a beautiful woman, who had materialised before him one moonlight night when the snow lay thick on the ground, bound him to his lady of dreams.

"It's no good. She's got hold of me and I can't get rid of her," he muttered, kicking the fender and shaking himself like a great Newfoundland dog. "What is the use of trying when she looks at me with those great blue eyes?" He banged the coal angrily with the poker. "A darned ghost!" he added, sulkily. "A darned ghost!"

IV.

Ruth drove in a closed carriage to the station to meet her sister. She was more than ever struck with the likeness between Cynthia and the picture of Malvina, as the pale, tall girl sprang from the train.

"How tired you look, dear!" Ruth exclaimed. "I suppose you have had a dreadful journey. The Christmas traffic has made the trains so late."

"Yes, I do feel rather worn out," Cynthia confessed. "You see, I was travelling all last night and had a rough passage. I only rested for an hour or so in town before coming on here. It is so kind of your friends to ask me, but are you sure I shall not be in the way?"

"Oh, no! You are most particularly wanted," Ruth declared; and then she explained about the tableaux. Poor Cynthia stifled a yawn at the thought of the evening's dissipations.

"I guessed you would be tired," said Ruth. "The others have gone out to try the ice, so when we get in I am going to put you straight to bed. Mrs. Smilie says that you need not even get up for dinner, and we think it will be all the more effective if you don't appear until the tableaux of Malvina."

Cynthia gladly caught at any excuse to sleep off the effects of the long journey, and slipped straight up to her room unperceived.

She was still sleeping when the gong sounded for dinner, and woke with a start to find a maid standing by her bed carrying a tray.

Flushed from refreshing slumber, and hungry, too, she enjoyed her quiet meal, rising with renewned energy.

"I am so glad you are feeling all right," cried Ruth, bursting into the room with a wonderful old-fashioned riding-coat in her arms. "The scene has been set and it looks lovely. Bella Wilson arranged the footlights—a row of decorative lanterns. She got hold of this dress. I don't believe we have any right to use it, but Pottle forgot to lock the oak chest upstairs."

Cynthia now entered heartily into the spirit of the game. She was delighted to hear she resembled the picture.

The riding-suit and hat fitted her slim figure exactly. Malvina seemed to have come to life, as Cynthia made her way through the vast corridors to the quaint tapestried chamber—the theatre of the moment. At the door she encountered Mrs. Pottle, a buxom woman gowned in rustling silk, who flung up her arms with a cry of horror and staggered against the oak wainscotting.

"Don't be alarmed," said Ruth, supporting the shivering figure, which shook from head to foot with indignation or fear. "This is my sister, and she is playing the part of Malvina in the tableaux this evening. We are going to act the story in three scenes. It will be most realistic.

Mrs. Pottle's jaw fell; she rolled her eyes, and with quivering fingers loosened her collar, gasping for breath.

"You'd do this—you'd do this thing?" she asked, in accents of strangled amazement. "You, a De Crespigny, too!" turning her startled eyes upon Cynthia.

"Why not?" asked the girl. "It is only for a joke."

"A joke! Heaven forgive the word! Don't you know this is Christmas Eve—the night of the whole year when the ghosts walk, making the house uninhabitable by their restless wandering ways? It is also, allow me to remind you, the anniversary of the murder! Was that a joke, I should like to ask? And pray, Miss De Crespigny, how did you obtain that old, valued family relic I see you flaunting thus boldly? Do you realise your ancestress died in that very costume—killed herself with her own fair hand? Are you not afraid a curse will fall on your head, and the spirits of the outraged dead

Digitized by Google

NEARER THE FOOTLIGHTS, FONDLING THE SWEETEST LITTLE SPANIEL, SAT A LOVELY WOMAN.

rise to haunt you at your masquerade? You and Miss Ruth are the only members of the De Crespigny family who have spent a Christmas Eve under this roof since the tragedy occurred; the others know better! It is ignorance has brought you here, and the ghosts will be busy to-night!"

Bella Wilson, hearing Mrs. Pottle's voice, joined the three figures, flashing angry eyes at the housekeeper as she listened to her tirade.

"How dare you try and frighten these young ladies with your bogey tales?" she cried. "You are a wicked old woman! We are doing no harm, and if you want to know how we got the costume, why, I took it, because you were foolish enough to show me the contents of the chest which you did not lock. We are allowed to use everything left in the house, and Mr. Smilie pays enough, I should think, to entitle him to a sight of Malvina's old clothes, which were only fit for a pawnshop till I brushed and cleaned them up."

Bella's words literally tumbled out of her mouth as she stood before Mrs. Pottle, booted and spurred, dressed as Malvina's husband, with a King Charles spaniel under her arm.

Digitized by Google

"I expect," she continued, hotly, "you would like to pretend the dog has a ghost too! But I am managing this show, and I can't let the stage wait, so come on, girls."

Cynthia's eyes had taken a startled look, which made her more than ever like the picture. Her colour faded while she listened, and more than once she glanced nervously round as if feeling a presence at her elbow.

"I wonder if it is wrong," she whispered to Ruth. "I did not realise the murder really happened, and on this same night. I thought of it only as a story."

Ruth looked uncomfortable.

"I don't know," she replied. "We are in for it now and can't draw back without mortally offending the others. I am half inclined to think Mrs. Pottle is right—that we, as De Crespignys, should not mock our own flesh and blood."

Mrs. Pottle's parting words, spoken as Bella went humming away, re-echoed down the corridor.

"Those who laugh last, laugh most!"

There was an ominous ring in them which struck a chill to Cynthia's heart.

A moment later she found herself the centre of an admiring group.

Everyone exclaimed with delight at the beautiful impersonation of Malvina.

They speedily rehearsed her in the positions previously planned; and the little dog, who seemed to take to Cynthia at once, gave good promise of fulfilling his part decorously.

"I don't know what is going on," said Bill to his men friends. "The girls seem to have got a bit of play-acting up their sleeve for a Christmas Eve jollity; but it's all been kept dark."

Presently Mrs. Smilie, with mystery in her manner and smiles on her lips, informed her son "that the show was ready."

Expectantly the audience made their way to the low-ceilinged room draped with tapestry, seating themselves in the old-fashioned chairs of oak and embroidery.

To the weird tinkling of a zither the heavy red curtains were drawn aside, and a remarkable picture revealed itself.

In the background stood a frowning man's figure watching the central objects with covetous eyes. Nearer the footlights, fondling the sweetest little spaniel to her breast, sat a lovely woman, with the startled blue eyes, mutinous mouth, cream-white skin, and rich gold hair of Malvina De Crespigny.

For a moment Bill Smilie gazed upon the living picture paralysed. What trick had his brain played upon his sight? Or was this verily and indeed the spirit he had seen creeping through the moonbeams in the haunted gallery?

With an exclamation of surprise he leaped to his feet, just as the curtain was about to fall, and made a frantic rush forward. Even as he did so a howl of agony broke from the little dog, and every light in the room went out, save for the flickering fire throwing shadows on the ceiling.

"Hold hard!" cried Bill in the general confusion. "Keep quiet and I'll strike a light."

He took out his matches and suited the action to the word. As he did so an unseen agency blew against the flame, which instantly died.

Bill tried again. This time his hand trembled violently; the same result ensued.

A deathly current of cold air gripped the room; the atmosphere seemed alive with influences.

Involuntarily every human creature stood rooted, their hearts failing them for fear. No soul dared move or utter, as something willowy and transparent shaped itself behind Cynthia. It was the shade or emblem of herself, but with a look of fury in the eyes, shining like blazing stars from out a wealth of rich gold hair. Only Cynthia saw nothing, though she felt the cold breath, and clung to the shivering dog, which trembled and gradually stiffened between her hands.

Hark! On the silence came the faint sound of little claws scratching at the outer door, the plaintive yelping of a dog in pain, followed by a gentle panting in the room, which recalled Bill Smilie's words to Ruth, who broke the tension with a piercing scream.

The wraith of Malvina dissolved into vapour, or was it merely the smoke from the wicks of extinguished footlights where Cynthia stood? No one ever quite knew, for weeping hysterical women and scared men made helter-skelter for the passage.

As if pursued by demons they fled towards the great hall door and out into the drive—on, on, like a herd of frightened cattle before a prairie fire, through the falling snowflakes.

Digitized by Google

"To the lodge!" a voice cried, shrilly.

The order came from Mrs. Smilie, who ran even faster than the girls. Bill was inclined to call his guests back, but Cynthia seized him by the hand, urging him forward, while she still held against her heart the dead body of a King Charles spaniel.

. . . . . .

Well, the end of it was that no power on earth would induce Bill Smilie's house party to finish their Christmas at Cavendish Hall. So leaving the place in the hands of Mrs. Pottle and the outraged phantoms, the wealthy Colonial made Yuletide merry for his friends at the Punch Bowl, a local hostelry.

One favour only he asked in return, that a night of horrible mystery might never be mentioned in his presence.

"You can talk of it all over the country when you go away," he said, with his good-natured smile; "but I've done with those darned ghosts. I want to try and forget."

Yet eventually he broke through his own rule, and spoke of it to Cynthia. They were walking back from an evening skating party some yards behind the others. The moon made night as bright as day.

"Why are you suddenly so silent?" she asked, conscious that his eyes were fixed intently upon her.

"I was noticing how like you were to 'Malvina,'" he replied.

"Ah you still think of that episode. And I don't wonder. It will haunt me to my dying day."

She spoke in low, strained accents as the joy bells pealed for the new year.

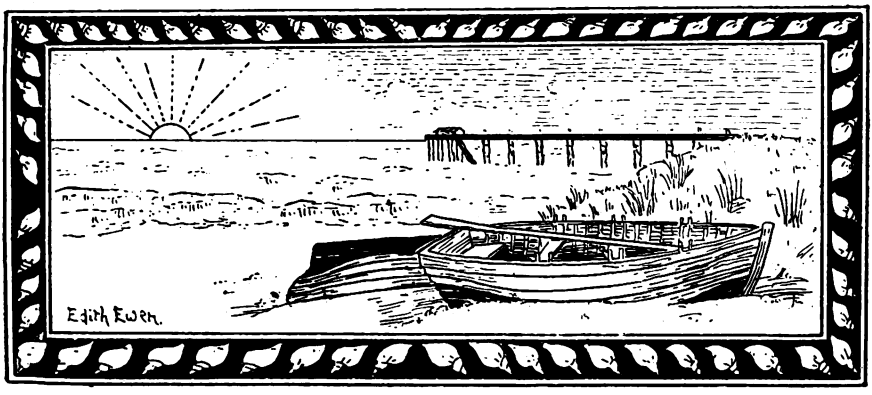
"You see," he said, clumsily, "I was in love with Malvina; that is to say, with the picture, I mean. I never dreamt anyone living could be like her till I met you, Miss De Crespigny. When the curtains divided and I saw you sitting in that tableau my heart seemed to jump into my mouth. I thought I should have gone crazy. So now you know what's the matter, and if you won't have anything to do with me, I'll just go back to the ghosts at Cavendish Hall!"

Cynthia paled at this terrible threat. "Oh, no," she cried. "No, no, I could not let you do that."

He seized her hand and drew her closer to him under cover of the night.

"It's only for you to say," he panted, breathlessly.

She answered in a whisper, and Bill Smilie did not go.



Digitized by Google

A MESSAGE FOR THE NEW CENTURY.

By IAN MACLAREN.

Author of "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush," &c.

THE arrangement of time into weeks, and years, and centuries is not only a practical convenience, it is also a means of grace. With each crisis, great or small, we are reminded that time is passing, and that time is a piece cut out of Eternity. The unseen world comes near, and for a time blots out the seen; the veil falls from before our eyes, and we pilgrims and strangers on the earth find ourselves in the presence of the Eternal. Life assumes its just proportions, and the exaggerations of this brief existence are reduced. Harassing cares and vain ambitions of to-day are shamed into silence. Vain regret and haunting sorrows are laid to rest. We look out upon the greater life, with its untold possibilities and its fearful responsibilities, and this life is cast into insignificance. We hear the sound of the ages, and the voices of this world grow faint.

As a man wakes on Sunday morning he desires to have the mistakes and sins of the past week buried out of sight. He intends to live on a higher level through the new week, and so he opens a new chapter with humility and resolution. When the Old Year dies away every serious person hopes that it may carry with it everything he has said or done of evil, and when the bells ring in the New Year there is no man who does not lift his heart to God praying that it may be to him a year of honest work, and holy living, and kindly feeling, and gracious service. There is no time when the conscience is so tender and the heart is so open as when another year is taken from our hands and placed among the books of judgment, as when we look down the long road on which we have not yet gone and whose circumstances are hidden from our eyes.

Very soon there will be given to us an experience which none of our generation have had, and which none of us can have again: we shall pass into a new century. It is wise and well that this event should receive just prominence and be invested with solemnity, so that our nation may be reinforced in the springs of moral feeling and may enter on the new age with high intentions and in the fear of God. It cannot be said that the spiritual life of the people is strong, or that the flame of hope is burning high, or that this present century is dying, as some centuries have died, its eye not dim and its natural strength not abated. There is no reason why the end of an age should be afflicted with feebleness and despair, but there can be no question that our age is dying with all the signs of decay, except that the valour of our people is quite unshaken and has astonished the world. The age is weary and is ready to fall asleep.

With the beginning of this century the democracy had broken its bonds in Egypt and crossed the Red Sea—very red indeed and troubled were its waters in France; the democracy had set out upon its journey across the desert to reach its land of promise. It was a brave ambition, to win political freedom and to obtain a share in the government of the nation. It was a long struggle, fought upon the whole with patience and moderation, and at last the people of every Western nation have come into their possession. The people are now the rulers, aud they hold the land from Dan to Beersheba, and they will never again be enslaved, nor cast out from their heritage. Whether in securing their Canaan they have obtained all they expected is another question, and he would be a very bold man who would say they had. The people have votes and can elect their rulers: do they know how to use their votes, and are they proof against the wiles of demagogues? They have better wages and more decent homes; but have they learnt to be frugal and temperate? They have ample means of education, and the very universities are thrown open to them; but are the people reading the great books, are they thinking on the great questions? Is there no reason to fear that the people have grown careless and frivolous with freedom and prosperity, and that their gods are pleasure and comfort?

Digitized by Google

The Victorian period witnessed a noble outburst and spring of letters, and it has been an honour as well as an inspiration to live in the age of Dickens, and Thackeray, and George Eliot, and Charlotte Brönte among novelists; and Macaulay, and Freeman, and Froude, and Grote among historians; and Tennyson and Browning, and Clough, and Swinburne among poets; and Carlyle, and Arnold, and Ruskin among critics of life and manners; and Russell, and Bright, and Disraeli, and Gladstone among statesmen. If the century opened with names of the grand order, it did not fail to supply their place when Scott and Wordsworth and Byron had passed away. There are few names now in any department of letters or statesmanship to stir the blood. There is no novelist for whose works we hunger and thirst every month as for another part of Dickens; there is no critic whose word is anything more than a passing opinion; Lord Salisbury is the only statesman of the old school who is left. We have no essayist with the charm of Lamb, with the virility of Hazlitt; no young Keats arises to provoke the war of criticism and amaze us by his fresh genius. Good work is being done with taste and labour, and clever, cheap work is also being done still more abundantly; but there are no giants in these days.

One fears that the blight of the commonplace is settling upon the Church, which ought to be the overflowing fountain of enthusiasm and the home of spiritual romance. The sublime enterprise of foreign missions has lost the fascination of earlier days; it is less of an adventure, more of an organisation. Its leaders yield to none of their predecessors in devotion and usefulness, but they are no longer pioneers and discoverers. There are not revivals of religion now, such as in the time of our fathers and the days before them, when quiet people cried aloud for mercy and hardy sinners were openly turned unto righteousness, and thousands were added unto the Church. Nor have we preachers of the grand order in such numbers as in the former days—men who could move multitudes at their will either to smiles or tears, and who reigned from the pulpit as kings from their thrones. A few remain—the last of their kind—to remind us what the pulpit once was and to assure us of the power of human speech. Possibly there never were so many well-educated and intelligent men in the pulpit before, and the standard of average discourse was never so high, but the outstanding men of genius and eloquence are few and are not likely to have successors. Preaching also is being reduced to uniformity, and the average man is coming into his kingdom.

One notices the same levelling up in the department of commerce and finance. Once there were great houses whose names were known to the ends of the earth; and there were also private banks which had the confidence of a nation. With those powerful firms no man without name or capital could compete, and they had, therefore, a monopoly of affairs; they were the aristocracy of business and the Doges of a larger State than that of Venice in her glory. The telegraph wire has reduced to an equality the great house and the small, and banks are now joint-stock enterprises in which there are a multitude of shareholders. Competition has grown keener every day, and a number of little men are dividing among them the profits of a few great men. It is a grave question whether there will be a place in future for the man of original and commanding commercial ability wherein he can carry out his own plans and reap his own profits, or whether he may not be simply the manager, under the charge of a board and looking after the interests of an innumerable multitude of people. If so, one of the great ambitions of the past will disappear, and the beginner in commerce will not have the honourable incentive which moved his father.

There has been a great change in the constitution of society, and it means, so far as one can see, that there is not going to be in the future such a distinction as existed in the past between great and small, but there is going to be a far nearer approach to equality. The capitalist will not be so well off, but the workman will be better off; fewer men will be able to live without working, and more men will get a reward for their work. The people will depend less upon rulers and will have more share in government. Genius will be very rare, but capacity will be widely diffused; there will be less state and more comfort, less submission and more brotherhood. No doubt there may be a loss in the distinction of life, and a certain commonplaceness of action and of talent; but a larger number of people will have their part in the affairs of the State, and a bigger share of the riches of life.

Digitized by Google

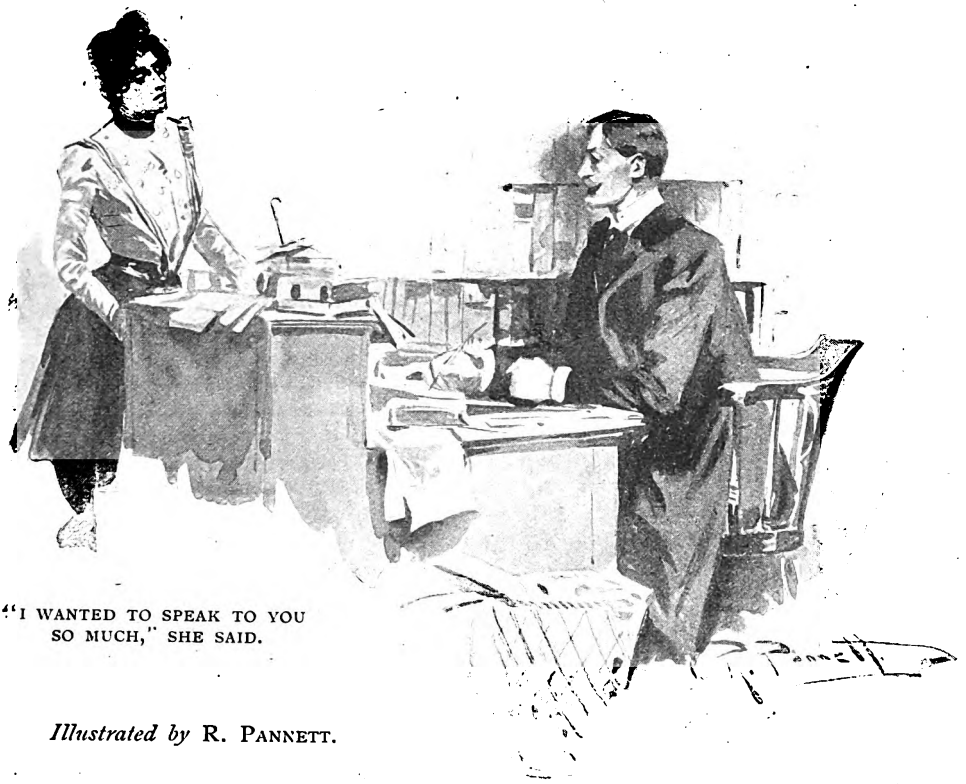
The new century will open with a strong appeal to the ordinary man, and will offer to him his opportunity; upon him, although he live in a small house and have only limited ability, although he be only one out of a vast multitude, will fall the burden of government, both in Church and State. With others like him he will direct the policy of the country and control its agitation, as well as arrange its local affairs. Within religion he must advance the kingdom of Christ by his personal conduct and by the fulfilment of Christ's law in his active work. The layman is going to count much more than he did, and the minister is going to count less. Great fortunes will grow fewer, respectable poverty will be more and more alleviated; although, of course, the man who invents a useful article in general demand will become a millionaire beyond the dreams of nobles, and the drunkard and idle person will always be poor, and deserve to suffer.

Absolute equality will ever be impossible till you can reduce every man's brains to the same value, and absolute equality would reduce life to a state of dreary commonplace; but a more general distribution of property and ability will have many advantages for the commonwealth. It will check the extremes of inordinate wealth and abject poverty; it will lessen the insolence of the rich and assuage the bitterness of the poor; it will increase the self-respect of the multitude by giving them the sense of power; and it will tend to abate the insolence of priests by investing the people with many of their powers. It is in such circumstances that the principle of brotherhood will have a wider range and an easier application; for it will not have to fight against the irresistible distinctions between genius and stupidity, between wealth and misery, between rank and low degree. Many of Christ's commandments which seem impossible now will then be within the reach of obedience; and many of the glaring violations of Christ's spirit, both in Church and State, will die a natural death. Before the new age has come to its majority, one may hope that every man who is sober and industrious will have a decent home to live in, and that the vicious will not be allowed to go at large; that temptations to vice will be restrained with a firmer hand when the people are the rulers; that every kind of education, from the highest to the lowest, will be open to the sons of the people; and that the work of the Christian Church will be carried on not by a few, but by all her members, and that once again the fair green land will be settled and possessed by the people. The people, made up of a multitude of unknown and undistinguished persons, are coming into their heritage; and whether they take twenty-one years or fifty years to assume the throne, the new century is going to be their opportunity and their crowning.

About one thing only ought we to be anxious—and that is the relation between the people and Christ. If they should cease to believe in Christ, then homes, and gardens, and schools, and plenty would avail them little; for the kingdom of the people would only end in a secular paradise, and the soul of the nation would die. It were better for a nation to be ill-fed and ill-clothed, better to have no share in government and only the poorest means of education, than to lose the inspiration of faith and the hope of the world to come. What lends glory to this earth is the arch of heaven above us, and the sun, which gives its colour to the tiniest flower; and what lends dignity to life is the sense of Eternity and the fellowship of man with God. As Christ lived in the humblest of homes, and did the plainest of work, and made His house and carpenter's bench of Nazareth for ever beautiful, so His Spirit alone can make the life of the people spiritual and sacred. The centuries come and go, but He remaineth Whose Spirit through all the centuries has been the guide of the people, and Who Himself has been their most loyal and powerful Friend.

JOHN WATSON.

Digitized by Google



"I WANTED TO SPEAK TO YOU SO MUCH," SHE SAID.

Illustrated by R. PANNETT.

HIS GREAT CHANCE.

BY MARY ANGELA DICKENS.

JOHN LANCASTER hardly knew when he first became aware of her existence. The editor of a daily paper has not, as a rule, either time or inclination to take heed of the clerks and typewriters who are the underlings of his underlings. The first thing he noticed was that she always lifted her face as he passed through the outer office. The next thing was her face itself. There was nothing particularly conspicuous in its outline; the features were small and delicate. It was very nearly colourless, and just a little pinched. But this is by no means an uncommon characteristic among girls who work a typewriter for their daily bread. Its pallor was enhanced by the dark hair which rippled about her forehead and by dark eyebrows and eyelashes. Her eyes themselves were large, and dark grey in colour—beautiful eyes they were in truth. But before John Lancaster arrived at this conclusion he found himself considerably perplexed by the fact that there was something in their expression, as their owner fixed them on him as he passed down the room—something in the expression of the whole face—which he could never immediately forget.

"What does she want?" he said to himself, half irritably. By this time he had realised, vaguely, that the expression was one of intense and wistful longing. "What the dickens can she want?"

At this stage in the proceedings he did not even know her name. He had no idea that he had the slightest wish to know it until he found himself one morning saying abruptly to his "sub.": "What's the name of the typewriter girl who sits in the left-hand corner as you go out? Pale girl, with dark hair."

Digitized by Google

"The new girl?" returned the sub. "Oh, her name's Ansted. Hard-working sort, she seems. Gets through twice as much as some of the others we have had—at present, at any rate."

"Oh!" was Lancaster's comment. And he applied himself to his work.

Two or three days more passed, and Christmas was near. "The new girl's" glance at him as he went in and out—for, as he assured himself, it was really nothing more—began to haunt John Lancaster like a cry of distress, to which he persistently turned a deaf ear. He was a sensitive man, and he possessed an imagination, and it began, in the phrase of the day, to "get on his nerves."

"It's such a good little face," he found himself thinking absently one night—he had been under the impression that he was writing a leader—"its such—such a patient little face. I wonder whether there's anything she wants me to do?"

It was on the day following this, while a good many people were thinking and also saying that the leaders in the Daily Messenger were not what they used to be, that John Lancaster suddenly rang his bell.

"Send me a typewriter," he said, brusquely. "No, not Miss Martin"—Miss Martin was the clerk who usually wrestled with the editorial correspondence. "Miss Ansted will do."

The editor of the Daily Messenger was writing rapidly when Miss Ansted made an unobtrusive entrance a few seconds later. He did not look up, and yet he was perfectly well aware that there was an unusual flush on the little pale face, and that the grey eyes were shining. So well aware was he of this, that he was almost surprised that Miss Ansted should seat herself before the typewriter and await his instructions in silence. He forgot that his appearance when he was apparently absorbed in business was not calculated to encourage interruption, and he could not possibly know that the girl only a few yards from him was saying to herself over and over again, as if the assurance would check the too rapid beating of her heart:

"By-and-bye! When he's finished, I'll try. By-and-bye!"

Five minutes passed. John Lancaster, with his head bent over his paper, was waiting for he did not know what, and when nothing whatever came, he suddenly grew unreasonably angry. He lifted his head, and his face was cold and hard. He drew a pile of letters from a pigeon-hole, and spoke in his abruptest and most business-like manner.

"Kindly take down some letters at my dictation," he said.

The instantaneous click and rattle which told that the typist had slipped a sheet of paper into her machine should have pleased Lancaster in its promptitude; but, instead of that, it only served to increase his irritation. He was an excellent man of business; and it was well known to those of his staff who had been longest with him that he never worked better than when he was out of temper. He dictated now for about twenty minutes exceedingly rapidly and lucidly, passing from one letter to another with only such a pause as was absolutely necessary to allow Miss Ansted to change the sheet of paper. Then he said, abruptly:

"Thank you; that will do," and applied himself instantly to the work on his table.

Miss Ansted was dismissed. There was nothing for her to do but to go. John Lancaster felt rather than saw that she hesitated for a fraction of a second. He knew that the colour had died out of her face. Then he heard her cross the room. At the door she faltered again, and turned her face towards him. He could see it so clearly, as he sat with his eyes fixed upon his paper, that it never occurred to him to raise his head. The next moment the door opened and closed softly. John Lancaster leant back in his chair suddenly and swore quietly.

"Now, why couldn't she say what she wanted to say?" he demanded of the empty room.

He asked himself the question so often in the course of the day, and it interfered so seriously with his sleep at night, that he finally assured himself that it was quite time he put the matter out of his mind. When he sent for a typewriter on the following day, he did not specify which clerk he would have; but he watched the door breathlessly until it opened to admit Miss Ansted. Then he drew a quick breath, and began to dictate as though the fate of nations depended upon his not losing a moment.

Digitized by Google

But it is natural to glance occasionally in the direction of a person to whom you are dictating, and Lancaster grew less and less fluent. The haunting little face seemed even paler than usual this morning as it bent over the machine; and there was something in the droop at the corner of the lips, seen thus in profile, which seemed to make the editor less clear-headed than usual. He broke off at last and spoke the words which dismissed the clerk almost mechanically:

"Thank you; that will do."

She had reached the door. In another moment she would be gone. Prompted by a sudden, overwhelming impulse John Lancaster looked up, and, as she turned, evidently almost involuntarily, he met her lingering, wistful look, for the first time, eye to eye. There was an odd little pause. The girl flushed crimson to the roots of her pretty dark hair, and he saw the thin little hands clench themselves as though their owner were nerving herself for a desperate effort.

"Is there anything you would like to say to me?" said Lancaster. It seemed to him that his voice hardly seemed like his own.

"May I? Oh, may I?"

She had come two or three paces towards him, her face quivering in every line, and as Lancaster pointed without speaking to a chair that faced his own, she came rapidly up to it, and stood clasping the back rail convulsively.

"I wanted to speak to you so much," she said. Her words came in a feverish stream as though she almost feared that the longed-for opportunity might escape her even now. "I thought, when I first came here, if you could only know—if I could only tell you—perhaps—perhaps—you would do something. But I was afraid!"

"Afraid of me?" said John Lancaster. It did not occur to him to wonder why it should cut him to the quick that this girl should be afraid of him; but she responded to his tone instantly, and evidently unconsciously.

"Not afraid of you exactly," she said, quickly. "I didn't think—but you are so very busy you see, and I was afraid of interrupting, and choosing a bad time."

"Won't you sit down?" said Lancaster. She shook her head, and her voice grew eager and beseeching again.

HE TOOK UP THE LETTER QUICKLY WITH AN UNERRING INSTINCT.

Digitized by Google

"No, thank you. I don't want to hinder you. I won't be one moment. I only wanted to say—it's about my brother—he is so very, very clever, and somehow he can't get a chance."

"Your brother?" repeated Lancaster. He was watching her face intently, and he thought he had never seen anything so pitiful as its earnestness. "Does he write, then?"

"Yes, yes," she answered. "He writes so well, oh, so very well! But you know how it is—it's so difficult to get a hearing. He has tried so hard, and he's been disappointed over and over again. Every paper has its own people, and won't listen to anything new. But you—oh, if you only would!"

The editor in John Lancaster was not entirely dormant, though the man was very much in evidence. He knew his world too well not to be sceptical as to talent that could not make itself known. He hesitated. The girl saw it, and a little despairing cry came into her voice.

"Oh, if I could only make you understand!" she said. "It's only just a hearing he wants—he could do better work than anybody if he only had the chance. And it's so bad for a man to feel that! It's so—so demoralising to know that the world isn't treating you justly. How can a man be quite—quite steady when he's always sore at heart and disappointed? But if he had work—regular work—ah, then it would be all right!"

Lancaster looked up quickly. He suddenly understood what made the little figure before him so thin and fragile.

"What is he doing now?" he asked.

She opened her hands with a little eloquent gesture. "He can get nothing to do," she said. "Nothing worthy of him, that is," she added, proudly.

"So he does nothing at all. Young scoundrel! Is it possible that he lives on her?" said Lancaster to himself. Aloud, he said: "Do you live together?"

She nodded.

"There are only the two of us left," she said, simply.

There was a pause. Lancaster was taking in the situation in all its bearings. What he should do was so entirely a foregone conclusion in his mind that he was almost startled as he read the agonised suspense in the girlish face opposite him. He rose abruptly.

"Of course your brother shall have a chance," he said, trying to speak lightly. "The best thing will be for him to come and see me. Let me see—to-morrow afternoon at three, shall it be? No, no; don't thank me."

Miss Ansted did not try to thank him.

"I can't," she murmured. "If you only knew——" She broke off, and fairly ran out of the room.

It seemed to Lancaster, when he opened the door of the outer office on the following morning, that the place was entirely empty. Then he realised that it was only one little face that was absent, the face which had been lifted to him as he went out on the previous evening, glowing with boundless gratitude and admiration. His brows contracted sharply, and he strode on to his own room. There was so much work to do in clearing up for the Christmas holiday. On the top of the pile of letters on his desk was one which he took up quickly with an odd, unerring instinct.

"21, Vere-street,
"Camden Town.

"Dear Sir,—I am so very sorry that I am not able to come to the office this morning. I do hope it may not be very inconvenient; indeed, I would not stay away if I could help it. And I am very sorry to say that my brother will not be able to keep the appointment which you were so kind as to make for him. He is very ill, and I cannot leave him. He is not at all strong, and I am afraid the excitement was too much for him. When he is better, if you will let him come and see you, it will be most kind.

"Faithfully yours,
"LETTICE ANSTED."

Over this formal little note John Lancaster's brows wrinkled themselves portentously.

"The excitement?" he said to himself. "Odd! And that poor little thing all alone with him. Confound it!"

It was about six o'clock in the evening when Lancaster, having attended somewhat perfunctorily to a certain amount of business, suddenly walked out of the office and hailed a hansom.

"21, Vere-street, Camden Town," he said to the man.

It was a cold foggy evening—Christmas Eve—and the fact that some of the street lamps were lighted and some were

Digitized by Google

SHE WAS HOLDING UP IN HER ARMS THE GAUNT FIGURE OF A MAN, WHOSE BREATH CAME IN STRUGGLING GASPS.

not did not help the cabman in his search for a locality which seemed to be of the humblest and most retiring nature. A great deal of questioning and wrangling and swearing took place before Lancaster found himself standing on the steps of a shabby little house in a shabby little street. In a street close by an open air market was in full swing, trade being very much quickened by the near approach of Christmas; and a clamour of voices of buyers and sellers made a background for

Digitized by Google

Lancaster's speech as he demanded of a dirty and untidy woman whether Miss Ansted lived there.

"Yes, she lives here," was the answer; "but you can't see her—not unless you are a relation, that is. Mr. Ansted, he's going fast."

"Going?" repeated Lancaster. Then a flash of horrified comprehension came to him. "You don't mean—he's dying," he asked. "Who is here? Who has Miss Ansted with her? She is not alone?"

The woman nodded. "Yes, she is, pore little thing!" was the answer. "There, she'll be better off without him, idlin' and grumblin' and drinkin' all the time, and her working for the two on 'em. But she won't know her luck, that she won't. She'll break her 'eart for 'im, if you arsk me. No one never was so set on her brother, not in this world!" She eyed Miss Ansted's visitor curiously, and then added: "Perhaps you'd like to see her, sir? It's very sad to 'appen on Christmas Eve."

She led the way up the stairs, and Lancaster followed her mechanically. Not till she had opened the door and announced him in a hoarse whisper as "a gentleman," did he realise where she was taking him. And as the truth dawned upon him, all the conventionalities which would have made John Lancaster hesitate, had the opportunity to do so been given him, fell away from him, and he walked into the room as one who had a right there. It was a little room, very poor and very bare. Facing the door was a narrow bed, and at the head of the bed, half-sitting, half-kneeling, was Lettice Ansted. She was holding up in her arms the gaunt figure of a man whose breath came in struggling gasps. A flickering candle lighted up the two faces, and as his eyes rested on them, John Lancaster's heart gave a great leap, and then seemed to stand absolutely still for a moment with pure pity. He expected to see a boy a year or so older or younger than Lettice Ansted; a boy with tendencies easily argued from his sister's vague reference to "steadiness," but one whose very youth suggested hope for the future. Not for one moment had the actual facts of the case suggested themselves to him.

Between the brother and sister before him there were twenty years. The head that lay against Lettice Ansted's shoulder was that of a middle-aged man prematurely aged until it looked like that of a man of sixty. The haggard features were lined and worn, not with work, not even with care, but with discontent and dissipation. The story of a life wasted beyond all hope of redemption was written on that face for every eye to read.

For every eye except those dark grey ones which met John Lancaster's as he looked from the brother to the sister in whose arms he lay. To Lettice Ansted the worn-out man was still the brilliant young brother, in whose genius her very childhood had put devout and loving faith. A quivering little smile touched her lips.

"It's too late," she said. "After all, it's too late."

John Lancaster did not speak. He came across the room, and, with a deft gentleness for which no one would have given him credit, he transferred the unconscious figure from her arms to his own.

Perhaps it was the movement that roused the dying man, perhaps the moment had arrived for that last look at the earth and things earthly which is so often infinitely clearer than any that precedes it. The eyes opened suddenly, and Lettice slipped on to her knees and laid her cheek against her brother's hand.

"O Dick dear!" she cried. "Dick dear, stay! Your chance has come at last. Don't let it be too late!"

But Richard Ansted was not looking at her. He was looking full into the eyes of the man who held him, and Lancaster, meeting that strange clear gaze, saw for a moment the man who might have been. Richard Ansted moved his hand feebly, and laid it on his sister's head.

"She always believed in me," he said, still looking into Lancaster's face. "She doesn't understand. But, you see—it would have been too late—anyhow. This is—best. Perhaps—somewhere else."

And while the cheery noise of the Christmas market rent the air outside, he went to look for his chance—somewhere else.

. . . . . .

Lettice never did understand. John Lancaster, when his wife talked softly to him, as she often did in after years, of her brother's great gifts and the hard measure Fate had dealt out to him, agreed tenderly with all she had to say.

"Poor chap," he said to himself. "I hope he's got his chance. I owe him—Lettice."

Digitized by Google

Christmas in the Home.

By HELEN MERRIMAN.

Again at Christmas did we weave,
The holly round the Christmas hearth;
The silent snows possessed the earth,
And calmly fell our Christmas Eve.

"WE have not the heart to do anything this Christmas—let us get it over as quietly as possible," was a speech one heard on all sides last year, and who could blame the speakers? For truly it was one of the saddest times this generation has known, both individually and nationally.

Many a home had been darkened by the Angel of Death, and the fortunate few whose friends were still with them were appalled and stricken by the news placarded forth so blatantly at every street corner!

Christmas shopping was hurried through with weary absent-mindedness, and as for decorating the house—it was out of the question!

All this was very justifiable, very excusable last year, but, although anxious hearts are still amongst us, and the din of battle yet sounds in our ears from afar, it is not right to give up the custom of Christmas rejoicing, for, although our own lives may be darkened, though the nation's outlook may be depressing, the cause for gladness is the same and as real as it was 1900 years ago. Surely we ought to mark in some way with evidences of rejoicing and gratitude the greatest birthday mankind has ever known, when the Light and the Joy and the Peace of the world was born, Who still gives to us and to all who ask it that "peace and goodwill from God to man" which no outward circumstances, be they never so sad, can destroy.

To those then who still hold Christmas as a festival—

Romantic women and simple men,
Whose hearts at the sound of Christmas still
With a thousand memories melt and thrill—and who wish their homes to look smiling and gay, though their own hearts may still be aching, some suggestions of easily carried out decorations may commend themselves to their taste as preferable to the piece of holly stuck over a picture frame or trail of ivy round the clock, which to so many housewives seems sufficient to mark the festive season. Not that the ivy trail is at all a bad idea; but it needs something more elaborate to back it up.

Little cardboard frames, painted green, with ivy or holly leaves sewn on to them, make pretty surrounds for picture frames, whether square or round. For the former the cardboard is cut into strips about 1 in. wide, matching in length the size of the frame, and fixed together at the corners with paper fasteners or a stitch. All this should be done first, then the separate leaves sewn on with a holly berry between them.

The same idea might be carried out, with a difference, for the larger pictures, especially oil paintings, when the green wreath should go inside the frame, not outside, and should cover the flat mount surrounding the canvas. Holly wreaths take so much time and greenstuff that they prove both troublesome and expensive to make, and busy people find it better to substitute long trails of ivy twisted round wire, or tied on to fine string to keep them wreath-like, and they will festoon much more gracefully and lightly than the more self-assertive holly and yew. A pretty over-door can be made out of a sheet of brown paper or cardboard. Big greyhound mounting boards, 7½d. a sheet, are very strong and stiff, and may be had of most artist's colormen. Two strips about a foot deep should be cut, and a third piece, double that depth, and about 1½ ft. wide, to form the centre part; the length of the two sides is, of course, determined by the width of the door. As the cardboard is thick, a pricker, or a hatpin, must be used to punch holes through which fine string can be passed, and the side pieces laid over the centre, and firmly sewn together. Then cover lightly with white cotton-wool or serge, or even common nun's veiling would do; or, if the colouring of the room admits of it, red flannel may be used (then the other colours must be in keeping). Have some brown paper strips ready painted green (the children love to do that work, it is such easy painting! and the bigger ones may be kept quiet and happy for a whole morning sewing the leaves on when the painting is dry). The centre round must be shaped, and where artistic methods are not possible, an ordinary round plate or Japanese tray, the right size, may be laid down, and a pencil run round the top from edge to edge. The paper strips for the leaves must be cut the same way, and when the edge is complete fastened on. The centre adornment may be according to personal taste, either the words "Happy Christmas," in scarlet paper letters edged with holly or rowan berries, or, what looks much better, the family crest in the middle, and the monograms of the heads of the household at each side. A Sheraton bow of real inch-wide ribbon, laid flat and twisting through and round the crest, looks very well, but if ribbon is objected to as tawdry the same device can be carried out in outline, with red berries, either gummed or sewn on. Each door of the various reception rooms may have a similar device above it, but they should be carried out in different colours and different ways, the crest on one, and words of welcome on another, while a third might simply have a wreath festooned across it.

Digitized by Google

Halls are troublesome to decorate, yet they require something, and as most of them have an archway of some sort, the chief decorations might be confined to that shown in our second illustration. Make a pretty thick wreath of greenstuff, with which to outline the arch, but the festoons must be of the slender, supple ivy trails. These, however, must not be left as nature made them, but should be twisted round pliant green cord or string and tied every here and there. A long trail is thus obtained, one end of which must be fastened to a hook screwed into the centre of the archway, and the other looped back to the brackets at the side, from which a trail of two feet or more should hang down the wall. The hook which holds the ivy also supports the indispensable mistletoe, and allows it to hang in a place where it will not be aggressively visible, yet sufficiently en evidence for those who wish to take advantage of it. The next thing to be done is to make a loop of strong two-inch-wide ribbon and nail it firmly on to the wall above the brackets, with a pliant bamboo cane slipped into each one. The end of the cane must rest firmly against the wall, and to allow of this the ribbon loops should slope a little outwards, i.e., be wider at one end than the other. To make the rods more secure a ribbon socket might be made by twisting some inch-wide ribbon round the end of the cane and nailing it to the wood of the archway with tacks set close to each side of the rod. From the other end of the bamboos a Chinese lantern must be suspended. The canes ought to be so slight that the weight of the lantern bends them over, and if possible these should constitute, for the one occasion, the sole means of lighting that part of the hall.

Digitized by Google

The decoration of the Christmas dinner-table is always an important item in the housekeeper's mind. How to get something new, and at the same time something pretty—flowers are at ruination prices and holly wreaths are done to death. An idea we have borrowed from the German "Christingles" may appeal to some, and suggest variations upon it to others. The Christingle itself is a good large orange into which a quill is set. This quill is split half-way down into four arms, which have properly a raisin at each end, but a crystallised cherry or plum would look better. A second quill, similarly cut and loaded, is set inside the first and acts as holder to a little coloured taper, which is of course lighted. The angels are supposed to watch the tapers burning, and bring joy and gladness to the possessor of each Christingle according to the steadiness with which it burns.

Now, by using these Christingles as a table decoration, a very pretty and seasonable effect may be obtained. A yellow silk centre should be laid down, about one yard long and three-quarters of a yard wide—or in that proportion to the table—and a high-standing dessert dish set in the middle of this; close round the dish, make a complete circle of those glass troughs in which Japanese leads are set to uphold the yellow and white and red chrysanthemums, which should rise on their long stalks as if growing out of the moss and ivy with which the troughs are finally covered. But take care your moss is within the trough and the ivy around it, otherwise the water will syphon on to the tablecloth and spoil everything. The flowers should be as tall as the dish, which, in its turn, has a glass jam-jar set in the middle of it. Taste and appropriateness must regulate the size and height of this, but it must have moss surrounding it, and on the moss the Christingles are set as close as the oranges will go. Another stands on top of the glass jar, the junction of which must be hidden by a tiny wreath of ivy close round the rim. Any other sort of jar or pedestal may be used. We are only suggesting what is within the power of all households, not what would require a vast expenditure to procure. This forms a pyramid of lights, and four more Christingles may be set at the corners of the silk; and, if it seems fitting, a Christingle set in a little ivy and moss filled plate before each guest would serve to support the menu, and at the same time be a graceful way of wishing each individual friend present

A VERY HAPPY CHRISTMAS.

Digitized by Google

Aunt Lavinia's Letter.

By MARY E. WILKINS.

Illustrated by FRANCES EWAN.

AUNT LAVINIA, or Miss Lavinia May, for she remained in her maiden estate until the time of her death, was famous in her day and generation for her skill in letter-writing, or, as they expressed it in those days, when everything had its full meed of syllables and adjectives, her "Epistolary Art."

Miss Lavinia had an elegant little desk, which still stands intact upon the shores of time. It is inlaid with mother-of-pearl, it has a lock which never was secure even in its palmiest days, and the key with a faded blue ribbon attached, always kept in a corner of the drawer, will not fit it. When the desk is opened, a fragrance, so very faint and delicate that it is scarcely more than a suggestion of one, steals forth as impalpably as a memory. This fragrance is made up of rose-leaves and sweet herbs, and musk and other things impossible to identify. The same fragrance is evident when the drawers of the old mahogany bureau upstairs, which belonged to Miss Lavinia, are opened. It is the material evidence of her presence in the house.

At this desk Miss Lavinia used to sit to copy her famous and notable letters. All the labour of composition was performed upon a slate which no longer survives.

Miss Lavinia's nephew, Thomas, who was born after her death and inherited the slate, let it fall one day from his desk in the district school, to the destruction of the slate and the ignominy of its owner, who was obliged to stand a half-hour on the floor in consequence.

Miss Lavinia came of a prosperous family, and lived in a fine old mansion house in one of the seaport villages of Massachusetts. After her parents died, and her two sisters and her brothers had married and gone away, Miss Lavinia was the head of the family at home. There lived with her two younger unmarried sisters, Salome and Lucy, and an orphan niece, Susan Becket.

All the family held Lavinia's epistolary talents in great veneration; while she was the nominal head and mistress of the household, everybody conspired to relieve her as much as might be from the duties, while not infringing upon the glories of her position that she might have ample strength and leisure to devote to her pen.

"Your Aunt Lavinia is gifted," Miss Salome used to say often to young Susan Becket. "We must relieve her of as many as possible of the ordinary burdens of life that she may be enabled to improve her talent."

Young Susan, who was sixteen, and had a sweet wondering baby face, assented and Miss Lucy (who was very industrious and never seen without needles of some kind in her hands, and who at that moment was making a dress for her talented sister) said, with an expression which altered her good but rather dull face as with a reflection of another's glory, that Lavinia was gifted as women seldom were, and ought to have none of the ordinary feminine duties to distract her mind.

Though the Mays were prosperous, even rich, and had always kept servants, the daughters had been instructed in all housewifely wisdom by their mother, Lavinia with the others. But Lucy had oftener than not, even in their younger days, performed her sister's tasks as well as her own.

When Susan Becket came to live in the old house, she watched every opportunity to wait upon her Aunt Lavinia. Often, when she saw her composing letters upon the slate, she would drop her own knitting, or patchwork, and stare at her in a very rapture of wonder and admiration. Sometimes Miss Lavinia sat for hours over the slate before she filled it, sometimes she sat for days, then she seated herself at her little work-table desk and trimmed her quill pen, spread her paper carefully, having adjusted her lines beneath and placed the sand ready at hand, and began to copy what she had composed in the finest chirography of which she was capable.

Digitized by Google

Every downward and upward loop was carefully and beautifully shaded, and she placed all the dots as conscientiously as she paid her debts, and rendered unto Cæsar the things which belonged to him, and all the letters moved from left to right as regularly and evenly slanted as a file of soldiers on a run of advance.

As for the subject matter, everybody admitted that was not to be excelled. Miss Lavinia held that a letter should have its own fine finish like any good work, its elegant figures of speech, its ornaments of quotations, its embellishments of style, and she carried out her theory as earnestly as she kept the commandments.

Miss Lavinia considered that no item of village or family news should be imparted without its corollaries of elegant sentiments and moral reflections for the improvement of the soul and mind of the recipient.

Young Susan Becket could not have an attack of influenza without affording her Aunt Lavinia an opportunity for pages of wholesome descantation upon the transitoriness of all earthly joys and sorrows, and the importance of improving every moment wisely in the cultivation of the powers of the mind and the graces of the soul.

Miss Salome could not have a toothache and pass a sleepless night without furnishing her sister with useful material for reflection, and Miss Lucy never finished a patchwork quilt or a piece of embroidery that it was not in a manner immortalised by Miss Lavinia for the enfolding of precious precepts and quotations from Scripture and the poets.

Never a wedding or a death occurred in the village but Miss Lavinia seized upon it like an industrious spider upon a cocoon, and spun therefrom wondrous webs of sentiment and fancy upon her pages of foolscap. One enthusiastic female friend of Miss Lavinia, who was the recipient of frequent communications from her, was reported to have remarked once that it seemed to her that it was almost worth while going through with a wedding or a funeral for the sake of having such beautiful letters written about it.

When Lavinia had copied all which she had written upon the slate, down she sat again to her labour of composition. It was Susan's work, eagerly performed and accounted as a privilege, to sponge the slate clean for the new instalment and see that the pencil was finely sharpened.

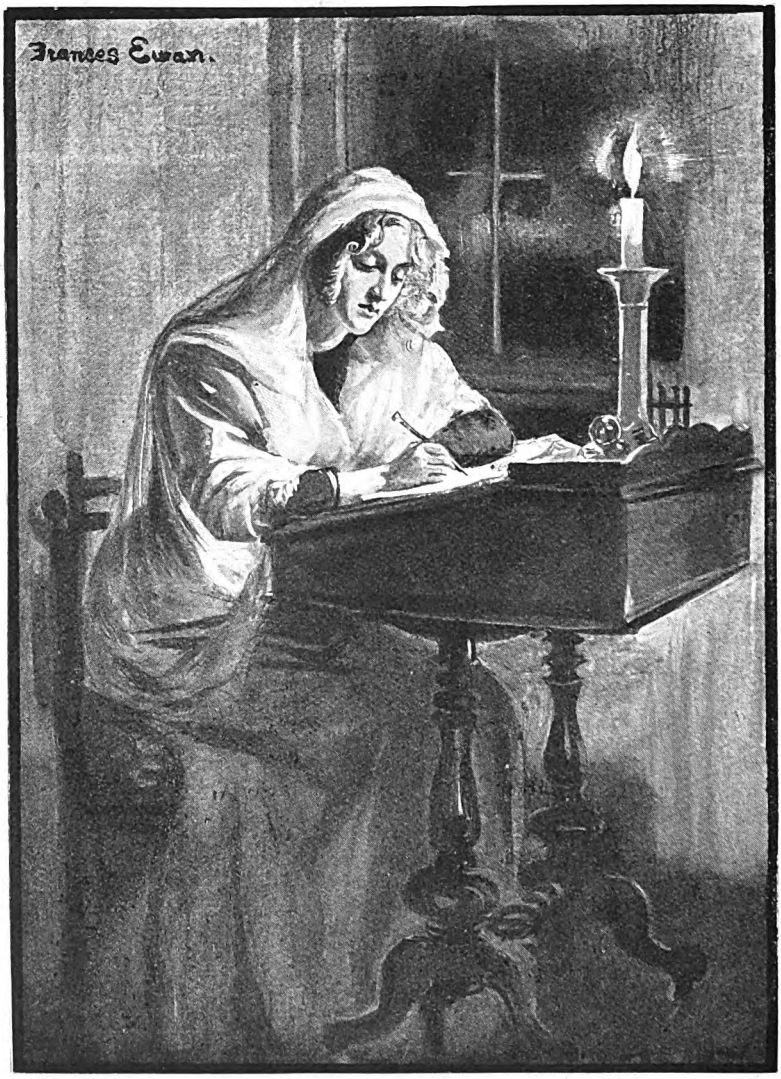
An evening or an afternoon was not nearly long enough for Miss Lavinia to complete a letter to her satisfaction. Often she spent her leisure hours for a week, then sent the epistle away with an artless hypocrisy in the opening sentence, artless because her correspondent, having experienced similar throes and labours of composition, understood it for only what it was worth, as a graceful conventionality intended to relieve her from a sense of obligation and free the writer from the imputation of lack of ease in literary matters.

The opening sentence ran somewhat in this wise: "Having now a leisure moment, I take my pen in hand for the purpose of inditing a few hasty lines." The gentle and ladylike lie was in the very face of the characters in which it was expressed as fine as miniature painting, to say nothing of the manifest impossibility of inditing a few hasty lines.

The recipient had always mental visions of the slate, and after the slate the desk—perhaps with the midnight candle burning thereon and Lavinia seated before it, bending with graceful patience over her task, her long side-curls concealing her delicate cheeks and making dancing shadows on the paper, her slender fingers grasping the pen daintily and fashioning every letter as carefully as if she were painting a flower.

Miss Lavinia was quite a local celebrity by virtue of her letter-writing. She was considered almost as worthy of fame as an author of books, and by some to be more so, inasmuch as they deemed, holding the prejudices of the day, that book-writing was somewhat beyond the sphere of women while letter-writing was virtuously and elegantly within it. One faithful friend and admirer said openly that for her part she had much rather write Lavinia May's letters than write Mrs. Sigourney's poems.

Digitized by Google



AUNT LAVINIA WAS BENDING WITH GRACEFUL PATIENCE OVER HER TASK.

It was agreed that if Miss Lavinia had chosen to do so, she could have written books; indeed she often transcribed an original poem in an album, and she wrote beautiful sentiments in gracefully halting lines upon the deaths of friends, which were treasured in family Bibles. However, these were regarded by her as only digressions from her given line of epistolary excellence and she was never very proud of them.

Lavinia's letters were all considered notable, but she was quite an old lady when she wrote the one which has become a family story, a folk-lore tale as it were; for families as well as nations have their folk-lore tales. Susan Becket was a grown-up young lady, and had an admirer coming regularly on Wednesday and Sunday nights, and Miss Lavinia's little work-table desk had been moved upstairs to the south chamber, because she was disturbed in her writing by the young man's visits, and it was such a very cold winter, it was impossible for Susan to entertain him in the east parlour. It was hard enough to make the west room comfortable with the largest logs which the fireplace would hold. The south chamber was very warm and sunny with its two south and two west windows, and Lavinia's desk stood between the windows overlooking the road.

Digitized by Google

Susan's admirer, Mr. Ephraim Brewster, used often, when he had parted from his sweetheart and was going home late in the evening, to look back at Miss Lavinia's window and see between the tasselled sweeps of dimity curtains her gentle old face shaded by long grey curls, bending over her desk. He, too, had the popular admiration for Miss Lavinia's letters. Susan had often entertained him by reading over some which her aunt had sent her from time to time when she had been away on a visit.

"I ought to be thankful for such precepts as these to guide me," Susan would remark, fervently, when she repeated Miss Lavinia's admonitions concerning vanity and lack of diligence, the proper estimation of the duties of life and the constant remembrance of that which comes after.

A very saint little Susan would have been, had she fulfilled all the injunctions of her Aunt Lavinia's letters. It seemed doubtful if even Lavinia herself was capable, while in the flesh, of carrying out fully the precepts which she enjoined upon her niece. Still by her letters Miss Lavinia herself, allowing for a little overgloss of expression, a few high-lights, so to speak, was revealed as the patient, womanly, pious soul that she was, full of sentiment which was noble though trite, and whose moral reflections discovering the further side of her thoughts and observations of daily life were not to be despised.

When Susan had been betrothed to Ephraim Brewster nearly two years, Miss Lavinia died very suddenly, and after the funeral began the famous search for her last letter. When Miss Salome and Miss Lucy and Susan began the loving and painful task of caring for, and packing away, after sundry little legacies had been given, Miss Lavinia's small possessions and little treasures of this world's goods, almost the first thing to be thought of was the letter.

Miss Lavinia had been known to be busied upon a letter for weeks before her death, sitting up late at night and even neglecting her usual tasks of knitting and reading to write.

"Where do you suppose that last letter of hers is?" Miss Salome said, tearfully, when the three loving, lonely women were engaged in sorting the contents of the little work-table desk with reverent fingers.

"I don't see it anywhere,' said Miss Lucy, quite pale with perplexity.

"I am sure I never posted it for her," said Susan.

"It is a pity if we cannot find it—the last letter she ever wrote," Miss Salome said.

"I cannot be reconciled to it," Miss Lucy sighed.

"It must be somewhere," Susan said, stoutly, "for we all know she wrote it, and if it wasn't posted it must be somewhere in the house. I am going to hunt till I find it if it takes me a year. Dear Aunt Lavinia's last beautiful letter shall not be lost."

"It was sure to be just as beautiful as ever," Miss Lucy said. "She never failed in her mind as she gained in years."

"She had a gifted mind," rejoined Miss Salome.

"I am never going to rest until I find that letter," declared Susan.

The three searched for that last letter from Miss Lavinia's gently gifted pen as they might have searched for the last MS. of some famous author or musician. They ransacked chests and boxes and bureau-drawers. They even mounted to the garret, where it was almost inconceivable that Miss Lavinia could have climbed, for her limbs had been feeble in her latter days. They looked through the old hair trunks, and unearthed files of letters written by hands long since dust, but Miss Lavinia's was not among them.

At last they gave up the search. "As far as I am concerned I would give every line that was ever written by any author, even Shakspere and John Milton, if I could find dear sister Lavinia's last letter," said Miss Lucy. She said it standing in the south doorway one morning in May, and Miss Salome and Susan were with her; they had just come down from the garret.

"I don't believe that letter is in the house," said Miss Salome, knitting her forehead.

"I don't see how it ever got out of the house," Susan remarked, perplexedly. "Aunt Lavinia never stepped outdoors for months before she died, and old Mr. Pearson says she had not given him any letters to mail for a week, and she was at work on that last one only three days before she died."

Digitized by Google

Old Mr. Pearson was the man who did errands and odd jobs about the house for the May sisters. He was quite aged, but had a remarkable memory and was to be relied upon.

"If Mr. Pearson says so, she didn't, but it is very strange how that letter got out of the house," said Miss Salome.

Just then a boy raced past with a wild whoop, which made them all start. He jostled the bush of flowering almond at the gate, too, and shook off a rain of pink blossoms.

"Tommy Pellet is a very careless boy," said Miss Salome, quite severely.

"He is a very noisy boy," rejoined Miss Lucy, with even more severity. "I fear he has not very good home-training."

"If dear Aunt Lavinia sent that letter to anyone," said Susan, keeping to the subject of the lost letter, since her young nerves were not as easily disturbed by noisy boys as her aunts', "we should have heard of it by this time. It is almost a year since she died."

"That is true," returned Miss Lucy. "It is very strange."

"Well, it is not in the house," said

MISS SALOME HELD THE LETTER TENDERLY, LOOKING AT IT WITH TEARFUL EYES.

Digitized by Google

Miss Salome, "not even the fragments of it, and she could not have burnt it, for it was summer-time and no fire in her room, and she had not been down in the kitchen for a week."

Miss Lavinia's last letter remained a mystery for many years. Susan married Ephraim Brewster, and went to Grover to live. The two sisters, Salome and Lucy, were left alone in the May homestead, with their old servant woman. They never ceased regretting the loss of their sister Lavinia's last letter. Every now or then one or the other would start up suddenly, drop her work, and hasten to search in some new place which she had just thought of; but the letter was never there.

"It would not surprise me at all if that had been the most beautiful letter she ever wrote," Lucy would often say, and Salome would nod in sorrowful acquiescence.

On Christmas Day, when Susan had been married about ten years, she came over unexpectedly with her little daughter Lavinia, driving herself. Ephraim Brewster owned a white horse and chaise, but he expected to be forced to sell it before long. He had met with heavy reverses; there was a mortgage on his house in Grover, which was to be foreclosed shortly. Poor Susan had been depressed for a long time; but that day she looked radiant, as she lifted little Lavinia out of the chaise, and turned to greet her aunts.

"Yes, it is a beautiful day; and we are both well," said she, hurriedly. "Come into the house quick, both of you, and don't let's stop a minute. I have something to tell you."

The two old aunts followed her wonderingly, for she was evidently agitated, though the look of joy never left her face.

"I don't suppose anything dreadful has happened; you look so pleased," Miss Salome said, tremblingly.

"No, and nothing dreadful is going to happen, thanks to dear Aunt Lavinia, and this," returned Susan, half-laughing and half-crying as she pulled an ancient and yellow letter from her pocket. "O Aunt Salome, O Aunt Lucy, here is the last letter!"

"Lavinia's last letter?" gasped Miss Salome.

"That letter we have always searched for?" Miss Lucy, said, faintly.

"Yes, her last letter, dear Aunt Lavinia's last letter. O Aunt Lucy, sit down in the rocking-chair—quick; don't faint away!"

"I am not going to faint," Miss Lucy affirmed, stoutly, though she sank into the rocking-chair with a very pale face. "No, dear, I don't want the camphor," said she, when little Lavinia had brought it from the chimney cupboard, at her mother's direction. "Tell me how you came to find it—quick, Susan!"

Miss Salome held the letter tenderly, looking at it with tearful eyes.

"Dear Lavinia, it is her handwriting after all these years," she said; but how came it to be mailed now, with a Lincoln, Nebraska, postmark on it; and here is a New York postmark, too, and a Grover, and it is directed to Sister Dorcas. I don't understand this, Susan."

"Well, it was this way," said Susan. "I will tell it as quick as I can. It is like a story. Nobody would believe it had happened, if it had not happened. We wouldn't believe it if it had happened to anybody else. You see, Aunt Lavinia wrote this letter over ten years ago, just before she died, to Aunt Dorcas in New York; and she opened her window one day when Tommy Pellet was racing by—you remember how he used to race by—and she asked him to post it for her. She was a little secret about that letter, because of something she wrote in it; and she didn't want to give it to old Mr. Pearson to post, and she didn't want us to know anything about it. So she hailed Tommy, and asked him if he was going to the post-office, and gave it to him.

"Well, Tommy Pearson didn't post it; he put it in his pocket; and when he got to the post-office, it wasn't there. He was frightened when he discovered it was gone; and went back and searched for it along the road; but he couldn't find it. He had a struggle between his conscience, which ordered him to go at once to Aunt Lavinia and tell her all about it, and his fear, which instructed him to keep quiet about it and not be blamed, and his fear got the better of him. He never said anything about the letter; and I guess he raced faster than ever when he passed our house after that.

"Well, you remember the Pellets moved to Lincoln, Nebraska, a year or so after Aunt Lavinia died, and Tommy with them. He is grown up now, and a clerk in a drug store, and is going to be married this fall. Two weeks ago his mother and the young lady he is going to marry found this letter in the lining of his old jacket, which they were cutting up to make a braided rug for the new home. It had slipped through a hole in the pocket, between the jacket and the lining, and there it remained all these years. Tommy stopped wearing the jacket soon afterwards, because it had grown so tight for him, and his mother kept it to make a rug, and never got round to it till now."

Digitized by Google

"Mrs. Pellet was always a slow-moving woman," remarked Miss Lucy, quiveringly.

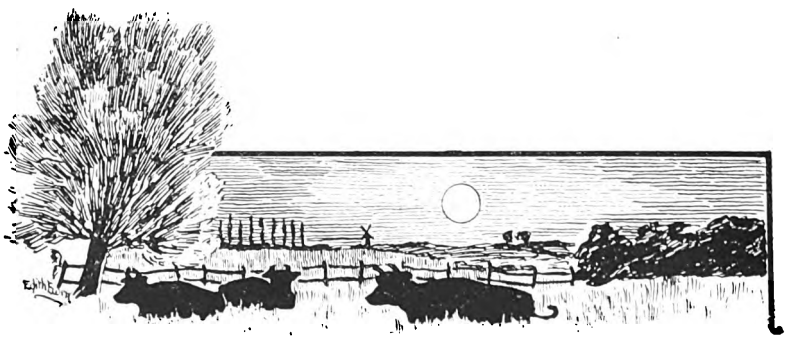
"When she found the letter," continued Susan, "she asked Tommy about it, and he remembered at once. I think it had troubled him some at the time. He wrote a very nice letter about it in which he says that one reason why he was glad to move to Nebraska was that he would not be taken to task for losing that letter. It is quite ridiculous that he should have been so scared."

"Especially of dear Lavinia, who was so mild," said Miss Salome. "Go on, Susan."

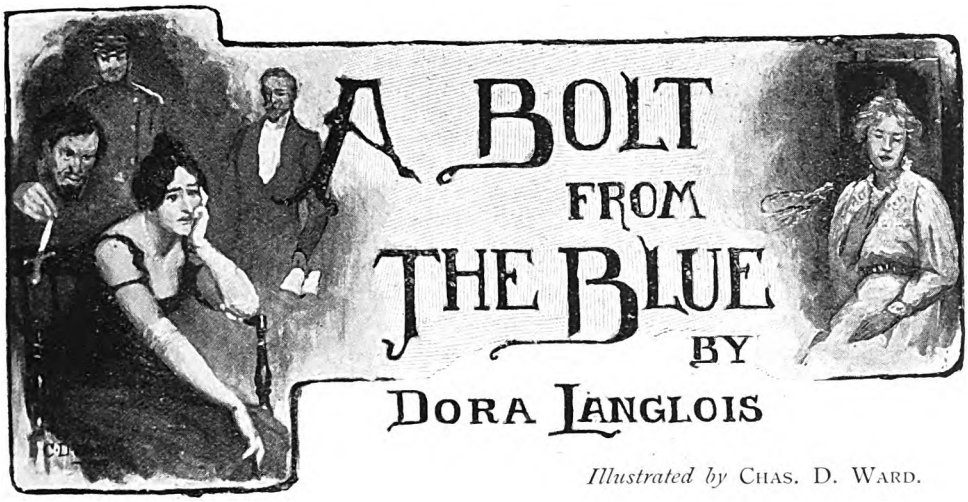
"Well, Tommy had the letter forwarded at once, just as it was—old seal, and folded paper, and all. Luckily, it was not injured, through his giving up wearing the jacket so soon after losing it. And luckily, Aunt Dorcas had not moved from her New York address in all these years, and she was coming to visit me, you know; and she came right on last night, and she brought the letter because it is about me, it is about me, you know. O dear Aunt Lavinia! O dear Aunt Lavinia!"

Susan could scarcely speak for her happy tears, but she went on to tell the rest. "It was all about some money that she had saved up from her little income for years, and hidden away in a secret place at the back of her desk," she said; "and—she—wanted me to have it for my wedding present; and she was afraid if anything happened to her suddenly—and it seems the doctor had told her there might—that no one would ever find it. So she wrote to Aunt Dorcas, because she thought it would not hurt her so much to know the truth about her illness, as it would us who were right here with her, and she wanted to be sure I had it. She didn't want to make her will—she never liked the idea of making a will; and she wanted the money to be a surprise, and so she took this way."

"And—and," went on Susan, "you know I had dear Aunt Lavinia's desk, and—I—looked—and there was the money—a little over five hundred dollars; and it is enough to pay the back taxes and interest, and we can keep the house; and—and I am so thankful that dear Aunt Lavinia's last letter was lost until now!"



Digitized by Google



A BOLT FROM THE BLUE

BY

DORA LANGLOIS

Illustrated by CHAS. D. WARD.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Frank Osborne, a rich man with socialistic ideas, has become entangled with a certain Helga Katiskoff, who passes for a widow. His sister Maria and his cousin Eva are in Paris with him at the time. Eva is in love with Frank herself, but stifles her feelings, and endeavours to help him with Helga, who is avoided by persons in good society. Though Frank does not know it, Helga's husband is still alive, in an inebriates' home. She herself is a member of a formidable secret society, and has in the past plotted against Russia for the liberation of Poland.

The members of the society look upon her entanglement with Frank Osborne with dislike, as in case of marriage she would be lost to them. Osborne has already gone through a form of marriage with her, when anonymous communications are made to him concerning her past, which lead him to leave her. Helga drifts into further conspiracies with the secret society. Frank, while in England, hears she is in St. Petersburg, and, guessing that she must be in imminent personal danger there, all his love returns, and he desires to rescue her. Arriving at St. Petersburg, he finds his fears partly realised.

CHAPTER IX.

THE strains of a waltz were floating through the Duchess Maya's salon and her brother, General Ivan Bazaroff, danced with one of the most distinguished women in the room. But his countenance was dull; he moved mechanically. There was no light in his small deep-set eyes under the heavy Muscovite brow. Suddenly a very graceful couple passed him—a young Livonian officer in a white uniform and a fair woman in a flame-coloured gown. And as they glided by General Bazaroff ceased to keep step with the music.

"La belle Anglaise encore!" murmured his partner to herself. "Nevertheless, to lose the beat is almost a crime," and she signed to her partner to desist.

The music ceased presently, and the young Livonian was preparing to make himself agreeable to his beautiful partner when he suddenly found his superior officer at his elbow.

"Permit me, Lieutenant. Lady Emilia, the next is ours, I believe."

The youthful officer gave way at once. He was too thoroughly Russian to oppose the desires of a superior, and the latter, as he bore the fair dancer away on his arm, whispered:

"You are late. I thought you intended to break your promise."

"I never break a promise," was the languid reply. "I never need to, for I do not promise those things which are likely to incommode me. I told you that if I came I would dance with you. I am here. You have my programme; I am, therefore, better than my word."

"Your promise was to dance with me, but you gave the first dance to that youth Vasaleich."

"Yes, I gave him the first dance, to you I give the second, and when I have danced with you as I promised I shall return home. Venez dansons!" and as she spoke she raised her left hand to his shoulder.

Digitized by Google

The contact of that shapely hand seemed to soothe his irritation. He placed his arm about her and together they glided out among the other dancers.

To dance badly with Lady Emilia as a partner was almost impossible. With his arm about her supple form he could have waltzed into the Mohammedans' seventh heaven of delight; but she who had come there ostensibly to dance was soon tired, drew her right hand from his, and fell back upon his arm.

"I have fatigued you very quickly," he said. "You finished your dance with Vasaleich."

"I always dance a dance out when I do not wish my partner to talk to me," she answered.

There was something masterful in the calm insolence of the woman. She could irritate or soothe, humiliate or flatter her victims at will. Her partner's subjugation was complete. He would have preferred to dance, but he complied with her will as though she had conceded him some special favour.

"You will let me talk to you, then? You will not assume that cold mien which inflicts tortures? You will not listen with your eyes far away and your lips half-curled?"

"No; I will listen attentively. Tell me, is it true that Tourganoff is dead?"

She spoke placidly, as though discussing some trivial piece of gossip, but the man beside her turned an ugly, chalky white.

"In your own house," he said, in a low voice, "I will tell you anything; but here——"

"In my own house? Ah, yes, I have heard many things already in my own house. I dreamt of a man with courage and devotion enough to tell me here."

"Courage and devotion! I have already placed my life in your hands."

"No woman was ever loved whose lover would not do that."

There was a slight pause, then she raised her eyes to his and said—

"No, no, it does not matter. You have not the nerve. The other will tell me all I wish to know."

Perhaps the mention of a rival fired him and piqued his vanity; perhaps the thought that another had been more imprudent than himself inspired him with confidence, for in the Russian bureaucracy faults which are general are never inquired into, and the man who has a brother in iniquity has an ally.

"I will tell you myself," he answered, half-defiantly. "What you have heard is true."

"How did he die?"

"Acute indigestion," he answered, looking straight into her eyes. "The soup he ate disagreed with him."

"That was on the recent journey to Moscow, was it not?"

"Yes, it happened in the Imperial car."

"And the cooks?"

"Oh, some of them have gone to study cookery in another part of his Majesty's realm. The four who were on the spot—the cook, his assistant, and two waiters—will not need to study or practice their calling any more."

"The poll-tax does not affect them then, I suppose?" she said, with a low laugh that covered a slight shudder.

"It does not affect them."

"Was there a woman among the number?"

"There was no woman upon the spot, but I hear that a woman has been arrested."

"Do you think she knew before her arrest that the plan had failed, and why it failed?"

He shrugged his shoulders. "All who knew that there had been an attempt must have known that it failed, but only the four conspirators who were on the spot knew why."

"Are you absolutely certain of that?" she demanded, regarding him under half-veiled lids and swaying her fan slowly to and fro. It wafted subtle perfumes from her bosom which intoxicated him, and feverishly eager to please her, he responded:

"I am absolutely certain. You have in your language a proverb which explains why those men told no tales on the arrival at Moscow."

In spite of herself a slight exclamation of horror escaped her.

"What!" she said. "Was it—would it have been so soon?"

"The thing was imperative," he answered, unconscious that he had shocked her. "There were, by good fortune, only those four present, and one other, a young officer, who were not already in the secret. Unfortunately, one of the attachés (an impulsive man) cried out in a loud voice when he saw the unfortunate victim fall back: 'Alas! Tourganoff is dead!' It was therefore necessary to deal with them at once."

Digitized by Google

"But these men, though they were on the spot, may have been innocent."

"Appearances were against them. At any rate, they had heard that terrible cry. They knew too much. Therefore the four responsible for that meal——"

"Were shot down, you say?"

"No; there was no noise. They were held, their hands behind them, and he who was highest in rank did what was necessary."

"Good Heavens! But the arrival at Moscow, the Imperial car a slaughter-house?"

"It was no such thing. The large wicker baskets which contained the provisions were emptied, their contents thrown on the line, where they would quickly disappear; and that which had been done was in that way concealed for removal at the end of the journey. Tourganoff's uniform, his decorations and everything else were removed, and he was re-dressed in plain clothes. He for whom the catastrophe was planned had journeyed in the preliminary train to Moscow. He was waiting as usual in the ante-room at the terminus set apart for him. He was sent for quietly, and came wearing Tourganoff's cloak, accompanied by the Court physician, who knew all. There was a little delay, and then he appeared in uniform, followed by the bearers who carried poor Tourganoff's dead body, and the doctor, who told the populace that the valet had just died of heart disease on presenting himself to his master."

"You spoke of a young officer. What of him?"

"He was thought to be above suspicion; he was of high rank, and opinions on the necessity of the case were divided. Eventually it was agreed that he should pass the rest of the journey with a dagger at his breast. On the arrival of the Czar he was removed in a closed carriage to the Kremlin. So far the world has seen and heard nothing further of him."

"Nor ever will, I suppose?"

"I cannot tell. It is a matter for the Czar's clemency. In a few years, when he has had time to reflect on the joys of freedom and favour, and the bitterness of an early death or life-long imprisonment, he may reappear. Some high and lucrative post may possibly be found for him."

"But this woman, who interests me more than all the others, what is her fate to be?"

"I do not know what has been decided. I only know that a woman has been arrested."

"What was this woman like? Was she dark?"

"Yes."

"About my height and build?"

"I do not know; she may have been at your age."

Now Lady Emilia knew well that she was looking for a person younger than herself; under such circumstances a man would have mentally decided that he was off the scent; she, however, figured the thing out—allowed something for the Muscovite's gallantry, something for his imagination; and a great deal to her maid's abilities, and, coming to the conclusion that there was no need to think herself on the wrong track as yet, demanded—

"Was this woman beautiful?"

"I tell you that she was dark. I know one type only of beauty, and one only perfect specimen of that type."

Lady Emilia was in no mood for trifling. "Did other men consider her beautiful?" she asked.

"I believe so. She ranked as a Court beauty in her time; but her husband was not enthusiastic."

"He was a Russian, was he not?"

"Yes, of Kassan, the Tartar blood; and she was a Pole."

It seemed to Lady Emilia that she was hot on the scent now. "Among those who were devoted to her there was one who was specially favoured, was there not?" she asked.

The Muscovite General started. "Yes," he answered, "there was certainly one. Have you by chance heard that story?"

She did not answer his question, but continued: "As she did not know the secret, would she meet with the same fate as the four you have mentioned?"

Her eyes had set into a hard, almost cruel, line, and her companion, regarding her, asked himself: "Does she wish to have it so?"

"Must I repeat my question?" she demanded, irritably.

"No, no," he answered. "I was only wondering if you took an interest in the husband; but of course not. That is ridiculous. It was too long ago—before you came to Russia in fact."

Digitized by Google

"What was long ago?"

"The trouble between her and her husband. He loved madly a very beautiful woman, they say, and forgive me—I find it hard to believe that there are really other beautiful women—for the moment I was in an agony though he is dead."

Lady Emilia favoured him with one of her haughtiest glances. "I don't understand you, General Bazaroff," she said, "but since you cannot tell me anything about this woman's fate——"

The unfortunate soldier caught her hand with a gesture of despair.

"I assure you, I swear to you by all the saints, that what I do not know I am willing to risk life itself to learn for you," he exclaimed.

"Then you think you could find out what has become of this woman?"

"Yes, yes; it would be difficult, dangerous, but I would do it. I would do it if——"

"If what?"

"If I might come to your drawing-room and tell you there."

"Can you doubt that one who served me thus would be welcome?" She met his eyes with one of those flashing glances which implied so much, and meant so very little; a shaft from the armoury of a beautiful woman no longer young; the kind of weapon which only a woman who has left her youth behind her knows how to use.

"Come," she said, "the music has changed. I have kept this dance for you as a reward. We will dance it out together; and then you shall take me to my carriage."

CHAPTER X.

The small hours that Lady Emilia spent in the crowded ballroom were passed in a sort of aimless fever by Osborne. He could not rest in his hotel. He was oppressed, stifled, and as a relief wandered out into the night. There was nothing in this great, gloomy city with its straight, wide prospects, its treeless wastes of open streets to remind him of Paris, with its music, its twinkling lights, its gaiety, and flower-perfumed air. Yet it did remind him with a bitter pang of that time when, having put the object of his master passion from him, he had walked the Boulevards till the dawn came and snuffed the candles of the night.

Only a little time, such a little time, since her white arms lay about his neck, and now—she had followed along that path down which she had sent her lover. He shuddered and tried to turn his attention to the objects around him.

It was a useless effort. Everything he noted brought him back to her, or to the mighty discontent of the huge misgoverned Empire. The Winter Palace frowning down on him recalled the sufferings of the hordes of workmen whose lives were sacrificed that an Emperor might flatter his vanity by rebuilding his fire-demolished palace in a year.

The night to him seemed full of horrors. Its sights and sounds were worse company than his own loneliness, and he fled from them back to his hotel, to spend the hours that followed in feverish, unrefreshing sleep.

It was late when he woke, and his servant, entering in answer to his summons, said—

"There is a young person waiting, sir, with a letter for you, but she would not leave it, she preferred to give it to you herself."

"Has she been waiting long?" he asked, as he commenced to dress hurriedly.

"No, not more than twenty minutes, sir," was the reply.

As soon as his valet had finished his offices, Osborne entered the other apartment, to find a neat young Englishwoman sitting at the window.

"My mistress sent you this, sir," she said, holding out an elegant little envelope. "She said I was to see you got it, so I took the liberty of waiting. There is no answer, but my mistress told me to say she would be glad to see you this evening at her usual hour."

Osborne took the apple-green envelope, and, as the girl left the room, tore it, and extracted another envelope, across which was written, in the same bold hand as the address, four words only:

"A present from Herodias."

"Herodias!" he muttered in bewilderment. "Herodias? Ah, it is from Lady Emilia, the answer to my questions. She implies that what she sends me is worth a man's head."

A strong disinclination to open the letter had seized him, together with a sense of oppressive guilt, as though, in his extremity he had been the accomplice of a breach of faith.

Digitized by Google

"No, no," he said at last, "I must not hesitate now. God knows that, not even for Helga's sake, would I have had hand or part in seducing an honest man from his duty. But this fellow, whoever he may be, was dishonest already. In his amorous desires he had already babbled State secrets. Such men deserve to be used as the unclean tools they are, though they soil the hand that touches them." His fingers trembled so that he could hardly open the second cover; but when he had mastered himself sufficiently to do so he found it to contain a thin sheet of unstamped paper, bearing what appeared to be a type-written copy of some official document, translated into the French language. This was what he read:

"Alexis Helga Petrona Lavinski, aged thirty-five.

"Native of Warsaw, Poland.

"Widow of Count Joseph Lavinski, of Kassan.

"Height—5ft. 5in.

"Complexion dark, skin pale, eyes large and dark; hair abundant, turning grey; hands and feet small; bearing imperious.

"Accused of disseminating Nihilistic literature, and suspected of complicity in l'affaire Tourganoff.

"Arrested on August 14th, 1892.

"Condemned on the first charge to perpetual banishment.

"Departed on the 15th for Vitinsk, Siberia.

"Route—Totma, Tcherdin, and Troitsk.

"Destined occupation—Labour at the mines.

"Note.—The prisoner Lavinski, sentenced to administrative exile, is not to be deported to the penal settlement at Moscow, nor allowed intercourse with others not concerned in this particular affair. She, together with suspects mentioned in schedule 961, will travel by special route. Coaches will be used till the frontier is passed, from which point the march will commence. The journey to the frontier is to be accomplished as quickly as possible."

Osborne sat with the paper before him gazing almost stupidly into space; every detail seemed to suggest that Helga and the convict Countess Lavinski were one and the same person. The age alone did not tally with his preconceived idea that she should not be more than thirty-three; but, after all, a woman's age is always doubtful, and she had never definitely told him hers.

She was living then! She had started on that desolate journey which she herself had once described to him so graphically. There seemed to him no possible doubt as to his duty. He must follow her into exile—follow her and guard her from some, at least, of the horrors and dangers of the way, for, before God and his own conscience, was she not his wife?

He had left her that he might put far from him the snare of a debasing passion; but she was his—his, and he must guard her from the brutalised directors of the weary march.

She was more guilty now than when he put her away from him. Yes, but from this guilt he himself might have saved her. He could no longer bring her into safety, and then place a barrier between them. No, if he followed her into exile, it would be with the full knowledge that she would regain that supremacy, rather than submit to which he had made the last twelve months of his life one hideous nightmare of unsatisfied longing.

But yesterday he had told Lady Emilia that there was no personal element in the affair, and, blind fool! had spoken in good faith; to meet to-day such a revelation of himself as this! If it was so, indeed, if all this outcry of responsibility meant only the gratification, at all costs, of a passion for one who had lost his respect, then he would not go.

The paper he had cast down with a curse on his own weakness, he had lifted again mechanically, and the date caught his eye.

Departed for Vitinsk. August 15th! Oh, God! She had been arrested on the very day on which he left St. Petersburg, satisfied that all was well; she had been condemned, and had started the following day. His journey home had not been a hurried one, it had occupied a full week—one day at home, four in returning, another passed since his arrival. She had, therefore, been on the road already almost two weeks, and, as the first part of the journey was to be accomplished in coaches, and with all speed, she must now be well across the frontier.

He sprang up with an impulse to follow her at once, only to sink back with a groan at his own helplessness. Siberia is not

Digitized by Google

North Britain; to take even the few first versts of the journey he must have a passport; to hope to accomplish the whole of it, not only that, but strong letters of recommendation also. Where and how were they to be procured?

"From Lady Emilia?" No, for some reason, which he did not dare to examine too closely, he felt that she would not raise a finger to make this voluntary exile possible.

Tears—tears of impatience and hopelessness—rose to his eyes; he scorned himself that he sat there idly weeping when his duty lay in action.

"I beg your pardon, sir. If you propose to go out this evening, had you not better dine? It is getting late."

"Late?" Osborne turned a dull, blank countenance on his man-servant. Was it possible that hours had passed while he sat there with the papers before him. "Yes, yes," he added, "I will do what you like; it does not matter."

After the services she had rendered him, a request from Lady Emilia was virtually a command. He must go to her, though she was the last person on earth he wished to encounter. There was on him a great desire to be alone with Eva; he had always valued her sympathy and affection, but he had never known what it was to miss both till this hour.

With a sigh, he resigned himself to his valet's offices, and at nine o'clock he was on his way to Lady Emilia's hotel.

Arrived there, he found himself among a crowd of other guests, while her apparent unconsciousness of his presence was sufficient rebuke for his presumption in having supposed himself singled out for a private interview.

He had begun to think that he might slip away unnoticed, and convey her his thanks by letter, when she suddenly turned towards him.

"What a pity," she said, speaking sufficiently loud to be heard by all about them, "that my friend, Count Kapotski, is not here to-night. I wanted to make you known to each other. You would have been delighted, he is such an excellent sportsman."

Osborne bowed, and murmured his thanks, though he was unconscious of any desire to meet the Count, and profoundly ignorant of any reason why he should desire such a thing.

"He has hunted and shot in all parts of the world," Lady Emilia continued, "but he still has a high opinion of Siberian sport."

Again Osborne bowed; courtesy restrained him from making the comment that the Count's opinions were of no interest to him. Her next remark, however, startled him, and seemed to make the Count's views of greater value.

"He says that to an English sportsman ready to rough it a little, the experiences of a Siberian tour should be delightful and unique. If you go to his hotel, near the Gostinnoi Dvor, to-morrow, Mr. Osborne, he will give you advice as to the outfit you require."

"As to my outfit?" Osborne echoed, faintly, his eyes seeking an explanation from her in vague bewilderment.

"Yes, as to your outfit. I know no one better able to advise you."

Then she turned to some of the men who stood round her, and said: "Mr. Osborne is one of the keenest of our national sportsmen"—which, by the way, was entirely a flight of her imagination—"and he is going to see how you do things in the land of the wolf and the bear. I expect him to bring me back some marvellous skins; and, at the same time, he is to visit, on this pleasure trip of his, some of your Siberian marvels—the mines near Vitinsk, for instance. When he returns he ought to have a budget of adventures to give us. Perhaps—who knows?—he may meet a convict train, or be chased across the plains by a pack of wolves. There is ample scope for all sorts of excitement in this proposed journey."

Her long speech had given Osborne time to recover his self-command; and he said meaningly:—

"I have not my passport yet, Lady Emilia."

"Oh, that is all arranged," she answered. "I obtained the necessary papers for you to-day. You will find them on the escritoire in the little salon. You have only to present them in person at the nearest bureau of police, and get them countersigned. Go and take them, Mr. Osborne, for yourself."

She raised her little jewelled hand, and pointed to the inner room; then immediately turned away, and tapped the arm of one of her admirers, to attract his attention to something she had to say.

As though in a dream, Osborne passed through the curtains, and took up an official envelope, open, but addressed to himself. It contained a paper, signed by a high official, recommending him, Francis Osborne, to the good offices of the Governors of Totma, Tcherdin, Troitsh, and Vitinsk, as also to those of the heads of all Government stations en route. With this invaluable paper were two others—one calling upon the Director of the Mines at Vitinsk to permit him to visit them, should he so desire; the other a brief note to the Chief of Police in the district in which his hotel was situated, desiring that official to make out bearer's passport without undue delay.

Digitized by Google

He stood with the papers in his hand like a man transformed; his gladness, his immense relief at having the way smoothed for him, and the first step taken and over, only marred by an inward shame at the recollection that he had imputed some sort of unnamed motive to Lady Emilia, which would lead her to hinder and restrain him.

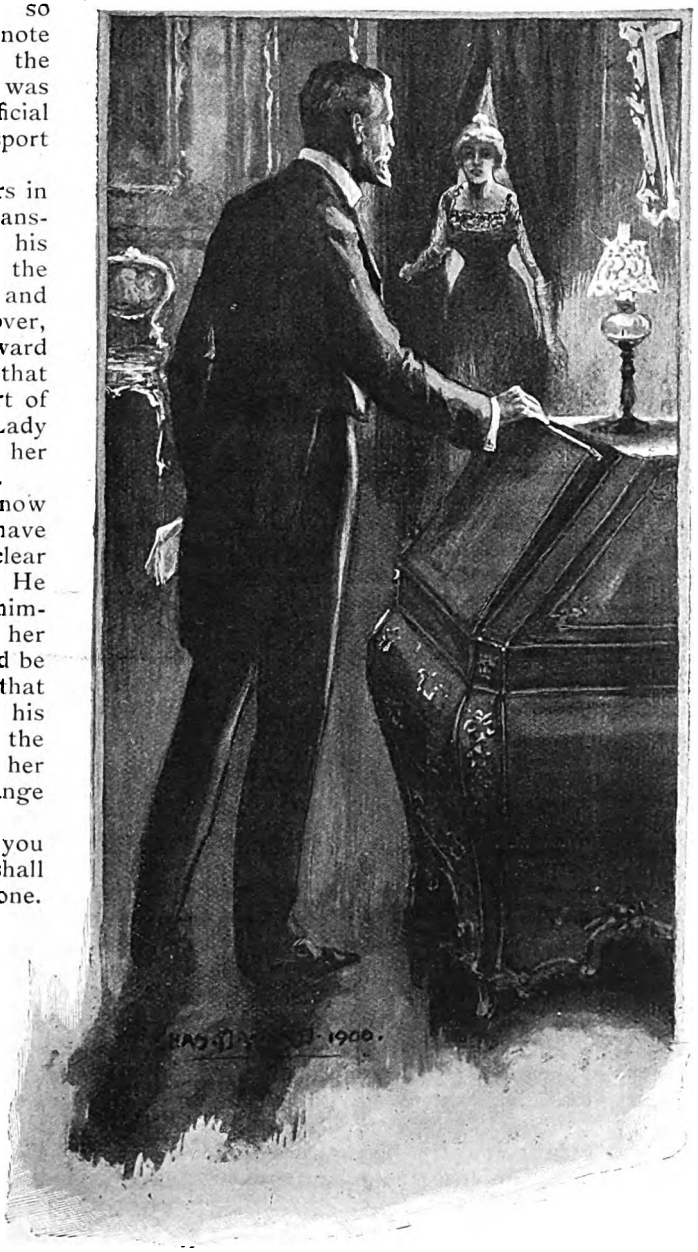
He did not wish to know what that motive might have seemed; it was quite clear that it had never existed. He felt an impulse to throw himself at her feet and crave her pardon; but to do so would be to insult her; and, with that impulse on him, he raised his eyes to see her standing in the curtains, her eyes humid, her face aglow with a strange light.

"I have come to bid you good-bye," she said. "I shall see you again, but never alone. It is good-bye now."

"I can say nothing," he answered, "but that I thank you from my heart for what you have done for me."

"And I you," she answered. "I am only returning a service. I shall go on in the same way to the end of the chapter, and the world will know no difference; but there will be one. I have at last seen one human creature who is not self-centred. I have learnt to believe in the possibility of that which I have wholly doubted—an eternal principle of good springing somewhere in our nature."

"No, no!" he cried, in acute self-abasement. "If you think you have seen that in me, God only knows how much you are mistaken!"



HE RAISED HIS EYES TO SEE HER STANDING IN THE CURTAINS.

Digitized by Google

"Hush! Let me think so still," she said. "It is the only thing I gain by that which has cost me something. And now, good-bye."

She gave him her hand. For a moment he could not answer her, and so they parted.

———

CHAPTER XI.

Six weary weeks had passed, and Osborne was in Northern Siberia, having left the last city of any note, Tcherdin, behind him.

Count Kapotski had been as good as his word, and had helped him to buy a hunting outfit (which he did not require), had advised him to travel as far as the frontier in the ordinary boat-shaped and hooded carriages to be hired at the posting houses; had recommended him to a jobber in Totma who would furnish him with a couple of horses and a sleigh for the snow-covered northern roads; and, best of all, had found for him a dvornik, or porter, who knew something of the localities to be visited, and who spoke a peculiar polyglot language composed of English, French, and German.

This man, Nichol Ivanovitch, was very servile, very dirty, very, very ragged; but he had a good-humoured smile, and could not only make himself intelligible to Osborne, but act as interpreter for him; so he concluded to take him at his own figure (probably about twice as much as he had expected to get), and, after fitting him out in brand new garments, started with him.

When they left St. Petersburg, though it was still August, there was a suggestion of October in the air; but for the past three weeks they had been surrounded always by the snow. Osborne so far had had no adventures, but innumerable annoyances. He was forced to delay himself to shoot with parties of young officials who insisted on showing him some sport. He was never able to go direct to the subject, but lost much time in making casual inquiries as to the convicts ahead of him. As far as he could gather he was steadily gaining on them; but the shooting excursions necessary to give colour to his journey constantly made him lose the advantages he seemed to gain.

Then at Tcherdin Nichol's clothing mysteriously vanished, and he again appeared in the motley rags and the awful boots tied on with string and stuffed at the cracked toes with straw, which his employer had meant him to discard. Osborne, of course, felt confident that the man had sold them, though he swore by all the saints that he had "only sent the good things back to his wife that the journey might not spoil them." So for the rest of the way the unhappy Englishman had to stand the smell of the filthy rags blown into his nostrils with the cold wind that beat on their faces.

His sense of smell was a very curse to him, for now they had to put up at night either at some little police depôt or in some peasant's hovel en route, and lying at night wrapped in rugs on the top of the stoves (bed-places in the wall over the hot iron plates), the black beetles put him into a very agony, crawling over his uncovered face and hands, and poisoning the air with their atrocious odour.

Still he pushed on, now thinking of the woman who was enduring all this and more, now dreaming vaguely for hours of home and Eva.

At last he heard by chance that the convicts were but four days' march ahead of him, that they had made a certain detour in order to leave those who were not destined for Vitinsk, and he found that, by taking another and more direct route, he might, as it were, head them off.

He decided to try it, drove like mad all the day, struck the main route at a little village, heard that the convicts had passed through an hour ago, and were certain to put up at a police settlement some five miles further on; pushed forward again with his tired horses, and at last drove into a little compound just as certain officers were dismounting and giving orders relative to the disposal of four weary, wretched human creatures chained together by their ankles. Osborne turned sick at the sight, and hardly dared to look at them, but the first direct glance he threw in their direction showed him that they were all men.

He could not ask any questions, but produced his papers automatically, responded to the officers' compliments and offers of hospitality as best he could, and then caught his breath with a gasp that almost betrayed him when one of them remarked:

"We must be grateful for the delay, sir, which gives us the pleasure of having been overtaken by you. A woman, one of the gang, fell sick three days ago. We waited a little for her, but she could not go on, and we left her behind."

Digitized by Google

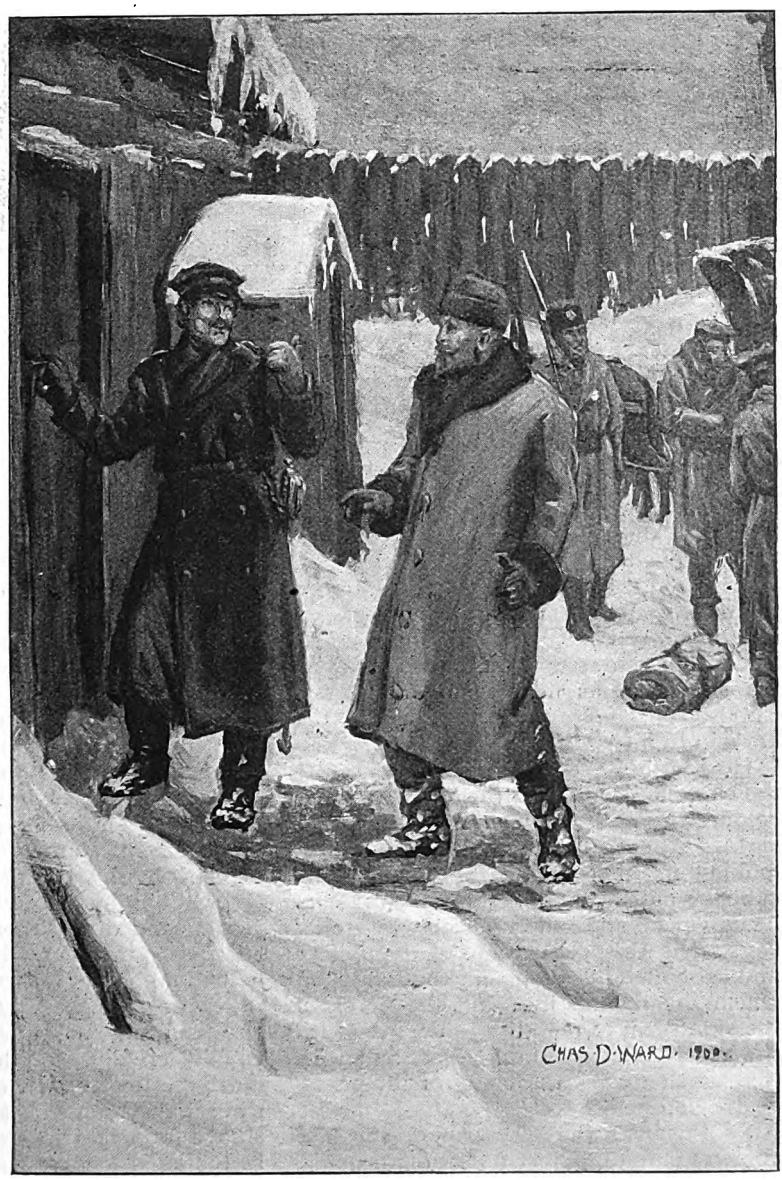
"Left her! Where?"

"At the third settlement from here on the high road. You must have passed it. These convicts are annoying beasts. If she is alive when we return we shall be forced to make all the journey again on her account. But come in. Come to the stove. You look frozen."

No man may follow the impulses of his nature in Russia. Therefore, Osborne, who would have given pounds to turn his horses' heads at once, was forced to remain, to play cards, to drink with these Muscovites, to listen to their heartless references to their "gang," and it was not till the following morning, when he had waved a last farewell to the cheerful officers, and taken one last shuddering glance at the poor chained wretches whom they surrounded, that he felt himself a free agent once more.



HE CAUGHT HIS BREATH WITH A GASP THAT ALMOST BETRAYED HIM . . . "LEFT HER! WHERE?"

"Where to, Excellency?" asked his moujik. "Do you shoot to-day?"

"No, no," Osborne retorted. "Back along the high road, Nichol. I hear that by changing our route I have missed something I wanted to see. Get me to the third settlement from here by to-night, and I will give you five roubles for yourself."

With a slight shrug of the shoulders Nichol commenced to prepare for a start, and in half an hour they were again en route over the snow, with the sleigh-bells jangling in their ears. Those bells, so merry and mirthful as he had heard them at home, carrying suggestions of expeditions begun in hope, and ended in fireside comfort, seemed to Osborne utterly weary and discordant, jangling out for mile on mile, and dying away echoless over the unbroken plains of snow. To think was impossible, except to the pad of the horses' hoofs and the clash of the bells on the arch above their necks. They seemed to him to beat upon his brain till his very heart strove to amalgamate with them, and throb his pulses to their tune.

Digitized by Google

"Your high nobility."

Osborne started and looked down at the man sitting below him with his feet dangling over the edge of the sleigh, and those wonderful boots, at once a mystery and a torment to him, very near the ground.

"Yes, what is it?"

"There is smoke over the edge. Away there to your high nobility's right."

"The third police settlement, do you think?"

"What else? Is this not the high road? And where there is smoke on the high road there is always the police."

Osborne drew his breath hard. The snow made his eyes burn and ache, more than they had ever ached for the brightest sunshine at home, but he could dimly discern something that was not as white as the snow, nor as heavy and dun as the clouds, curling upwards against the horizon to his right.

He kept his eye upon it, and presently the chimneys, and then the roof of a slate-coloured grit-stone dwelling came in sight. About it clustered some mean-looking hovels, each with its inevitable cabbage-patch; and the plain, from its being cut up and rudely fenced with stone, suggested the cultivation of rye. Rye and cabbage and hemp oil, the things on which the moujik lives, till the pores of the skin seem to reek to the nostrils with the smell of their rankness; and with that smell always the clang of the peace-destroying bell.

So this was the place where she had come to end a life once full of the promise of all good things. Well, God knows best. Perhaps it was better so, than to drag on the weary burden of the flesh further along the road.

At the unexpected sound of their bell, a heavy-looking fellow, in shabby military attire, supplemented with articles of his own contriving, opened the door and frowned on them. The moujik was already bowing and gesticulating to him, greeting him as "little father," and informing him that "the great nobleman" who occupied the sleigh desired to be accommodated for the night by him.

So much Osborne gathered, because the formula, with its concomitant bows and shrugs, was already familiar to him.

"Papers!" The man advanced on him with a forbidding scowl, with which also he was familiar, for there is nothing in all the world to match the servility of the moujik but the arrogance of his equally low-born and ignorant brother the official.

"They are here."

Osborne handed them over, and waited while the man read them slowly and with difficulty.

"Put the horse in the shed, you," he said, "and tell his Excellency that he is welcome."

The man's hand was already on the door, but a terrible reaction, a spasm of cowardice, had seized on Osborne; he dreaded to follow him into the house. He had hardly mastered the feeling when the man turned round with a movement of suspicion, caught him roughly by the shoulder, dragged him to the track of his sleigh, indicated the plain across which it lay, tapped his papers excitedly, and then pointed to the other horizon.

Francis Osborne understood this rough pantomime at once, and such colour as the journey had left in his haggard cheeks fled from them in his consternation. The man's brain was the organ of a Muscovite official—he saw the absolute letter of his instructions and nothing more. He was recommended in those pages to give succour to the bearer en route to Vitinsk; he had no orders to harbour or assist him if returning. Would the man arrest him and send him back under escort, or almost equally cruelly send him on to the next large settlement there to wait two or three days to get his passport countersigned for a return—a return which might be too late?

He stood there dumb while the Muscovite poured on him a flood of suspicious questions and abuse; then suddenly he found his own moujik at his elbow.

"St. Nicholas and the holy stone! Was the little father angry with his Excellency?"

Digitized by Google

So much he understood, and then after a wild war of words, a torrent of salaams and shrugs, the official joined another who had just appeared, and the moujik smiled up at his superior with a smile of peculiar low cunning, and said :

"Your Excellency has been faithfully served. Your Excellency's servant shall drink many glasses of vodka to the success with which the beast of a policeman is fooled."

"What have you told him, then?"

"That we lost the road three hours ago in coming through the forest (that one over there, the tops of the trees of which make themselves seen); that we met a peasant who sent us back after pulling our sleigh out of a drift; that not two versts from here he may see the place where we came again to the high road."

"But if he should ride out to see?"

"Bah! It is too late; he will not leave the samovar to-night. Besides, I told him that your Excellency was generous and gave good gifts."

The official and his companion now rejoined them, and the latter spoke: "His Excellency is recommended, he can come in. There is a convict woman in there lying on the stove; but when his Excellency is anxious to sleep, we will turn her off on to the floor. She need not incommode him much."

This speech being translated to Osborne made him shudder, but he could not answer it or let the men know what he thought of the proposal; and it even struck him that to have no speech in this land was just as well for the safety of his body.

He had no time for further speculation, the door was open and they had entered an interior in no way unlike those to which he had become accustomed. The same stone floor and rough wooden furniture; the little window high up and dirty; the same foul hot air beating on his face as he entered; the same stove in the centre of the wall; the caps, craftans and accoutrements hanging from nails; nothing to give the place an individuality, and yet how different, how very different, for on the stove lying with her back towards them was a woman.

Her body was covered with sheepskins, her head with a coarse red kerchief of wool; from under it her long hair streamed. Turning grey, the official description said. Good Heavens! It was grey. His heart was beating against his ribs heavily; his voice was choked within his throat. He dared not go to her side to touch her, nor dare he even address her; but he kept his eye upon that heap crouched under the grey-looking sheepskins, convinced that the sound of his voice as he spoke to the men, and showed them some paper money, would rouse her. It did not; she never even stirred.

"Ask him if the woman sleeps?" Osborne said to his moujik, possessed with the awful fear that this lethargy, this utter lack of interest, must be death itself.

The Muscovite official shrugged his shoulders on understanding that the stranger took interest in such an unimportant matter; but, having seen the paper money, and no doubt wishing to oblige, walked to the stove and pulled the sheepskin from the woman's shoulder.

Osborne saw her draw it back again with a peevish gesture, but without turning or uttering a word.

She had forgotten his voice then? Well, no wonder; it sounded strangely even to himself—or was she half delirious?

It seemed to him that the dreary business of preparing the evening meal would never end. He looked round in an agony, wondering where these two men would sleep, and how he should get a few minutes' privacy to speak to her.

He noticed that they took her no food, and asked at length if she might not have a cup of broth?

"She sulks," was the reply. "She will not eat. His Excellency should not trouble himself, it was best to let her be."

"Offer it to her, nevertheless," he said.

Again the official, with an eye to the paper money, rose, and again he was repulsed with a peevish gesture.

A heavy hour passed after the meal, during which Osborne sat by, watching the men empty their little mugs of vodka and listening to their disjointed conversation; and at last one rose, stretched himself, turned for a moment to the ikon in the corner, and crossed himself.

"He goes out; is it not?" he demanded of the moujik.

"Yes, Excellency; his wife and he live in the next building."

"And the other, what does he say?"

"That we have eaten well and drunk well, and that the stove is the best place for men who have done their duty."

Digitized by Google

Osborne turned and watched the man. He had arranged the skins on the only other bed-place above the stove, and was now removing his outer garments (the only portion of a Muscovite's wardrobe which ever appears to come off his back until it drops off); Ivanovitch, the moujik, had arranged a spare rug for himself before the stove on the floor, and simultaneously the two advanced on the woman as though to lift her down.

Osborne sprang up. "For God's sake let her be!" he cried, in a voice so full of protest that it needed no translation.

The moujik fell back; the official muttered something to the effect that his Excellency must please himself, but that for his part he had slept on the stove all his life and could not change his habits now; and the woman, with an effort, roused herself and turned her face towards Osborne.

CHAPTER XII.

The light of the smoking-lamp fell on it, and Osborne saw a ghastly countenance, lighted by fever-brightened eyes, large and dark; the face of a woman who might have been fifty, a woman he had never seen before.

He dropped back into his chair, and covered his eyes with his hand; she had turned again to the wall, and all was silent until the heavy breathing of the two men told that they slept a vodka-sodden sleep.

Then he uncovered his eyes, to find that the woman was leaning on her elbow and regarding him intently.

"You came here to follow me?"

"Yes."

"I thought so. I do not know why, but I thought so. Yet you do not know my face?"

"I do not know it."

"From your face, I see," she continued, speaking in French, "that you have made a mistake. You are English; you have not come for the sake of the cause; you have no wrongs to revenge; it follows, then, that you seek some woman other than myself."

"You are the Countess Alexis Lavinski?"

"I was so called."

"I have been following the Countess Lavinski. I was deceived by the description of her personality, by her second name, Helga, and by the report of that which she had attempted."

"The deception has cost you a futile effort and much pains; yet you may thank God that it was but a deception—if you still believe in Him."

Osborne made no direct reply. He slipped his heavy boots from his feet, and advanced softly to her side.

"You would take nothing from those men," he said; "take something from me," and he handed her his wine-flask.

"Why build up my body for the mines?" she answered. "My life is finished; and yet no, I will have my strength again for a few hours. Give me what you have brought."

Looking closer into her face, and at the emaciated hand which took the flask from him, Osborne saw that there was no specific disease upon her, but that she was dying of starvation.

"My God!" he whispered. "Have they not given you food?"

"I have not taken it," was the simple reply.

He bent over her with a great horror and a great pity in his breast.

"You are tender to me," she said, "but your heart is naturally with that other. You would ask a hundred questions did not compassion make you silent."

"I would ask but one," he replied. "You told me just now to thank the God in Whom my faith is placed. I find it hard to do so before such a spectacle as this; besides, I know nothing, I have proved nothing, beyond the fact that she is not here."

"And you wish to know——?"

"If you were the only woman arrested for the recent attempt on the Czar's life?"

"Yes, the only one."

"Thank you," he said, gravely, and was moving softly away.

"My friend." He started; it was the first time that title of endearment had been given to him since he had heard it from Helga's lips. "My friend, your face speaks for you. You are still unsatisfied. What is it you would ask me?"

"No," he said. "My God! No. I cannot ask that other question! It would be too cruel."

"Ask it! Give me the happiness of serving you."

He hesitated a moment; but at last, unable to resist, he replied in a whisper as hoarse as her own: "You have told

Digitized by Google

THEN HE UNCOVERED HIS EYES TO FIND THAT THE WOMAN WAS . . . REGARDING HIM INTENTLY.

me that no other woman was arrested; if you could tell me that no other was—was——"

"Guilty?"

"That no other was concerned, then I should thank God indeed!"

For a moment she did not speak, he thought that a spasm of anger contracted her features. If so it passed in a moment and was gone. "Be of good cheer," she answered, "the guilt was mine. No other woman knew of it. Sleep to-night in peace, my friend. Sleep in peace—and since you pray—pray for me."

Osborne sank back into his chair by the table and spread his arms upon it. It seemed to him that this knowledge of Helga's innocence lifted a load so heavy from his heart that in its rebound it carried all before it. He could not shout his thanksgiving, but, weak as a woman, sobbed it out upon his folded arms into the stillness of the night.

CHAPTER XIII.

In the cool drawing-room of a pretty villa at Ventnor, Miss Osborne sat regarding an open letter, much as though it were some extraordinary geological or zoological specimen which had suddenly been presented to her notice.

It was from St. Petersburg, and had been posted by Osborne before his departure.

"My dear Maria," it ran. "Don't be alarmed at the budget of papers I enclose, they are merely instructions for my lawyer. I am contemplating a journey north, to visit the mines of Siberia; I may possibly return in three or four months, but as there are so many chances on the road, I am settling my affairs definitely in a way to meet every possible contingency. I have given directions to have a sum of two thousand pounds placed at once to my credit with Rega and Co., of St. Petersburg; and until you hear from me to the contrary I wish to have two hundred pounds paid over to them for me every quarter. Your pin money and the sum I have always handed you for housekeeping expenses will be paid over regularly as usual, on the distinct stipulation that the establishment is kept up in the same style and on the same lines as at present. The remainder of my income will be paid yearly to Eva, who will know what to do with it. If at the end of five years I have not returned (or earlier should you learn that the sums in Rega and Co.'s hands have begun to accumulate) I wish you to apply in Chancery to presume my death. You will then be able to act on my will, which in sum and substance is merely a definite disposal of my property much on these lines. I have nothing further to add except good-bye and God bless you. We have held different views on many subjects, and the difference has sometimes seemed to embitter our intercourse a little. I wish I could let you know how much I regret that bitterness now I am bidding you good-bye. Think as well of me as you can, Maria, and believe that there will always be a warm affection for you in the heart of your affectionate brother, F. OSBORNE."

Digitized by Google

"P.S.—Be kind to Eva. I have an unpleasant presentiment as regards her. Fancy, no doubt; yet it seems to me that there is some kind of trouble in store for her.—F. O."

"Well, of all the mad, ridiculous letters!" exclaimed Miss Osborne. "Pray, what does yours contain? Are you aware that Frank has broken out in a new vein? Forsooth, he is going to be a traveller now. He—— Upon my word, if the girl isn't crying."

Crying! That was a poor word for the passion of grief and despair which presented itself to Maria's astonished gaze. Well might Francis Osborne have that presentiment of which he spoke, the cause of which was hidden from him.

"What's the matter, my dear? What is the matter? Frank isn't going to die, because he sees fit to start on a journey and make his will."

"No, no, Maria; but what difference will that make to us if we never see him again? Oh! How shall we ever live without him?"

Miss Maria paused; it floated across her mind that she had managed to live some fourteen years very comfortably without him, and that the advent of her stepmother's "wretched baby" had not improved things for her, so she looked across at the weeping girl, and said: "Don't be ridiculous, Eva! You'll make yourself positively hideous for the garden party this afternoon," which was her way of being sympathetic, and a very common way to.

Eva sprang up and fled from the room, and Miss Osborne settled her cuffs and said: "Dear me! How provoking!" Though whether she meant her brother's letter, her cousin, or herself, she did not explain.

Poor Eva! In the room above she sat alone face to face with the problem she had just propounded, "How shall we ever live without him?" From the day when she first came to their home, a little black-robed orphan, with Maria's dreary platitudes on the duty of resignation ringing in her ears, and he, though ten years her senior, had entered into her feelings and surrounded her with a new sunshine of love, he had become all in all to her.

Gradually and naturally to himself, as the years passed by, he had changed his protective tenderness for the child into the affectionate friendship of comradeship, and it was not his fault that with her the change did not come about in the same way. A man whose nature is strong does not readily merge the love he can give a child into the sort of love he has to give to a wife; but with the opposite sex the reverence, the reliance, the hero-worship of childhood, insensibly drift into what might be, were it sought, the perfect love of wifehood.

She loved him, she loved him, and she could not live without him. Had he been happy, contented, married to Helga, or even to Lady Emilia, she could have accepted her fate. But how accept it now with his letter lying before her?

In the opening it told her only what Maria knew, but then in the full assurance of her ready sympathy, in utter ignorance of the source from which that sympathy sprang, it added the whole truth.

Digitized by Google

"I have written to Maria already and given her all these business details, but my last act before I set out is to write to you. Maria knows that I am about to travel and where I am going. You will know (when you hear that my destination is the Siberian mines) what I am doing and why I do it. I believe that I have found Helga, and I am about to follow her. If I find her, it will no longer be possible for me to bring her back to England and safety; therefore, in order to have some chance of protecting her where she is going, I shall, on finding her, apply to the Czar for permission to make her my wife. I wonder if you can understand the position, so that you do not regard me on the one hand as sacrificed, nor on the other hand fall into the belief that I did not know my own mind when I spoke to you? I might say that the legal obstacle to our marriage (uncertainty as to her husband's fate) has been removed. But that would be to make truth lie, for her husband's existence would only have postponed our union, it could never have separated us.

"There was a time when I could say, with the unhappy Moor: 'If Heaven had made me such another world, of one entire and perfect chrysolite, I'd not have given her for it.' That time, with all its glorious illusions, has passed, and yet in a way I love her quite as much as ever I did.

"I don't know why I tell you all this. I set out to write myself down perfectly happy and content, that your friendship might answer mine with the sentry's salute, 'All's well!' But even this well-meant deception is impossible. All is not well. The world has gone bitterly wrong with me. I would like to come home to peace and to you—to the calm life of our comradeship, of mutual endeavour, and to be done for ever with these feverish dreams.

"I have taken up one duty and left all the rest. For Heaven's sake, Eva, do not let my little vineyard go to ruin because I am not there to till it. You will always have enough for yourself. I give you my purse. Use it to buy me moral exemption, as it were. Never think of saving, though I know you will get many a lesson on extravagance. I seem to have but half a mind in anything I am doing just now; but that phase will pass as soon as action takes the place of inertia. I know that once on the road I shall spur forward eagerly. It is only here, at the parting of the ways, that I stand looking backward. Good-night! Good-bye! To-morrow I shall be on the road, but to-night is dedicated to my regrets; it is the requiem of the past. Good-bye once more. God bless and keep you! I wish I could see you. If there is anything in this to give you pain on my account, remember that it is not the sadness of a lifetime, but that of a very heavy hour which I have flown to you to lighten.—Yours as always, FRANK."

"I wish I could see you!" Would he have written that could he have seen the girl's face and heard her sobs? Would he have eased his burden ever so little at her expense could he have known how cruelly she would suffer, on the one hand, because his love for Helga was so full; on the other, because it was not full enough to make her stand aside and say, "He has chosen that which is best?"

"Eva! The way you are going on is simply absurd. It's atrocious! It's—it's unwomanly!"

"Unwomanly, Maria?"

"Yes, unwomanly. At least, I'm quite sure it's unmaidenly to make such a fuss over any man."

Poor Eva! Attacked thus in what, through centuries, has been woman's weakest spot, she made one desperate effort to reclutch the maidenly dignity which her mentor said was slipping away. It was too late. She looked into Maria's small, hard eyes and saw comprehension there; and too proud of her grief to waste time "in patching fig leaves for the naked truth," she answered, fiercely:

"Yes. I am unmaidenly! I wish I had your right to break my heart for him; but since I have not, let me be. Your crying shame on me won't alter it."

Lady Grove's garden-party at Bonchurch that afternoon was a very bright affair; but Maria, who had hoped that her young cousin would make an impression, both by her beauty and her budding fame, looked with chagrin at the girl's swollen eyelids, and whispered to their kind hostess:

"No, my dear Lady Grove, positively no. Don't make much of her, and don't introduce her to anybody. First impressions go such a long way, you know, and she is not in the mood. These artistic temperaments, you see, are so easily unstrung; and she has been upsetting herself about some trifle. Do let me beg of you to hand her over to some quiet nobody, who won't mind her being a little distrait."

Digitized by Google

"My dear Miss Osborne, there are no nobodies here except my relatives," her ladyship replied, with a smile. "I am quite grieved, though, about Miss Rayne, and I'll do my best. Ah, Bertie!" she added, turning sharply to a very callow youth who stood at her elbow, caressing the place where he hoped some day to raise a moustache. "Are you there? Where's Diana?"

"Here, aunt. Here I am," cried a frank-looking girl, who bore a strong resemblance to the youth, and was his junior by a year, though she looked older.

"Yes, here we are," said the boy, as though he had not discovered the fact till his sister mentioned it. "We're both here, Di and I."

"Well, I want you to take Miss Rayne under the trees and amuse her. Mind, you are not to let anyone bother her; she has a headache."

"Oh! Poor dear!" exclaimed Diana. "We won't let anyone bother her, will we, Bertie?"

"Certainly not, Di," the youth responded.

"Be off at once, then," said Lady Grove, and the couple departed.

But half-way across the sward Bertie Trevor pulled up with a jerk.

"Oh, I say, Di——" he remarked, turning suddenly red.

"Well, what do you say when you say nothing?" his sister inquired.

"About that time, you know, when I met them coming from the Academy and she was crying?"

"Well?"

"Well, if people go and cry when you haven't said anything. Hang it all, you know——"

"Don't be silly, Bertie, it wasn't you. She was just crying for joy, of course."

"Sure?"

"Certain."

"Oh, well, it's all right if you say so."

"Of course it is. What a fellow you are, old man. You haven't half enough confidence in yourself." And so "the mfutual aid society," as brother and sister were called, drifted away, "to form a hollow square" round Miss Rayne.

"And so Mr. Osborne has gone to St. Petersburg," Di was remarking, a few minutes later, as she sat on the grass at Eva's feet. "How awfully nice! We went there with Uncle Jonas—Professor Jonas, you know. He's awfully clever and knows all about Russia, and he's here this afternoon. I'm sure he'd like to know you, but as your head is so bad it wouldn't do——"

"I should like to see him very much," Eva interrupted, her face suddenly flushing with interest. "Oh Mr. Trevor, if your uncle would come and talk to me!"

Bertie cast an anxious and doubtful glance at his sister, but receiving an affirmative nod, departed.

"I don't know whether we've done right," Di said, apologetically, "only I'm sure our small talk must tease you quite as much as uncle would. I must tell you, though, that Uncle Jonas has to be wound up when you want him to talk, and then the worst of it is you can't stop him till he runs down. You see, he reads such a lot of papers to the Royal Geographical and other societies that he gets used to talking right away for an hour. But if he bores you just ask me for my smelling salts—I haven't got any, but that doesn't matter—and Bertie and I will shut him up, if we have to do it by main force."

The professor arrived and he did talk. He prosed away till Di and Bertie began to fidget. But still Miss Rayne sat and listened and never asked for that smelling bottle which was non est.

"The fact is, Miss Rayne," he said, "the eyes of the civilised world will be on Russia this winter. In this year of grace, 1892, we are going to see an unparalleled famine desolating a country which has, if it chose to use them, all the resources of science ready to its hand. The harvest was bad last year, but the tax-gatherers insisted on seizing the grain set aside for seed in payment of taxes in arrear. That was killing the goose with a vengeance. Look at the situation—no machinery, no science, no fertilisers, and no seed, except what they snatch from the bin which has been filled for the mill—and ask yourself if famine is not a foregone conclusion. It's all very well to call the Muscovite peasant improvident when he grinds corn that ought to go for sowing; but when we have it, as I have had it, on the personal authority of a man like Tolstoi, that in normal times the said peasant only consumes 70 per cent. of the nourishment required to bring his body up to the standard, can we wonder that he says, when the officials of the Czar have seized his seed-grain: 'Let the next year look after itself. I'll eat to-day while I'm alive to do so'?

Digitized by Google

"Does the Czar know? No, most probably he doesn't. I've no doubt that he would have remitted the taxes and made a sacrifice to bind the people to the soil; but the officials always want to gather them, because they live, not on their salaries, but on the filtration of public moneys through their hands, and their rapacity is one of the prime factors in the peasant's growing distaste for the agricultural life. Of course the peasant hates the soil, chiefly because his immediate progenitor was counted as part of it."

"Oh, uncle!" Di broke in; "Miss Rayne isn't very well, and I'm sure such gloomy talk——"

"No, no," Eva interposed, "I am deeply interested. My head is not so very bad, Miss Trevor. Pray let me beg your uncle to continue. You would imply, professor, that this sort of trouble has occurred before, and is likely to be intensified this winter?"

The professor's weak eyes looked through his glasses over the heads of his audience to a point on the lawn, at about the same distance from him as the back benches of a fair-sized lecture-hall from the platform. He fixed his eyes on that spot and kept them there.

THE PROFESSOR . . . PROSED AWAY UNTIL DI AND BERTIE BEGAN TO FIDGET.

Digitized by Google

Bertie nudged his sister and gave vent to a suppressed chuckle. "You've done it, Di, interrupting him. He thinks it's the rowdy students up to their larks again."

Miss Rayne repeated her query: "You think that there will be overcrowding in the cities of Russia this winter, and grave danger of infection to the residents, or—or travellers passing through?"

"Eh? Oh! Ah! Yes, certainly; very grave danger."

The professor's eyes left the back of that imaginary hall and settled on the face of his interlocutor.

"You spoke of infection?"

"Eh? Oh, yes, of course, infection. Hunger, typhoid, scurvy, and the like."

"He's quite deflated. Got a puncture in his tyre," whispered Bertie, in a soft aside.

The professor, however, expanded his chest, slipped his left hand under his coat tails, waved the right, and began again:

"The cities of Russia will see this winter a tremendous influx of pauperism. The thing has happened before. This is no mere prophecy, it is as certain as the deductions of the meteorologist. Hordes of the peasants in the frontier provinces where the harvest has failed, will make for the great high road to Siberia, tempted by the glowing accounts of the plenty in some of the semi-penal wheat-growing settlements there."

Eva's face suddenly became very pale, and Diana, pressing her fingers meaningly, said:

"Do let me get you some smelling salts. Do now!"

"No, thank you," Eva responded, faintly. "Not for a moment or two, Miss Trevor. I want to hear more of this."

The fact was that Francis Osborne had omitted to mention the route he was about to take, and Eva, knowing well that all exiles, no matter from what province, are supposed to start from the great penal settlement at Moscow viâ Kassan and Tobolsk, was picturing him on this very route. No doubt, in setting forth, he would be ahead of this great army of disease and misery; but should he for any reason return—return as he himself had hinted he possibly might—in some three or four months, then, according to the professor's gloomy prognostication, he must pass through the very thick of the trouble.

"Is nothing being done?" she asked, faintly. "Are there no preparations? Surely the Czar——"

"The Czar's father was murdered in the street in '81—after two fruitless attempts, Miss Rayne, remember that—and his present Imperial Majesty, though an excellent family man, cares very little for the seething millions who call him the Great White Father. His son (Nicholas II. of the future) might do better and care more, but —"

"Then you say that no preparations are being made?"

The professor did not get along quite so easily in the conversational style because interruption threw him out.

"There are the Red Cross Sisters," he said.

"All Russian ladies, I suppose?"

"Oh, no, English a great many of them. Necessary qualification, two months in a fever hospital; for full particulars apply to—apply to—— Dear—dear me! Now I had that circular, I am confident I had it."

"Do come to the tent now and let us get you some tea, Miss Rayne," Diana insisted.

"Yes, I will come, Miss Trevor. Thank you, Professor Jonas," and as Eva moved away she carefully deposited in her pocket a printed slip which the professor had unearthed from his letter-case.

"What did she want that for?" Bertie asked his sister, sotto voce.

"We've done a nice thing between us," answered Di; adding immediately: "But it wasn't your fault, Bertie; you're not to blame."

CHAPTER XIV.

The morning following his stolen interview with Alexis Lavinski, while the official and Ivanovitch were preparing the morning meal, Osborne, cramped and aching in every joint as though bruised by a bludgeon, commenced to make the nearest possible approach to a morning toilet. Some snow-water in a horse-bucket, and his own handkerchief used as a towel, were the luxurious accessories of the function. Moreover, not having acquired the Tartar insensibility to the presence of a woman, he elected to perform his ablutions in the enclosure outside the house.

Digitized by Google

It was a dangerous experiment, as he very quickly learnt, for, not having heated his body first to that pitch which permits the Russian to rush naked from the hot-air bath and plunge into an icy stream, the water into which he put his arms seemed first to scald and then to paralyse him, and drawing himself up with a gasp he stood there, his bare flesh dripping, unable even to stagger back to the shelter of the dwelling.

"Holy Saints! Has the little father lost his reason?"

It was Ivanovitch who fortunately appeared upon the scene, and threw himself upon his master as though intent on assault and battery.

"Come in, come in!" he cried, when after having struck and beaten his helpless employer with his open palms as vigorously as the French blanchisseuse beats linen with her bat, he commenced to drag him forward. "And if, Excellency, you must wash, in the name of the saints and martyrs wash by the stove!"

"No," Osborne managed to articulate, "no; the woman——"

"Ah! Bah! Such a fuss. To the stable then. The horses' breath makes it warm there, and it is against the stove wall. But be quick, you were nearly gone with frost-bite, Excellency, that time."

In the stable, as suggested, Osborne completed his toilet, and returned to the house more dead than alive, to find Alexis Lavinski leaning on her elbow, her great mournful eyes fixed upon the door. It seemed to him that her face brightened at his entrance. The torturing night-sweats of extreme weakness had damped her thick hair, and still stood in beads on her brow. She had removed the red wool kerchief, and her thin hand was restlessly pushing away the matted, heavy locks.

"You are uneasy," he said, as he advanced to the stove. "Do you wish for anything?"

"I was only thinking," she answered, gently, "that when we accept exile we do not reckon on meeting those who shame us by their cleanliness."

Blushing like a schoolboy Osborne turned round and possessed himself of a large-sized mug, designed to hold quass; then, filling it without permission from the already heating samovar, he took off his large white silk scarf, dipped one corner in the warm water, and offered it to her.

With a pathetic smile of thanks she tried to raise herself into a sitting position. He put his disengaged arm about her and lifted her up, and as she moved a shudder went through him to hear the clank of a chain. Merciful God! This creature, already too weak to perform the simplest offices for herself, was still wearing the convict's chain.

"Does his Excellency propose to set out to-day?"

Osborne, with a start, looked round. What was there to hinder him? He was a free man now. He must push on, of course, to the next large settlement, and there get his passport countersigned on some excuse for a return. But, in spite of that necessity, on retaking the road he would be virtually starting for home.

What was there to stay him? Nothing but the haunting look in the woman's eyes as she opened them at the sound of the question and fixed them on his face. "No," he said, with an effort. "Tell them I am fatigued. There will be heavy snow. I will pay well to be allowed to remain."

It was fully an hour before the meal was over, and the proprietor of the establishment had for some purpose left the house; but, as though she had heard nothing since his answer, Alexis Lavinski opened her eyes again and said:

"Is it that you give me the privilege of starting first?"

"I do not think they will attempt to move you," he answered, trying to ignore her meaning.

"My friend," she said, "your face speaks. Have I not told you so? I understand; and, believe me, I shall not delay you long."

He pressed her hand gently and answered: "I shall remain as long as I may."

A few moments later she said, faintly: "One thing has oppressed me. You thanked God with the fervour of your heart last night, not so much that the woman you sought was safe from my fate, but that she was not as I am. You think, then, that nothing which we suffer can excuse our acts?"

"Do not let us talk of it," he urged.

"I must," she retorted, feverishly. "Cannot you see that your gentleness, your pity—strange and wonderful as it is to find such things upon the Siberian plains—have humiliated me? I tell myself 'He would act thus to the lost, the abandoned, the vicious, provided only they were weak.' I am weak, God knows. But for that I seek no pity. I ask for justice, and if you cannot be just, who shall be? Look at me, I am but thirty-five, and I have already endured fifteen years of exile, though until August 13th last I had never committed any crime. Picture it to yourself, fifteen years of exile, and such sufferings as the death I would have inflicted could never have imposed."

Digitized by Google

"What?" Osborne cried. "You have been in exile almost half your life? You escaped, then, you returned to revenge your sufferings?"

"No," she answered, her eyes blazing, her voice trembling in her passionate resentment. "I forgave the wrong inflicted on me, I never thought or dreamt of revenge; it was for an act of mercy, the cruel mercy of the Romanoff, that I took my life into my hands and said: 'These things shall be no longer. The very name in which they do them shall perish from the land.' Listen, friend, I will tell you a story, not of Florence in the middle ages, not of France and the lettre de cachet, but a story of Russia to-day, and then—then you shall tell me if you dare condemn."

(To be continued.)

ONLY A SMILE.

Only a smile that was given me,
On the crowded street one day,
But it pierced the gloom of my saddened heart,
Like a sudden sunbeam's ray.
The shadows of doubt hung over me,
And the burden of pain I bore,
And the voice of hope I could not hear,
Though I listened o'er and o'er.

But there came a rift in the crowd about,
And a face that I knew passed by,
And the smile I caught was brighter to me,
Than the blue of a summer sky;
For it gave me back the sunshine,
And it scattered each sombre thought,
And my heart rejoiced in the kindly warmth
Which that kindly smile had wrought.

Only a smile from a kindly face,
On the busy street that day!
Forgotten as soon as given, perhaps,
As the donor went her way.
But straight to my heart it went speeding,
To gild the clouds that were there,
And I found that of sunshine and life's blue skies,
I also might take my share.

George MacDonald.

Digitized by Google

THE TOY SHOP OF THE WORLD.

By J. A. HAMMERTON and E. C. MIDDLETON.

IT is strange how words lose their original and proper meaning and from terms of accuracy, or even compliment, become expressive only of contempt. When a man refers to "Brummagem" it is with a sneer in his voice and a curl of the nose. The word is popularly supposed to be synonymous with trashiness, tawdriness—shams in general. Yet, it is only one of the hundred and fifty ways of spelling the name of the Midland Metropolis, and time was when it was officially recognised, for the different modes of spelling Birmingham are like the nine and sixty ways of constructing tribal lays—

"Every-single—one—of—them—is—right."

As for Edmund Burke's famous phrase, "the toy-shop of Europe," nothing could be more incorrect than the popular interpretation of that. Birmingham is by no means a centre of the toy industry, in the sense that dolls and mechanical contrivances for the amusement of young folks are made there. The word toy in this connection is a local trade term for describing all kinds of small wares—watch chains, bangles, trinkets, small steel tools, hooks and eyes, hair curlers, and so on. Thus "the steel toy trade," which is still a considerable business in Birmingham, has absolutely no connection with the nursery, but is concerned with the manufacture of most useful, if not indispensable, tools for workmen and amateurs of all kinds.

If Birmingham were suddenly to refuse to sell any more of its "toys" countless trades throughout the world would be immediately placed at a disadvantage. Consequently, people familiar with the wondrous ramifications of Birmingham's industries, and knowing the real meaning behind the words which head this article are only inclined to smile at the ignorance of those who use "Brummagem" as a term of reproach or contempt.

Unlike Glasgow, Manchester, Leeds, Liverpool, or Belfast, Birmingham has no great commanding industry which stands typical of the town. Its products are mainly the small things of life, but it is the small things that are oftenest most remarkable. And assuredly some of Birmingham's small things are of more importance than other cities' great ones.

A local poet has recently sung of it as "The City of the Rifle, Sword, and Pen"—three small yet mighty things.

The gun trade is one of Birmingham's staple industries—one of its oldest. Yet it may surprise many people to know that the absurd prejudice against Brummagem goods forces the local gun makers to subterfuges which speak loudly of the strength of ignorant misconception. No less than five-sixths of the guns sold as "made in London" are manufactured in Birmingham. They are sent to London to be "proved," and many sportsmen who proudly boast that their particular gun is by this or that famous London "maker," point triumphantly to its London "proof" mark as evidence. The odds are five to one that it is "Brummagem."

The prosperity of the gun trade varies. During the American civil war such was the boom that many fables still circulate about the eating of £5 notes between sandwiches by the Bromicham "gunnifins." But some of these yarns are doubtless true, as, for instance, the tale that at that time if one entered a tailor's shop and asked for a coat or suit from a certain piece of cloth, the tailor would first enquire as to your business, and if you were not in the gun trade, he would apologise and explain, "you can't have that sir, it's a gunmaker's pattern!" It was a time of feasting, drinking, cock-fighting, and general revelry in the gunmaker's light. Then set in the reaction. The humble but savory bloater came to be known, and has ever since been locally called, the "gunmaker's goose." Now more money is spent in guns than ever, but there are more people in the trade, more competition and less profit for the makers.

Digitized by Google

But Birmingham guns—avowedly so—are well to the fore. Dr. Calver, the famous American shot, despite the cleverness of Yankee gunmakers, uses a Brummagem gun. He did so when he defeated the Hon. Tom Marshall in the world's championship, and so impressed was the Hon. Tom that he immediately secured a Brummagem gun and defeated the doctor. Not only this, but the second and third positions were all taken with Birmingham's guns.

One sees less in Birmingham now of those long flint-lock guns whose barrels were some five or six feet in length, with the stocks painted rather a bright red, their prices ranging from six shillings to about seven shillings and sixpence. The maker of a decent gun always repudiated such weapons—as guns—and told you that the barrels were made of gas piping. But the men who made them considered themselves public benefactors. They supported the "survival of the fittest" theory, and looking upon the natives of West Africa, to whom the trash was sold, as the unfit, proudly boasted that one of their weapons, when fired, would kill the man who held it and probably the one next to him.

Perhaps this trade may have had something to do with the contempt implied by "Brummagem," since those worthless weapons for beguiling the untutored savage were always known as Birmingham made.

"VIRGIL" SHIELD MADE IN BIRMINGHAM. VALUE, £1,500.

Digitized by Google

The real gun trade is still largely a handicraft, and it may interest readers to know that the barrel is made straight by no mechanical process, but simply through the unerring eye of the worker glancing along it after he strikes it with a mallet until he is satisfied of its absolute trueness.

Swords have been made in Birmingham since the earliest times; but we believe in modern times Sheffield has done more in this trade than Birmingham.

If it be true, however, that "the pen is mightier than the sword," then Brummagem is assuredly the centre of a mighty industry; for who does not couple the name of Birmingham with steel pens? The maker of the first steel pen is believed to have been a Sheffield artisan, but it is in the great Midland city that the manufacture has been developed to its present high stage of efficiency. And a very interesting trade it is—worthy, indeed, of an article to itself.

"Neatness and order" is the motto of the penmaker. Long strips of steel, like so much ribbon, pass through the press, and "blanks" or flat pieces of steel are cut out with a rapidity and noise almost appalling. Then follow a number of operations that look as if they might be simplified. We are not sure we remember the order correctly, but one press cuts out the slot, another puts in the side cuts, a third adds the name of the maker and number. Then the pen is raised, or rounded, from the flat and the point slit. They are next ground round the points, hardened, annealed, and browned, counted and boxed, the wholesale price being, for average pens, twopence per gross; though they have been made as cheap as a penny per gross. The cheapest pens go to Italy, the dearest to Russia.

After all these processes, the production of the penholder seems simplicity itself. Strips of wood follow each other in rapid succession through a machine, and issue the next moment from the other side, straight, taper, twisted, or any pattern the setting of the machine determines. Fancy pencil-cases are mainly made by master-workers in their own houses and small workshops. Those flashy white metal pencil-cases, with copying-lead in them, and probably a precious stone at the other end, are turned out by the makers for one shilling or one-and-six a dozen: they sell at fourpence or sixpence each. The difference goes in profit to the various middlemen who handle the article before it reaches the public.

The employees in the pen trade are mainly women and girls, and the number of pens produced each week would be something fabulous if it were possible to ascertain. Thirty-five years ago, when the trade was comparatively young, 50,000 gross of pens were turned out in Birmingham every week. Now the production must be many hundred thousand gross every week—figures before which the mind of the ordinary man who is not a Fellow of the Statistical Society must reel. The girl-workers make about seven shillings a week, which is a good wage for most girls' labour in Birmingham.

But perhaps Brummagem's jewellery is as characteristic as any of the city's products. In the jewellery trade the word Brummagem has certainly a most sinister meaning, the impression being that the jewels made in Birmingham are of the sincerest flattery order—imitation. Nothing could be more unfair to the jewellery trade of the city. There is only one "imitation" jeweller's shop in Birmingham, and it is a branch of a London establishment.

Yet it cannot be denied that the imitative capacity of the Birmingham jeweller is noteworthy. Forty years ago it was boasted that Birmingham workers in "metal gilt" could produce for one penny a locket that looked as good as a gold one which cost thirty shillings, and about that time the imitative faculty was so far developed that an article "made with hinges and clasp, in the form of a volume, and with good likenesses of the Prince and Princess of Wales, was sold wholesale for about one halfpenny each."

Talking of imitation, an enterprising Birmingham manufacturer recently was seized with the happy idea of issuing counterfeit sovereigns to be sold as counters for card games, and the great demand which ensued led to the police prohibiting their sale, for racing "sharps" were buying them in dozens and passing them off as the real articles. They were sold for about 4½d. the dozen. The trash that is given away in lucky bags is not made in Birmingham, and a maker of jewelled rings which sell for a penny apiece was greatly shocked to think we imagined Birmingham made such cheap stuff as lucky-bag rings!

There is still a good deal of imitation jewellery made in Birmingham, but the

Digitized by Google

real article is manufactured even more largely, though the unfortunate town gets the odious reputation of producing nothing but the imitation stuff, and most of the genuine goods are sent out after being stamped at the London Assay Office to masquerade as London manufactures. We have known a Birmingham man who bought a beautiful watch in Paris thinking it was made there, while it had actually been produced in his native city and within a few hundred yards of his own office!

JOSEPH MOORE'S MEDAL AFTER SCHEFFER'S "CHRISTUS CONSOLATOR."

Here is a true incident coming within our own experience which will illustrate this point. At the time of the marriage of the Duke of York we found a photographer bemoaning his fate. A handsome gold casket, to contain the freedom of a northern city, and a pair of candelabra were to be presented to the Royal couple. The casket was indeed a triumph of the goldsmith's art, therefore had the Birmingham manufacturer sent the centre piece and one candlestick to the photographer with instructions to produce a photograph showing the pair of candelabra. The photographer appealed for the second candlestick. "Can't have it," replied the manufacturer, "it's gone to be Hall-marked." "Well," urged the photographer, "it won't be many hours, can't I wait for it?" Then the trouble was cleared up. The northern city could not present a Birmingham-marked casket and candelabra to Royalty, so the articles had each been sent, when ready, to London to be Hall-marked, in order that the Royal recipients might not be insulted with Brummagem ware! This fraud is perpetually being perpetrated to the glorification of London because of a stupid prejudice against Birmingham goods.

Why one sees so little of the jewellery trade in Birmingham is because it is confined to a very limited and dingy area—say, roughly, a hundred acres lying between Great Hampden-street, Vyse-street, and St. Paul's-square. Walk round here, and the only sign one sees of jewellery or its kindred businesses are small and unobtrusive plates in private houses; of display there is none. The streets seem deserted. Here and there an errand boy may be noticed, or, perhaps, a group of them; possibly they bear on their arms rolls of dirty looking metal, and from the way they place them on the ground to indulge in marbles, games, or gossip, none but the initiated would believe that those same rolls were silver or gold, which, having been sent in ingot form to the mill, is being returned rolled, and one of these small urchins may be possessed of, say, 300 oz. of silver, or an equally valuable load of gold. Surely this is the familiarity that breeds contempt!

Though at five minutes to one o'clock the streets of the jewellers' quarter may be deserted, another five minutes bring into them hundreds, thousands, of workers in the jewellery trade; each entry and house will yield its scores, all producing, day in, day out, Brummagem jewellery, from the very finest, set with diamonds, down to the quality where price demands that the stones shall not be "set," but affixed to the brass backing with "fish glue." The finger-ring so made loses most of its "jewels" if the hands be washed in warm water. Should the visitor look inside a workshop, he will not be impressed. The dirty-looking metal, bound together with thin wire, upon which the workman directs a blast from a blow-pipe and a gas jet, will not be recognised as gold, and yet the partially-formed object that rests upon his "wig," and to which he makes constant additions by means of a small camel-hair brush and flux of borax, will eventually be, perhaps, the centre of attraction in a Bond-street shop. The observant will notice that each workman has in front of him a pan or skin into which falls his filings, and it may be a surprise to be told that such trifles, "lemmel" and "sweep," constitute the sole source of profit to the high-class Birmingham jeweller.

OBVERSE WITH THE "SALVATOR MUNDI" OF LEONARDO DA VINCI.

Digitized by Google

Plated goods have been largely made in Birmingham since 1764, and though Sheffield was before Birmingham in the manufacture of silver plate, "electro" plating was originated in the Midland town. Less enduring than plate proper, it is accepted by the great mass as cheaper, "therefore better," and if the public will demand a cheap particle the manufacturer must supply it. Cutting of price has reduced the deposit until it is alleged that, so attenuated is the deposit of silver, orders for abroad are not plated until the last moment, and are forthwith placed in air-tight cases lest the precious metal evaporate before the articles arrive at their destination. Common report has it that in such cases the articles are no longer dipped into the solution of silver but are merely allowed to see it. Whatever the price the buyer will pay, Brummagem will give him his money's worth. If the purchaser will cut prices down, on him the blame must rest.

If one could only get admission to all the interesting workshops in Birmingham what a delightful and instructive holiday one could spend, going from one manufactory to another watching the artisans at work. It would only take about a month.

A very interesting process is the making of glass, and it is produced in an endless variety of conditions in Birmingham, from the massive prisms that are used in lighthouses to the gossamer-like fairy balls for decking Christmas trees—the one so thick and tough that a sledge hammer would be required to break it, and the other so thin that the slightest pressure of the finger will reduce it to the nothingness of a spider's web. Foreign, and even home, competition has robbed Birmingham of much of its glory in the glass trade; Belgium, on the Continent, and St. Helens, in the north, now dividing the honours.

One rather curious anecdote may be related of the former production of "crown" glass. When hot the glass was blown out into a cylinder, then cut at the ends, slit down the side, flattened out, smoothed and cooled into a sheet of transparent glass. French workmen were introduced, and for long it was a mystery how an undersized Frenchman with a 30-inch chest could blow a globe so very much greater in size than a burly Englishman with his 42-inch chest. No importance was attached to the Frenchman's habit of rinsing his mouth with water before he performed, but at last the secret leaked out. Retaining a slight quantity of water in his mouth before blowing the glass, he ejected that as he blew through the tube, the water turned into steam, and, steam being much more expansive than air, he was thus able to produce a wider cylinder with less lung power than his lusty English competitors, who had never thought of such artifice.

Were some magician to strip from our lady reader all she wears of Birmingham manufacture, we should be extremely apprehensive of the consequence. For, if the truth must be told, from the crown of her head to the soles of her feet she is Brummagem in very essential features. The hat-pin with which her triumph of millinery is attached to her head would immediately be withdrawn—whether it be the simple steel pin with its glass knob, produced in Birmingham workshops by girls who turn them out at a few pence the gross, or a silver and gold one, even set with diamonds, all alike are Brummagem. The hair that has its beautifying "wave" would have remained lank and straight but for those "wavers" or "curlers" made in the Hardware City. The hair-pins, too, would all be withdrawn, and our lady's head would thus begin to look dishevelled. The brooch, the necklet, the watch or muff-chain, all would have to go. So, too, the bracelets, rings, and trinkets, even though they bear

Digitized by Google

"JUBILEE" VASE MADE IN BIRMINGHAM. VALUE, £3,000.

the London Hall-mark. Of course all her safety pins would go, and it is interesting, by the way, to know that girls are paid just twopence for "carding" nine gross of safety pins: that is fixing nine pins in a row on a gross of cards. They have to be very smart at it to earn the merest pittance.

Having evanished her jewellery, our magician would next claim the buckle from her waist-belt, and further alterations in the figure might be observed as those supple steel supports that frequently add so much charm to the female form divine were withdrawn from her corsets. We greatly fear a collapse would here ensue. The patent fastenings removed from her gloves would militate against appearances, and the withdrawal of her umbrella-frame would be a small matter compared with the removal of such trifling but important details as all hooks, eyes, pins, and fastenings of all sorts. The claim for buttons would have called up those from the boots

Digitized by Google

—if they were eyelets it would be all the same—and with the removal of rivets or sprigs of any kind from the soles, Brummagem would have claimed its debtor from head to foot.

Fashion is indeed fickle, and accounts for strange doings in Birmingham as elsewhere. Take our lady's buttons, for instance. Buttons of pearly whiteness are demanded, and the demand is met. Then there ensues an accumulation of the dark or smoke pearl, considered worthless. Whether the manufacturer winks one eye at Fashion, or how it comes about, we know not, but the wand of Wizard Fashion is waved, and smoke pearl is "the thing." The manufacturer so orders prices that his fortune is made.

Some years ago such a change produced remarkable results. Mother-of-pearl was cheap, flat buttons were in vogue, and the thick portion where the two shells are hinged was useless, all such parts being looked upon as waste. Tons upon tons were carted to waste land; here and there an old well was filled up with them. Time passed on; these thick pieces of pearl were covered with layer upon layer of other refuse. Fashion then demanded round pearl buttons like bullets, each shell would only afford three or four. No doubt Fashion was in league with some man who had hoarded up his waste joints; those who had not done so thought ruefully of what they had cast away. Prices rose, and then there set out prospecting parties, such as one might see on a newly discovered alluvial goldfield; the piece of waste land was visited, shafts were sunk, and, like all other mining, there were successes and failures. Whole cart-loads of the precious treasure would be met with, and sums up to £50 or £60 would be offered for the opportunity of emptying a well, known to have been used as a "tip." A vast fortune even now awaits the scientist who can remove the unpleasant yellow colour found in pearl shell, and said to arise from the iodine.

If our magician were now to turn his attention to the husband of the lady we left in such pitiable plight, we think he might come out of the ordeal better. But the removal of his studs, his links, his buttons, his buckles, his boot-fastenings, umbrella fittings, glove clasps, and the ferrule from his walking-stick, not to mention his key-ring, would at least produce an untidy appearance. The loss of his Brummagem money would perhaps be more serious than he might expect. For, although only coppers have been completely minted there, there was one Government order that consisted of sixty tons of pennies, thirty tons of half-pence, and ten tons of farthings—by the way, who ever sees a farthing now? Of silver coins for this country Birmingham has done no more than prepare the silver blanks for our National Mint, but the coining presses of the Royal Mint are Brummagem; so, too, the notable die-sinkers, the Wyons.

So far our gentleman-friend has not suffered much, but at his office we should find him deprived of his steel pens, his metal inkstands, his gas brackets, his desk bell, his table lamp, his iron safe, his copying press, and the wire that brings his telephonic messages. If he has a telegram from America by the first cable the Great Eastern ever laid, thanks are due to Brummagem, at one of whose numerous wire-mills it was made. Should he ride home on his bicycle, the chances are two to one Brummagem made it entirely. Twenty to one it made the chain, and about a hundred to one it made the tubes, and, if a higher-grade machine, fully fifty to one the fittings are Brum's.

Tube-making is indeed a great Birmingham industry; whether the tubes be skelp, butt-welded, lap-welded, or solid-drawn there is but one home for their production—Brummagem. Unless the gentleman be a teetotaller the glass of ale he takes by way of refreshment has found its way over the brewery through copper tubes wrought in these same tube mills. The "beer engine" with which it is drawn from the vaults, the tap of the private barrel, the corkscrew that reveals the contents of the bottle, all hail from the same place.

Perhaps one of Birmingham's most unlovely productions is the enamelled sign with which "largest circulations," pills, syrups, and other things (not Brummagem's) are announced. Their manufacture is rapid and interesting. Over a sheet of iron is peppered from a dredger the powdered ground colour; the sheet so covered is transferred to a wheeled carriage, a huge oven door opens, the sheet is run into the oven; in a few moments it is withdrawn, and on cooling presents its white or blue shining surface. This is covered with a second coating of enamel powder, with a slight admixture of gum; then dry letters of lead foil, or even paper, are placed on the surface, and the application of a brush removes all the colour powder except that under the paper or lead pattern. Again is the surface submitted to the oven, again the plate is withdrawn, and after perhaps a second application your enamelled sign is complete. Many have died in the production of these goods. The lead, for which there are make-shifts but no real substitute, slowly and surely permeates the system. The girls will not use the respirators that would save their lives. Why? Well, the Brummagem work-girl considers they mar her type of beauty, and too often she sacrifices her life to her vanity. Another deadly trade is that of the brass caster. No one ever knew or heard of an old brass caster. If such present himself he may be old, but he will have ceased brass casting while he was yet young. Or if he be an old brass caster, then it means that he would yet be young had he followed another calling. The Act of Parliament provides milk for him, so do his employers, but he will not take it; he prefers beer, and dies young. The strip caster, who deals with large bodies of metal, suffers most. One day he has the "stifles," recovers, returns to work, suffers again, and perhaps again,

Digitized by Google

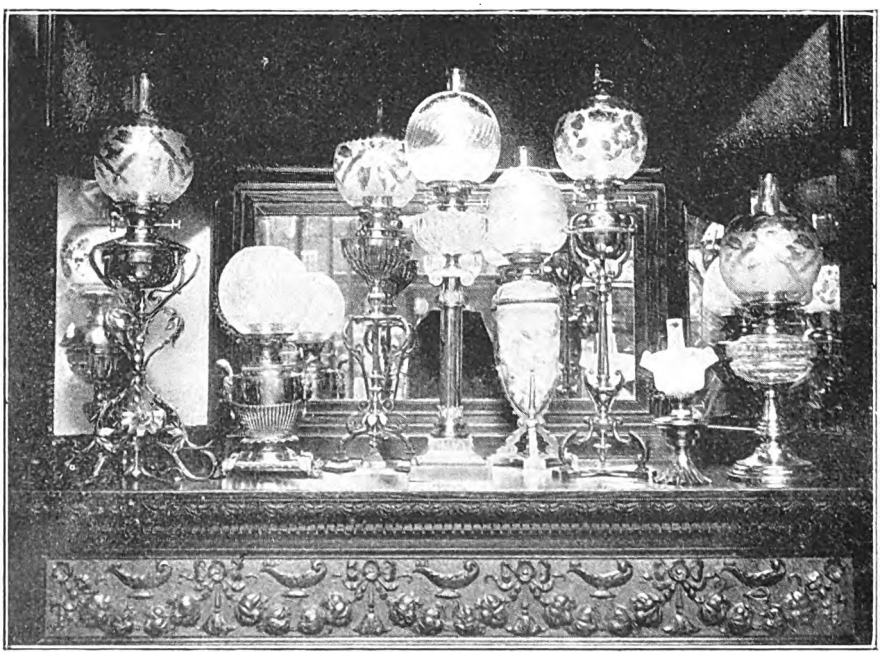
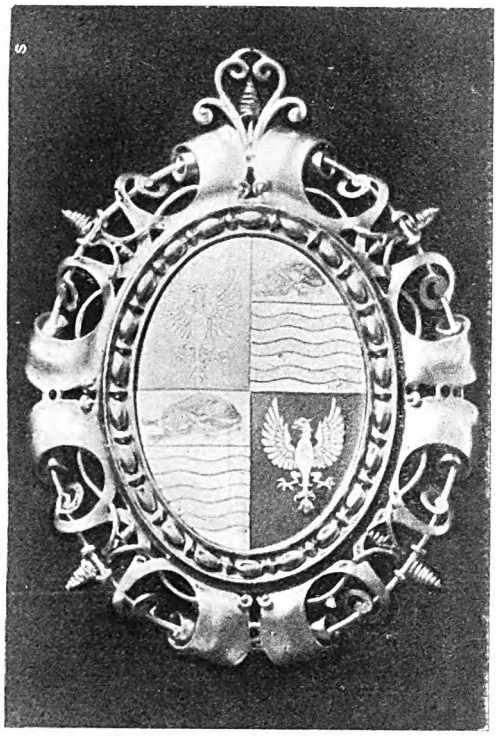
SILVER CASKET, MADE IN BIRMINGHAM, PRESENTED TO MADAME DREYFUS.



GROUP OF DUPLEX LAMPS.

Digitized by Google

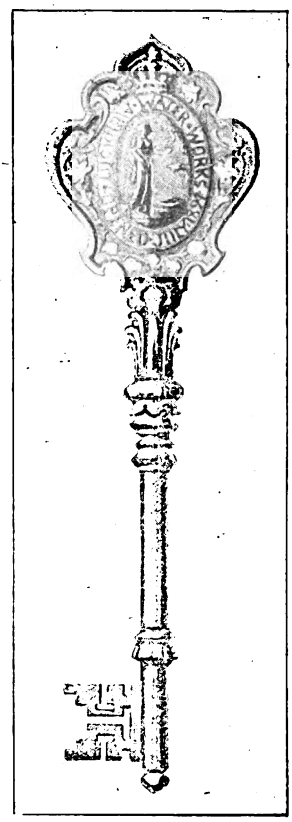


PENDANT TO MAYOR'S CHAIN.
(MADE IN BIRMINGHAM.)

at shorter intervals. Then he dies, and is succeeded by his mate. These men draw heavy wages, but all die young. It is the mixture of spelter with the copper that is fatal. The caster muffles up his face when pouring, but to no purpose. The casters in copper, bronze and iron suffer no such risks—and draw no such money.

Here and there around Birmingham are cartridge manufacturers, and interesting it is to see the metallic cartridges made. Starting with a flat disc or "blank" about the size of a halfpenny, step by step it is drawn into a short tube, headed, capped, charged and closed. Girls do the work, and little ones, too. When the pressure of the Franco-Prussian War was at its height hurry and recklessness brought about so many explosions that the General Hospital erected a special building for "explosives" victims. Explosions occurred weekly; five, ten and fifteen victims were killed on occasions. Modern improvements have changed all that, and now it is said, thanks to the elaborate precautions, an explosive factory is one of the safest of places. Not only are military and sporting cartridges made in millions, but blasting cartridges, too, and we have seen little girls, in their blue serge aprons and carpet slippers, busily employed closing blasting cartridges, any one of which would wreck a house. Birmingham played its part in the South African War. Most of the Boer guns, and many of the Lyddite shells, were Brummagem, and, as there must be a grumble at everything with such an origin, the Boer here does it.

We suppose that the Piccadilly lounger would feel hurt at the suggestion that his existence is dependent upon Birmingham. But his most distinctive features—his cuffs and collars—would be impossible without the laundress's iron, and be it charcoal-box, sad, or polishing, it comes from Brummagem. Without these the "Johnnie's" life would be a blank indeed.



KEY OF LUCKNOW WATERWORKS.
(MADE IN BIRMINGHAM.)

If we visit church, the metallic altar fittings, the eagle lectern, be it of the conventional pattern or "natural," and two out of the three stained glass windows are from the same source—Brum'! And when the reviler has passed from this world the fittings of his coffin, be they plain or ornamental, brass, iron, or silver, will be invoiced from Brummagem, as probably also the rope that lowers it. Manufacturers in the same town, who supply both the picks and the shovels that dig his grave, will even thoughtfully send the ornamental railing to mark the interesting spot. Thus in life and death thou art with us—Brummagem!

Digitized by Google

A BIRMINGHAM CLOCK ON BRACKET.

J. A. HAMMERTON,
E. C. MIDDLETON.

[The illustrations of this article are from photos, the copyright of which belongs to the Proprietor of "The Birmingham Magazine of Arts and Industries." The silversmiths' work is by Elkington & Co., the goldsmiths' by T. & J. Bragg, the clock by N. and E. Spittle, medal by Joseph Moore, and lamps by Hinks & Son.]

Digitized by Google

"JOAN," SAID CURLIE, "I WANT TO SPEAK TO YOU SERIOUSLY."

PENTHONY'S SWEETHEART.

By E. BURROWS.

With Illustrations by J. Barnard Davis.

I.

HER real name, as she was always careful to explain, was Christina Margaret, but somehow she was always called Curlie. To say that she was one of the most important members of society in the Indian station in which the Denisons were quartered—he was second in command of the ——th—conveys but a poor idea of Miss Denison's popularity. As for Denison's regiment, every man in it was Curlie's slave, and chief amongst them was one Ronald Penthony, who literally adored Miss Denison, and constituted himself her cavalier on every possible occasion. He was a good-looking young fellow, straight and lithe of figure, with a pair of the bluest of blue eyes. Once he had obtained the reputation of being the greatest flirt in the station, but that somehow had all passed; and of late there had been a distinct change in him, since Curlie had come into his life, and been known as Penthony's sweetheart.

The breeze was just stirring the acacia trees in the cool early morning when Penthony flung his reins to a syce, and ran up the steps of the Denisons' verandah.

There was a rush and flutter of a dainty white dress, and a small figure, with a mass of curling auburn hair flying in the breeze, was caught in his arms.

Digitized by Google

"Hullo, my sweetheart, I've come to take you for a ride this glorious morning. Is Punch fit for a gallop?"

"I think so—he's very lazy, Pippin, and I'm not heavy, so he has no 'scuse, has he?"

"None," said the Pippin addressed, Long ago Curlie had christened him Pippin, when her baby lips had been unable to make more than that out of Penthony, and Pippin he remained to the end of the story.

"May she go, Mrs. Denison?" he asked, as a nice-looking woman came into the verandah.

"Of course she may; run away, Curlie, and get on your habit. Pippin will see about Punch, I am sure."

"All right," said Pippin, cheerfully. "I'll bring her back in time, Mrs. Denison."

"Oh, I can trust you with Curlie," she said with a smile, and as he swung away towards the stables she watched him with the smile still lingering in her lovely eyes. She stood there till he reappeared, leading the graceful little Arab, which was Curlie's own especial property. She appeared at that moment, a dainty little figure in her blue habit, with a velvet cap on her sunny hair. There was much arranging of skirts, stirrups, and girths as she settled herself in her saddle, and with a little nod to her mother, and a kiss waved to Major Denison, who appeared as they started, they trotted out of the compound to the sandy road.

"A quaint couple," said Major Denison with a laugh, as they disappeared from sight; and Mrs. Denison smiled.

"A very devoted one, at any rate," she said; and the couple in question trotted gaily along the sandy road.

Curlie was very silent, and Pippin—as he may be known—glanced at her serious little face with a twinkle in his blue eyes. He was used to Curlie's fits of deep and anxious thought.

"A penny," he said presently; and the child laughed. It was an old joke, but none the less appreciated.

"They are worth much more," she said, subsiding into gravity again. "I was thinking about—Joan."

Pippin's pony plunged suddenly, as a spur touched him.

"And who," said he lightly, is Joan"?

"Joan is—well, Joan," said Curlie, not very lucidly. "You'll see her to-day, Pippin, and she's come all the way from England. She is—Oh! sweet."

Pippin laughed.

"Anything else?" he enquired. "Then she's a great pal of yours, sweetheart?"

Curlie nodded.

"Nearly my greatest," she said, "and I heard mother say once that to know her was to love her. You'll love her, Pippin?"

"Not I!" said Pippin gaily, "anyway, not while I've got you."

There had been someone once, whom to know was to love, and a shadow darkened his eyes for a moment as the memory came back to him. He had known her so well—that other Joan.

Curlie's sweet voice roused him from his reflections.

"Of course, you would not love her as you do me, Pippin, I know that. But wait till you see my Joan. I'm quite wrapped up in her."

The deliciously quaint air with which Curlie delivered herself of this speech brought back the ready smile to Pippin's lips, and their ride ended in much laughter and gaiety.

"You'll come to tea, Pippin, won't you?" said Curlie, as he lifted her down from the saddle.

"H'm," demurred Pippin, discontentedly, "don't you think you'd better come and have tea with me, Curlie? There will be such a crowd this afternoon."

"I couldn't leave Joan," said Miss Denison, decidedly. "You might come, and then you'll see her."

"Oh, very well, but look here, don't let your Joan interfere with our morning rides, you know. That'll never do."

"Joan," said Curlie, with her superb little air, "is much too nice to interfere with other people. Good-bye, Pippin."

The little figure vanished, and Pippin, as he led Punch round to the stable, swore softly at himself.

"What an ass I am," he muttered, "to think the very mention of her name—which is common enough——"

Punch duly stabled, he mounted his own pony, and trotted away to his quarters. That same afternoon found him entering the pretty room, where a murmur of voices and the cheerful clatter of teacups announced that Mrs. Denison was dispensing the cup that cheers to a small crowd of people. As he entered, Curlie in a soft white frock, with her wonderful hair curling over her shoulders and framing her sweet flower-like face with an aureole of ruddy gold, greeted him with, "Here's my Pippin. Mother, he has come after all. I told him he must see Joan."

Digitized by Google

Mrs. Denison laughed.

"Then you must be properly introduced," she said, "Joan dear."

A girl who had been standing in the shadow came towards them.

"Joan dear, Mr. Penthony—Miss Stafford."

And Pippin, as he bowed, set his teeth hard.

"We have met before, I think," he said with a laudable indifference in his tone, and the very least colour rose to Miss Stafford's cheeks. Curlie looked from one to the other with perplexity dawning in her forget-me-not blue eyes.

"Then you know Pippin," she said, "and you never told me, Joan."

Miss Stafford looked down at the child in momentary confusion, and Pippin caught himself watching the colour which rose to her soft cheeks, and then died away.

"You see, dear," she was saying, in that familiar voice which he had once—ah! once loved—"I had no idea that your Pippin was . . . the Mr. Penthony I used to know . . . long ago. I daresay he is as much surprised at this meeting as I am."

"Were you surprised?" said Curlie, slipping her hand into Pippin's. "Why, you are cross!"

"Not cross, sweetheart, only surprised," said he with a smile at her anxious little face. "You had a pleasant journey, I hope?" he continued, addressing himself with deadly civility to Miss Stafford.

"Very, thanks," said she, coolly, all her embarrassment flown. After a little desultory conversation the group drifted apart, and Curlie took Pippin to admire a certain very small and fluffy kitten. After a minute or so she looked up. "You don't like my Joan," she said severely, and Pippin started.

"Oh, I like her," he said, feebly. But Curlie shook her head, unconvinced.

"You weren't a bit glad to see her, Pippin, and she must be quite an old friend."

"Don't bother your sweet self about Miss Stafford," he said, vehemently. "She—I—we didn't—er get on very well once, and I daresay she doesn't want to see much of me now."

"That means you quarrelled," said Curlie, "and with my Joan. Oh, Pippin, dear, couldn't you make it up?"

Pippin shook his head.

"I don't think so, Curlie."

"I had a quarrel once, and I made it up quite nicely."

"You quarrelled? With whom, sweetheart?"

"Well, you see," said Curlie, in an explanatory tone, "it began very small, and it grew so big, you know, Pippin."

He nodded. Oh! he knew.

"And then—it was Tommy Jameson—he was very rude, and I wouldn't play with him, and then next day we made it up."

"How?" asked Pippin with interest.

"Well, Tommy said he was sorry, and apologised, and I said it was all right, and then he kissed me, and I kissed him, and we never quarrelled again. So you see, Pippin, how easy it is; couldn't you really make it up with Joan?"

Pippin shook his head with a sad little laugh.

"Not that way, Curlie."

"Mother always says, 'Kiss and be friends,' she said, "and I'm sure Joan would; she'd do anything for me, and she's so nice. Oh, Pippin, you make me so unhappy."

"I'll do anything for you, sweetheart but that. Don't let's talk about Miss Stafford any more. Are you coming for a ride to-morrow."

"Yes, and Joan too."

"Oh, of course, if Miss Stafford likes," said he stiffly.

And yet as he tramped back to his quarters he was haunted by Curlie's words, "Kiss and be friends." Ah! if he only could.

The memory of it all came back to him so vividly. It had happened three years ago; only a very usual story after all. Three weeks together in a country house with Joan Stafford had been quite enough, after that there had been a summer of unclouded happiness; then the little rift within the lute, which had begun in so little, and—alas! the pity of it!—had grown and widened, till a great gulf lay between them; and after that came a coldness—estrangement—and silence.

Digitized by Google

That was all.

II.

"Joan," said Curlie, "I want to speak to you seriously."

They were sitting in the verandah. Joan lying back in a deck chair, gazed absently at the delicate green of the trees in the compound. An open book lay on her lap, which she was not attempting to read. Curlie, who had been engaged in the manufacture of a minute frock for an equally minute doll, had suspended operations, and was regarding Joan with grave scrutiny.

"Well, dear?"

"I want to know why you quarrelled with Pippin?"

Miss Stafford sat up, and the book fell to the ground. No doubt stooping to pick it up brought that quick colour to her cheeks.

"I quarrel with Mr. Penthony? My dear child, what put such an idea into your head?"

"Pippin."

"Mr. Penthony said," began Miss Stafford incredulously, and Curlie nodded.

"Yes, I'm sorry, Joan, but he did say you quarrelled, and I said it was a great pity. You see, Joan, I am so fond of you and Pippin, and he looked unhappy."

"What!" said Miss Stafford, sharply.

"Yes, he was," repeated Curlie, "and he sighed—I heard him, Joan. Couldn't you make it up this once?"

"No, no, Curlie—and you are quite mistaken, dear, Mr. Penthony isn't unhappy about that," said Miss Stafford, with suspicious haste, "it's nothing, Curlie, but I couldn't make it up—now."

"I don't see why," said Curlie, mournfully. "It's so easy; I told Pippin so."

"Oh! darling, don't talk about it to Mr. Penthony any more," said Miss Stafford; "please don't, Curlie. It doesn't matter, you know, but I would much rather you didn't."

"Well, I won't," said Curlie, "but, oh, I'm so sorry, and I was sure you'd love Pippin."

Miss Stafford laughed a queer little laugh.

"We can't all think alike, you know, Curlie," she said. "You don't——" She broke off abruptly as Pippin suddenly appeared coming round the corner of the verandah.

"Lovely day, Miss Stafford," said he cheerfully. "Curlie, I am awfully sorry I couldn't come for you this morning, but I had to do duty for a fellow who's gone sick. May I stay to tea?"

"Of course you may. Mother, Pippin's come to tea."

"That's right," said Mrs. Denison. She had just joined the little group in the verandah, where a servant was placing the tea-table. "I hear that young Cardew is ill," she said. "Nothing serious, I hope."

"A chill, I think; he was seedy all yesterday, and went on the sick list this morning. I was detailed for duty, otherwise I should have been here early to take Curlie out."

He glanced at Joan as he spoke, and thought how happy she looked, with her cheeks pink as an English rose, and a smile dancing in her pretty eyes as she talked to Curlie. But as he watched her the smile and brightness died away suddenly, and he could have sworn that she sighed; a very small sigh.

"So you and Joan are old friends," said Mrs. Denison, as she gave him a second cup of tea. "She used to stay with us at my old home, and this is a long-talked-of visit."

"It is a long time since I had the pleasure of meeting Miss Stafford," he said, briefly.

"But not long enough to forget her, Pippin," said Curlie's little voice, and Pippin laughed uneasily.

"No, Curlie, not long enough for that"—and Mrs. Denison glanced at Joan as she caught the significance in his tone. She had a very shrewd suspicion of the real state of affairs, though Joan had never said anything upon the subject.

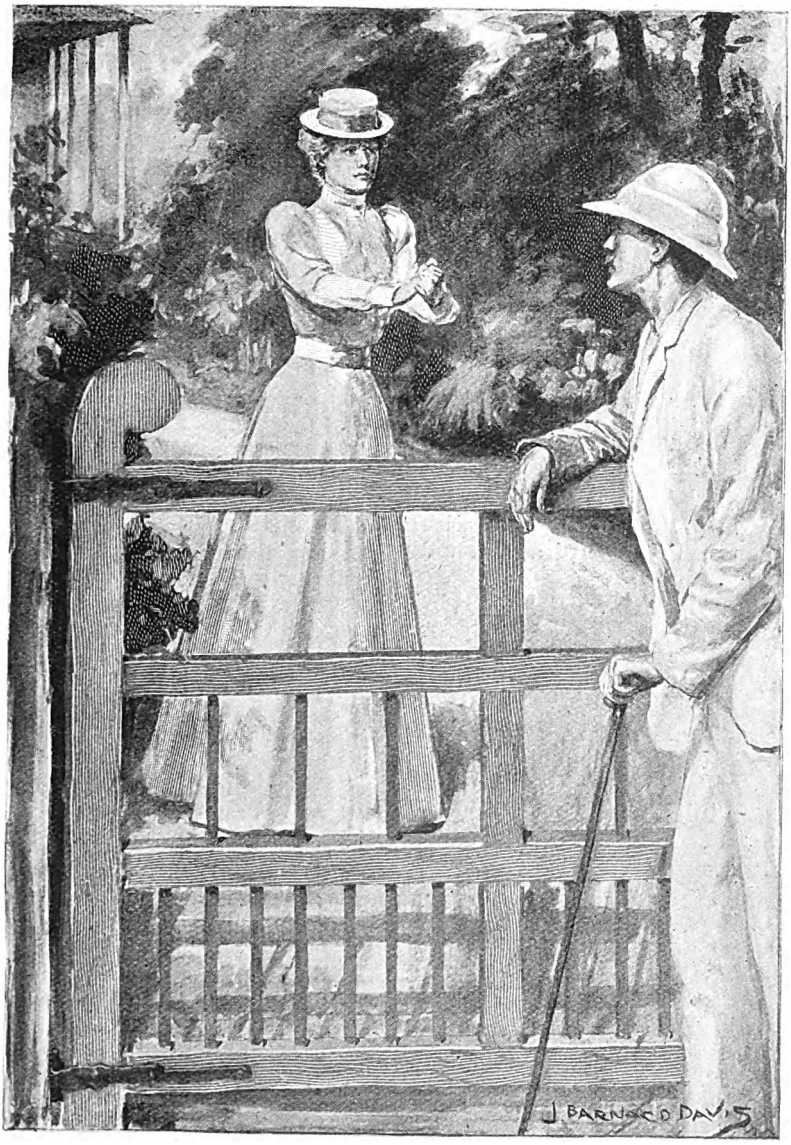
Curlie went to the gate with Pippin that night, and her small face was very wistful as she said good-night to him.

"What's the matter, sweetheart?" he said as he held her up on the top of the gate. "You're very quiet. Not—Miss Joan again?"

"Yes, it is," said Curlie mournfully, looking down at him from her exalted position, "but I promised I wouldn't talk about it any more, so I can't, Pippin."

"You promised Miss Joan that, did you?"

Digitized by Google



"NO, NO," SHE CRIED, "DON'T COME NEAR ME."

"Yes—faithful. But I do wish you liked her a little, Pippin; can't you?"

A small soft arm stole round his neck, and Pippin stifled a groan.

"Don't, Curlie! Perhaps I am sorry now, but you don't understand, dear, yet. You will some day—when you're quite grown up and no longer seven year old Curlie. You'll forget your Pippin then."

"No, never—never," she said in her tender little voice. "I think Joan is a tiny bit sorry now—but I mustn't talk about it. Let me get down, dear Pippin."

"Wait a minute—don't you think you might give me a kiss, Curlie? You never have, you know, and I'm sure I deserve it."

"I'm not that sort of person," said Curlie, with an air of virtuous dignity, "but as I'm very fond of you, Pippin——"

"Well, you kissed Tommy Jameson, you know you did."

"Oh! that," said Curlie, with a little wave of her hand, "is quite different. You see it was to make up a quarrel."

"Well, perhaps it'll help to make up

Digitized by Google

mine," said Pippin, deceitfully; "mightn't it, Curlie?"

"I don't know," she murmured disconsolately, laying a soft little cheek against his. "I wish it could. Good-night, dear, dear Pippin."

"Good-night, sweetheart, run along in—you'll catch cold."

He swung her down from the gate, and watched the small white figure disappear into the verandah; then he turned away and tramped along the dusty road all unconscious of the fact that Miss Stafford was watching his retreating form with a guilty air, and a suspicion of tears in her pretty eyes.

* * * * *

"Penthony's on the sick list," said Major Denison, unbuckling his sword belt. Joan looked up from her work with a start, and Mrs. Denison turned round from her writing-table.

"Ill!" she said; "he was here yesterday. What is it, George?"

"Well," said the Major cautiously, "the doctor's not quite sure, but he is afraid it is—diphtheria."

"Diphtheria!" gasped Mrs. Denison; and Joan's work slipped from her fingers.

Mrs. Denison had an unspeakable dread of diphtheria; it had once been a scourge in her own family, and the very name filled her with horror.

"They are not sure," said Major Denison, "but I'm afraid it must be, poor chap. There are three unmistakable cases I hear. Young Cardew is one of them."

"Anything but diphtheria," murmured Mrs. Denison, and Joan, who was gazing out of the window, said in an odd sort of voice, "It is a horrible thing, Helen——but—Mr. Penthony will recover."

"He may," said Mrs. Denison, with a sigh, and she thought of Curlie with a sudden pang. The child came into the room at that moment.

"Mother, do you know Pippin's ill?"

"Yes, dear. Father has just told us. How did you hear it?"

"Father's orderly told me, and he said, mother, that Pippin is mortal bad. Mayn't I go to him?"

"No, no! darling," cried Mrs. Denison, filled with terror at the very thought. "Not till he's nearly well. He has to be kept quiet you know, Curlie, and we shall hear every day how he is."

"Dear Pippin," said Curlie, with a little sigh, "I wish I might go to him." And then she looked across at Joan, whose head was bent low over her work.

"I do believe," murmured Curlie to herself, "that Joan is sorry after all."

Days passed quickly, and each day Penthony grew worse, and drifted towards that mysterious borderland from which all that skill and care could do were striving to draw him back. And each day Curlie begged to see him, and the answer was always "Not yet." She was still puzzling out in her little head the trouble which existed between Pippin and Miss Stafford, and it was not till one sultry day, when the news came that Pippin was sinking fast, that a sudden idea came to the child. She went in search of Joan, and found her in her own room, with suspiciously flushed cheeks and a general appearance of depression about her which did not escape Curlie's vigilance.

"Joan," she said, solemnly, "you've been crying. Pippin is worse. Tell me, Joan." She gave Miss Stafford's arm a little shake.

"Yes, dear, he is," said Joan, in a choked voice, and Curlie looked at her for a moment.

"He might die," she murmured, with a touch of awe in her blue eyes; then she threw her arms round Miss Stafford's neck.

"But you are sorry, Joan—say you are sorry.

"Sorry!" echoed Miss Stafford. "Oh! Curlie, darling——" and the child holding her tightly felt that Joan was crying as if her heart would break.

"Don't, dear Joan," she said in her soft little voice, "I knew you were sorry, but oh! if you could only tell Pippin."

"Ah! if I could," sighed Joan, and the idea in Curlie's head developed into a sudden resolution.

"Would it be all right then?" she asked, and Joan nodded.

"But it's too late, Curlie," she said, and the child repeated:

"Too late?"

Was it?

The news that Pippin was worse was only too true. He was sinking fast. He had come to that fatal stage when it seemed a happy thing to die; he was so tired. Long and bravely had the doctor fought death, and kept him at bay, and Pippin had unconsciously fought too;

Digitized by Google

but now—well he didn't care, and only begged to be left alone.

"He's giving up," groaned the doctor, "and that's pretty well fatal. Poor chap!"

He lay in a state of semi-stupor, turning his head away impatiently when they brought him nourishment. The doctor watched him in despair, and yet he had had such a good chance—with his youth and strength—against even that terrible disease which had clutched him by the throat and almost suffocated the life out of him. Now it was exhaustion which had laid such a deadly hold on him, and he was drifting very fast towards that distant border over which no man may return when once he has crossed it.

The morning had dawned cool and beautiful, and the patient lay motionless and silent, save for a murmur which broke now and again from his parched lips. The young doctor had been up all night, and now he was able to snatch a couple of hours' rest in an adjoining room.

Everything was very silent.

No one heard a little footstep, and the cautious turning of the door handle. No one saw, alas! the dainty little figure which stole across the matting-covered floor to the bedside, and Curlie stood, a little alarmed at her own daring, beside her Pippin.

She watched him for a moment with bewilderment in her forget-me-not blue eyes, then laid a small cool hand on his hot one. How thin he was! and so hot. Poor, poor Pippin!

She touched his cheek with her hand, and he stirred a little and opened his eyes.

"Pippin," she said in her eager little voice, "Pippin, dear."

Somehow the cloud which had rested on him melted away, and consciousness returned to him for a moment.

"My sweetheart," he said, hoarsely, in a voice so faint and husky, "Curlie . . . why . . . are you . . . here?"

"I wanted to see you so much," she said, breathlessly, "and, oh! Pippin, I'm so sorry you've been ill. But you'll be better soon."

He did not speak, and Curlie added softly:

"Joan is sorry, Pippin."

"Joan!" There was such pitiful eagerness in the tired blue eyes. Somehow, he did want to live after all. Life was very beautiful, and he was young.

"Yes, she cried so, Pippin. Oh! you can make it up now, and she said if she could only tell you it would be all right, so I came, Pippin, and no one knows I'm here, but I wanted to tell you myself."

"Darling," he muttered hoarsely, and Curlie laughed.

"It's all right, Pippin dear. I mustn't stay now. Get better soon."

She touched his poor thin cheek with her soft warm lips, and turning as she went out into the verandah, waved her hand. Then the vision vanished. Surely it must be a vision.

The doctor coming in later found his patient semi-conscious.

"I made a poor fight," he muttered weakly, "but I'll do better now."

And he did; while the doctor marvelled at the sudden change in his patient's condition, and little did he guess the cause.

Curlie went home in a gleeful state of mind. No one knew of her visit. She had managed it beautifully, she told herself. And how glad Joan would be! Dear Joan, who was so sad, with dark circles round her eyes, telling of miserable, sleepless nights. It never occurred to the child that she had done any harm, and that night when her mother came to see her in bed, she told her of her visit, and the reason for it. But Mrs. Denison's heart stood still with a terrible, unspeakable fear, and later in the night when Curlie woke with a cry, "I'm so thirsty, mother, and my throat hurts," the dread grew.

"Was it to be diphtheria again?"

III.

The news that Major Denison's Curlie had diphtheria flew through the station like wildfire, and there was hardly a heart in the place that did not ache for the mother, who watched untiringly beside her darling as she lay flushed and restless, her blue eyes brilliant with fever, and her little hoarse, choked voice crying for a drink—always a drink. Sometimes she wandered a little, and then her cry was always for Pippin and Joan, and tears flew to Miss Stafford's eyes as she listened to the husky little voice. She too had her fair share of the nursing; she had insisted on it, and to satisfy her the Denisons gave way. Her soft voice and tender hands always pacified Curlie when everything else failed.

Digitized by Google

The terrible weeks dragged by slowly, and every day the child grew weaker, and an awful fear clutched Mrs. Denison's heart. Every day news came that Pippin was fighting his way back to life; that he was stronger, better, until one day he was pronounced convalescent, and out of the doctor's hands.

The very first use he made of his liberty was to crawl round to the Denisons' quarters; the news about Curlie had been carefully kept from him, and all unconscious of the danger which threatend his little sweetheart, he managed to reach the gate, when coming slowly down the path, under the acacia trees, he saw—Joan. A glad light flew to his tired, blue eyes, as he caught sight of her. She did not see him at first, as he stood outside the gate.

"Joan!" he said, and she looked up with a little cry.

"You!" she said, breathlessly. "You" —— and at the look in her dear face Penthony made a movement to open the gate, but Miss Stafford threw out her hands appealingly.

"No, no," she cried, "don't come near me."

"But I'm all right," he said, eagerly, "there's no danger of infection now."

"Ah! not you," she said, "but don't you know there may be infection from me? Is it possible that you have not heard that Curlie—Curlie is—ill?"

"My God! Curlie—and they never told me. Joan—is it—diphtheria?"

Miss Stafford nodded, and murmured something; tears choked her voice. "We can do nothing," she said presently, "it is terrible to see her, and all the time she talks of—you. Oh! Ronny—" (the old familiar name slipped from her unawares) "it will break her mother's heart."

There was a miserable silence, somehow there was a big lump in Penthony's throat. "And I can do nothing," he said at last, "not even see her. But, Joan—how did she catch it?"

"She went unknown to us to see you when you were ill—and that night—she first complained."

Then it came back to Penthony that what he had thought a dream must have been reality; the dream in which a dainty little figure had stood beside him, and laid cool hands on his, and murmured that "Joan was sorry." And then the child had kissed him. Dear Heaven!

"I must go back," said Miss Stafford's tired voice, "Curlie will want me. Goodbye."

"Tell her I shall come every day to hear about her, Joan. She will always be in my thoughts."

He watched her disappear into the house, and then turned away slowly, with something like a mist in his eyes. To think that Curlie, his little sweetheart, was lying ill with that horrible demon clutching at her throat and choking out her life, and he could do nothing—nothing to save her. The thought that she had caught the disease from him only added to his pain, and that night Ronald Penthony prayed as he had never prayed before that his sweetheart might be spared to the mother, to whom the child was dearer than life, and who was even now hoping against hope.

It was the next day that he went round to the Denison's bungalow. Everything was very still, and as he reached the door he could hear the ponies stamping in the stable. A groom appeared at that moment, followed by a little fox terrier, who crept up to Penthony's side and looked up at him with pitiful entreaty.

"Miss Curlie——?" began Penthony, and something in the man's face choked the words back.

"Missie died—early this morning, sir," and a sudden, awful faintness swept over him. He staggered.

"Hold up, sir—there—it's orful—and the dog frets its life out."

"Thanks, White—was it—sudden?"

"Quite peaceful, sir, so I heard."

He turned away. So—it was all over. As he got back to his quarters he noticed that the dog—Curlie's dog—had followed him.

"Poor Jess," he said, and the dog whined and licked his hand. He was still weak after his terrible illness, and now—this! A rush of tears blinded him and he knew no more.

* * * * *

It was a week before Penthony was able to crawl out again. The shock and weakness had laid him low, and even now he was but a wreck of his former self.

He was walking slowly along the sandy road which led to the Denisons' quarters. At the gate he caught sight of a slender figure in black, and hastening on he overtook Miss Stafford.

Digitized by Google

"Joan," he said, "Joan, dear."

Speech was beyond her, and there were tears in her eyes as she looked at him; but somehow, the next moment his arms were round her, and she was hiding her sorrow on his shoulder.

There was no need for speech after all. No need for explanations, or anything else.

Curlie's tender little hands had brought them together once more, after the years of coldness which had rolled away. Curlie's little voice it was that came to them out of the sad past.

"Kiss and be friends."

Then the story was told of the reason for the child's visit to him, and Penthony's eyes grew very tender as he listened.

"It was for us," said Joan, huskily, "Oh! Ronny—to think of the terrible price which was paid for our happiness—a mother's heart broken, and—our Curlie gone. To the very end she thought of you. "Give my love to Pippin—and—and—be good to him, Joan," were her last words."

There was a long, long silence.

* * * * *

Mrs. Denison went home with Joan, who promised not to leave her till Penthony came to fetch her; and during the years of happiness which are before them, Pippin and Joan will never forget her to whom they owe all—whose tender little hands had gathered up the broken threads and bound them together once again.

There is a picture now in Mrs. Penthony's room of a sweet face with glorious hair, and forget-me-not blue eyes; a face which lingers long in your memory when you have seen it, and underneath is inscribed:

"Curlie, Pippin's Sweetheart."

Digitized by Google

How to Give a Christmas Party.

By LUCIE HEATON ARMSTRONG.

CHRISTMAS is the children's carnival, so perhaps we had better begin our account of the festivities of the season with the all-important juveniles, never so important as at this particular time of year. All manner of amusements are prepared for the children home for the holidays, but nothing pleases better than a party given at home—their very own party, to which they can invite their little friends, and take an active part in all the preparations. The names of the tiny hosts and hostesses figure on the invitation-cards, and it is considered in better taste to have the name shorn of the prefix, thus: "Katie and Jacky," or even "The little Browns," "at home" on such a day. Here is another form which has lately gained acceptance: "We are giving a little party on January 6th, from 4 to 8. Can you come?" A quaint little picture, representing some children carrying all the paraphernalia of the tea-table, comes next, and lower down on the card is inscribed "To Aunt Jane (or whoever it may be). From Mollie and Jack." If there is any special attraction, such as "dancing" "conjuring," or "Punch and Judy" (most welcome words of all!), this can be written at the right-hand lower corner. The little guests set to work to reply, and we know how lengthy a business is the answering of an invitation when it has to be done in a large round hand on a small sheet of paper. However, after many exciting episodes, the little composition is finished, and Johnnie and Jacky are duly informed that Mary and Fanny Greenaway are most happy to accept their kind invitation for January 6th. Happy is, indeed, scarcely the word, for the party haunts the children by night and day, and they would arrive a good hour before the time if only they were allowed. Punctuality is correct at a children's party, however, and though the little ones must not arrive an hour before the time, they may arrive within a quarter of an hour of the invitation, not an hour or so late, as is the custom of their elders. The children of the house should be trained to behave nicely at their own party, they should be taught to bear their part in the responsibility of receiving, as this is a thing which can scarcely be learnt too early in life. The children should stand at the door of the drawing room, shaking hands with the little guests as they arrive; the father and mother should stand a little further in, and greet the children next. Tea is announced within half an hour of the time mentioned in the invitation, and the children adjourn to the dining-room, where they find a pretty tea-table prepared for them, with urns of tea and coffee at either end. The governess and the eldest daughter of the house usually pour out the tea and coffee, the servants handing the dishes of cakes, etc., to the children. Tea for the "grown-ups" is generally served at the same time in an adjoining apartment, the servants standing behind the buffet and pouring out. The guests now adjourn to the drawing-room, and the revelry begins. The amusements should be varied, as children quickly tire of any game if it is carried on too long. The constant changes in the figures of the cotillion make it eminently suitable to a children's party, only providing that it is led by two people who are thoroughly conversant with the figures. They should not take part in it themselves, but devote their whole energies to the direction of the juveniles.

At the end of the cotillion comes a distribution of presents, and this should be done by the children of the house. Two of the children come in wheeling a large cart or wicker wheelbarrow full of presents which they give to the little guests. Sometimes these presents are quite simple—little sets of red note-books, pocket-books, work-cases, pencil cases, or paint-boxes—almost any little thing is a pleasure to a child ; sometimes sprays of flowers are given instead—sprays for the little girls and buttonholes for the boys. Whilst the cotillion is in progress the dining-room can be cleared, and the children adjourn there to find some entertainment prepared for them—a conjurer, some amateur "niggers," Punch and Judy, or a little play. A party of this kind is more effective when fancy dress is added to its charms—the period or style desired should be stated on the cards, such as "Greenaway," "Directoire," or even "Bal blanc." In the latter case any style may be worn, as long as the dress is carried out in white. A bal blanc is greatly improved by the employment of the kind services of the limelight man, who throws different coloured lights on the dancing figures. Whether the children wear fancy dress or evening dress, it is etiquette for grown-up people to wear ordinary visiting dress on these occasions, merely discarding their heavy wraps, and retaining their bonnets and gloves. It is purely a children's party and the adult visitors are simply invited to look on. It will be seen that rather a grown-up entertainment is in favour for juvenile parties, whereas grown-up people indulge in rather infantile pleasures at this season of the year. It is no good to go out to Christmas parties if you don't know how to play games.

Digitized by Google

All sorts of eccentric amusements are proposed, and it is the part of the guest to enter into them with apparent pleasure. All manner of nondescript parties are given between Christmas Eve and Twelfth Night, at which the greatest good-temper must prevail, and the Lord of Misrule is king. People of every age are invited, and the old join for the time being in the amusements of the young. The little girl of fifteen "not out" may enjoy the pleasure of appearing at a party of this nature, the old friend of the family comes in to watch the dancing, and the children sit up till unheard-of hours on the plea that it is only once a year. The house has been made to present a thoroughly festal appearance through the medium of many devices in holly and evergreens, the great bunch of mistletoe hangs in the hall, and a "Welcome" in holly berries greets the visitor on entering ; mirrors and doorways are wreathed with the Empire festoons, which form the one and only way of rendering Christmas decorations artistic. The holly-leaves must be taken off their stalks and threaded singly on to a long piece of green thread ; you now have a flexible rope of greenery, which can be adapted into all kinds of pretty shapes. Allow it to fall in two festoons (like the "swags" you see on old china), tying up the centre with a bow of pale-blue ribbon. The festoon must never stop at the exact point where it is fastened, but a couple of feet of greenery must fall at either side. Little swags of holly leaves may edge the chandelier, and the room should resemble a green bower. Coffee is served to the visitors on first arrival, and the time between this and supper is generally filled up with games, in which all can join. Musical chairs, dumb crambo, twenty questions, and other time-honoured institutions are indulged in by all the party, for everyone must be a child for this occasion, and all should play their part with spirit, and try to get rid of the English characteristic of mauvaise honte. "Twenty questions" is always much more successful if played in the form of clubs ; two people should go out, and the rest of the party should be divided into two, each section joining a separate circle. The same word should be chosen by both sets. The two outsiders are then called in, and one goes into the centre of each circle, and eagerly asks questions in an undertone. "Is it this? Is it that? Animal? Is it anything to wear? Is it white? Is it black? Is it worn by somebody who is well known to the public? Does she dance? Does she sing at the opera?—at the theatre?—at a music-hall?" Here there is a moment's pause for inspiration, and the questioner (who has been only fed by "yes" and "no" all this time) bursts out triumphantly with the solution to the problem, "Is it one of Yvette Guilbert's long black gloves?" Having guessed aright, he takes his place in the other circle, taking with him the person by whom the secret was betrayed. The game commences anew, and the club which betrays its secrets gets gradually smaller, and is finally swallowed up in the opposing faction.

Another amusing game is the following : Three coins—two florins and a shilling—are placed on the floor at the upper end of the room ; a member of the party is blindfolded and provided with a long stick, and told to walk in a straight line from the bottom of the room to the top, and to pause and place the end of the stick on one of the coins. This is done by each member of the party in turn, the one who touches the coin being allowed to take it away. It is not so easy a performance as it sounds, for very few people are able to calculate the distance or the direction when once they are deprived of their sight. Supper is generally served about eleven, and this may be "sit down" or "stand up," according to the taste of the hostess. The latter plan is perhaps the most common, the large table being covered with dainties, the ladies sitting round the room, and the gentlemen waiting on them. The refreshments take the form of sandwiches of various descriptions, oyster patties, aspic jellies, sweets of various kinds, and plenty of bonbons for the young people. The table should be decorated with scarlet flowers, with a table centre of scarlet silk. After supper a dance will be most acceptable to the young people, and the evening should terminate with "Sir Roger," in which all the company can join. A party of this description is often given on New Year's Eve, and in this case the amusement must be carried on till the mystic hour of twelve. The party should adjourn to the hall a few minutes before the time to welcome the New Year in with an open door. One of the company (a son of the house, if possible) should be sent outside to be what the Scotch call "the first foot." He should come in with a bottle in one hand and some bread in the other, and wish all the company a Happy New Year. "Auld Lang Syne" is then sung with all the company holding hands, and the party then breaks up, and the merry evening is over.

Digitized by Google

LUCIE HEATON ARMSTRONG.

INTO A FAR COUNTRY.

A house of death—and yet no gloom
Has met me at the door;
A pleasant place I find it still,
As it has been of yore.
The hands that set the rooms aright,
The feet that tread the floor,
Are no less swift to serve her now
Then they have been before,

The chamber of her soul she swept,
And garnished it within;
A place of sweet propriety
And fragrance it has been,
To which a holy visitor
Most gladly entered in,
For to the inmate of the room
This guest was near of kin.

And now both host and guest have gone
Beyond the utmost star;
The darkened chamber they have left
To dwell in lands afar.
A fair estate they two have won,
Which hath nor hedge nor bar,
In the sweet light of God Himself,
Where many mansions are.

The little house upon the hill
Has never looked more fair;
The fragrance of a hundred blooms
Is stealing up the stair.
The thrill of that long pilgrimage
Is on the quiet air;
Oh, blessed hour, than bliss itself
More wonderfully rare!

Florence E. Dunn.

Digitized by Google

MR. THOMAS ATKINS IN WAR TIME.

By The REV. E. J. HARDY, M.A., Chaplain to Her Majesty's Forces,
Author of "Mr. Thomas Atkins," "How to be Happy Though Married," etc.

A FRENCH soldier once quaintly said that it was his business to kill and be killed to earn his living. Certainly the British Thomas Atkins has not only given a good return for his rations of treck ox-beef in South Africa, but he has gained golden opinions for himself.

An officer of the Royal Army Medical Corps thus wrote from the front: "I thought that the British 'Tommy' was a degenerate sort of being, and that is certainly the impression he gives you at home; but out here it is quite different. He is a brick."

A friend of mine wrote when he was serving as a chaplain at the front: "The British soldier out here is another man. There is little of the familiar 'grousing' and bad language."

In time of peace Mr. Thomas Atkins takes his share of grousing or grumbling, for he is an Englishman. He detests route-marching, for instance, and is not above falling out of the ranks and going to hospital when there is only a very small blister on his foot. This is because he does not see the use of route-marching, and thinks that it has been invented only for his annoyance. In time of war, however, as we saw in South Africa, he will march thirty miles continuously on an empty stomach and bleeding feet. In a letter home General Buller wrote that he was "filled with admiration for British soldiers"; and then described how they had fought every day and nearly every night from February 14th to the 27th "broiled by the sun during the day, drenched by rain at night, lying but three hundred yards off an enemy who shoots you if you show as much as a finger. They could hardly eat or drink, and they got little sleep, and through all they were as cheery as could be."

Speaking of the same fortnight of fighting, a private soldier, in a letter which I saw, made light of all he had gone through; but added pathetically at the end: "Dear Sister,—I have had to cut the bottoms off my trousers to mend the other parts with."

It is when the excitement of battle is over that the strain is most felt. It then gets on the nerves and mind of some of the fighters, causing them to start up in their sleep and dream of the hidden foe. You will see strong men jump at the breaking of a stick or the slightest sharp noise.

Mr. Thomas Atkins takes war, and all that it brings with it, quite coolly as being in the day's work, and does in it very much what he does in the time of peace. If, for instance, he is fond of pets when things are peaceful, he sees no reason why he should not play with them when shells are flying about. Speaking of a long cannonade from the Boer works, a war correspondent wrote: "I sat on the rocks and watched. At my side the Gordons on picket duty were playing with two little white kids." The same writer tells us that not far from this place he met an ostrich, and that a soldier remarked: "He came up here some days ago, and he always stays here now we feed him and fool with him, and he seems very happy."

Nor does Tommy leave his love of sport at home when he goes to fight abroad. In South Africa the men had pet scorpions, and used to back their favourites. After one battle, in which several horses were taken from the Boers, there were races with the animals. After the races one horse, and not a bad one either, was sold for three cigarettes.

A dandy officer of the British Life Guards being asked how he felt during the battle ot Waterloo, said that he felt

Digitized by Google

"awfully bored!" This was an exceptional man, for as a rule British officers and men enjoy the wild pulsation of strife. They are like the Irishman who, seeing a crowd, sent his little daughter to find out what caused it, and to say that if there was a row daddy would like to be in it.

Speaking of Waterloo, Wellington said: "As to the way in which some of our ensigns and lieutenants braved danger—the boys just come from school—it exceeds all belief. They ran as at cricket." So, too, a soldier writing to his mother about a battle in South Africa said: "You can't believe how happy I was fighting against the Boers. I felt as if I were in a football match." Another soldier wrote to his mother: "I shall never forget the day (of the battle of Colenso) as long as I live. The first few minutes of the action makes you queer, I can tell you. Then you don't take any notice of it. I was laughing and joking just the same as if I was sitting down in that dear old corner at No. 14, Alexander-road" (his home).

The campaign in South Africa showed many things, but two especially—first that our short-service soldiers could fight; and, secondly, that they would face the fire of up-to-date weapons, which some had thought would be beyond the endurance of human nerves. Those who have not seen active service at all, or who have seen it only on the old conditions, do not know what a battle is like when smokeless powder and long-range weapons are used. Tommy Atkins up-to-date and "our brother the Boer" have introduced us to that knowledge.

War is horrible, but it brings to the surface the good that is in Thomas Atkins. Mr. Frederick Treves, one of the eminent civilian consulting surgeons who went to the war, wrote thus about our soldiers: "Their unselfishness was many times very marked. An orderly was bringing some water to a wounded man lying on the ground near me. He was shot through the abdomen and he could hardly speak owing to the dryness of his mouth, but he said: 'Take it to my pal first. He is worse hit than me.'" A private of the 2nd East Surrey Regiment thus wrote after the battle of Colenso: "A sergeant of the Irish Fusiliers and a gunner of the Artillery showed an instance of true grit. One was shot in the head and the other in three places about the legs and body, and when the doctor saw them he asked what was the matter. The sergeant said: 'Sure I'm only shot in the head and the other fellow in three places.' They were helping one another along."

Speaking of the individual gallantry shown by men at Ladysmith, General Sir George White gave the following instance: "During an artillery duel there was a sergeant, Boseley by name, in command of one of the guns, sitting rather doubled up on the trail of his gun. A shell took off one of his legs high up on one side and took an arm out of the socket, and he fell across the trail of the gun, as they thought, an inanimate speechless mass; but to the astonishment of every man amongst them a voice came from the mass inciting them on to their duty, and saying, 'Here, you men, roll me out of the way and go on working the gun.'"

A colour-sergeant of the Gordon Highlanders who knew this artillery sergeant, and who himself had got seven wounds in the same engagement, told me that the day before he behaved thus bravely the sergeant had fainted when he saw another man's leg taken off by a shell.

Before the Boer war came to correct the softness and luxuriousness which were beginning to enervate us, I heard a naval officer say that we needed a big war to teach us how much we could suffer. Soldiers on active service learn how much they can dare and endure, and they learn to respect courage, patience and a simple mode of life in others. Writing to his parents from South Africa, a private said: "To see our smart officers, God bless them! roughing it like navvies, makes you respect them and no mistake."

We are so accustomed to read of officers saying, when mortally wounded, to their men: "Do your duty, my lads, and never mind me," that their self-forgetfulness almost ceases to surprise. What is it like to be in a first battle and to be wounded? Perhaps Lord Wolseley was right when he said that no pleasure equals the excitement of fighting, but it is an acquired taste, and the first field of battle in which a man finds himself is, for some time at least, a disagreeable place. The man who says that he was not afraid, and did not wish himself well out of a first battle, is a liar. The bravest soldiers are often most afraid when they first face an enemy, just as the grandest orators are most nervous when they begin to speak.

Digitized by Google

As a rule, soldiers are so much excited that they hardly know what they do in battle. I have now in my charge as chaplain the 21st Lancers who won fame at Omdurman. I often ask the men what were their feelings during the famous charge they made. They say that they do not remember anything about it in the day-time, but that it occasionally comes to them at night like a fevered dream.

How do soldiers feel when wounded? Judging from what many of them say, it would seem that when a man is hit by a bullet, even if it be in a vital part, he is numbed, and scarcely feels any pain at first. A nurse at Wynberg Hospital wrote home that she was amazed at the way some of the men, though "positively riddled" with bullets, got well. "One man had been shot five times, but was quite lively. I asked if he felt much pain. He replied: 'No; only one shot that went through my left lung caught my breath the first few days and hurt a bit.'" A Rifle Brigade man who was in the fighting at Colenso, wrote: "One poor fellow was wounded no less than three times—in each arm and in the right thigh—and yet he was walking without assistance. He passed near me, and said, with a laugh: "It's a bit warm up there; they have hit me three times, but have not rung the bell yet." Another man, though wounded in three places, said that the only thing he was sorry for was that he had left his smokes and his matches behind in his pistol holsters. From Bloemfontein a soldier thus wrote after the battle of Paardeberg: "The only grievance I have is that during the battle I lost thirty-two shillings, but I can't grumble, for when I lost only thirty-two shillings, many a poor fellow lost his life; so, instead of grumbling, I thanked God." So, too, my friend, the chaplain already quoted, says that after the battle of Belmont the men bore their wounds, "not only without complaint, but with an unaffected gratefulness for not being worse, and for having escaped at all."

And when they are in hospital, our Tommies are so grateful and obedient that the sisters say they make splendid patients. "How can I thank you enough, sister, for what you have done for me?" said an Irish soldier. "There's no use praying for you, for there is a place in Heaven reserved for the likes of you." And the implicit trust which the soldier puts in those who have the care of him when he is sick, is quite touching.

Writing of the siege of Ciudad Rodrigo, George Napier said: "I was a field-officer of the trenches when a thirteen-inch shell from the town fell in the midst of us. I called to the men to lie down flat, and they instantly obeyed orders, except one of them, an Irishman, and an old marine, but the most worthless drunken dog, who trotted up to the shell the fuse of which was still burning, and, striking it with his spade, knocked the fuse out; then, taking the immense shell in his hands, brought it to me, saying, 'There she is for you now, yer 'anner. I've knocked the life out of the crater.'"

Coolness in the presence of shells, which are to most men's nerves very trying, was found in the soldiers engaged in South Africa as well as in the veterans of the Peninsula campaign. A soldier, also an Irishman, in the late Boer war, was stooping down unloading forage. A Boer shell entered the ground five yards from him. He did not look up, but said to himself: "Ach, go to blazes with ye!" At the battle of Busaco the firing was so fierce that Wellington, with his whole staff, dismounted. One of them, however, Napier by name (one of the famous fighting trio of the name) fiercely refused to dismount, or even to cover his red uniform with a cloak. "This is the uniform of my regiment," he said, "and in it I will show, or fall this day." He had scarcely uttered the words when a bullet smashed through his face and shattered his jaw to pieces. As he was carried past Wellington he waved his hand and whispered through his torn mouth: "I could not die at a better moment." This was brave but stupid, and there was too much of the same sort of stupid bravery at the beginning of the Boer war. Officers got themselves and their men killed quite unnecessarily. Probably some of them were polite enough to regret that they were dressed in khaki instead of scarlet, as this gave the Boers more trouble to hit them.

Still, the South African campaign has proved, literally up to the hilt, that our present soldiers are of the same stuff as the men who fought under Wellington in the Peninsula, and that "there is no beating them, in spite of their generals."

E. J. HARDY.

Digitized by Google

The Pilgrim Fathers' First Christmas.

By EVERETT E. HALE, D.D.

THE first Christmas on record is that which passed a few days after the Pilgrim Fathers and Mothers landed. There is, naturally enough, a certain confusion about the landing of the Fathers at Plymouth, and the dates for our celebrations. I say "naturally enough," because there are two landings to be celebrated; because the change from Old to New Style affects the days of commemoration; because there was one mistake made in the calculations by changing Old Style to New; and, fourthly, because this mistake has generally, but not always, been corrected. Let me, then, put in order the essential points.

After the Mayflower, with her hundred and one settlers on board, was safe in the harbour at the end of Cape Cod, some of the leaders started in their "shallop" to find a place for their colony. These people rested in Plymouth harbour, on Sunday, December 11th. Monday, December 12th (Old Style), they sounded the harbour, and "marched into the land." This was the memorable landing of the Pilgrim Fathers, which, with the addition of nine days to change the style, is celebrated on December 21st. By a mistake, for fifty years or more ten days were added, and where this is done the celebration is on the 22nd. It is interesting to observe that the real landing was on the shortest day of the year. They had no time to lose. They returned across the bay to their ship, brought her back to Plymouth harbour, and came there safely on December 10th (Old Style); on the 18th they "went a-land," on the 20th they called on God for direction, and went ashore again, made a rendezvous, left twenty people ashore, and went back to the ship, "resolving in the morning to come all ashore and to build houses." But the next day was snowy and wet, so that they could not go ashore. At night it was so tempestuous that the shallop could not land their food as soon as they wanted it. The Mayflower had to anchor and ride with three anchors ahead. In the midst of this poor Richard Britteridge died. Perhaps we ought to remember Richard Britteridge in our celebrations. He is what the Roman poets would have called the Protesilaus of this epic. And they could not all land on the 23rd. Some of the men did, and felled and carried timber.

Sunday they rested. The people on shore thought they heard savages, but all was quiet. Now comes the first Christmas. For the careful reader must observe that Christmas is on December 25th, whether the style be old or new. "Monday, the 25th day, we went on shore." And if, as seems probable, the women went on shore for the first time, there is the place and time for Sargent's picture of the landing, where you see Mary Chitton and Mrs. Winslow and the dog. That was not a bad celebration of Christmas. And I think some of them—Mrs. Winslow perhaps — remembered the Christmas of their childhood. But that little girl with her hood bound on her head had perhaps never heard of Christmas at all. Now it was on this day that the men went to work. I think that William Brewster and William Bradford recollected very well what they were doing. I think they were glad to make the others work on that day. The reader can judge, however, when he reads the entry in Bradford's journal:—

"Monday, the 25th day, we went on shore, some to fell timber, some to saw, and some to rive, and some to carry. So no man rested all that day."

Digitized by Google

This seems to me grim, and to have been put in on purpose. "But towards night some, as they were at work, heard a noise of some Indians, which caused us all to go to our muskets. But we heard no further; so we came on board again, and left some twenty to keep court of guard. That night we had a sore storm of wind and rain."

"Monday, the 25th, being Christmas Day, we began to drink water aboard."

I think this also is rather grim, that they began their enforced temperance on this day. But he goes on: "But at night the master caused us to have some beer, and so on board we had divers times some beer, but on shore none at all." Please to observe, then, that, as has been said already, and as cannot be said too often, on Christmas Day "no man rested" while they laid these foundations of an empire. "Forty or fifty Englishmen, in hats and doublets and hose, of the fashion which you may see in your fable illustrations in Æsop, with those odd English axes that men used then, and with their double-handled saws, with a few beetles and stores of wedges, will make your tableau." I have once and again seen the opera of "I Puritani," and have heard them sing the magnificant chorus, "Suoni la tromba." I saw once in Italy, in the eagerness of the Italian revolution which united Italy again, the enthusiasm of the Florentine audience. The Puritans of the play came forward and waved the Italian flag and the Red Cross of England together, as they sang the chorus. The enthusiasm reached its very crisis when, in the midst of the scene, which was set for an English guard-house, the chorus sang "Gridando Libertà." For those words had been forbidden by the Austrian rulers of Italy since the opera was first produced. The poor Italians who represented English Puritans had been compelled to wave their flags and to sing "Gridando Lealtà." "Crying loyalty!" was the phrase put upon the lips of people who were represented as engaged in rebellion against their King! I have seen the same opera, when the American Stars and Stripes, with the English Red Cross, were waved together and where the people sang together "proclaiming liberty!"

Mrs. Hemans tells us that the Pilgrims sang "hymns of lofty cheer" while they were at work on the shore there that winter. They had not the same libretto as we, but I think these were the words they sang:

O take us, Lord, unto thy grace,
Convert our minds to Thee;
Show forth to us Thy joyful Face,
And we full safe shall be.
From Egypt, where it grew not well,
Thou brought'st a vine full dear;
The heathen folk thou didst expel,
And then didst plant it here.
Thou didst prepare for it a place,
And set her roots full fast,
That it did grow and spring apace,
And fill the land at last.
The hills were covered round about
With shade that from it came.
And eke the cedars high and stout,
With branches of the same.

And I like to set the scene of my opera on the shore of the brook there, as they finished the hard-tack and salt-junk which they had for their dinner, with perhaps a roast pigeon or two which John Billington might have shot with his snapchance. Another fancy of mine is that the girls and the women, after they had attended to the fire, perhaps after they had roasted those very pigeons, strayed up the stream, with perhaps a stout boy to take care of them, or perhaps some romantic man who could not handle a cross-cut saw. And then I feel quite sure that they must have picked their hands full, and then their aprons full, of cranberries, and that they brought them down to the fire, and that some mother of the party recollected the Lincolnshire cranberries, and how much better these were than those. Then, is it going too far to suppose that in one of the logs the men cut down there was honey, and that they boiled the cranberries and the honey together, and that after the jelly was cold the women, at least, had it for their dinner? I have overhauled a good many of the Cotton Manuscripts looking for a letter that might tell this, and though I have never found it I still have hopes that some such letter may turn up. A good thing to add to the bill of fare of that day would be a roast turkey, if John Billington had only seen one and brought it down with his fowling-piece. The turkeys were larger then than they are now; they could not have flown very high when they weighed sixty pounds, as undoubtedly some of them did: and as they had never been persecuted by anything but a flint arrow in its short flight, I think they might have come near enough for Billington to kill one.

Digitized by Google

If only this same letter should reveal the fact that he did kill one, and did roast it, we should feel that William Bradford and William Brewster had been circumvented in their wish that there might be no feasting that day. But, fortunately or unfortunately, the discovery of Bradford's manuscript, which has just now been returned in such state to Massachusetts, shows that they had turkeys for their Thanksgiving feast of the next year; and the language used seems to imply that they had no turkeys the year before. Another of the letters which I have not found in the British Museum would have described this experience of John Billington: "Having become weary with cutting down a small fir-tree which had been allotted to him, he took his snapchance and shot with him, and, calling a dogge he had, to whom in the Low Countries the name Crab had been given, went after fowle. Crossing the open brook and climbing up the banke to an open place which was there, he found what had been left by the savages of one of their gardens, and on the ground, picking at the stalkes of the corne, a flock of large blacke birds, such as hee had never seen before. His dogge ran at them and frightened them, and they all took winge heavily, but not so quicke but that Billington let fly at them and brought two of them down—one quite dead, and one hurt so badly that he could not fly. Billington killed this, and tyed the two together; and following after the flocke had another shot at them, and by a goode Providence hurt three more. He tyed two of these together, and brought the smallest back to us, not knowing what he brought, being but a poor man and ignorant. Hee is but a lazy fellowe, and was sore tired with the weight of his burden, which was nigh fortie pounds. Soe soon as he sawe it, the Governour and the reste knew that it was a wild Turkie, and, albeit he chid Billington sharply, he sent four men with him, as it were Calebs and Joshuas, to bring in the firstlings of the lande. They found the two first, and brought them to us; but after a long search they could not find the others, and soe gave them up, saying the wolves must have eaten them. There were some that thought that John Billington had never seen them either, but hadde shot them with a long bowe."

Here is a scanty account of all that we know of the Christmas of these poor men and poor women, half of whom were to die before four months were over. It is pathetic indeed, in contrast to this, to read the statement in the forgotten annals of England of the same Christmas as it was celebrated here. While the Pilgrim Fathers were preparing the new empire which England lost by the folly of her King a hundred and fifty years afterwards, King James the Fool was celebrating Christmas in his own foolish fashion at home. He was coquetting at that time with the King of France, greatly to the annoyance of the braver Englishmen of his time. Just as the Christmas holidays came on, the King of France sent a well-equipped party of diplomatists to flatter or seduce James into just that alliance which the more independent Englishmen hated. The annals of such things are apt to be better preserved than those of woodcutters who are founding empires; and so we know that on this very Monday, the twenty-fifth day of December, the Ambassador of the French King started from Dover to go to London. "The Master of Ceremonies had sent him twenty carriages and three hundred horses for his suite (how poor Bradford would have exulted if he had had the meanest of those horses to haul logs for him!); there were elegant addresses made to him whenever he came through any village. At Gravesend he and his suite entered into twenty-five barges painted and hung with tapestry, and well adorned, and so in four days they arrived in London (the last time I went over the same distance it took us two hours). The palace of the late Queen had been magnificently and superbly arranged for him."

Then came visits of the King and of the Prince of Wales and of all the Ambassadors. The day of his reception he dined with fifty guests, and the Duke of Lennox, the Grand Master of England, served him. Then there were audiences, and receptions, and banquets and hunting parties. So the Sovereign of John Carver and Edward Winslow and William Brewster and William Bradford held wassail at Court, while they were blowing their fingers in the cold, and building their twenty-foot store-house.

EVERETT EDWARD HALE.

Digitized by Google

A Chat about Christmas Cards.

By HELEN MARION BURNSIDE.

"ARE cards 'going out'?" one often hears asked, and we can but refer questioners to the shop windows for a reply, where every small stationer and linendraper is making a fascinating and seductive show of cards, to the exclusion of their proper wares.

"We sell cards by the million," the manager of one of the oldest fine art publishing houses tells me. "Our output increases every year side by side with the demand, which this season is greater than ever."

Perhaps the strongest proof that the custom of sending cards still grows in public favour is the fact that most important firms have within the last year or two all migrated to larger and more imposing premises, while more and more new ones spring up and prosper annually. This should be good hearing, for each of the large firms employs many hundreds of hands of both sexes, from artists and authors down to the army of young girls who earn a livelihood as finishers, sorters, packers, etc. It would, therefore, mean ruin to thousands of people should the custom of sending cards go out of favour.

Even the small proportion of the public who are wont to grumble at the trouble of year by year selecting and sending out a hundred or so of these pretty trifles would, I venture to believe, find the social season rather a blank without the excitement of the postman's knock, which commences several days beforehand and reaches its climax with the special delivery on Christmas morning itself; while, as for the junior proportion of the community, Christmas for them would scarcely be Christmas without its cards.

It must be interesting to elder folk, who—like her Majesty the Queen—preserve in albums the cards they yearly receive, to look back at the first that were issued—it must have been thirty years ago when the fashion was in its infancy—poor, flimsy little bits of pasteboard, with crudely designed and coarsely coloured flowers or holly sprays, or perhaps a robin depicted thereon, with the addition of a doggerel rhyme, and contrast them with the artistic and literary merits of the dainty productions of the present day, when even the first artists, such as Sant and Marcus Stone, and poets of world-wide fame, such as Sir Lewis Morris and Dr. George Macdonald, do not disdain contributions from brush and pen in order more fitly to furnish forth our Christmas greetings, to say nothing of the army of smaller folks, whose skill and talent are yearly taxed in the cause.

As a writer of card verses for upwards of twenty-five years, the remark is often made to me in about September, "I suppose you are thinking of your Christmas verses? The cards will be out soon." It is not generally known that the literary matter is required a year beforehand, and that from the time an original design is accepted by a publisher, to its final completion, with lettering added, the process of producing a card occupies from six to eight months. A large proportion of the work is still done at the great Continental lithographic works, notably the colour printing; but of late, we are glad to state, English-made cards are growing in public favour and taking the place of foreign work, and some of the leading firms now produce their cards entirely in England, and on their own premises. Even those who have printing houses on the Continent produce the beautiful black and white cards, which have had so unprecedented a success, entirely at home, whilst all the designs are by English artists. Therefore about 80 per cent. of the entire cost of the production of cards is spent in England.

Digitized by Google

The demand for private cards is certainly on the increase, many heads of households preferring to save themselves the trouble of general selection by adopting this fashion. For my own part, I invariably start with the intention of doing so, but as invariably I succumb to the temptation of making my selection from general cards. The process and execution of private card work is much the same as in ordinary ones, though, of course, requiring a larger amount of detail. Many of them are, in fact, ordinary cards with private lettering substituted for general verses and mottoes.

The popularity of booklets and calendars also grows, supplementing as they do the Christmas and New Year's cards. They are issued in their thousands, and next New Year's Day, commencing as it does a new century, has been specially catered for in the matter of calendars, and there seems to be absolutely no end to the novel and ingenious forms taken by these pretty and truly artistic souvenirs, which, even when 1901 has passed away, will be worthy of preservation as mementoes of our entrance on a new era, and which will therefore possess an historical value. Some are small enough to carry in the purse or waistcoat pocket, others are to stand on the table, or are made to revolve by some clever mechanical means; but the greater number are to hang upon the wall, and these are shaped in all manner of attractive forms. There are also for this season really lovely booklet calendars printed in old English style on parchment with pendant seals. Some of these have as many as sixteen pages, several of which are left blank for memoranda. These latter are issued by Messrs. Raphael Tuck and Sons.

The booklets and calendars published by the Artistic Lithographic Company, who devote their best energies to this particular line, are always worthy of high praise. The booklets are prepared with great care and taste, both with regard to poetry and pictorial decoration; they are printed in Bavaria and some of them ought to rank as gift books, as they are quite imposing in appearance and are so beautifully printed and finished. Efforts have been made to make this season's collection of booklets more seasonable in character, and we are glad to remark that both illustrations and letter-press are decidedly more Christmassy. The poetry in many cases conveys the same kind of good wishes as cards do, and this is, I think, a distinct advantage, as booklet buyers of previous years have often made the complaint that both pictures and lettering treat of everything and anything but Christmas.

Messrs. Raphael Tuck and Sons, to whom I am indebted for the blocks which illustrate my chat on this interesting subject, may be termed the Fathers of Christmas Cards, since they tell us that "a record of upwards of thirty successful consecutive seasons lies behind them in the waning century;" hence they must be connected with the very first issues of which I have spoken. Their enterprise has created a gigantic business, which has grown and grown till it has landed the firm and its enormous staff of employees in the splendid block of buildings in Moorfields, known as "Raphael House."

Foremost amongst the great collection of novelties which they offer for this season's stand is the "Wedgwood" series. For the purpose of producing these I learn that Messrs. Tuck made special arrangements with the firm of the late Mr. Josiah Wedgwood, from whom they obtained the use of the designs of many eminent artists which are reproduced with so much truth and delicacy of finish that they are real gems of art. Next come the dainty black and white series, which are in all sizes and shapes, and in every variety of subject, at prices that will suit all purses. The winter landscapes, in particular, are so fascinating that few people will be able to resist them.

Digitized by Google

The "Mediæval" collection, in which the manners and customs of that period, as well as its distinctive style of decoration, are represented, is worthy of note. Many of these cards are reproductions of well-known pictures, the Madonna and Child, the Nativity, etc., the subjects being suggested by the sacred and legendary art of the period, and have corresponding quaintly-expressed greetings and mottoes. Nor does "Father Tuck" ever forget the children. A large portion of his marvellous collection is, as usual, devoted to them, and many and various are the devices, both for Christmas and New Year, which will presently delight the bright eyes of the juveniles.

It may not come amiss to quote here a letter from a friend who holds an important appointment in Burma, who tells me that on last Christmas morning he had to receive, according to custom, a deputation of native chiefs, who were the bearers of presents and good wishes. When the attendant ceremonies had come to an end each of these grave Indians solemnly presented him with a Christmas card, which, to his amusement, he found to be "Raphael Tuck" cards, with verses by myself.

Messrs. W. McKenzie and Co., one of the firms whose entire output of cards is executed in England, have a most lovely collection in the same style as the illuminated parchment work which took public fancy by storm and met with such unprecedented appreciation last season. This firm has for years past devoted its best efforts to the improvement and development of this special style, and the combination of illumination and black and white work on parchment is carried out with perfect taste and artistic feeling. Messrs. McKenzie have bestowed much patient research in the reproduction of old English decorative forms on some of their best series, which represent ancient Yuletide customs and traditions. These are combined with characteristic greetings, mottoes, and quotations, couched in the quaint phraseology which marked the period. There is also a series of greeting cards, specially designed for "absent friends," which will gladden many a wistful eye and longing heart across the sea, to whom they will veritably come like the "touch of a friendly hand."

It is a well-known fact that Her Majesty the Queen takes a special delight in Christmas cards, and each year has an immense collection submitted to her, from which she and her daughters make large selections. Not only are great numbers sent by the Royal family to each other, and to friends, but they take great pleasure in receiving them. The Queen has a large collection of albums, in which each season she causes the cards which she has herself received to be placed, and as long as Her Majesty thus sets the fashion there cannot be any danger of the popularity of Christmas cards dying out.

HELEN MARION BURNSIDE.

T

Digitized by Google

Photograph by] [Lafayette.

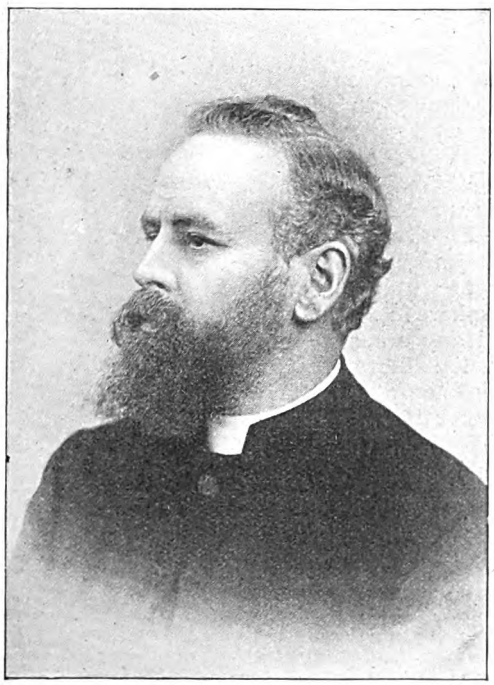
A CHARMING CHRISTMAS GUEST.

Digitized by Google

IN THE PUBLIC EYE

Men and Women who are Helping to Make the World Brighter and Better.

TO have charge of twelve thousand people, two-thirds of whom are foreigners, is not a light task for a vicar, but the Rev. J. H. Cardwell discharges the duty well. He is Vicar of St. Anne's, Soho, one of the principal foreign "colonies" in the Metropolis. Mr. Cardwell has qualified himself for the work by spending the whole of his ministerial life in London. His work began at Clerkenwell, where he became curate of St. James's in 1865, and after two years there the Bishop of London appointed him to the charge of the new district of St. Andrew, Fulham Fields, where market gardens were being rapidly covered with houses. Here, for nearly a quarter of a century, he distinguished himself as a builder of churches and the founder of new parishes. Five of the new Fulham churches, besides other parochial buildings, owe their initiation to him. In 1891, the Bishop of London appointed him to his present living in Soho.



REV. J. H. CARDWELL.

Photograph by J. A. O'Neill, 69, New Bond Street.

Having restored his own church of St. Anne's, Mr. Cardwell is now energetically promoting the rebuilding of the nave of St. Mary's, Charing Cross Road, lately pulled down as a dangerous structure by the County Council. The rector throws himself heartily into public and social work, and serves on various parochial boards. St. Anne's Vestry has been very successful in its crusade against disorderly houses, and has been greatly helped by the fighting qualities of the rector. Mr. Cardwell has had some strange experiences. At a wedding which once took place in his church, the police warned him that the bridegroom was an anarchist, and that they would "take their opportunity." Mr. Cardwell attached no importance to the matter, and after the ceremony, which passed off quietly, asked the police if they were not mistaken. "We have had a dozen men in the church," was the reply, "and have made some very useful observations." Not long ago, too, a woman appealed to the rector, with pathetic earnestness, to "unmarry" her!

Digitized by Google

DR. ROBERT WATSON.
Photograph by A. Donald, Dundee.

FEW names are better known north of the border than that of Dr. Robert Watson, while his wife, as "Deas Cromarty," has her own wide constituency in the south. "Bonnie Dundee," where they reside, may at one time have well deserved the adjective, but at present it is distinctly jute-y, yet neither the smoke from its factory chimneys nor the ecclesiastical atmosphere in which they toil seem to have had any other than a stimulating effect on the literary pair. That Dr. Watson has been able to find time and energy to publish "The Gospels of Yesterday" exorcising the shades of Drummond, Spencer and Arnold, "The Apostolic Age," three volumes of "The Expositor's Bible," edit a religious weekly and contribute to weighty reviews, while carrying on efficiently and enthusiastically all the work of a large church in a crowded neighbourhood, can only be explained on the ground that he is an Aberdonian by birth. In this particular, "equality of opportunity" was denied to his genial mate, for her forbears were Yorkish and Lancastrian; yet, despite this initial hardship, she has proved to be no whit behind her husband in industry and sparkle. As the daughter of a Wesleyan minister her early writings naturally found their way into the Wesleyan Bookroom, but the advent of the "British Weekly" widened the scope of her pen, while her articles in "The Young Man" and "The Young Woman," under the nom de plume of "Deas Cromarty," further extended her influence and the indebtedness of her readers. She enjoys journalism and believes in it as a power for good. All her works of fiction bear this out: "A High Little World," "This Man's Dominion," "Under God's Sky," "When Hearts are Young," "His Fault or Hers?" and "The Heart of Babylon." "The Journal and Letters of George Gilfillan"—a work highly prized in the north—was the joint labour of husband and wife. Dr. and Mrs. Watson both live quietly, as people must who do so much and such varied work, but Mrs. Watson lectures occasionally, and is one of the best women speakers in Scotland. She and her husband find their chief recreation in foreign travel, or a week snatched for a ramble into the Highlands. Whether by pen or voice they are both perpetually leavening the world for good.

"DEAS CROMARTY."
Photograph by A. Donald, Dundee.

Digitized by Google

ONE cannot be many minutes with Mrs. Travers Lewis without feeling the influence of her kindly genial manner that has made her so much beloved by the thousands of girls whom she has befriended. To them, perhaps, she is even now better known as Miss Ada Leigh. For it was as Miss Leigh that she started her homes for girls in Paris many years before she had become the wife of the Archbishop of Ontario. As so often happens, it was just a chance word that originated the idea in her mind. Miss Leigh was staying in Paris with her sister to study French, when in the course of a casual acquaintance with a work-girl she learned how friendless were the lives of American and English girls who were struggling in Paris, often for a mere subsistence. Immediately she invited this one girl to spend Sunday afternoons with her. Soon she found others to join her, until she had a little circle of fourteen girl friends, who came regularly every week, only too glad to meet with a welcome from one of their own countrywomen. Then came the year of the cotton famine, and Miss Leigh returned to her home at the Red Hall, Audenshaw, near Manchester, where she was soon busily helping the many women whom she found in great distress and poverty. It was not until three years later that she found herself again in Paris, when she at once set to work to hunt up her old friends In doing this she learned still more of the wretchedness, the misery, and the temptations the English girls suffered when living alone in this great city, so she set to work to gather some of them around her. So the idea grew. Her visits to Paris became more and more frequent, until at last the gift of one franc from one of those she had befriended sent to her with the words "a gift of love and faith for a girl's home in Paris" led to her taking the first apartment in 77, the Avenue Wagram, where she started her home. Here she received all English-speaking girls without distinction of class or religion; anyone who needed her help was welcome at all times; with the result that the home was soon more than full, and she was warned that such overcrowding would be considered illegal. Then came the hard work of collecting £10,000 to buy the whole house in the Avenue Wagram, but at this she did not flinch, and so well was her energy rewarded that in six weeks the whole sum had been subscribed. Since that the work has increased year by year, until at the present day we have the large, complete, and well-organised home that is year by year so great a boon to thousands of our countrywomen. It was not until 1889 that Miss Leigh married Bishop—now Archbishop—Travers Lewis of Ontario, which has partially separated her from her homes. But her interest in them is still as keen as ever, and although she will tell you that her first thoughts are with her husband's work in Canada, we cannot talk with her for long without finding out that the girls have lost none of her loving sympathy because she has formed closer ties and has widened the sphere of her labours.

MISS ADA M. LEIGH.

Photograph by the Stereoscopic Co.

IT is not surprising that Westmorland should become a nursery of song. In that land of mountain, lake, and waterfall—the refuge and inspiration of poets and the cherished home of a sturdy race—the spirit of music can only have been dormant—never dead. But it needed awakening and the awakening has come through Miss Mary Wakefield. Miss Wakefield is the daughter of the late Mr. William Wakefield, of Sedgwick, and her brother was a few years ago High Sheriff of the county. She is herself a gifted and highly trained singer with a passionate enthusiasm for her art, and she has, besides, untiring energy in organisation, and a persuasive personality which attracts those whom she desires to serve and at the same time commands the support of those able to aid her work. Some years ago Miss Wakefield set herself—to use her own words—"to bring the greatest pleasure of my own life as close as may be to the lives of others with less opportunities." Invoking the spirit of emulation as the handmaid of definite musical instruction, she began a series of singing competitions for the villagers of Westmorland, which, under her guidance and inspiration and largely through her own actual effort, have developed into a county Eisteddfod that is almost unique in its success. Many leading musicians of the day have become interested in the movement; high class choral music has been successfully undertaken, and at least one new work—Mr. Arthur Somervell's "Power of Sound"—has been specially written for the Westmorland singers. At the same time church and chapel choirs throughout the county have, according to local testimony, manifestly improved, an impulse has been given to singing in the village schools, and an interest in music has been kindled in the most secluded hamlets. The original aim of the movement has, in fact, been realised in a remarkable degree. Miss Wakefield has a beautiful home at Grange, overlooking Morecambe Bay, in which there are many souvenirs of celebrated people, whose friendship she has gained in her musical work, but of such personal mementoes she has none more cherished than those of John Ruskin. He always welcomed her to Brantwood, and he dedicated his "Sesame and Lilies" to "Mary Wakefield, to whose bright and gifted nature—good in the kindest sense—the author is thankful for some of the happiest hours of his old age."

Digitized by Google

MISS MARY WAKEFIELD.

IF some powerful personage should secure us a 45 per cent. increase in our incomes, and promise us a further increase speedily, we should doubtless be ready enough to say that the world was the brighter for his presence. This is the light in which Mr. Benjamin Pickard, M.P., is regarded by 50,000 Yorkshire miners, and by many thousands more elsewhere. The "King of the Miners" he is sometimes called, and certainly few men have exercised a greater influence on their class. Hence these lines. Mr. Pickard is literally a miner. He was born in a colliery village—Kipport, near Wakefield—in 1842, and he started work in the colliery at twelve years of age. But he has also been leader of others and a trades unionist from his youth up. He was secretary of a miners' lodge at sixteen, became successively assistant secretary and secretary for West Yorkshire in the seventies, has now for twenty years been secretary of the combined Yorkshire Miners' Association, and finally has become president of the Miners' Federation of Great Britain, which he practically brought into existence. He is a keen and tenacious fighter, but he combines generalship with pugnacity, and by persistent and skilful organisation he has gained power not only to rule the men, but successfully to negotiate with the masters. In the great strike of 1893, which has left its mark on his health, he fought for the principle of the living wage, and the establishment of a minimum wage as part of the basis of the existing Conciliation Board is a distinct triumph of his leadership. The movement for a compulsory eight hours day is not yet so successful, but Mr. Pickard sticks to it manfully,

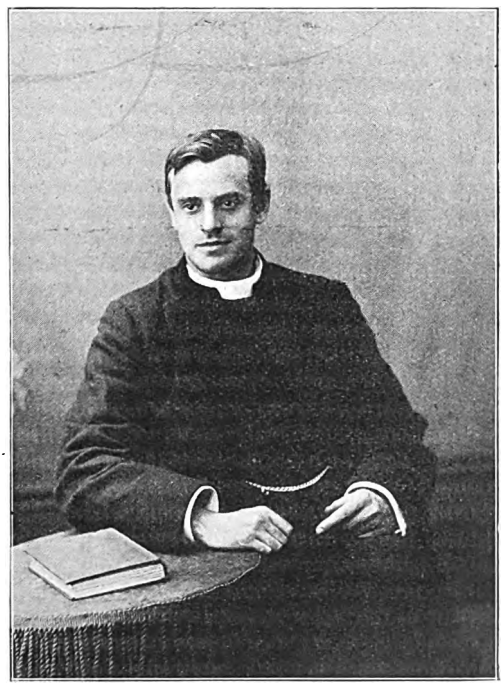
Digitized by Google

THE COUNTESS OF CARLISLE.
Photograph by Stiles, South Kensington.

though he himself, like many others who are not miners, works more than eight hours a day most days of his life. He represents in Parliament the Normanton division of the West Riding, and has one of the safest seats in the country.

THE Countess of Carlisle is one of the most devoted philanthropic workers of the day. Possessed of wealth and rank, she has always let her influence be on the side of social reform, and it is as a social reformer that she has occupied positions on both Parish and District Councils, and been a member of a School Board. She is probably best known to people in general as the President of the Women's Liberal Federation. Her party political work, however, is only a small portion of that which claims her attention. Possibly her greatest efforts are made in connection with the temperance cause. She is a prominent and valued member of the United Kingdom Alliance, and occupies a position on its Parliamentary Committee. It was temperance reform that first drew her into public life. She then organised Bands of Hope and other temperance societies on the family estates, and such was the energy she devoted to the work that the temperance movement became much strengthened in the North. Lady Carlisle is a stirring, eloquent, and powerful speaker. Of a commanding presence and musical voice, she holds her audiences spell-bound. Her democratic views and utterances do not always please those in her own rank of life. But she has an enormous influence over the women. She leads because they know that she endeavours to carry out personally the doctrines that fall from her lips. Lady Carlisle was one of the promoters of the Children's Holiday Scheme, which has proved such a blessing to the unfortunate children in the slums.

THE Pottery District is one of the most depressing in which to live and work. The surroundings are so grimy and dreary and the atmosphere is always thick and heavy with the black smoke belched forth from hundreds of chimneys. The clergy and ministers of all denominations who are constantly striving, under terrible disadvantages, to bring light into the lives of the toilers



REV. T. L. MURRAY.

Digitized by Google

may be deemed heroic. Not one of the least of these is the Rev. T. L. Murray, the Vicar of S.S. Mary and Chad, Longton. His parish is a large one and the average wage of the breadwinners of families is twenty-two shillings a week. Nine years ago Mr. Murray took charge of that part of Longton as a mission district. His only place of worship was a dilapidated iron church which had done duty in various parts of the country for many years. For five years it was patched and patched again until it was impossible to mend it more. In spite of the poverty of the district, Mr. Murray determined that a church must be built. With only £17 in hand a venture was made. Praying earnestly, the energetic clergyman set to work. Most of the money then needed was begged from his private friends, but the people themselves out of their poverty gave what they could afford. Some four hundred houses contributed weekly pence for two years. A stone church was erected and a house, destined for a public-house, was secured and turned into a vicarage. It was necessary for the carrying on of the work to find more money than had been raised, and Mr. Murray and a friend made themselves responsible for the amount. Yet £3,000 is needed to complete the good work already begun, as there are no parochial buildings in which to carry on the guilds, clubs, and other organisations which have been set on foot in order to help the people to withstand the allurements of the public-houses, dancing saloons, and other places of questionable amusement. Mr. Murray's is indeed a labour of love, for he receives no pecuniary benefit from his parish. There is a small endowment which goes to the support of a curate who helps the vicar in his work. Mr. Murray, with his energy, perseverance, and love for humanity, has made the district of S.S. Mary and Chad a bright spot of Church life in the Potteries.

MRS. BREWER.

Photograph by Lock & Whitfield, 178, Regent Street, W.

PHILANTHROPY and literature have not often been more successfully combined than they are in the person of Mrs. Brewer, the widow of the late well-known Dr. Brewer. Few of the schemes and associations which have for object the ameliorating the lot of the sick, the poor, and the miserable, but have the entire sympathy, and, wherever possible, the practical support of Mrs. Brewer. The plenitude of charities, however, renders it imperative that the sphere of even the most ardent philanthropist should be limited, and the choice of one or two deserving ones made. Mrs. Brewer is especially interested in the branch of the Ragged School Union which deals with the crippled and sick children, and many are the entertainments which she has organised on their behalf, and the bazaars and sales of work in which she has taken part. The great Assembly Hall in the Mile End Road has been the scene of several mammoth tea-parties for these little maimed ones of the metropolis, and picnics during the summer days have made bright spots in the lives of these "Drift Citizens." That excellent Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children has also a faithful friend in this benevolent lady, and "The Blind in Their Homes, under Mrs. Starey's fostering care," are often treated to some extra moments of happiness by her. That enormous mass of human beings designated under the generic title of the poor of the East and the north-east of London are not forgotten in the distribution of funds accruing from one of the concerts got up by Mrs. Brewer, and occasionally the Sailors' Homes, situated at Poplar, and other localities of London's great Orient have to thank her for many a cheery evening of music and song. For many of these entertainments Mrs. Brewer has, of course, to obtain assistance from her friends, but, at the same time as she is organising these, she is constantly busy with her needle, making comfortable garments for the poor, and dainty wares to tempt the pockets of the wealthy on their behalf. The London barmaids are occasionally Mrs. Brewer's guests, and the tact with which these young women are made to feel themselves at home in her hospitable house is deserving of all praise. Few women have to face greater temptation day by day than those who serve in the restaurants and refreshment rooms of such a city as London, and the little club or house in John Street, Bedford Row, so ably managed by Miss Gough, ought to have many earnest helpers amongst the advocates of Temperance.

Digitized by Google

REV. CANON GIBSON.
Photograph by Rosemont, Leeds.

DR. E. C. S. GIBSON has now been five years vicar of Leeds, and the gossips will soon be nominating him for every vacant bishopric. As the profound Tupper puts it, "A frequent, similar effect argueth a constant cause," and the last five vicars have all found their way rapidly to the Episcopal bench. Lord Salisbury might, indeed, do worse, when he is bishop-making, than follow Leeds precedents once more. Dr. Gibson, to begin with, has a good physique. The late Bishop Ryle is credited with at least one mild witticism in claiming that his clergy could always "look up" to him, and though perhaps not quite up to the Ryle standard in inches, the vicar of Leeds has the manly and dignified presence which one feels should always be associated with lawn sleeves. He moves about the city with a firm step, erect, alert, as with a purpose in life which he meant to fulfil, and the manifold duties of the vicariate are discharged by him with unfailing energy. Dr. Gibson, however, has other than physical qualifications for his position. For the responsibilities of leadership and influence which it involves, his fifteen years headship of Wells Theological College were an adequate preparation, and as a theologian and scholar he commands respect. In the pulpit he appeals to the intelligence rather than the emotions, but the hearer is, nevertheless, impressed with his earnestness; his style is direct and unaffected, and his enunciation distinct. On public questions which abut upon pastoral duty, such, for example, as education and temperance, he speaks with decision when the occasion requires it, and the charitable institutions of the city find in him a reliable counsellor and friend.

THE ONLOOKER.

Digitized by Google

How the Moon Astonished the Sun.

A STORY FOR CHILDREN.

By BERTHA HARRISON.

IT was millions of ages ago in the very earliest beginnings of anything at all, and Sky Father and Mother sat peacefully on their golden thrones in the great Blue Hall that reaches from Everywhere to Nowhere. All day long the gentle Rainbows circled round and round them; all night the gay Northern Lights danced wild and graceful ballets to the trembling music of the stars, while the Sky Babies rolled merrily about on the blue floor and taught the Comets to play tricks.

Oh, it was a quiet happy life, and Sky Father and Mother had nothing to wish for, especially as regards their children, for they were all as good as gold; a trifle mischievous at times, perhaps, but that does no harm. Children, however, will get bigger as time goes on, and then trouble begins, at least for the grown-ups who live with them, and particularly fathers and mothers. Most children have to be taught to work for their living somehow or another, and it is very tiresome to think out what each one will like to do, or what he or she will be able to do best.

It was this matter that Sky Father and Mother talked much about when they saw their eldest boy, the Sun, outgrowing all his clothes and getting rather too rough with his sisters in their games. He had begun to tease the Comets too, which was a little dangerous, for angry Comets have a way of lashing out suddenly with their tails, and a blow from a Comet's tail is no joke.

So altogether it was high time something should be found for him to do, but the difficulty was to know what. Sky Father thought and thought so hard that the Blue Hall grew dark with thunder-clouds, and Sky Mother begged him to take a little rest and enjoy himself once more, for something would be certain to turn up and, after all, there was no very great hurry. To be sure, the boy was getting a little unmanageable, but then a boy was a boy, and you couldn't very well make him anything else. So Sky Father did as his wife wished, which made things more pleasant for everybody, but he kept the subject in the back of his mind in order to have it ready when the time came. And one day he looked out of his window from which he could see to the very Uttermost Beyond and even farther than that, and his glance fell upon the little brown ball of a world ever so far below him, spinning round and round as fast as it could, like a top when it is fast asleep. He saw it was very badly lighted, and did not always spin true, but wobbled a little sometimes, and he thought at once of his eldest boy. Here was the very thing for him to do. He should walk along the broad Sky-path and light the World. So he called the Sun and told him about it, and took his hand and led him across the sky to show him the way, and the next morning the Sun went forth to his new work alone.

He was mighty pleased to have the whole of the sky to himself to play about in, and on the first day he did play about and no mistake. Instead of walking quietly and steadily along the proper path Sky Father had shown him, he skipped about all over the place, now high up in the North, now low down in the South, all round the East and West, dancing and turning somersaults, and behaving generally more like a common meteor than a respectably brought up Sky boy.

The World was very angry and sent a message to say he would much rather have no light at all than such a Skipjack creature as the Sun, and if he was going on in that mad fashion the sooner he was blown out the better.

When the Sun got home that evening he had rather a bad time, for both Sky Father and Mother were vexed and disappointed that he should have behaved so badly. And Sky Mother talked very seriously to him, and Sky Father said if he could do no better he would have to be sent to the Uttermost Beyond, which is a flat, grey, uninteresting place inhabited by the old Lightnings who are past work and only able to sit and wag their heads at one another, and talk of the good old times they had in bygone ages, and that is always dull hearing for young folks.

Digitized by Google

The Sun did not at all like the idea of spending the rest of his life in such humdrum society just as he was growing up and going to see something of life. But he knew whatever Sky Father said he meant, and there was no getting away from it. So being at heart really a good lad he promised to amend his ways and apologise to the World, and do his work most carefully in future, and he has behaved quite beautifully ever since and given every satisfaction.

There was one person, however, who was not altogether pleased to see the Sun go out to work every day, and that was his sister, the Moon. She was very nearly as old as her brother, and considered it was quite time that she too should get about a bit and see what was going on.

Every night when the Sun came home and told tales of all the wonders he had seen during the day the Moon besought him to take her with him if only just for once. But the Sun always laughed in a superior sort of way that hurt the Moon's feelings, and said young maids were best at home where they could do no mischief.

And the Moon grew thin and pale, and Sky Mother began to get anxious about her and said she thought a little change might do her good, and so persuaded Sky Father to let her brother take her for a day's walk.

The Sun promised to take every care of his sister, and, as she was but a slip of a thing, he tucked her arm into his that he might help her along, and together they went along the broad Sky-path.

The Moon enjoyed herself immensely, and came home so much better for her day out that she was allowed to have another, and another, and in fact several more, till it came to be quite the usual thing for her to accompany her brother on his daily walk, always leaning on his arm. But one day when they were starting out, the Sun said he thought the Moon had grown so much stronger she ought to walk alone, and she said she was quite willing to try, but she felt a little doubtful about being able to keep up with him all day, for he was bigger than she and could travel faster.

For the first part of the time things went well enough, but towards the end of the day the Moon began to get tired and to lag behind, and the Sun got home first and she was left all by herself in the dark, lonely night. She was terribly frightened, and rushed on as fast as her little tired feet would let her, and was heartily glad to get safely back to the Blue Hall.

Next day the same thing happened, and then she said to Sky Father she thought the Sun had behaved rather badly to her. But Sky Father considered a little, and said he thought she was old enough to do some work too, and to save any trouble between herself and her brother he proposed that she should light the World by night as the Sun lighted it by day.

At first the Moon did not quite like the idea of going across the Sky-path all alone in the dark; but Sky Father told her the stars would bear her company and cheer her with their music, and that the World himself was looking forward to much pleasant conversation with her during the peaceful night time when everything was quiet and he had nothing else to attend to.

So the Moon was quite pleased, for she had already grown to love the World. She felt happy to think she was going to be of some real use to him, and determined to light him at night in a steady, careful way. She was not to be allowed to overwork herself either, on account of her health. On certain nights she would be off duty and join her family in the Blue Hall amid the music and dancing.

The Sun, however, being the eldest and a tiny bit spoiled into the bargain, was a little annoyed that the Moon, a mere girl, should be nearly as important a person as himself. Like many very young men, he did not believe in girls doing much outside their own homes. So when the Moon told him what was to happen, he laughed and said it was absurd to think she was going to be of the smallest use to the World; she wasn't big enough, and, as for brightness, why her light was as black darkness compared with his own, and in the day time no one would be able to see her at all. Besides, she was so slow; she could not possibly get along the whole Sky-path in the proper time. The poor young Moon was much cast down by this cruel speech. She fled for comfort to the lap of the dear Sky Mother, shedding bitter tears and lamenting that she was so small and dark.

Digitized by Google

Sky Mother kissed her, and bade her take comfort and dry her eyes, for no one could know their own brightness, and if the World was content that was enough.

Sky Father said the Sun was getting a bit too big for his new boots, and must be taken down a peg or two. Yes, he must have a sharp lesson, and be taught not to think himself everybody, as he was rather inclined to do. In the meantime the Moon must do her duty faithfully, and one day she should herself astonish the Sun.

So it came to pass that one fine morning when the Sun was on his daily path he chanced to look behind him. To his surprise he saw the Moon running after him as fast as she could; in fact she was running much faster than he had thought was possible for her. On and on she came, drawing nearer to him every moment. Now her shadow fell upon him, and the next minute she stepped right in front of him, completely blocking all his light and hiding him from view. And in this position she stayed for some time.

Oh, how angry the Sun was! He positively shook with rage. He did not in the least know what to do. He tried to dodge the Moon, but that was no good; he did not dare walk any faster than his usual pace, for that was strictly forbidden. It was most surprising and aggravating to find that, after all, his young sister should be able to get the better of him in this way and interfere with his light. And if she could do it once she might do it constantly, and then what would become of him? He would be laughed at by everyone, and the World would have nothing more to say to him. It was dreadful to think of what might happen! And the Sun began to be frightened as well as angry.

When the Moon saw this she knew she had done enough, so she smiled sweetly and began to move off, but slowly, for she did not wish her brother to think she was afraid of him. By degrees she dropped behind again till the Sun was quite clear, then she fled swiftly home to tell Sky Father and Mother how she had got on.

The Sun did not really recover himself properly all day; he felt very shaky and nervous, and was certainly not in the best of tempers when he got home that evening. And it is more than likely there would have been a fine quarrel all round had not Sky Father given the family a good talking to. He said there must be no more nonsense about one child being better than the other. They would all enjoy equal powers with one another, and perfect freedom to walk about the Sky-path at any time, provided their proper work was not neglected. And if the Moon chose to show herself in the daytime, why, she might do so, and stand in front of the Sun, too, if it did not interfere with the World's comfort.

To tell the truth the World had been a little bit upset by the curious performance of the Moon, and wanted to know the meaning of it. But when the whole affair was explained to him he took the Moon's part, and said it really was the only thing she could have done in the circumstances. At the same time he begged it might not happen too often and that he might be warned beforehand, for it was a little awkward to have the sunlight suddenly put out when he didn't expect it.

So when the Moon intends to stand in front of the Sun, which is not very often, she always takes care to tell the World in plenty of time. Then the funny little two-legged creatures he takes care of run from place to place and look at the doings of the Sun and Moon through black spectacles and long tubes. They also pretend they know a good deal about the Sun and Moon, and go and write books full of horrid long words. As a matter of fact, however, they don't really know anything at all, for this is the only full, true, and particular account of the matter.

Digitized by Google

For THE BAIRNS.

Conducted by
THE REV. J. REID HOWATT.

"THE FUNNIEST THING I SAW IN MY HOLIDAYS."

THE competition for this has not been so good. Most children are enjoyers of fun rather than recorders thereof. Or perhaps it is because wonders seen on holiday are hardly counted as wonders—where all is wonderful. It may be much the same in this respect as it is with conjuring. Your little child, at all events, sees nothing wonderful in a turnip being changed to a rabbit inside a man's hat; the whole world is full of wonders for him and one or two more don't matter! Be the reason what it may, the entries for this competition have been few, whereas those for the last one were very many and very good. Let me give some specimens.

Marjorie Eldridge thinks the funniest thing she saw in her holidays were two gentlemen who had "fits"! One had "screaming fits," sometimes with his arms in the air and sometimes his legs! The other had "creepy fits," with his hands creeping like spiders! It made her shriek with laughter when the fits came on. One of the gentlemen told her (confidentially) that the fits were much worse after drinking tea, and asked her to get some for him, but Eliza wouldn't give him any; he would have to wait till her ship came home!

Marjorie's sister—Olive—thought it was odder to make acquaintance with a little girl, three years old, who never wears anything on her head, or coats in winter; the windows of the house where she lives are kept open summer and winter, yet the dear little girl never catches cold, and is always merry.

Constance Clarke put off writing till the last minute and had only time to say that at Warwick Castle she saw "Guy's Porridge Pot"—a huge vessel, about three feet high, large enough for two or three people to stand in. It was used for a punch bowl when the present Earl of Warwick came of age.

The following from Gladys E. Wynne is interesting:—

One day we were taken to New Brighton, and entered the Tower Gardens. After going into various places of amusement we decided to go into the Ashanti Village. On entering, the first thing we saw was a large hut, whose roof was supported by poles only, so anybody could look in. Women and men were seated all round opposite little fires, on which were cooking monkey-nuts, bloaters, Indian corn and cakes made of the same, potatoes and many other things. The women seemed quite indifferent to heat, for they took potatoes out of boiling water with their fingers to see if they were done. Tied on one mother's back was a dear little baby, who cried in a very English way when his mother bent down and nearly tipped him over her shoulder into the fire. Seated on little stools were two other babies who each held a big spoon, which they licked with great zeal. They soon finished the contents of the spoon, and one toddled towards a man who sat with a rather cross expression on his face watching alternately some frizzling bloaters and boiling potatoes. The baby stretched forth its hand stealthily towards a dish of potatoes, but it was caught and sent back to its mother, who gave it a half-empty dish of potatoes to clean with its finger, whilst she fed on monkey-nuts. Just at this time in trooped about five boys, who evidently had come for food, for they were given the basin of potatoes which the baby had attempted to pilfer. We next saw some rather peculiar dances, which were very funny, especially those of a man with a floured face, a fur jacket, and yellow tassels round his waist, holding in his hands two weapons like fish knives.

Digitized by Google

Passing over some that are very brief, and also very grave instead of funny, there can be no doubt but the following is the best of all sent in this time; to the writer accordingly I have sent a beautiful prize, while I join with her in regretting that the flight of years will make this her last contribution—for she will soon be above age.

31, High-street, Huntingdon.

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—These last summer holidays, while staying at Folkestone, I journeyed for the first time abroad. I went to Boulogne, and whilst there I think I came across the funniest things I have yet seen. We left Folkestone by the eleven o'clock boat, arriving there about two o'clock. Well, one of the funniest things to begin with was that the sea was so calm that no one was sea-sick, but there were several gentlemen looking very drowsy huddled up in different corners with rugs wrapped all round them, and they were looking most forlorn. It was a dreadfully hot day and we thought we should get melted. But going we felt a beautiful breeze when we got into the middle of the Channel. As we neared France we could see quite plainly where Calais was and numerous French villages. At last we arrived at Boulogne, and it seemed as if we were actually beginning to melt, for it was hotter than ever. When we got off the boat we found ourselves landed among endless engines and trains, but somehow or other we managed to find our way to one of the main streets, but I was most surprised to see the porters wearing blue shirts, just like those our butchers wear. By this time it was time for lunch, so we went to a French restaurant called the "Chat Noir." We tried to make the waitress understand what we wanted, but it all seemed in vain. Father asked her for soup, fish, meat, and sweets, but the waitress shook her head and said, "Non, non, non, monsieur, non soup, nous avons fish, meat et fruit." But after we had waited long enough for the things to have been cooked, we had lunch. After lunch we went for an electric tram ride by the sea coast to a little village called Wimereux. We saw a lot of French fisherwomen with their charming large white stiff bonnets. On the way, when we were going down hill, the tram ran off the lines, but some men soon put it straight again. We stayed at Wimereux for a little time and returned by another tram. We then went to the Casino and there everybody seemed to be drinking cider and wine. Another thing which seemed rather strange was that the people who were drinking beer, etc., in public houses, sat about all over the pavement on chairs and forms in a vast confusion. We then strolled down several streets, and the women seemed to be doing all their work out of doors on the pavements, such as washing the dogs and brushing their husband's clothes. We next asked the way to the Boulogne fair, but though we did ask persons who spoke English, they evidently did not understand a word we said, for one said one way and one another, so that we passed up and down the same streets several times. When we did arrive at the fair, there was a great confusion of jabber, jabber, jabber, and by what we heard, they were all very anxious to sell their wares. Almost at every stall we saw piles of dark brown ginger-bread, some of which had huge pieces of citron stuck all over it. We also saw a woman sitting in front of a large heap of collar studs; she gave about thirty or forty for ten centimes (about a penny in English money). When we had got to the end of the fair we went and looked at some Roman remains and Notre Dame, which was decorated in silver, white and blue, for some special service. We then returned and had tea where English was spoken, and about seven o'clock we returned to the boat and had a beautiful journey home by moonlight, and we could see the flashlight of Cape Gris Nez quite plainly. We arrived at Folkestone again about half-past nine to ten o'clock, after having had a very enjoyable day. —I remain, yours truly,

ROSE EDITH SARLL (Aged 15½ years).

The next competition will be on

"OUR BROTHERS AND SISTERS."

A lady who read a paper recently before an Educational Society in London is reported to have said "That instead of the sisterly love they all so much desired, they usually found in the average family that girls considered it was a privilege of sisterhood to be annoying and even abusive, and to call each other idiots and fools. They too often found that instead of mutual interest there existed mutual distrust and even hate." Is this so? Are sisters unsisterly and brothers unbrotherly? Give me your experience and opinion; let the brothers write about the sisters and the sisters about the brothers, and so we shall get to the rights of it. Write on one side of the paper only, enclose your name and address (along with a pen-name if you do not want your real one to appear), and state your age (must be under 16), and send in by the 20th of this month to Rev. J. Reid Howatt, The Crescent, Camberwell-grove, Denmark-hill, S.E., and I shall give a handsome volume for the best letter on each subject, or two prizes altogether.

THE CRUTCH-AND-KINDNESS LEAGUE.

Members of the League, and especially those just joining, often ask, "What kind of letters should we send to the cripple-children?" There is no rule: the styles and statements are as varied as the writers themselves; it is enough that there is a sympathetic and kindly heart, and the rest is sure to come right. To make certain about this I have gathered a sheaf of letters which have been sent to different cripples by members in all parts of the world, and give some extracts from them; they make interesting reading in themselves, as well as fairly represent the communications of all the members of the League.

Digitized by Google

This, for instance, from Russia :—

Isn't it wonderful how the news of one little sick girl will travel? There you are down in London, and here I am away up in St. Petersburg, Russia, and yet I know that you are not strong and well like other little children, and that you have lately been very sick indeed. And I know, too, that you have a sister: her name I do not know yet, but some day I hope you will write me and tell me what it is. And all this has happened because we have the same dear Father in Heaven, and He knew that the little sick girl would like to have some letters written all to her very own self, and He knew, too, that I wanted a dear little sister to tell stories to, and so He put it into the hearts of kind people to make us acquainted. This makes us feel very near together, doesn't it, Frances?—as though I were sitting beside your bed holding your hand and talking to you.

Then the warm-hearted writer goes on to tell interesting things about Russian children, queer Russian ways, together with story on story, all glinting with fun, and yet with tenderest thoughts running through all.

This from Berlin :—

I wonder how you have been getting on through the hot weather. Why, it seems as if the sun thought he was a stove and that it was his business to bake the whole earth! . . . We have had such a grand celebration here in Berlin, when, on the sixth day of May, the eldest son of the Emperor was eighteen years old, and his father gave him a beautiful palace all to himself, with many grand courtiers to attend him. So that the Crown Prince, as he is called, isn't any more a boy, but a very grand person in the realm. I wonder if he does not sometimes feel as though he would like to be a little boy again, and live in his father's house as he used to do, with his dear mother and many brothers, and one dear little sister? Perhaps he is glad to have a house of his own to invite his mother to come to. (Then follows a fine, chatty letter.)

This from South Africa :—

My brother was wounded very severely in the engagement at Schrepner's Nek, and my mother and father went up to Ladysmith, but father got a pass as far as Dundee. There he saw the Colonel and the man who carried my brother off the battlefield. Next day they were taken to Vryheid by the Dutch, but we have not heard of or from him since; we have tried every possible way to get news, but have not succeeded. Mother stayed in Ladysmith for two weeks, hoping to go to Vryheid some way, but had to come home again. . . . Durban has never seen such poverty as now prevails; on every side is a widow or an orphan, and so many homes and hearts are sad, but we have not grudged our Queen and country our dear ones, and we are so very thankful to God for permitting us to have such wise and humane generals. Poor Buller has had a hard time of it, but now everyone is praising him, for he really has had more to do than all the other generals. (Then follow particulars of stirring and interesting matters.)

This from New Zealand :—

I am enclosing a piece of ribbon, and hope you will like to wear it on your hair. . . . I expect you would like to hear about the little children who live in New Zealand, wouldn't you? You know people were living here before the English came. They were called Maoris, and there are a lot here now, some living quite near where I am. They have not a white face and skin like you have, but are quite brown, and have dark eyes and dark hair. They don't talk like you either, but have a funny language of their own which you would not understand at all, but the children go to school and learn to read and talk just like you. They are very happy little children too, and have always a smile on their faces, and little Maori babies must be very good, for they never seem to cry. When their mothers carry them about they don't hold them in their arms, but carry them on their back in a shawl, and you see the little baby's face peeping over the mother's shoulders, etc., etc.

From Tasmania :—

You would laugh if you saw my youngest brother! He is very little but simply loves horses, so he has two pieces of iron which he pretends are horses; he calls the one "Darly" and the other "Jumbo," and runs up and down the room banging them on the floor and says they are cantering, and he makes them kick-up, and "buck" and puts them in the corner and pretends they are eating chaff in the stable, etc.

From Lugano :—

Fancy!—one of our tame sparrows flew away a short time ago; we advertised for it in the newspapers, and two days afterwards it was brought us back by a little girl! The way she caught it was this: The day the bird flew away, when the girl was asleep she was suddenly wakened by something scratching her neck. At first she was frightened, thinking it might be a mouse, but then she saw it was a little bird trying to cuddle down on her shoulder to go to sleep! Was it not lucky that the girl slept with an open window? We were so happy to get it back.

From Yokohama :—

Even as I am writing, I hear a small bell ringing under the window, which means that the Japanese newspapers have had some extra news, and are now delivering it. The newspaper men always run about ringing a bell when they have extra news. We had a fire near our house last night. Did I ever tell you about Japanese fire-bells? They are fastened on the tops of very high poles, and a ladder is made up the pole. When they wish to ring the bell they must climb up this ladder and pound at the bell with a mallet! I suppose they have them so that they may see where the fire is.

So with letters from New York, Chicago, Montreal, New Guinea, and almost every part of the world besides. I have purposely taken these extracts out of letters which have come from afar, so that it may come home the more impressively to every reader that the good work done by the Crutch-and-Kindness League is work that can be done in any part of the world and by those of every age. There are six thousand poor child cripples in London alone; the Ragged School Union takes a friendly oversight of these, as far as it can, with the help of voluntary visitors, but when these have done their utmost how lonesome the life of the little cripple is! To put a bit of sunshine into it the members of the Crutch-and-Kindness League take each one cripple to whom a letter is written once a month or so. This is the gist of the League, but all particulars may be had for a stamp, not from me, but from Mr. John Kirk, Secretary, Ragged School Union, 32, John-street, Bedford-row, W.C.

Digitized by Google

NEW MEMBERS FOR THE MONTH.

Arthur Lowde, care of Miss Twelves, Chesterfield; Miss Lucy Pegler, Oddington; Master Gordon Cope, care of Miss Medway, Hendon; Master Owen Rugg, Clapham Common; Miss Alice Mann, Miss Florence Mann, Durham; Miss Nellie Scandrett, Cape Colony; Miss Elsie Barr, Bristol; Mrs. Richmond, Anglesea; Miss A. F. Robinson, Darlington; Miss E. M. Flint, Cardiff; Mrs. Titchmarsh, Newbury; Mrs. Jolliffe, Brighton; Miss Gertrude Hallott, Miss Rose Epton, Miss Emma Hardy, Miss Annie Mann, Miss Beatrice Parkinson, Miss Lizzie Smeeton, care of Miss G. Hallott, Nottingham; Master Harold Luck, care of Miss Underwood, Luton; The Band of Mercy Committee, care of Miss Underwood, Luton; Sunday School Class, care of Miss Bray, Dublin; Mrs. Treadgold, Bath; Miss A. C. Wilson, Balham; Miss D. Wright, Westgate-on-Sea; Miss Gertrude Stevenson, Devonport; Miss Kate Beckmann, West Hartlepool; Mrs. Daw, Miss Goodhind, Ottery St. Mary; Miss Lillie Stapley, Tunbridge Wells; Miss Florence S. Dods, Upper Norwood; Miss Lilian Shearn, Oxford; Miss Marguerite Coulsell, Hackney; Miss Ethel Leybourne, Cowsett; Miss Evelyn E. Reade, Wickham Market, Miss Lily M. Jones, Ilfracombe; Miss Daisy Hardy, West Hartlepool; Miss Emily Watch, Surbiton; Miss Alice Hartland, Southsea; Miss Middlemiss, Cheltenham; Mr. J. W. Bradshaw, Compstall; Miss Pattie Pochin, Croft; Miss Irene Phillips, Ilfracombe; Miss Louie Pyle, Miss Alice Pyle, Miss Beatrice Pyle, Addlestone; Miss Bessie Playfair, Lewisham; Master George H. Landon, Aylesbury; Mr. James Rutherford, Junior, Waltham Cross; Mrs. Arthur Cadell, Buxton; Miss Edith Broodbank, Kilburn; Mrs. Morgan, Market Drayton; Miss Wells, Southgate; Miss Flossie Dent, Southport; Miss Gertrude Stainbury, Barnstaple; Miss Essie Boag, West Hartlepool; Mrs. Dawson, Newcastle, Staffords.; South Bar Congress Church Y.P.S.C.E., care of Miss Bray, Banbury.

EDITORIAL NOTICES.

THE attention of our readers is called to the fact that Volume IV. of "THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE," handsomely bound in red or green cloth, can be obtained of the publishers, Messrs. Horace Marshall and Son, Temple House, Temple Avenue, London, E.C. The volume contains two complete serial stories and scores of short stories and special articles. There are five hundred pictures in the volume.

"Onlooker" invites contributions to "The Public Eye" pages, accompanied by non-copyright photographs. A postal order for five shillings will be sent for every paragraph published. Photographs will be returned if accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope.

If our readers are pleased with this Christmas number, which is issued at the usual price, we shall be greatly obliged if they will bring the MAGAZINE under the notice of their friends.

Our January number will contain several specially attractive features, and will be worthy of the first issue in the new century.

Digitized by Google

USED IN THE HOUSEHOLD OF THE QUEEN.

USED IN THE HOUSEHOLD OF THE QUEEN.

Digitized by Google

FOR IRON FENCING, GATES, &c. WRITE TO THE MAKERS.

BAYLISS, JONES & BAYLISS'

WROUGHT IRON HURDLES AND GATES

PATENT CONTINUOUS FENCING

WIRE FENCING.

IRON WHEEL-BARROWS.

NEW PATENT SELF-ADJUSTING ROUND-BAR RAILING (No. 2740).

TENNIS FENCES

KENNEL RAILING.

Can be fixed close up to Purchaser's boundary, and suits rise or fall in the ground.

Is, we believe, the cheapest in the market.

WRITE FOR PRICES.

WINE BINS

GALVANIZED COMB NEB MESH NETTING.

Averages 20 per cent. Cheaper than ordinary Netting

Post free

TREE GUARDS.

POULTRY FENCING.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE OF ALL KINDS OF HURDLES, FENCING, GATES, &c. FREE.

VICTORIA WORKS, WOLVERHAMPTON.

LONDON OFFICES AND SHOW ROOMS—139 & 141, CANNON STREET, E.C.

Over 70 years' Established Reputation.

NEAVE'S FOOD

"Highly Nutritious." Lancet.

FOR INFANTS & INVALIDS.

Used in the Russian Imperial Nursery.

Gold Medal awarded, Woman's Exhibition, 1900.

THE BEST AND QUICKEST REMEDY FOR

RHEUMATISM, GOUT, LUMBAGO, BRONCHITIS, SORE THROAT, NEURALGIA, &c.

SMEDLEY'S CHILLIE PASTE

Bottles, 1/1½, 1/6, & 2/9, of all Chemists.

Gives instant Relief. Does not Blister.

The most obstinate cases of Rheumatism, Gout, Lumbago, Neuralgia, etc., are soon cured by the outward application of SMEDLEY'S CHILLIE PASTE, together with an occasional dose of

LASCELLES' PILLS

Bottles, 1/1½ and 2/9, of all Chemists.

Sole Proprietors—HIRST, BROOKE, AND HIRST, LIMITED, LEEDS.

THE OLDEST AND BEST.

UNEQUALLED FOR ITS BRILLIANCE AND CLEANLINESS.

ADAMS'S FURNITURE POLISH

FOR FURNITURE, BROWN BOOTS, PATENT LEATHER, OILCLOTHS, AND ALL VARNISHED AND ENAMELLED GOODS.

THE QUEEN says: "Having made a fresh trial of its virtues after considerable experience with other compounds of the same nature, we feel no hesitation in recommending its use to all housewives."

VICTORIA PARK WORKS, SHEFFIELD.

TO COLOUR GREY HAIR TRY ALEXANDRE'S SHADEINE

TRIAL BOTTLE 6D. Per Post, 7D.

SHADEINE colours grey or faded hair BLONDE, LIGHT or DARK BROWN, BLACK, AUBURN, and GOLDEN. It contains neither lead, silver, mercury, sulphur, nor anything injurious.

Guaranteed not to burn the hair, produce an unnatural tint, but to be permanent, washable, free from grease or stickiness, and ABSOLUTELY HARMLESS.

A MEDICAL CERTIFICATE with every Bottle.

LARGE BOTTLE, 3/6; Post Free, 3/9. TRIAL BOTTLE, 6d.; Post Free, 7d. (Secretly Packed)

Established 1867. (PARIS DEPOT: 23, Rue de Chabrol.)

J. M. ALEXANDRE, 30 WESTBOURNE GROVE LONDON, W.

WHEN BUYING A CHEAP BICYCLE,

look at the tyres. If they are not

DUNLOP TYRES

the machine is not cheap at any price.

The DUNLOP PNEUMATIC TYRE CO., Ltd.,

ALMA STREET, COVENTRY;

160 to 166, CLERKENWELL ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

Agents for Australasia and the Colonies: R. A. THOMPSON & Co., Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane, Adelaide, Cape Town, etc.

LONDON: PRINTED FOR THE PROPRIETORS BY THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY, LIMITED, WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, CARMELITE STREET, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE

FOR HOME AND SUNDAY READING.

VOL. 5. JANUARY, 1901. No. 4.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

LONDON: HORACE MARSHALL & SON, TEMPLE HOUSE, TEMPLE AVENUE, E.C.

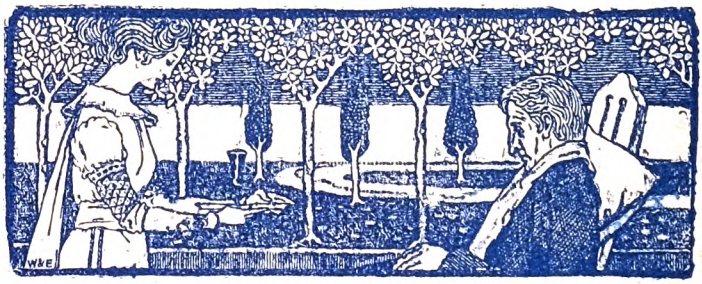
Cadbury's Cocoa

Absolutely Pure, Therefore Best.

"The Standard of Highest Purity."
—The Lancet.

Digitized by Google

No 439.



Hall's Wine.

When illness, worry, or age has nearly taken all the life out of you, Hall's Wine will revive and increase what strength you have left. It imparts immediate tone and vigour, and no reaction follows its use. Its recuperative and restorative power quickly tells in all cases of debility, convalescence, and depression.

3/- and 1/9

Bottles in two sizes

Sold by licensed grocers, chemists, and wine merchants. Write for booklet.

Stephen Smith & Co., Ld., Bow. London.

BODLEIAN 14·1 1901 LIBRARY

Digitized by Google

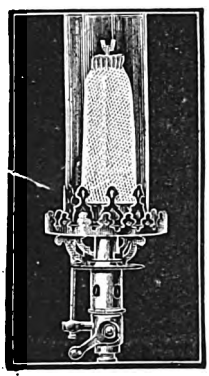
ADVERTISEMENTS for the next Issue must be sent not later than Jan. 6th to H. DAWSON & Co., 34, Norfolk Street, STRAND, W.C.

BORD'S PIANOS

25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (second-hand 10s. 6d. per month) on the Three Years' System. — Lists free of C. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C. PIANOS EXCHANGED.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

These magnificent Pianos for Hire on the Three Years' System, at advantageous prices and terms.—List and particulars free of CHAS. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C.



The Gas Self-Lighting Co.,

LIMITED.

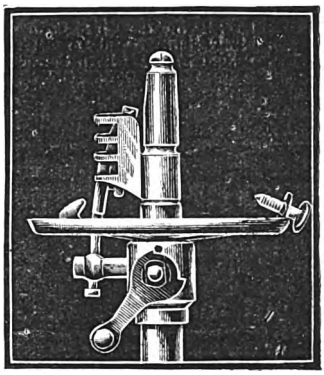
By means of this Company's valuable patents, the use of matches or tapers for lighting gas jets is entirely dispensed with, dispensing also with a bye pass jet continually alight (this saves the expense). A great source of danger from fire is thereby removed, and an annual expense far exceeding the cost of the Self-Lighter is saved.

THE SELF-LIGHTER.

A Simple, Effective, Economical Danger Remover. You turn on the gas and the Self-lighter ignites it. Invaluable to all gas consumers. Remit 3s. for Sample, or send for List and full particulars to:—

The GAS SELF-LIGHTING Co., Ltd.,
130, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.

Telegrams: "SPONGELET, LONDON." Telephone No. 5206, BANK.



THE LARGEST STOCK
IN LONDON
OF GENUINE ANTIQUE FURNITURE

Is to be seen at THE SOHO BAZAAR,

GILL & REIGATE, LTD.,

77 to 85, OXFORD STREET,
LONDON, W.,

Dealers in Antique and Modern Furniture, China, Carpets, Prints, etc. Artistic Decorators and Upholsterers.

Collectors and others should write to Messrs. Gill and Reigate for their new booklet of Antiques, etc.

Christ's College,

BLACKHEATH, S.E.

PRINCIPAL—

F. W. AVELING, M.A., B.Sc.

Home Comforts.
Public School Training.
Practical Science Teaching.
Five Laboratories.

Digitized by Google

FOR MOTHERS AND DAUGHTERS.

ORGAN MUSIC IN THE HOME.

The organ, though the grandest of all instruments, has this one drawback—that it can never add to the brightness of the home except in the case of the very rich. But, for all that, we need not go without the enjoyment of its varied effects, and this is owing to that wonderful invention, the organette, which is sold by the firm of J. M. Draper, Audley-street, Blackburn. This instrument, which only costs the modest sum of 35s. cash, including 20 feet of music, is supplied with 28 full-sized American organ reeds, controlled by three stops, viz., flute, expression, and vox humana. The music is produced by perforated sheets, which pass round the organette in endless bands, enabling a tune to be played over and over again without stopping. No skill is required of the performer, who simply turns a handle. All kinds of music can be played, and the instrument furnishes good orchestral effects. By the manipulation of the stops a soft sweet tone or a loud long swelling melody may be produced, trills and high falsetto as well as deep bass, and all manner of pleasing combinations at the will of the performer. A cheaper instrument with one stop may be purchased for 30s.

Persons of genius are more individual than any other people, and less capable, consequently, of fitting themselves, without hurtful compression, into any of the small number of moulds which society provides in order to save its members the trouble of forming their own characters.

OUR INFLUENCE.

There are two spirits in every man, and these spirits are contending together for the mastery. In all our relations we make our choice as to whether we shall evoke the best or the worst in those whom we meet; whether we shall liberate the best that is in them or invigorate the worst. There are men who go through life and do no evil so far as action is concerned, but who blight everything fine and fair which comes in their way, by the chilling breath of scepticism; there are others who have a genius for calling out the best. It was impossible not to believe in the nobility and dignity of life when one listened to Phillips Brooks; his atmosphere made scepticism incredible. When Hume declared that he believed in immortality whenever he remembered his mother he was bearing testimony to the almost divine influence which women of the highest type always exert, and which they often exert in entire unconsciousness. What a man believes or what he disbelieves is a vital matter, not only for himself, but for others. Let him believe in the best, and, however full of faults and imperfections he may be, there will be in his own nature a slow but tidal movement towards goodness, and he will make the attainment of virtue easier for all who know him. Let a man disbelieve in the possibility of purity, integrity, and unselfishness, and, although he may have great ability and many attractive qualities, he will smirch the society through which he passes, and leave a blackened trail behind him.

The miser who is able (but unwilling) to relieve want is truly a miserable man.

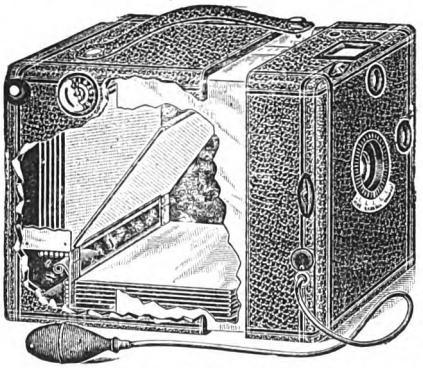
Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

VIVE

New

M.P.C. Vives.



With or without Focussing.

Every Camera Guaranteed.

Before buying elsewhere send for our Art Catalogue and Illustrated Brochure Free. Embossed mounted photo, 2 penny stamps extra.

Guinea Vives.—Largest pictures (4¼ × 4¼, adaptable to any smaller size) for plates, cut films, or roll films.

VIVE CAMERA CO., MANUFACTURERS,
No. 15, Regent House, Regent Street,
LONDON, W.
NEW YORK.
CHICAGO.

CAMERAS

LEAD EVERYWHERE

AN EVENING CLOAK.

The opera-cloak of the moment is so beautiful that one could write columns upon its charms and its variety. There are several shapes from which to choose. There is the long handsome cloak with quite a train, made of satin or brocade, either coloured or black, and lined throughout with a glory of satin in white or the palest shade of grey. Added to this, a rich jet passementerie as often as not edges the whole interior of these elaborate garments, while the collar and upper part of the cloak itself are given up to lavish trimmings—jet, steel, lace, feather, or fur. Then we may entirely alter the appearance of an opera-cloak already in hand by adding a capelet of lace over the shoulders, or an edging of fur or feather round the collar and upper part of the mantle. The three-quarter-length cape is still remarkably popular for evening occasions, and here the rounded fronts which we have loved so long are gradually but surely giving way to the squarer arrangement. Cloaks of this kind are made in silk or satin, in fine cloth, cashmere, foulé, and silk rep. Occasionally, too, we see coloured brocade used for the purpose, while hailing from Paris are some of the elaborately tinted chiné and glacé silks, reds, pinks, blues and greens being closely intermingled. A glacé silk, however, for the purpose is never warm, so that the style is not likely to prove very popular.

Digitized by Google

The Gregorian is distinctive in the exquisite quality of its tone.

Gregorian Church and Chapel Organs

It is indorsed by leading organists, and meets the demand of critical musicians at moderate expense.

Prices, 70 to 600 Guineas.

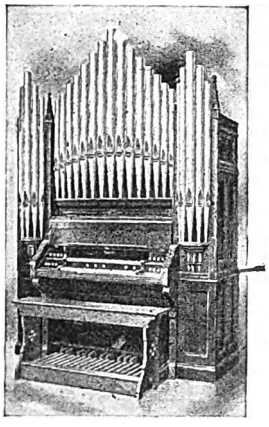
The Gregorian's rapidly increasing popularity for Church and Chapel use is ample reason why it should be investigated by all Churches contemplating the purchase of an organ.

Its method of tone-production is radically different from all others.

Catalogue A2, giving full description, will be mailed on request.

DISTINCTIVE FEATURES.

QUALITY and POWER of tone, Variety of registration, and Price.



STYLE 22.

"These instruments will be extremely desirable for churches and halls. It is a new and original idea, for your have modified the tones of the reeds in such a way as to reproduce perfectly the tones of the pipe-organ, especially diapason and clarabella tones."—ALEXANDRE GUILMANT, Organist and Composer, Paris.

"The voicing of your instrument is noteworthy; each stop has its characteristic quality—the flute is really flute-like, and the clarinet preserves the peculiar wooden character of the original. Most remarkable is the close approach of sound to the pipe-organs, many of these not being its equal in quality and tone. Last, but not least, the light, quick action and never-varying accuracy of intonation deserve special mention."—WALTER J. DAMROSCH.

THE ORCHESTRELLE COMPANY,
225 Regent St., London, W.

TO ASTHMA SUFFERERS.

IMMEDIATE RELIEF in all cases of ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, CROUP, and WHOOPING COUGH is gained by the use of

POTTER'S DATURA ASTHMA CURE.

Sold by all Chemists and Herbalists, in Tins at 1s. each Free Sample sent on receipt of Post Card to POTTER AND CLARKE, Artillery Lane, London, E.

Hair Destroyed.

Send me an envelope (stamped and addressed and I will tell you how to remove all superfluous hair free of charge. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Miss B. O. (Room 3), 195, Oxford Street, London, W.

CONSUMPTION

CONGESTION of the LUNGS, CHRONIC BRONCHITIS & ASTHMA COUGHS, COLDS & INFLUENZA cured by

CONGREVE'S Balsamic ELIXIR

Sold by all Patent Medicine Vendors.
Congreve's Book on Consumption, 6d. or 1s. post free from Coombe Lodge, Peckham, London.

HOVIS
TRADE MARK.

It is the most tasty and appetising of Breads with valuable nutritive properties.

Most Family Bakers make and deliver it daily. Should yours not do so, we shall be pleased to send our Agents' addresses.

THE HOVIS-BREAD FLOUR CO., Ltd.,
MACCLESFIELD.

Digitized by Google

HUMOUR.

As a weapon of self-defence, humour has its own peculiar place in life's arsenal; that fact is proven; but it is not a weapon of offence, as is satire, the bastard cousin of humour. Humour's gentle answer turneth away wrath, while satire invites anger. A humorous retort has a pleasant and calming influence, yet carries with it, at the same time, a subtle warning that the speaker is not quite to be trifled with. Satire gives a like warning, to be sure, but in common with chickens and curses and boomerangs, satire has a fatal trick of coming home to roost. No one wholly enjoys being laughed at, smile the humorist ever so gently; and in this laugh lies humour's restraining power; but when it comes to being sneered at, as satire sneers, human nature will not endure the insult, and sooner or later vengeance is apt to follow. It may be that humour has no place in the original beatitudes, but—Blessed are the Humorous!

Profitable Business.

This is what we all want.
You are probably making a good income, but you would like to make a better one.
How are you going to do it?
Can you answer this question? If not, may we help you?
We are business experts.
We know how to make any genuine article sell well.
It is no use having a really good article unless you can make the public realise that it is good, and want to buy it.
You can only do this by means of advertising.
Advertising has made many fortunes. It will make one for you if you handle it judiciously.
Many of our clients are now making thousands a year from an article which was unheard of a few years ago.
We helped them to do this, and we can help you in the same way.
Nothing is too large or too small for us to handle.
All you have to do is to write us a letter stating what your business is, and we will help you.
Our advice only costs a penny postage stamp, and it may lead you on to a fortune.
It is worth trying.

H. DAWSON & CO.,

34, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

GRESHAM'S SCHOOL, HOLT, NORFOLK.

Headmaster*—G. W. S. HOWSON, M.A. (late of UPPINGHAM SCHOOL). Founded 1555.

Three miles from the sea and close to Sheringham and Cromer. Splendid Climate. The soil is gravel on chalk. Entirely new drainage.

GOVERNORS: The Fishmongers' Company and County and Local Representatives.

Classrooms, Laboratories, and Workshops are in course of erection, at an estimated expenditure of £40,000.

HIGHEST INCLUSIVE FEES, £57 PER ANNUM.

Science and Modern Languages taught throughout the School.

Yearly leaving Exhibitions of £60 per annum for three years. Next Term commences Monday, January 21st.

For further particulars address the Headmaster.

Digitized by Google

A Year's Subscription to, or a Bound Volume of the

WIDE WORLD MAGAZINE

Forms a Particularly Acceptable NEW YEAR'S GIFT.

THE JANUARY NUMBER OF THE "WIDE WORLD," 6D., IS NOW ON SALE EVERYWHERE.

It contains the cream of the authentic Personal Adventures of the Anglo-Saxon race, and is, moreover, the recognised medium for the publication of extraordinary Travel Photographs.

You should Read in the Number Just Out:—

ON THE HEELS OF AN ARMY. Some adventures in search of adventure. By an Old Indian Official.

MR. PRATT AND HIS TRAVELS IN CHINA. Mr. Pratt is one of the most successful collectors of Natural History specimens in the world. The narrative is illustrated with his own photos.

MY EXPERIENCES AS A "GIRL-DIPLOMAT" IN PERU. By ELIZABETH L. BANKS, formerly Secretary to the American Minister in Lima.

OFF THE BEATEN TRACK IN PALESTINE. By ARCHIBALD FORDER, of the American Missionary Alliance, Jerusalem. With some remarkable snap-shots.

TRIED FOR MURDER IN CENTRAL AFRICA. A contribution which no "WIDE WORLD" reader should miss.

MY EXPERIENCES OF TURK'S ISLAND. By the late Rector.

AN L.M.S. MISSIONARY IN NEW GUINEA. Illustrated with photos.

ETC., ETC., ETC.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The "WIDE WORLD" has made special arrangements for the coming year, whereby it will secure the cream of the narratives of the most distinguished explorers; and the Editor has much pleasure in announcing that next month Captain H. H. P. DEASY, the distinguished Central Asian explorer, will commence the record of his hardships and adventures in some of the wildest regions of Central Asia. Captain DEASY has already been awarded the Gold Medal of the Royal Geographical Society for his magnificent work.

The "WIDE WORLD" will also publish the adventures of Major A. ST. HILL GIBBONS, who has just returned from making the Sign of the Cross on the Continent of Africa (Cape to Cairo, and Chinde to Benguela).

Among other important forthcoming narratives of adventure will be the experiences of a Government Official before, during, and after the siege of Kumasi; the adventures of Major BRIGHT, of the Rifle Brigade, among the tribes of the Upper Nile; and "A Trip through Unknown Abyssinia," by Captain H. P. G. COTTON.

GEORGE NEWNES, LTD., 7 to 12, Southampton Street, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS.

New Six-Shilling Novels.

THE INIMITABLE MRS. MASSINGHAM: A Romance of Botany Bay. By HERBERT COMPTON.
"Mr. Compton writes in a style that is itself an allurement. His characters also attract and interest. . . Life in the convict settlement forms the second part of the volume. It is either wonderfully real or imagined with strange vividness."—Scotsman.

"AS A WATCH IN THE NIGHT": a Drama of Waking and Dream. By Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED.
"Powerful, interesting, and well-proportioned."—Daily News.

THE MAN THAT CORRUPTED HADLEYBURG, &c. By MARK TWAIN. THIRD EDITION.
"Shows Mark Twain at his very best."—Black and White.

THE FOURTH GENERATION. By WALTER BESANT, Author of "The Orange Girl." SECOND EDITION.
"Arrests the attention, and holds it from first to last."—Daily News.

AS LUCK WOULD HAVE IT By WILLIAM WESTALL, Author of "With the Red Eagle," &c.
"The reader is at once interested. . . . Their fortunes are complicated after a fashion as dexterous as it is exciting, and they are recounted with irresistible élan."—Literature.

PHILIP WINWOOD. By R. NEILSON STEPHENS. With 6 Illustrations by E. W. HAMILTON.
"A bright and spirited story. . . . The plot is ingenious, and maintains its interest unflagging to the end."—Bookman.

THE BAG OF DIAMONDS, AND THREE BITS OF PASTE. By GEORGE MANVILLE FENN. 6s.
"All highly sensational, and all excellently told."—Scotsman.

IN A CATHEDRAL CITY. By BERTHA THOMAS. SECOND EDITION. 6s.
"A charming novel."—Freemasons' Chronicle.

New Three-and-Sixpenny Books.

THE SMALL-PART LADY, &c. By GEORGE R. SIMS (DAGONET).
"Humorous, pathetic, and tragic by turns."—Leeds Mercury.

THE ADVENTURES OF TYLER TATLOCK, PRIVATE DETECTIVE. By DICK DONOVAN.
"Good from end to end—full of fresh, well-written and entertaining matter."—Scotsman.

THE "PRETTY POLLY": a Voyage of Incident. By W. CLARK RUSSELL. With 12 Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, cloth, gilt edges, 5s.
"Redolent of the sea breeze. . . . A capital novel."—Birmingham Post.

LONDON MEMORIES: Social, Historical, and Topographical. By C. W. HECKETHORN, Author of "London Souvenirs," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.
"Good reading for all who are interested in London. Its gossip takes a wide range, including London's famous houses, . . . and many amusing stories of persons and things."—Pilot.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE ANNUAL FOE.

While the English climate in point of healthfulness compares favourably in many respects with that of foreign countries, yet the terrible prevalence of chest diseases during the winter must certainly be laid to its charge. A little book has been sent us by the Paul Weidhaas Hygienic Institute, 16, Buckingham-road, Brighton, wherein a new hygienic treatment of chronic diseases of the respiratory organs and stomachic complaints is recommended. Many letters are printed giving the grateful acknowledgments of sufferers who have found benefit from the treatment, and the originals, we understand, can be seen at the Paul Weidhaas Institute.

Science, the partisan of no country, but the beneficent patroness of all, has liberally opened a temple where all may meet. Her influence on the mind, like that of the sun on the chilled earth, has long been preparing it for higher cultivation and further improvement. The philosopher of one country sees not an enemy in the philosopher of another: he takes his seat in the temple of science, and asks not who sits beside him.

Ashville College,
HARROGATE.

TERMS:

January, May, and September.

FEES:

£45 and £50 INCLUSIVE.

Illustrated Prospectus from

JOHN BOWICK, Esq., M.A., LL.D., Headmaster; or

Rev. JOHN MOORE, "Denehurst," 12, Baker Street, NOTTINGHAM.

A VELVET GOWN.

The sketch shows a reception dress, intended for afternoon wear, in reddish-purple velvet, made with some simplicity of outline over a vest and panel of embroidery on chiffon, lined with satin of brightest peach-blossom colour. The lace cape is a piece of fine old point, but as that is a possession of the fortunate few it can be replaced by one of the clever imitations now so much worn. The little chemisette and collar are in white chiffon, with narrow black velvet run through it. The gold tissue waistband is fastened with an antique buckle. The little bows down the front of the bodice are made of satin similar to that which forms the lining of the embroidered vest and panel. Deep lace cuffs finish the under-sleeves, over which fall the puffed velvet over-sleeves, the necessary fulness for which is provided by the narrow tucks that run downwards from shoulder to elbow in groups of three.

Whether thralled or exiled,
Whether rich or poor thou be,
Whether praised or reviled,
Not a rush is it to thee:
This nor that thy rest doth win thee,
But the mind that is within thee.

Digitized by Google

WORLD - TRAVEL

Organised by

HENRY S. LUNN, M.D., F.R.G.S.,

W. HOLDSWORTH LUNN,

AND

CONNOP F. S. PEROWNE.

CRUISES

On the Magnificent Ocean Yacht "ARGONAUT," Tonnage 3,254, H.P. 4,000. Electric Light. First-class Cuisine.

SAILING FROM Marseilles AS BELOW TO

Jan. 2nd, 1901.—Sardinia, Sicily, Naples, Capri, Ajaccio, Villefranche, and Marseilles. A 16 days'Cruise for 19 Guineas and upwards (Return Ticket, London to Marseilles viâ Dover-Calais included).

Jan. 18th.—Athens, Palestine, Egypt, and Naples. A 27 days' Cruise for 29 Guineas and upwards (Return Ticket, London to Marseilles viâ Dover-Calais included).

Feb. 16th.—Crete, Piraeus, Smyrna, Constantinople, Beyrout, Palestine, Egypt, Malta, and Marseilles. A 44 days' Cruise for 46 Guineas and upwards (Return Ticket, London to Marseilles via Dover-Calais included).

£10 10s. & £13 13s. TOURS TO ROME.

Extensions to Naples, Florence, Venice, The Italian Lakes, and the Riviera.

Full Particulars from the Secretary—5, ENDSLEIGH GARDENS, EUSTON, LONDON, N.W.

TOO STOUT.

I was for years; by chance I came across a simple home remedy that reduced me from 17st. to 10st. 12lb., and I will willingly send particulars free to any sufferer enclosing stamp.

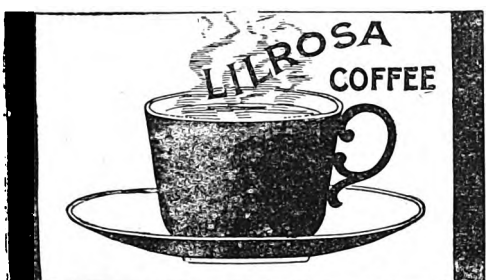
MRS. A. P. FELL, 195, OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.

TO ADVERTISERS.

All communications respecting Advertisements for this Magazine must be addressed to

MESSRS. H. DAWSON & CO.,

34, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.



The PERFECTION of FLAVOUR & FRAGRANCE. Absolutely pure. Sold ground and packed in ¼lb. tins at 1/4 per lb.; or the whole bean in 5lb. cotton bags. Carriage paid on parcels of 5lb. upwards.

THE LILROSA COFFEE, 101, Leadenhall Street, LONDON, E.C. FREE Sample by post on receipt of post-card mentioning this Mag.

Never Fails.

Established

26 YEARS.

Have you a Cough?

A DOSE WILL RELIEVE IT.

Have you a Cold?

A DOSE at BEDTIME WILL REMOVE IT.

WHEN YOU ASK FOR

Owbridge's Lung Tonic

BE SURE YOU GET IT.

Try it also for

Bronchitis, Whooping-Cough, Asthma, Consumption.

Prepared by

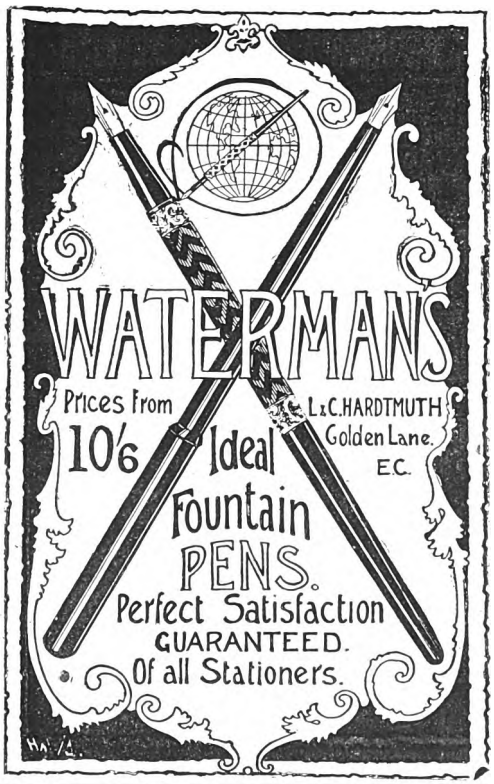
W. T. OWBRIDGE, Chemist, Hull.

Sold everywhere

in bottles, at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s.

COPYRIGHT.

Digitized by Google



WHAT IS NORMAN AND STACEY'S PLAN OF FURNISHING?

IT is a clever scheme now known and adopted in all parts of the English-speaking world, which enables you to furnish your house or flat throughout from drawing-room to kitchen (even to the extent of linens, silver, cutlery, blinds, etc.) out of income without disturbing your capital, by (instead of paying cash) dividing the whole amount into 6, 12, 24, or 36 equal monthly payments. During the above-mentioned period you can, of course, at any time (should you wish it) pay off the amount, and avail yourself of the cash discount.

NORMAN & STACEY, LTD.,
118, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C.

All goods marked in plain figures.
Country orders receive special attention.
Free delivery and inspection solicited. A beautiful catalogue in colours is given upon personal application.
N.B.—In 1894 we originated the Free Life Insurance System of furnishing.

Beware of Imitators.

and NEURALGIA Positively Cured

by a Simple, Safe and Speedy Remedy. A Zox Powder can be taken anywhere, at any time, and with any liquid, with wonderful results.

Two Free Sample Powders

to any reader of the TEMPLE MAGAZINE sending stamped addressed envelope to ZOX CO., 11, Hatton Garden, London, E.C.

You Test it Free.

The "Osman"
Turkish Towels and Bath Mats.

OF ALL DRAPERS.

Made by

BARLOW & JONES, Limited,

Manchester, London, & Bolton.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done, with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. E. C. (Room 8), 195, Oxford Street, London, W.

THOMAS TURNER & CO., MAKE THEIR OWN STEEL.

ENCORE RAZOR

Hand Forged. Extra Hollow Ground. Carefully Set. Guaranteed Perfect. See "Encore" on Shank.

IVORY ... 6s. 6d. | BLACK ... 4s. 6d.

Send for Free List of Cases. From all Dealers, or write direct to Makers—

T. TURNER & Co., Suffolk Works, SHEFFIELD,

who will supply through nearest agent.

Ask for "Encore" Pocket and Table Cutlery

HILLABY'S

PURITY, STRENGTH AND FLAVOR.

IN EVERY HOME.

The need of HILLABY'S LIQUORICE is found in the Winter for Coughs and Colds, Sore Throats, &c. Splendid corrective for disordered Stomach or Bowels.

HILLABY'S Ltd., Lion Works, Pontefract.

LIQUORICE

3 DAINTY SAMPLES FOR 1d. STAMP.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS FOR JANUARY, 1901.

			PAGE
I.	Millet's "Angelus"		Frontispiece
II.	The Greatest Need of the Century	Dean Farrar, etc.	283
III.	The Vicissitudes of Millet's "Angelus"	Rev. James Johnston	289
IV.	A New Year Meditation		290
V.	Winston Churchill, M.P. A Study and a Story . . Illustrated.	John Hulme	291
VI.	The Glamour of Home . Illustrated.	Clive Holland	297
VII.	Women's Settlements in London . . . Illustrated	Mrs. Hirst Alexander	303
VIII.	A Boy's Love . . . Illustrated.	E. C. Gidley	313
IX.	Missionary Pennies and the Work they are Doing . . Illustrated.	Geo. A. Angus	319
X.	Lord Avebury and His Work . Illustrated.	William Sidebotham	323
XI.	The Christ Child	Florence Marryat	330
XII.	The Club Doctor's Wife on "Clubbers" . Illustrated.	Ella Jefferiss	336
XIII.	Wonders of the Blind and the Dumb	J. A. Hammerton	339
XIV.	A Bolt from the Blue. Serial Story. Chapters XV.-XVII. Illustrated by Chas. D. Ward.	Dora Langlois	345
XV.	Christ's College, Blackheath . Illustrated.	A. P. Easton	363
XVI.	In the Public Eye Illustrated.	The Onlooker	367
XVII.	For the Bairns	Rev. J. Reid Howatt	373

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All manuscripts and drawings must be accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes, or the Editor cannot promise their return. They must be addressed, THE EDITOR, "TEMPLE MAGAZINE," WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, CARMELITE STREET, E.C.

Contributions accepted for "In the Public Eye," are paid for at the uniform rate of 5/- per paragraph including portrait. All photographs, which must be non-copyright, are returned.

Business Communications and Orders must be sent to MESSRS. HORACE MARSHALL AND SON, TEMPLE HOUSE, TEMPLE AVENUE, E.C.

Letters relating to Advertisements must be addressed to MESSRS. H. DAWSON AND CO., 34, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, W.C.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE will be sent by post each month, to any address, for an Annual Subscription of 8s. Binding Cases can be purchased from the Publishers for 1s. 6d.

"NEGO"

No Paper Required. THE FIVE-SECONDS FIRELIGHTER. No Waste of Cinders.

THESE Firelighters are a scientifically-prepared composition, with enormous inflammatory properties. All that is necessary when lighting a fire is to break the block into three sections and place in the stove, surrounding the same with coal. When ignited a steady fire will immediately result. One of these Firelighters is quite sufficient to boil a kettle in a few minutes. Sold everywhere in packets of 10, price 3d., or will be sent post free upon receipt of Three Stamps.

THE "NEGO" CO., GOOLE, YORKS.

A sample of these Firelighters will be sent post free on application.

The only

GOLD MEDAL

Awarded for Milk-Chocolate at the Paris Exhibition, 1900, was gained by

PETER'S

MILK-CHOCOLATE,

The Original and Best.

Sold by all Confectioners and Grocers.

Sole Agents (trade only), S. J. MACKENZIE & Co., LTD., LONDON, E.

Digitized by Google

AN IMPORTANT NEW CENTURY LITERARY ENTERPRISE

Rudyard Kipling's

GREAT NEW STORY,

Entitled

KIM

Will appear in the pages of

Cassell's Magazine

DURING 1901.

THE JANUARY PART, containing the commencement of this Great Story, is Now Ready, Price 6d.

The Illustrations of this Story are by the author's father, Mr. LOCKWOOD KIPLING, Mr. EDWIN L. WEEKS, and Mr. H. R. MILLAR.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED, LONDON,
AND ALL BOOKSELLERS.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

MILLET'S "ANGELUS." (See page 289).

After a Carbon Print by Braun Clément & Co. [Dornach, Paris and New York.

Digitized by Google

The Greatest Need of the Century.

Symposium by representative men, including Learned Divines, Popular Authors, Leading Editors, Well-known Humorists, and two M.D.'s. . . . . .

DR. FARRAR,

Dean of Canterbury.

The permanence of our Empire, the stability of our Commerce, the whole welfare of the Nation, depend on our showing ourselves capable of developing more strenuousness, more self-denial, a deeper conviction of the truth that there is one thing only—Righteousness—which exalteth a nation; and that sin is not only the reproach but the ruin of any people.

RICHARD WHITEING,

Author of "No. 5, John Street."

The greatest need of the twentieth century is a word of timely warning against the foolishness of trying to find new aims. The best of the old ones will do. Let the century bend its back to the task which its predecessors have only boggled as yet. After all the nineteenth will be best remembered by its efforts to carry on that great work of social emancipation which the eighteenth just lived to begin. Weak as the old eighteenth was, it had a fine death-bed repentance in the French Revolution. There is still a good deal to save from Nietzsche and the Devil. We have yet to find the secret of a more equal diffusion of the blessings of life, even of such as may be expressed in the coarse terms of pounds, shillings and pence. Too much goes to individuals, or to the corporations that are taking their place in our economic system. They are too fat; and their kicking threatens the very frame of things.

Less than enough of all that is best worth having is left for the "balance" of mankind. These are still far short of their proper share in education, housing, beauty, sweet body and sweet mind. I would not give them more beer. In a kindlier light from the skies, the burning question of the difference between the long pull and the short would cease to have its present lurid importance. It owes everything to its background in our city of dreadful night. The poor in purse and in spirit must be lifted up, or they will drag us all down together. We have to extend the conception of "a bold peasantry, their country's pride" to the whole mass of the disinherited. The contrast is too shocking as it stands. Our choice lies between the violence incidental to their attempt to do what nobody else will do for them, or the wiser way. The statesmen, the thinkers, the writers, and all the shaping tribe have a glorious part to play in the twentieth century. They will no doubt be equal to it. Happy the infancy of to-day! What would not one give for its chances of seeing at least a partial fulfilment of the hopes of the race?

F. C. BURNAND,

Editor of "Punch."

Can there be any question as to what is the "greatest need" to the majority of us in the new century? Has it not been the greatest need for most persons in the past century, or rather centuries? Money.

Have every good quality possible, be the most charitable person in the world, and if you have no money—cui bono?

It needs no "symposium" of philosophers or men distinguished in Art and Letters to tell us that the greatest need for the new century, and for every other century, past, present and future, is "money."

Digitized by Google

Without money the next need is miracles.

Money or miracles. Remember the tribute money found in the mouth of a fish.

There's an example: The miracle produced the money, or, rather, the money was produced by miracle. Had money been present a miracle would not have been needed.

The Rev. SILAS K. HOCKING,
Novelist and Methodist Preacher.

What is needed more than anything else is a genuine ethical revival—the creation of a finer moral sense, of a purer moral atmosphere. I would say nothing in disparagement of creeds or ceremonials, or modes of worship—these things are important, no doubt, but they are not of supreme importance—the one essential thing is character. "He hath showed thee, O man, what is good, and what the Lord doth require of thee. That thou do justly, that thou love mercy, and that thou walk humbly with thy God."

We have insisted continuously on what may be called the formal side of religion, such as attendance at meetings and sacraments. We have urged the necessity of faith and sound doctrine—and no doubt rightly so—but the all-important question of godliness, of the higher ethical life, of the fine moral sense that resents, and shrinks back, from the least approach of sin, has in my judgment received far too little attention. I hesitate to say a word that should seem to reflect on existing organisations, and yet most thoughtful men, I think, will admit that the moral tone and the moral standards of the world leave much to be desired. Nor is there any very clear line of distinction between those who profess religion and those who do not. As a matter of fact, some of the noblest characters in the world to-day—and by general consent acknowledged as such—make no profession of religion at all.

I fear we must hold it a truth that however successful the Church may have been in christianising the world, the world has been far more successful in secularising the Church. The merely rich man has far more influence to-day in Church Councils than the merely godly man. Big houses count for more than great souls, and small sins are winked at when covered by large contributions. If the Kingdom of Heaven is represented by the ecclesiastical organisations that we call the Church, then a golden key will unlock the door, and money will purchase the highest seats.

The Christian Church to-day is suffering from precisely the same evils that affected and paralysed the Jewish Church in the time of Christ. The points of analogy may be easily traced by anyone who will take the trouble to do so. Hence the failure of the Church to meet and circumvent the growing evils of the land. The power of the drink-seller is steadily increasing both in the Church and in the State. The Stock Exchange gambler is to the front in ecclesiastical enterprises. The company-promoter, the money-lender, the jerry-builder, the rack-renter, have honoured places in the synagogue, and the result is that morally the nation stagnates. Even religiously we make no real progress. There are fewer young people in our Sunday schools than there were five years ago; fewer adults, relatively to the size of the population, attending our churches; fewer additions, in proportion to the agencies, to the roll of Church members.

Nor is that the worst, from a merely ecclesiastical point of view. The Church has lost its hold upon the great mass of the people; not one in ten of the working men of England attend Church or Chapel. What we term the masses don't believe in the Church, or in the ministry. They don't believe that we are sincere. They don't believe that we believe what we profess to believe, or we should do differently from what we do. It is a humiliating confession to make, but we had better face it. These people have no quarrel with Christianity. They believe in Christ and reverence Him. But they fail to discover in us any real likeness to the Master.

Wherein, they ask, is the difference between those who profess religion and the great mass of respectable people who make no profession? Are we more peaceful, more neighbourly, more ready to forgive, more eager to do good, more willing to suffer wrong? Is our life simpler, sweeter, more gentle and generous and heroic? Do we come out from among the ungodly? Do we stand apart—a nation within a nation—rebuking national wrong, resisting passion and strife, holding aloft the banner of brotherhood—fighting against lust and greed and drunkenness, or do we fritter away our life in oiling ecclesiastical machinery and let the world wag as it will?

Digitized by Google

I may be mistaken—I hope I may be, but it seems to me we have lost the vivid sense of wrong that ought to characterise us. We really don't trouble about such matters as drunkenness, and gambling, and prostitution, and war. Our conscience is not sensitive to the finer shades of morality. We allow evil things to be done in the hope that good may come. We place denominational gain before national righteousness, and we have lost sight of the race in our passion for a nation.

So I come back to the point at which I started. It is an ethical revival that we need. No opening of the flood gates of emotion will meet the case. No new acceptance of a creed. When the Church herself has been converted to Godliness then shall we make our influence felt upon the nation.

We want a nearer vision of God—a realisation of His immanence, an awakening to righteousness and a sense of our own accountability, and of a judgment to come.

Rev. C. H. GRUNDY, M.A.

Rural Dean of Greenwich.

The pressing need of the new century is among the young men; a sense of duty instead of a love of pleasure.

The youth of England lack industry and the power of "sticking to it." Their minds are full of football records and entertainments. The one idea is to "get away from the office" as soon as possible.

Self-improvement is put on one side for smoking concerts and amateur dramatics, and the tendency is to lean on parents and to get money from them, instead of pushing forward in life by plodding and efficiency. The "early closing" is the idea everywhere. The dogged intention to make one's way in the world and rise by sheer hard work is dying out.

The limp lover of pleasure, to be paid for by other people, is everywhere. The grit and determination which built up the old businesses of England is going, and young men are content to be clerks in "Limited Companies" because they have neither the self-respect nor the energy to make a career.

CLEMENT SHORTER,

Editor of the "Sphere."

Assuming that there are in this country, and in every country, many thousands of people who, without any fault of their own, but through temperament and circumstance, are suffering the most painful fruits of poverty, I take it the greatest need of the next century is that it should solve this problem of the undeserved poor.

Dr. JESSOPP,

Rector of Scarning, Norfolk.

I believe the greatest need of the twentieth century, as far as the welfare of our own country is concerned, is that the financial position of the Church of England should be very largely strengthened. This can be done in two ways. Firstly, by raising a sum of not less than two millions sterling by a subscription raised in the same way as the Wesleyan body has determined to raise, and has gone far already to raise, one million sterling. Secondly, by dealing with all existing and future endowments exactly in the same way as the Episcopal and Capitular Estates and the revenues of the endowed schools have been dealt with and are now administered, the patronage of the several benefices remaining undisturbed. When this is brought about, as I believe it will be, all houses and lands and all funded property, from the income of which the beneficed clergy derive their stipends, will be handed over to trustees and managed by them, the nett income being paid to the several incumbents of the parish or district churches.

The inequalities in the values of the benefices will as a rule be left as they are, except that the very poor benefices will be subsidised, probably in the same way as the poorer bishoprics were subsidised by arrangement, duly carried out by the powers that be.

The saving in the expense of management in keeping up the houses and buildings, and in developing the resources of the benefices, will be immense; while the creation of a new Church Fund, to be raised by subscription, will suffice to maintain those whose duty it will be to become the moral and religious teachers of the nation and to minister to the daily increasing multitudes now largely left to take their chance

Digitized by Google

MAX O'RELL,

Author of "John Bull and his Island," etc.

The nineteenth century has been the age of scientific discovery, but there is a discovery that no explorer has yet succeeded in making, that of the French people by the English, and that of the English people by the French. The ignorance of nations on the subject of what is going on in other nations is something appalling, but when we reflect that France is only twenty-one miles from England, that ignorance, so far as these two great and intelligent countries are concerned, must be a subject of wonderment.

Up to now, the newspapers, which are the only means that the masses of the people have to educate themselves, have fed their readers on "patriotic lies," instead of teaching them the truth. The greatest need of the twentieth century is a press upright and noble, that will see that its duty is to preach concord, and to help, by their careful discretion and consideration, the work of diplomatists whenever any difficulties may arise between two nations. If, besides, a law is passed that will cause newspapers to be prosecuted for libelling foreign nations, as well as private individuals, the peace of the world will be assured.

THE REV. ALFRED ROWLAND,

Pastor of Park Chapel, Crouch End.

Strenuous self-denial for the sake of higher aims in life appears to me one of our greatest needs. In all directions we see signs of self-indulgence. Sometimes these appear in mere animalism, such as drunkenness and impurity, and often in amusements which have in them no recreative influence, so far as the higher part of one's nature is concerned. A quarter of a century ago or more, debating Societies demanded of their members the conquest of indolence and nervousness, but they are now supplanted by entertainments which exact no effort, and do no more than pass the time agreeably. This easy-going, pleasure-loving spirit is seriously affecting the right use of the Lord's Day, some of whose hours should surely be spent in acts of worship, in study of divine truth, and in service for others, but which by many now is wholly devoted to pleasure. To the same cause we may attribute the lack of strenuousness in those who take up perfunctorily, or temporarily, great movements in the direction of temperance reform or missionary enterprise. Passionate zeal for political, social or religious questions is rare, and steady continuance in well-doing is not more common. What we need, therefore, if we would rise to the noble possibilities presented by the dawning century, is whole-hearted consecration to the service of God and our fellows.

GEORGE B. BURGIN,

Literary Critic of the "Daily Express."

The greatest need for the new century is a little more faith, hope, and charity, and a little less pessimism. In the words of a celebrated old divine, let us remember that, "We have a title to be provided for, as we are God's creatures . . . and, therefore it is a huge folly and infidelity to be troubled and full of care."

CANON DANIELL, M.A.,

Chaplain of Dulwich College.

On entering a new century one must remember that human nature is always the same human nature. There is the same engrained corruption and weakness to be dealt with and remedied; and the same edification, or gradual building up of character on right lines to be secured. The Son of Man is still "The Way." He shows us what the true man is, and what that progress, that "getting on" (of which we often think and speak wrongly), really is. He constrains us by His love to be as He was, self-devoted and self-sacrificing. He inspires us to think more of the praise which God gives than of that which man bestows. He makes us by His own victory to overcome the world, which is always tempting us to sacrifice principle to self-interest, and to be absorbed in what is only temporary instead of what is permanent. He enables us to find Reality in what is above nature, and not in the natural and the seen. These considerations are always the secret of triumph in us and through us of the truth. But a changing world of wilful men, and nations, and people, makes some special point need emphasis as the nineteenth century passes into the twentieth, and we achieve another 100 Anni Domini—Years of the Lord.

Digitized by Google

England's strength has been and is the purity of its home life, and the use of its opportunities as the school of right being. Surely in the twentieth century we need to look to it that we and other peoples make and keep the home and family as they should be—"A man's foes shall be they of his own household." There are the sharpest battles fought, and so the greatest victories won. There does the real man most reveal himself. There is the most lasting impression made for good and evil on the most impressionable whom we are more immediately sent to impress. Marriages arranged with no thought of the responsibilities of those who by marrying found a home, with no thorough partnership and confidence between man and wife, with the intention of a selfish evasion of the greatest of the issues of the married state—sap the foundations of all wholesome life. The tale of how the poor live in our great cities of to-day makes one tremble for the consequences of homeless upbringings to the strength of England and of humanity. We could say much more, but it is enough to sum up one man's unworthy thoughts of the greatest need of the new century into the words—More conscience for the founding and maintaining of our homes as the only reliable beginners of all that Love which we have learnt from The Son of Man.

GEORGE MANVILLE FENN,

Author of a Hundred Popular Novels.

In my opinion the greatest need of the new century is a thorough cleansing of the national hive by means of a short Act of Parliament—one which would enable the magistracy to work in co-operation with the Army and Navy in making a clean sweep of the ruffiandom existent in our large towns, which swarm with able-bodied young men and lads of a class who are a curse to themselves and a constant evil to those among whom they dwell. As matters stand, we are constantly reading of Hooliganism and its varieties, which now supplement the ordinary petty crimes that fill our prisons. These pests of society will not work; they are perfectly useless, and for their benefit as well as our own, I would give the magistracy the power to hand over to the naval and military authorities every able-bodied man or youth fit to serve, who could not prove that he is getting an honest living. It would mean the formation of depots of supply for the two services, in which excellent sailors and soldiers could be manufactured for enforced service, with the sternest repression and punishment where needed for the vilest and most stubborn, and rapid advance by gradation for the more willing, who should have facility for becoming decent soldiers or sailors fit to be drafted into our regiments or ships. We enforce education with the child and boy. Why not continue it with the growing ruffian? He would be beyond the reach of the cane so delicately used under the school board, but here in cases of the very worst there is the lash. Retrograde? Better than the constant imprisonment which seems only to harden, and its application would be the greatest rarity if stern military discipline were the order of the day.

THE REV. H. R. HAWEIS, M.A.,

Incumbent of St. James', Marylebone.

More prophets, fewer parrots; more thought, less talk; more fact, less fancy; more faith, less form.

H. W. MASSINGHAM.

London Editor of the "Manchester Guardian."

The greatest need of the New Century is, in my opinion, to teach the Individual Truth, the State Justice, and the Church Christianity.

CANON W. HAY AITKEN,

Of Norwich Cathedral.

I think that we may get at a conclusion as to what is the greatest need of the Twentieth Century by reflecting on what it is that we most deplore in the end of the Nineteenth. I believe that most thoughtful observers of the moral features of the period would indicate this by a somewhat clumsy, but all too intelligible word—INDIFFERENTISM. It is not merely to Christian religion that the masses are indifferent. It seems scarcely possible to awaken any enthusiasm on any subject of either moral, social, or even political reform. The one hopeful feature of the hour in this respect, contrasting with this, and indicating the potentiality of better things, has been the recent outburst of patriotic feeling.

Digitized by Google

Now I suppose that the opposite of indifferentism is EARNESTNESS. We need earnestness in other things besides football, and indeed even in this there seems a tendency to sacrifice the enthusiasm of the amateur to the commercially apprised skill of the professional.

We need (Oh, that we might begin our new century with it!) "another Pentecost." This will produce earnestness in every department of reform. I always believe that it was the American Revival that killed slavery, and a similar spiritual movement, coupled with the strong teaching that is now, thank God, so common on the subject of Christian morality, will inaugurate a new crusade against those monstrous moral and social evils which still disgrace our modern civilisation.

J. KEIR HARDIE, M.P.,

Leader of the Independent Labour Party.

Men!

REV. W. CARLILE,

Founder and Chief Secretary of the Church Army.

From a Church Army point of view, the crying need of the Church of Christ is, that she should be truly Catholic in her love both for the best, however much she may differ from some, and for the worst, however much they may have sunken; as well as Apostolic, in that she puts herself to endless risk and trouble to win them.

REV. F. B. MEYER, B.A.,

Pastor of Christ Church, Westminster.

The greatest need for the new century is a revival of the sense of Reverence, by which I mean the habitual acknowledgment on the part of us all of the reality and worth of the unseen and eternal. Our modern life seems utterly superficial. Wealth, display, pleasure monopolise us. We burn so much gas, and spend so much time, far into the night, in its glamour, that we seldom look up to the stars burning through the ages, in the infinite spaces of the Universe. How differently Drake, Frobisher, Hawkins, Sir Philip Sydney would have written to Queen Elizabeth of their successes by land or sea, to the style that most correspondents and leader writers now employ; whilst the references of Hampden, Pym, and Colonel Hutchinson to God, the Bible, and the eternal principles of the Kingdom of God would be deemed so much cant if used by a statesman to-day. We are losing our reverence for human rights, for our liberty, for our word, for the family, for God's Day, God's Book, and God himself. And when reverence for things which lie behind the material and outward vanishes, the dry rot has already struck its fangs into the foundations of our national life.

CORRIE GRANT, M.P.,

Chief Organiser of the Progressive Forces in London.

Your question is extremely difficult to answer. Everybody will consider the question of what is the greatest need of the new century from their own, and therefore from a different point of view. My little daughter's answer is "More Liberal M. P's.," while a struggling friend of mine is confident that the true reply is "More money." I should say first that I desire our social and moral progress to be as great in the new century as in the old. The greatest need of the new century is therefore more citizens of character, of determination, single-eyed, unselfish, simple. What is the greatest stumbling block in the way? The steadily growing greed of wealth.

MAX PEMBERTON,

Author of "The Footsteps of a Throne," etc.

I think the greatest need of the new century is:—

For the Nation—Sobriety and a due sense of proportion.

For the Politician—New Voices but old Truths.

For the Worker—A wider vision looking across the Channel to ask where the worker stands.

The final greatness of this Empire depends upon the fidelity to the old traditions of freedom and peace. Her commercial greatness, indispensable to her stability, is purely a matter of intellect and application. She must work harder and think more. Perhaps her greatest need is the knowledge that her commercial supremacy is leaving her.

Further interesting contributions will appear next month.

Digitized by Google

THE VICISSITUDES OF MILLET'S "ANGELUS."

BY THE REV. JAMES JOHNSTON.

THE wanderings of Millet's noble and affecting picture are scarcely less romantic than the circumstances of its production, painted in the solemn loneliness of the Plain of Chailly, beside the immemorial oaks and beeches of Fontainebleau.

"The Angelus," which was painted in 1859, was originally sold by the artist for about £70 to M. Feydeau, and after passing through several hands, the price ever advancing as the fame of the picture grew, it was purchased by Mr. J. W. Wilson for £1,520.

At the Wilson sale in 1881 it became the property of M. Secrêtan, the French copper-king, who gave no less than £6,400 for it. But reverses compelled M. Secrêtan to part with the whole of his magnificent collection of art treasures, and once more "The Angelus" changed hands.

In July, 1889, the entire collection was brought to the hammer in Paris. M. Knoedler, on behalf of the Corcoram Art Gallery, New York, and M. Antonin Proust, who was supposed to hold a commission in the name of the French Government, were the chief competitors for Millet's masterpiece, and after an exciting and spirited bidding "The Angelus" was knocked down amidst intense excitement to Mr. Proust for the immense sum of £23,000. This price included the Government commission of 5 per cent.

Subsequently, however, the French Chamber of Deputies refused to ratify Mr. Proust's purchase or to grant money to pay for the picture, and Millet's chef-d'œuvre was afterwards exhibited for a year in the United States.

At a later date the ultimate home of "The Angelus" was uncertain, some declaring that it remained in New York, others that it was again on its native soil.

Proof is now forthcoming that it is at present not far away from the French capital.

M. Chaucard, the latest owner of the picture, paid for it, when it had been round the world and had found a temporary resting place in the United States, something very like £32,000. It is worth noting that, according to a statement in connection with the recent art bequests of M. Ionides to South Kensington, London, it is by a mere accident the British nation does not now enter into possession of the immortal "Angelus," since M. Ionides could at one time have purchased Millet's work for the modest sum of £3,000, and very nearly did acquire it.

M. Chaucard, of the Magasins du Louvre, Paris, should be one of the happiest of art lovers, possessing, as he does, a world-renowned collection of paintings, which he has lately removed from the Avenue Velasquez to his suburban residence at Longchamps, facing the Windmill. So highly does M. Chaucard cherish his artistic hobby that it is an inflexible rule with him never to sleep a night from under the roof that shelters his precious gallery.

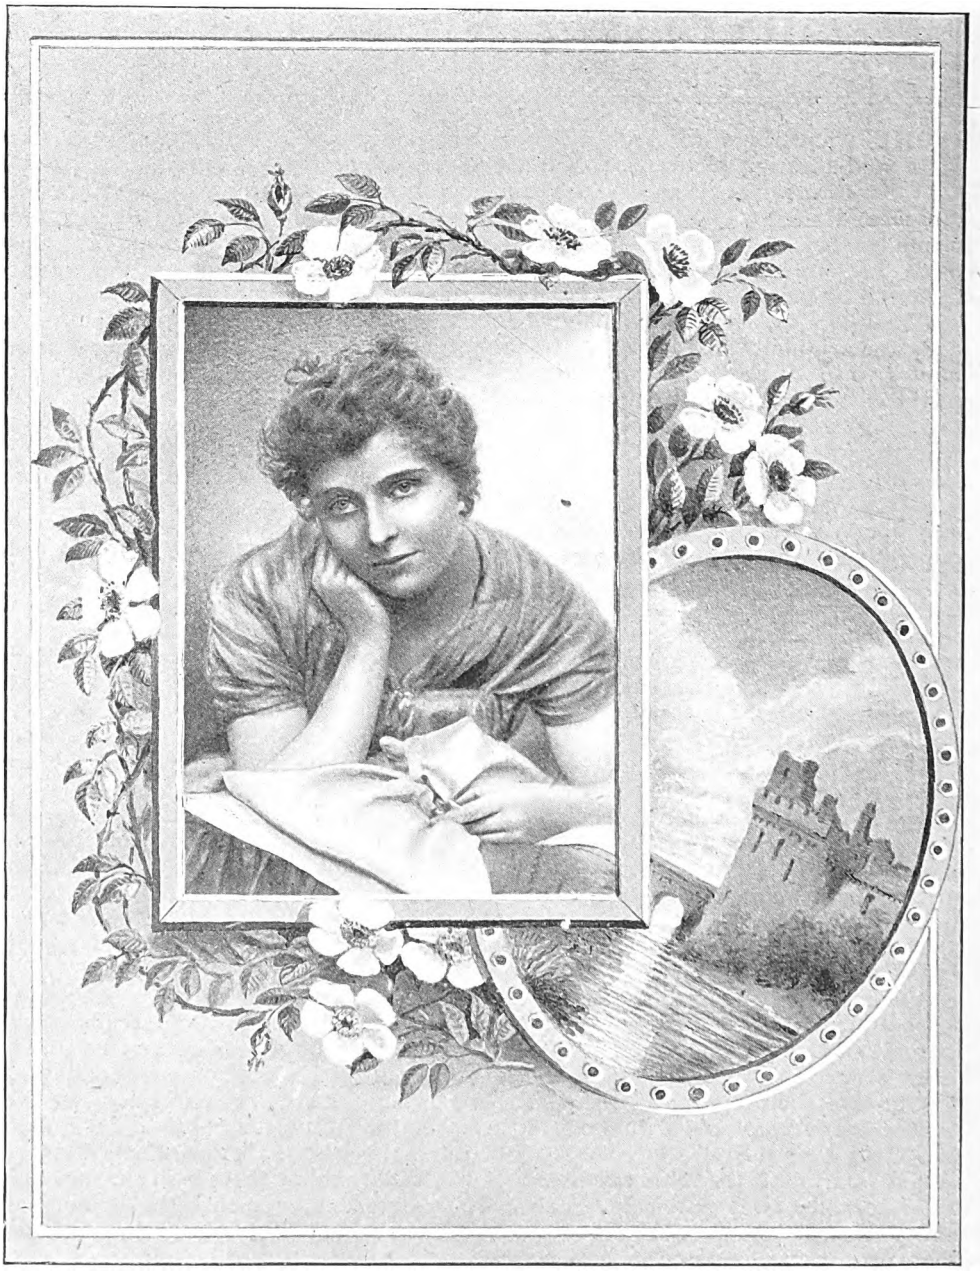
It appears that on Sunday, October 21st, M. Loubet, the French President, went to lunch and saw the famous paintings, including the gem of the great French painter, and that on the same occasion the chief members of the Cabinet met M. Loubet at M. Chaucard's table.

This greatly increased the fame of M. Chaucard's gallery, and a day or two later it was visited by King George and his son, Prince Nicholas of Greece. Although M. Chaucard attends daily to his house of business in the city, and only dispenses hospitality on Sundays, he cordially made an exception for King George, who saw "L'Angelus" for the first time in the Chaucard collection.

What pathos there is in the fact that at the present moment the triumphs of Millet's brush are realising enormous prices, while the artist himself struggled against the pressure of poverty, for the most part all his life long amidst his lonely Barbizon surroundings, painting with a sympathetic power, such as no other painter has shown, the life of rustic France.

JAMES JOHNSTON.

Digitized by Google



A NEW YEAR MEDITATION.

Digitized by Google

WINSTON CHURCHILL, M.P.

A Study and . . a Story.

By . . JOHN HULME.

I CAN imagine a much easier task than verbally painting a portrait of anyone who has suddenly acquired popularity, for this latter often produces the same effect upon a man or woman that strong lime light has upon the made-up face of a stage hero or heroine—fictitious values, which daylight, ordinary surroundings, and a closer view dispel.

If the artist is conscientious, he will desire to put down on his canvas the simple truth. He will seek to express the real rather than accept the stage ideal, and (unless for special reasons) will endeavour to paint his sitter characteristically posed, in a natural light, and with an appropriate background.

But a certain amount of courage is necessary to enable the artist to thus record his realistic impressions; because in so doing he will, more likely than not, offend both the sitter and his friends; for it is not everyone who is philosophical enough to exclaim: "Draw me as I am, wrinkles and all."

Thus far, then, by way of preface to the exhibition of the sketch I have attempted of Winston Churchill, M.P. for Oldham; a sketch upon which I have endeavoured to work in a soberly critical, yet not unsympathetic spirit; a sketch during the preparation of which I have been reminded of the Horatian maxim that the unknown often passes for the magnificent, or, as the old English saying puts it, "Hills look green when viewed from afar," a sketch recording my impressions of the subject just as he appeared to me; neither adding anything, selecting anything, nor rejecting anything.

The junior member for Oldham, during a conversation I had with him at Crompton Hall in Lancashire, informed me that he was born at Blenheim on November 30th, 1874. From a preparatory school at Brighton he, in 1888, proceeded to Harrow, where he remained for about five years and which he left in 1893 to enter Sandhurst.

MR. WINSTON CHURCHILL AT THE FRONT.

After eighteen months spent in the military academy there, he, on the 20th February, 1895, received a commission in the 4th (Queen's Own) Hussars, the same year seeing him obtain permission to go out to Cuba for the purpose of witnessing the Spanish-American war, as an attaché to the force of Marshal Campos.

In 1896 the 4th Hussars were ordered to India, Mr.

Digitized by Google

Churchill accompanying his regiment. He was with the Malakand Field Force in '97, and also went with the Tirah expedition in the early part of '98. In the autumn following he succeeded in getting himself attached to the 21st Lancers, and consequently had an opportunity of beholding Kitchener's Soudan campaign brought to its brilliantly successful conclusion at the battle of Omdurman.

A year and a-half ago, or little over four years from the time of his entering, he left the British Army.

His sword was then turned into, not a ploughshare, but a stylus; his work henceforth was to consist of giving, not orders, but orations; his duty, the chronicling, not creating, of war's alarms; for, abandoning the profession of arms, he enlisted in the army of political professors.

In July, 1899, he unsuccessfully fought a bye-election at Oldham, and, a few months later, sailed for South Africa, in the capacity of war correspondent. His subsequent career needs no recapitulation here, since it has loomed largely enough in the public eye to be easily read by even an express-train passenger. It was during Mr. Churchill's bye-election contest at Oldham that I was first afforded an opportunity of studying him at close quarters. A friend of mine happened to be on a visit to Oldham, and we both joined in putting in a little work on behalf of Mr. Churchill, whom my friend often saw, and frequently conversed with; I also meeting him, but less frequently.

Months afterwards we compared notes. "What is your opinion of Churchill?" I enquired.

"Began at the wrong end. Ought to have started with sweeping the stage instead of playing leading parts," was the gruff though kindly-meant reply of my amateur-theatricals-loving companion.

To this reply I made no answer. Frankly, I was puzzled. For I had read a certain novel which I was informed was written by Winston Churchill when a mere boy of twenty-two.

"Twenty-two years! Almost a Plato in petticoats," was my mental remark concerning the writer, after I had finished his last chapter, for the tale is undoubtedly interspersed with more philosophy on women and politics than one usually associates with the experience of a young man of two-and-twenty. It was precisely written, too, and hence, after glancing at other work to which Mr. Churchill's name appeared, expectancy ran moderately high, whilst making my way for the first time to hear him speak, anticipating that his discourse would, at least, have a literary flavour, if not embellished with oratorical grace.

But it had neither; and close quarters had brought its first shock of disappointment.

His escape from Pretoria, and letters on the British-Boer campaign invested him with a halo of interest that again raised the expectations of many who, like myself, were desirous of noting any improvement that might have taken place either in the manner or matter of his speeches.

And again disappointment has followed in the wake of the closer view.

Mr. Churchill and oratory are not neighbours, yet; nor do I think it likely they ever will be.

Under ordinary circumstances, he uses carefully prepared notes properly arranged according to the effect intended. His temperament is highly nervous, which may explain his tendency to over gesticulate. A favourite platform attitude, used whenever he has made a point, is to place both hands on his hips, what time he beams the smile of satisfaction. At other times, when excited, he seems to be hammering home his words with both hands raised aloft.

I have travelled several hundred miles for the purpose of hearing him either lecture or make political speeches. In reality, however, it has been practically the same speech—its subject South Africa. If politics were comprised solely in the terms Natal, Orange River Colony and the Transvaal, then would Mr. Churchill graduate as a proficient politician. On his knowledge of, or ability to deal with, important social questions a more reserved opinion must be expressed.

But if he does not yet exhibit any striking, all round acquaintance with political questions, it must be borne in mind that he has had no very great opportunity for acquiring it, for he had finished his school career and professional training when he was but four months over the age of twenty, an age when the average professional man is only beginning his course of study, and most of the five years and nine months since then has been spent in savage or semi-savage lands.

Digitized by Google

One suffers another disillusion on seeing Mr. Churchill enter a small room (say where his committee meet). The idea one forms of him enveloped with a seven-thousand-miles-away atmosphere, and from descriptions that from time to time have been given of him, is that of a broad-chested, well set-up, bright eyed, brown faced young man with a military carriage, a ringing voice, and infectious smile. But the junior member for Oldham is rather slightly built, and his stoop dispels our preconceived notions of his soldier-like bearing. Light untanned complexion, faintly brown hair, rather dreamy eyes that frequently droop, a cleanly cut chin, shapely hands, and a quickly vanishing smile constitute the picture of his external appearance.

MR. WINSTON CHURCHILL AND LADY RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, WITH MR. AND MRS. WHITTAKER, THEIR HOST AND HOSTESS, AT OLDHAM. THE FIFTH PORTRAIT IS THAT OF MR. HUGHES, A FRIEND OF MR. CHURCHILL.

One day, whilst returning from the Terrace of the House of Commons, my friend the late Louis J. Jennings, then M.P. for Stockport, and myself passed the present Colonial Secretary.

"What a world of care Mr. Chamberlain seems to have on his shoulders!" said the author of "Field Paths and Green Lanes," and the remark returns to me as I watch Mr. Churchill's movements. He seems to be always steeped up to the eyes in business; and to manifest at times a strange forgetfulness. One evening, he informed me, to my surprise, that he had forgotten the names of the principal towns where he has to lecture this winter in America.

It would hardly be correct to allude to either his wit or humour as prominent, whilst on general subjects he is but a middling conversationist. Yet his eye brightens whenever either painting, politics, or soldiering is mentioned, and his best expressions come out when discussing campaigns, kit-cats, and Cabinet Ministers.

Digitized by Google

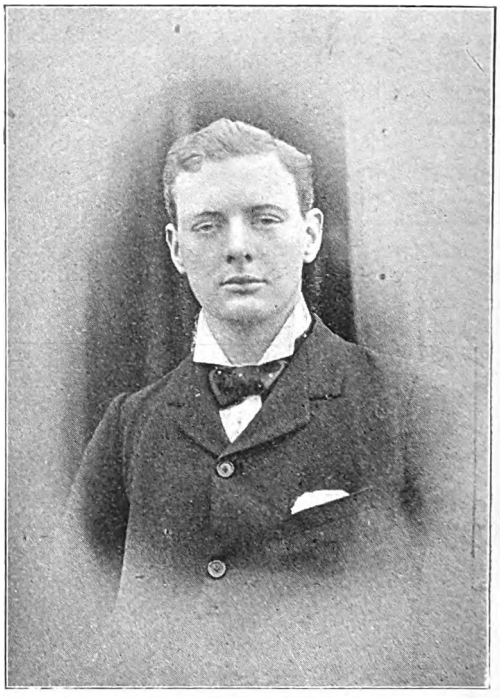
"Will you accompany me to Paris?" said the Duke of Marlborough to him one day, not long ago.

"I will; but in that case I shall, when at the Exhibition, spend most of my time among the pictures," was Mr. Churchill's reply.

He is certainly fond of painting, although, judging from one or two of his remarks, I should imagine his taste inclined towards those works that expressed, rather than suggested, detail. An admirer of novels dealing with soldier life, he is also very accurately informed as to contemporary military history, and on one occasion surprised a constituent who had been through the Franco-German war, by not only putting him right on a disputed point regarding a certain engagement, but also by repeating the number of killed, wounded and prisoners in every important battle in that campaign—from Worth and Gravelotte to the downfall of Paris.

The spirit to dare and the determination to do must also be placed to the credit side of his account, whilst on the other hand an impatience of opposition has laid him open to the charge of being lacking in deference to the ideas of others.

But in passing the above opinions on Mr. Churchill I wish it to be understood that I am criticising him by a high standard; a standard however, no higher than the pedestal on which recent events have placed him. He is the man of the psychological moment.

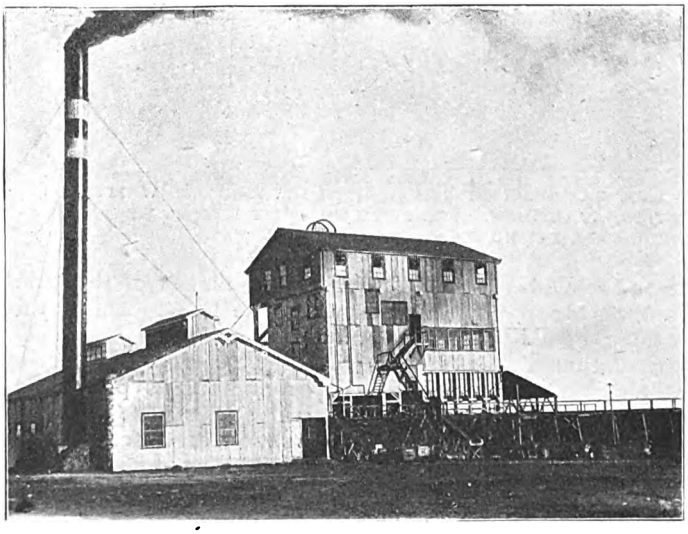


HOME FROM THE WARS.

His lucky star is in the ascendant. To attract the notice of and secure the electioneering assistance of Mr. Chamberlain was in itself a fortunate achievement, but an achievement to be followed by an event quite as remarkable.

At the close of the meeting, and a wait of an hour being necessary before Mr. Chamberlain could start on his return journey, he determined to spend the time at the railway station. So into the saloon compartment of the special train by which he was to travel, he went, accompanied by Mr. Churchill, Mr. Crisp, and a friend of my own who is an enthusiast on the question of supporting the indigent aged. After the company had lit up, and the symbolic rings had begun to make their appearance, one of the party said:

"Now, Mr. Chamberlain, seeing that your party is once more in



THE MINE WHERE MR. CHURCHILL WAS HIDDEN.

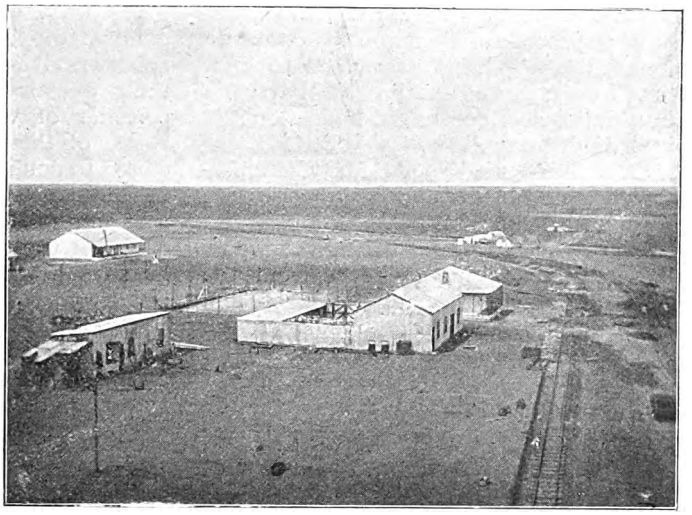
Digitized by Google

power, I hope you won't forget to deal promptly with the question of old age pensions."

"Of course they will," remarked Mr. Churchill, looking enquiringly at Mr. Chamberlain.

"I know of no more interesting or likely field of legislation," continued my friend the first speaker.

"It is certainly a very important one," added Mr. Churchill, "the visits I paid to the Oldham workhouse and the sights I have witnessed elsewhere having impressed me deeply on the matter."



WITBANK, THE STATION AT WHICH MR. CHURCHILL TOOK REFUGE IN A GOODS TRAIN.

The Master of Highbury turned his eyes upon both his questioners, knocked the ashes off his cigar, gazed forth into the night for a moment, then throwing himself back into his seat, he, with a good-humoured smile, and in a half-interrogative, half-exclamatory tone, said, "What! From South Africa to the Submerged Tenth!"

MR. DEWSNAP, WHO ASSISTED THE ESCAPE.

"Yes, for the welfare of the latter is of importance quite equal to the former," rejoined my friend.

Again the same roll of the cigar between the lips of the Colonial Secretary, and again the same smile of amusement. But this time not a word of reply. He seemed to have gone into a train of thought.

"Of course," said another member of the little party, "of course, Mr. Chamberlain will bring in a Bill dealing with the matter?"

But the Master of Highbury would promise to do no such thing.

"Why, the British people look upon you as pledged to the measure!"

"I know they do," said Mr. Chamberlain, rousing himself and becoming animated, "I know they do. And yet in no speech I have ever uttered will it be found that I have definitely pledged myself to any such thing.

"But how has the idea got abroad, then?"

"Well, it was just in this way: During the last time I was out of office, I began turning over in my mind this problem of providing for the declining days of the poorer class. I had no definite scheme of my own in view; but clung to the notion that if a number of capable intellects were brought to bear upon the question, something feasible might be evolved.

"So I began discussing the matter with several of my friends, and, after a while, succeeded in getting sanctioned the formation of a committee, which any member of the House of Commons who took an interest in the subject was asked to join. Now, how many of the Liberal Party do you think responded to the invitation?"

Digitized by Google

"I don't know."

"A solitary one!" said Mr. Chamberlain, throwing up his hands with a gesture of amazement. "However, we went on with our work, and no doubt you know all about our taking evidence from the representatives of Friendly Societies, and also from others. As a result of our labours I recommended the granting of five shillings a week by the Government to such as had attained a certain age, and shown themselves deserving of such aid by their own endeavours. This, however, did not, for some reason, meet with the approval of the Friendly Societies, and now, I acknowledge, I see no way out of the difficulty. Therefore, to say I definitely pledged myself to do anything in the matter is a mistake. I voluntarily grappled with the question to the best of my ability, but definitely pledged myself to nothing."

Mr. Churchill looked puzzled but remained silent.

And now, in beginning the painting of the remaining portion of this portrait's background, I must ask the reader to step inside Imagination's car and journey with me to a scene in South Africa. 'Tis a wild looking place, exploited by the Transvaal and Delagoa Bay Collieries Company, about three miles from Witbank, in the neighbourhood of Middleburg.

A number of rough miners are congregated around the fire of one of the huts dotted about this bleak spot—a spot not too inviting at best, but less so now, when the times are as tempestuous as the elements raging without.

"Lord help any poor fellow out of doors to-night!" exclaimed one of the miners.

Scarcely had the sound of the assent, chorussed by the rest, died away when a knock is heard at the door.

Every man springs to his feet, and seeks his arms, for in that neighbourhood friends are few, foes plentiful; spies everywhere.

The knocking being repeated, the door is opened, whereupon a man, haggard and tattered in appearance, staggers in, uttering as he does so the question: "Are you English?" Upon receiving an affirmative answer the stranger's strength gives way, and he falls to the ground exhausted. The application of a flask of spirits revives him, and then in answer to their questions he states that he is a prisoner of war escaped from Pretoria. Some of the company are, however, inclined to doubt his story; but one of them, having received satisfactory answers to certain questions he had put, exclaimed: "It's all right, mates. This man is what he says he is—Winston Churchill, who put up for Oldham, this last summer. I know the very house where he stayed during the election, for it is opposite my own home. Lads, we must stand by him."

"Aye! that we will, Dan, now you've proved him to be a right 'un." So it was decided to put him down the mine until they could make provision for getting him away on a Delagoa Bay bound train. At Witbank a truck laden with bales of wool was noticed, and selected as the one in which to secrete their man; the bales being arranged on either side of a two feet space along the centre. Across this space other bales of wool are placed, a few tiny openings being left for the admission of air.

Churchill, stowed away in the mine, was in ignorance, and in ignorance subsequently remained (until a short time ago) of the tragedy which was enacted to secure his freedom. About the third day of their preparations, a mounted detective—a well-known Boer spy—rode up to them and after announcing his suspicions, demanded the surrender of the refugee.

"Now look here, Trichardt, we and you, although Britons and Boer, have lived on friendly terms for some time now; and if you can just bear that little fact in mind, and close your eyes until we have finished this business, you needn't hesitate about naming a good sum as the recompense for your blindness."

"I want none of your money; but I do want the man I'm after, and I'll have him, even if I flood the whole place with soldiers, for I have a duty to my country to perform."

"We, too, have a duty to our country, and I to my townsman in particular, and I tell you, Ghert, you may flood the place, but we'll not betray our man."

I think it were better, here, to draw a veil over my narrative. What is left to the imagination is terrible; but as one of these rugged miners puts it: "Was one man to stand in our way? No. Many a better man than he had died in the war."

JOHN HULME.

Digitized by Google

The Glamour of Home.

By CLIVE HOLLAND,

Author of "My Japanese Wife," etc.

THE December mist, which crept up stealthily out of the sea that lipped sullenly against the sides of the dreary Isle of Portland, clung round the slopes, blotting out the houses and hovels of cheerless grey stone that huddled like frightened sheep at the island's north-western base.

The grim walls of the prison, doubly impressive from the bareness surrounding them and inexorable as the flight of time, were almost hidden in the drifting wrack swept inland from the Channel.

The dawn had long hesitated in the East, but twenty miles inland from the heights of Dorset, uplands with a knot or two of straggling firs crowning their summits, a red glow was now to be seen 'ust suffusing the wintry sky.

The clangour of the prison bell had died away muffled by the sodden air.

In a little cell of Block D, a building constructed like a piece of mechanism, a fitting complement of the weary regularity of the whole prison, a man had lain awake thinking almost through the night.

On the shelf were books; a Bible, prayer and hymn book, and a volume of Scott's novels. If the occupant could have seen to read he might not have perhaps lain awake thinking. Thinking till the desire for freedom, for the stretching of his limbs in one delicious burst of running, for breathing air which did not seem to him as though allowanced out with Governmental parsimony like everything else in that terrible place, seized upon him again with the aching, almost delirious, desire of the first few months.

Seven long years he had risen, eaten, worked, returned from his labour, sometimes slept and sometimes lain awake till the man he had been was almost crushed out of human semblance so far as thought and feeling were concerned, leaving behind in its place a machine—a portion of the vast machinery of the township within stone walls in which every unit was expected to labour and exist solely as a part of the whole.

In the night watches of that twenty-third of December, No. 12,222 had lain and thought. Phantasmagoria came into the cell and abode with him for a time. Shapes of the people he had wronged, those who had suffered by the very crime that got him fifteen years; a smaller band of those who in his better moments he had aided. With a strange persistency his last "affair" presented itself vividly to his mind's eye as he lay alternately looking up at the whitewashed ceiling which, though so low, was now shrouded in gloom, and at the tiny flicker of light burning outside the cell door, which came a pale gleam to him through the glazed observation hole. The very way by which he could have escaped detection and consequent capture now occurred to him mockingly after all these years. What a fool he had been! And if he had only known then he might have been—where? At home with his wife and three little ones.

He remembered with startling vividness how he was sitting, pipe in mouth, in his shirtsleeves after his legitimate day's work reading Lloyd's of the previous week, when the tap came on the door. A tap of which, without knowing why it differed from the summons of a neighbour eager for a chat, he at once knew the purport.

Before he could make up his mind to anything the detectives were in the room, the steel handcuffs on his wrists, and one of the men was reading the warrant in the monotonous voice of officialdom grown callous from many similar experiences. The hurried parting from his wife, who was overcome with frank amazement; the trial; the stuffy court; the voice of the barrister who in defending him discovered so many virtues, for which no one else had ever credited him with possessing; then the harsh tones of the counsel of the Crown; then the summing up of the hard-faced imperturbable judge; then the sentence.

Digitized by Google

And afterwards?

Despair, rage, depression, and almost madness. Silence, which seemed at first to be illimitable; crushing, heart-breaking silence. And then at length when he mixed amongst his fellows again he realised that he had become a part of the vast prison machine which laboured without hope and without reward.

Summer's heat and winter's cold in the quarries succeeded each other with monotonous regularity. Days when the air seemed like that of a furnace, and the very stone that he worked appeared to radiate heat remorselessly, and days when the dust caused by the falling masses almost choked the workers, puffing from the sides of the quarry like the smoke of heavy guns. Other days when the cold was so intense that the stone almost burnt a bare hand laid upon it, like iron will in times of frost, and when the low-hung sun scarcely ever succeeded in sending a shaft of tepid warmth into the quarried depths.

All these years he had behaved well, except during those first few weeks when he was eating his heart out with vain regret. A considerable period of his sentence would be remitted, and the fact that he had once saved a warder from the desperate attack of a fellow convict, reckless because a "lifer," had been counted unto him for righteousness. He had even inspired a little confidence in him in the hearts and minds of the warders in charge of his gang, and this was destined to be the aid of his undoing.

As he tidied up his cell just as it was getting light, he remembered that it was the day before Christmas. Something that a warder had inadvertently let drop the evening before had reinstated his memory of time until it should again lapse in the drear monotony of days never varying and of no particular import.

If he could only go home for Christmas. Just one day. To see his wife and children he would purchase this boon at the price of a year of his life. In his imagination he conjured up what they would be doing. How surprised they would be. How little they would expect to see him.

Later, all the way to the quarries the idea kept working in his mind. It was madness, worse than madness to think of it, and yet he thought and planned and trembled at the audacity of it all. Working as one in a dream, but through long habit making no mistake sufficiently flagrant to call for reprimand from the warder. The fog had lifted from the isle before they came out, and from the prison road could be seen distant hills of Dorset green and sunlit in patches. In the channel to the south-west across the bay the fog still hung menacingly; a thick, smoke-coloured belt merging sky and sea. All the morning long the germ of this mad scheme of his throbbed to more extended life in his brain. He returned to the prison at mid-day, dragging his heavy boots slowly with the rest of his comrades through the sticky grey mud, still possessed with this one idea. It had, indeed, so far formulated as to cause him an access of unwonted cheerfulness.

After the frugal mid-day meal—a meal beyond the powers of town-bred visitors, but inadequate enough for the needs of hard-worked men labouring in bracing air—he tramped back with the rest to the quarries. At most there would be a couple of hours or so of work ere dusk came on.

The men worked rather slackly, that is all save No. 12,222, who now that his mind was firmly made up, strove to attract no extra observation of either his person or doings. The warders were less vigilant than usual. Perhaps they too were thinking of Christmas and dear absent faces.

In the heart of one of the workers in the quarry below them was the glamour of home.

Late in the afternoon there suddenly arose an altercation between two of the men. One of those fierce outbursts of the latent wild animal, which neither toil, nor silence, nor discipline, nor fear can quite stamp out. The warder who was posted a little way up the rise from the quarry came to the aid of his mate. Two "lifers" were beating at each other savagely with their tools. They were not easily torn apart. It was a terrible fight. They came at one another like wild beasts; and when one, stunned for the moment by a blow from a light crow-bar, fell with a staggering slide into the yellow-grey mud of the roadway, the other crashed down on top of him unable to save himself from the clutch of the falling man.

Digitized by Google

"HE WAS SITTING, PIPE IN MOUTH, IN HIS SHIRTSLEEVES, AFTER HIS LEGITIMATE DAY'S WORK, READING "LLOYD'S."

Digitized by Google

TWO "LIFERS" WERE BEATING AT EACH OTHER SAVAGELY.

At last these two, reckless of the consequences, perhaps even not unwilling that a new crime might knot a rope round their necks and thus end their misery, were separated; and for the first time the warders and their prisoners noticed the fog had come down. It was falling in billowy wisps over the edge of the quarry, after hanging like a pall of smoke poised above it. Other warders had come summoned to assist in the quelling of what might have developed into a mutiny or general attack, and the two combatants, one scarcely able to stand, were half-dragged, half-led away, whilst their companions were being hurriedly formed into line for the homeward march.

Through the fog and gathering gloom they went, silently save for the dull tramp of two score of feet on the soft, muddy road.

Suddenly a man was discovered missing.

There was a hurried consultation between the warders. It proved to be No. 12,222. They hurried in the rest through the main gate, which almost overhangs a steep declivity to the rocky shore, and raised the alarm.

But of what good was it?

Outside the darkness had fallen suddenly, and, as the chief warder said, "it was as thick as a hedge."

Anything like a systematic search was impossible until the fog lifted, and that would not probably be until sunset, if even then.

In one of the lesser-used quarries belonging to a local stone merchant, No. 12,222 crouched like an animal in its lair, peering out into the gloom of the narrow gallery by which he had entered. His shoulders were still heaving, and his breath came in thick gusts from the exertion of running. He was more than a mile away from the scene of his escape, and yet how wonderful had been that run in the free air of heaven. Free! He could have shouted with ecstasy; the perils of recapture never entering his mind in that mad burst of lawless joy.

At night he determined to creep silently across the isle, and away down its north-western slope. Surely in the black darkness he could crawl along that strip of shingle and sandy road which connected the isle with the outer world. He had no fear of the search parties. He could avoid them, he thought, with ordinary care. They would of necessity carry lights; and he would watch, and seeing them, though they would not see him, he would contrive to outflank them in the fog and inkiness of night.

Once or twice as he lay in his cavernous hiding-place he heard loud "Hulloas!" but they were a long way off, and the sounds never came very near. He trembled violently at first, but as they became fainter he was reassured, though for the first time a sense of his peril crept stealthily into his brain.

At length, when it was quite dark, he crept from his retreat and began to descend the face of the quarry, groping every foot of the way in the pitchy darkness, and cutting his hands with jagged corners of the rock. Sometimes a piece of stone would loosen beneath his hand or foot and fall with a rattle that alarmed him into the soft deep mud at the bottom of the quarry, or with a sharp splash into some pool.

Digitized by Google

At last he reached the bottom in safety, still borne up by the strange and almost intoxicating sense of freedom, and unmindful of the dangers and risks besetting his path.

Up the slippery track, along which the stone trollies small of wheel ran to the top, he climbed laboriously in the darkness till he came full against the scaffold pole set as a rough barrier in wooden X-like supports. Then out into the road —the road which stretched a dark grey, scarcely distinguishable strip between dwarf stone walls, one way to the cliff edge and the other to the slumbering town. Eight hours before it would be light, that is if the fog held. He heard approaching footsteps, then voices. Their owners came along rapidly, and for some little distance before the two men got opposite to where he was concealed he could hear most of what they were saying.

"A fool's errand," said one, and the fugitive recognised the voice as that of a deputy warder. "Why, the fog's so thick that we couldn't tell him a dozen feet off. He might be t'other side of that wall, and we should be none the wiser. We'd best turn back at the end of this field and get in out of the damp."

"You're right," the fugitive heard the other man say. "It is thick. Thick as a hedge, and not likely to lift till sunrise anyway. And then our fine fellow will find it hard enough to hide here or get away anywhere else."

"Oh, he'll never get away. Never you fear, Thompson, we'll have him fair and square when we can see."

"But not afore," replied the other. And then the speakers, to the listener's infinite relief, passed out of earshot round the bend in the road.

So he was to be caught!

He crouched lower behind the wall in the stark terror which seized suddenly upon him. He must wait till they returned, and then he would push stealthily on again towards the western slope which would lead him to the beach and outskirts of the town.

In ten minutes the footfalls sounded again coming along the muddy road. The two men were silent as they passed him. The scent of tobacco smoke remaining for a moment or two in the heavy air, and then they were gone and the coast was once more clear.

He waited another ten minutes or so, an hour it seemed to him, and then he raised himself cautiously, peered over the wall, and eventually dropped silently into the road again.

His legs trembled beneath him, partly from the effects of his cramped position behind the wall, and partly from his fear. But always ahead of him there appeared to be a picture of home hanging on the curtain of the mist, luring him on and inspiring him with a courage which seemed to have nothing to do with his craven body and limbs.

A mile more and the road began to dip.

Down below him doubtless lay the little townlet, a mass of grey stone houses

HE COULD HEAR MOST OF WHAT THEY WERE SAYING.

Digitized by Google

huddled promiscuously like sheep in winter for mutual warmth and protection. In the windows of a few were fitful lights, but these he could not see through the enveloping mist as he stumbled on. Suddenly a puff of chill air struck across his face. He knew enough of island weather to recognise that this presaged for him calamity. Another puff of cold, damp air and a cry was almost wrung from him as he glanced in front of him down the slope and saw lights gleaming below him. With startling rapidity the veil of mist lifted and rolled away seaward. In a few minutes, before his brain, dulled with the monotony of his prison life, could realise his position and urge him to seek shelter, he stood in the bright moonlight a lonely, conspicuous figure upon the white road leading downward to the shore.

When, at last, he realised his position, something told him it was too late. He gazed around, still half-stunned by the calamity which had come upon him with such suddenness.

ANOTHER STUMBLE, A HEADLONG FALL.

To his left lay more quarries and then the sea lazily breaking against the tumbled masses of rock at the foot of the steep cliff from the face of which they had fallen. Ahead was the town; the road to freedom now no longer possible. On the right the green slope at the top of which a little distance from the edge lay the outworks of the prison.

As he looked across this, and upwards, a solitary figure came into view along the sky line, paused, and then a shout, clear in the night air, floated down to him. The figure ran along the ridge. It was some warder on the look-out for him.

In his unreasoning terror he leapt the low stone wall, and fled, as fast as his fatigue and heavy boots would let him, across the field in the direction of the breakwater which lay below, a long grey line stretching out into the seeming infinity of sea. All across the field, silvery white with dew in the moonbeams, he was in full sight of the sentry. He plunged recklessly onward; the idea that he would never, after all, see home, that the gaunt building on the hill, with the gateway which had swallowed up so many lives from outer ken, would engulf him once more, beating like the stroke of a piston in his brain.

Across another small field he ran; along the edge of a ridge dipping sheer down twenty feet or more. Once he stumbled, and almost fell over the gaping edge.

He had nearly reached the end when there was a spurt of flame from the heights above him, and the report of the rifle rang out sharply in the night air.

A man in a cottage just below turned to his wife at the sound, saying with careless spirit of prophecy, "D'ye hear the gun? They must have come across the chap as gave 'em the slip in the fog to-day. There's another poor soul gone to kingdom come, Maria." But the sound never reached the mind of No. 12,222. Suddenly he felt a hot iron strike his leg, and crash into the bone. Another stumble, a headlong fall from the ridge into the depths beneath.

In that few seconds of horrible descent the glamour of home was still with him, as the vision of his wife passed once more across the curtain of his mind. And then he struck the sharp stones beneath and purchased his freedom with his life.

Digitized by Google

Women's Settlements in London.

* * * *

By Mrs. HIRST ALEXANDER.

TO gather all the members under one roof, that they may gain from a common life, stimulus, guidance, and support, for common service of their poor neighbours, is an essential idea of a Settlement. It has been said the word "Settlement" means a great deal besides. "It means that the dwellers in them live constantly among the poor; they see the sights, hear the sounds, and smell the smells which the poor people see and hear and smell." The women who work in them are of other traditions and ideals. Many of them have had the best education England's Universities can give. All are cultured ladies, who have left refined and often luxurious homes, and with a simple but strong desire to be neighbourly, and with no small courage have gone down to give as much as possible of what they have received to those who have been less fortunate.

Whether it be that only the very nicest women are drawn by Settlement work, or that the noble and unselfish labour of the life brings out everything of grace and sweetness in expression and bearing, I know not, but in the Settlements the most charming women are to be found. Their ideals are lofty, their schemes expansive and all embracing. Aged workhouse women, tired mothers, toiling young women and girls, playless children, forlorn babes, the sick, the suffering, the crippled, the homeless, the workless—all, so far as lies in the power of their benefactors, are enfolded in the tender arms and touched by the helpful hands of these true Sisters of Mercy and followers of the Master's great example

Women's "Settlements" had their origin at a meeting of Cambridge women students, who considered that a philanthropic side should exist to their student and intellectual life. The idea extended to Oxford, and has developed and taken root in higher-class girls' schools all over England, as well as in Churches of various denominations.

Photo by Wickens.

MISS HARINGTON.
(Head of St. Margaret's House.)

There are fourteen Federated Settlements in London, whose Committees meet periodically to gain strength and knowledge by the exchange of more or less long and varied individual experiences. These focussed, amalgamated and turned to account, result in the application of the best discovered methods of work, and the highest—at present—attainable rate of progress and achievement.

It is with these Federated Associations, varying in age of establishment from thirteen years to one year, that I shall deal, beginning by right of seniority with the Women's University Settlement at 45, Nelson-square, Blackfriars-road, S.E., of which Miss Sewell is Warden, and Miss Beatrice Cust Hon. Secretary. This, the first of its kind, founded thirteen years ago, has its centre in one of the large old houses of a square, the abode of the wealthy in the long-ago past, when the now grimy, plebeian Southwark was a fashionable suburb. The residents of the Settlement, as its name indicates, are largely (but not wholly) composed of University women, hailing from Cambridge, Oxford, and London Universities. It is substantially supported by students at the various women's colleges, the London School of Medicine, and by several girls' high and endowed schools. The complement of "settlers" is sixteen. In addition to these are nearly a hundred non-resident workers, some of whom go for a part of the year for special purposes, while others are practically workers throughout the year. A branch of the Association's business is the training of workers for their duties among the poor, the course extending over a year or two years, at the option of the student.

Digitized by Google

MISS F. B. CAYLEY.
Head of St. Mildred's, Westferry Road,
(Photograph by Gunn and Stuart, Richmond.)

It must be understood that, except in rare instances, the residents in all Settlements, not only give their services, but pay their own board and lodging. The charges vary from £30 to £65 per annum, which all goes towards working expenses.

The settlers in Nelson-square are not under parochial control. Whilst initiating work of their own for the physical, intellectual, and moral elevation of those among whom they labour and live, they spend a large portion of time in helping existing organisations. But whether the one or the other, it is all done strictly as co-operating with and complementing the efforts of others. They are invaluable colleagues on many humanitarian associations, a condensed list of which I give, as it will serve to indicate the multifarious departments in which, not only they, but the members of all Settlements, more or less occupy themselves, in addition to their own special work. Here is the synopsis:—The Charity Organisation Society, the Metropolitan Association for Befriending Young Servants, workers with Miss Octavia Hill, Board School Managers, Savings and School Bank Collectors, District Visitors, Invalid Children's Visitors and Teachers, Saturday Play Hours Clubs, Childrens' Country Holiday Fund—finding nearly all the secretaries for the heavy work of the latter — Women's Provident Dispensary, Nursing Home, Loan Picture Exhibition, Winter Entertainments, etc., etc.

This settlement started the Invalid Children's Class in the New Cut in 1893—the first in London. It possesses a registry and apprenticeship department. Among those apprenticed are deaf, dumb, paralysed, and crippled girls and boys. The value of the work may be gathered from the fact that a crippled girl, after serving her time, has been three years with the same employer, earning twenty-two shillings a week. In the cripples' workshop, among other things, boots and walking shoes are made to measure. Orders are gladly received.

Relief is given, after due enquiry, in cases of sickness and destitution. Material aid, however, in these cases, forms but a small part in the scheme of help, and endless care and patience and thought have not only to go before, but to follow after, any such attempts. "Here—indeed not here only, but in every part of our work"—say these University women, "we must have made, and we shall make, many mistakes. The same old questions present and re-present themselves to us individually and collectively. We are many, and we shall not all solve the same questions at the same time in the same way, and it seems to us that it is our part to recognise both our scope and our limitations.

Digitized by Google

AT THE DISPENSARY.

"We form an ideal, but our ideal ever eludes us; we think we have found a possible formula, but, as we utter it, it becomes inadequate; we believe we have gained the firm ground of a general principle, and behold it is insufficient for us.

"Yet is not this what we must expect, since our problem is a human problem, or more truly a series of human problems, each infinitely complicated, involving not only the lives of those of whom we wish to think, but our own lives also? And where anyone's life is involved we must count upon endless possibilities, endless variety, endless surprise.

"One of us abides by the rule and is right, another abides by it and is wrong; in one case we apply our accepted principles rigidly, and are rewarded by sound and wholesome results; in another the intimation of a principle lying deeper still, justifies a leap beyond them, and perhaps kindles the first idea of a principle at all in another.

"We do not say these things as undervaluing principles, nay, even rules—we cling to them as what shall save us from chaos. But we have not learnt all there is to learn yet, and if we will go forward slowly and steadily with open eyes and heart, every little bit of experience may be to us the potential teacher of a better way.

"And so to go forward and to learn is surely what we most care to do."

St. Margaret's and University Houses in Victoria Park Square, Bethnal Green, represent the ladies' branch of the Oxford House Settlement, and have for head Miss Harington, and for warden the Right Rev. the Bishop of Stepney; president, the Hon. Mrs. John Talbot; vice-presidents, Viscountess Valentia and Mrs. Warren (Magdalen College). It is Episcopalian

Digitized by Google

MISS BARBOUR.
(Mrs. Hewitt's able Coadjutor.)

MRS. ELLIS HEWITT.
(Lady Superintendent of the Presbyterian Settlement.)

in character, therefore religious as well as educational and social in its aims. The association was started in 1889 by four ladies, who shared Mayfield House, in Bethnal Green, with another small body of settlers from the Cheltenham Ladies' College. In three years, their numbers having increased, they took a house for themselves. The work still grew, and a second house had to be taken. These dwellings are also reminiscent, like those of Nelson Square, of departed glories—in this case somewhat ecclesiastical in flavour. In a golden period of Bethnal Green's history lived, in close proximity, Cardinal Wolsey and Bishop Bonner. But though quaint and interesting, the houses being disjoined and cramping the work for want of proper club, common, and other rooms, a new St. Margaret's House is in contemplation—in fact is badly wanted. For its building fund, the rather formidable sum of £8,000 is required. The number of residents is now twenty, but the work has grown out of all proportion to that increase, and has won devotion, not of odd hours or a few years, but of lives. The Settlement is looked to confidently by the permament bodies of Bethnal Green for the supply of skilled voluntary workers. More residents and visitors are required. The settlers visit in six parishes, teach in the Sunday-schools of seven, conduct Bible Classes, Clubs, Guilds and Educational Classes innumerable; assist in Bands of Hope, visit the workhouse and two neighbouring hospitals, besides carrying on all the usual lines of work already indicated as associated with Settlements.

MISS CHEETHAM.
(Head of the Canning Town Settlement.)

St. Margaret's is the mother of two daughter houses—St. Helen's, at Stratford, E., and St. Mildred's, at Millwall,—but being much younger settlements, I shall speak of these in their due place later on.

St. Hilda's East—the Cheltenham Ladies' College Guild Settlement—was established in the same year as St. Margaret's and in the same house, as before stated, in order to give former pupils the opportunity of doing work among the poor of the East End, and of learning the best ways of helping them.

Digitized by Google

No Settlement is more busy and comprehensive in its schemes than that of Bermondsey, which is organised on somewhat different lines to others, inasmuch as the men in their house in Farncombe Street, where the Warden and Mrs. Lidgett live, and the women in theirs a mile away, at 149, Lower Road, Rotherhithe, and other smaller branches, work as one Settlement, with the Rev. J. Scott Lidgett as Warden, and Miss Simmons as director of the women's work. It is nine years ago since the Women's House was taken and furnished by the Warden and Miss Barlow, of Edgworth, near Bolton. This association, though Wesleyan in its origin, receives workers from any and every denomination. The vital characteristic of the Settlement ideal at Bermondsey is "that in a world composed of men and women any advance must be most efficiently carried on by their combined powers and energies." "We are," says the Rev. Mr. Lidgett, "a little company of men and women, who have resolved, on broadly Christian ground, to live in the midst of a large, poor population, which is rapidly being deserted by its more successful inhabitants. As Christian citizens we desire 'to live not unto ourselves,' but to turn our hands to any form of social service which requires to be done; whether in church, in educational affairs, in administration, or in the various enterprises of sound philanthropy. The Kingdom of Christ embraces all human powers, and must satisfy all human wants. . . . We look out upon this district of London, and where we see some work that wants doing, according to our power, we cast about to find someone who will set about it."

MISS SHELFORD.
(Head of the North London Ladies' Settlement.)

The population which this Settlement affects in Bermondsey, Rotherhithe, and the riverside parishes is not much less than 150,000. "The wearying sameness of our streets," writes the Warden, "is the outward sign of the almost equal sameness of conditions and general attainments of those who inhabit them. The final end of every bit of our work, as we conceive it, is deeply Christian, and every activity is undertaken in the belief that it is in some degree—higher or lower—necessary to the advancement of the Kingdom of Christ."

The overflow of the Women's House rendered colonisation necessary.

"Saturday is the proper day for moving in these parts," wrote "Sister Grace" (Mrs. Kimmins), one of the actors in the first exodus to a little three-roomed flat, "and as we wished to fall in as far as possible with the ways of our neighbours, we chose that day.

"The children stood in little groups and announced to their respective parents each move on our part.

"'A bed each they've got,' they yelled, and when our window boxes were brought up, one small, barefooted urchin screeched in utter astonishment, 'There's five cawfins just gone up, five!'

"Now, however, we have settled, we have called upon our neighbours, we have become known to the people around and we are happy. Sometimes domestic cares crop up, the chimneys smoke, and the blacks fly in, but all that we expect. It is so delightful to live in a place where those who will can run in and out without fear—a simple little cot (a kitchen and two bedrooms, wooden chairs and everything to correspond), where the tide of humanity washes right up to the door.

"Rat-tat at the door—who can it be? Tommy with his blue eyes shining and race tracks all around his face and neck, where he has tried to wash, and his rags fluttering as the keen wind whistles up the stone staircase. I've come to take

Digitized by Google

Photograph by J. Thomson

MRS. CROSSLEY.
(Sub-warden of St. Helen's House.)

yer to the concert, Sister Grace, and I've washed myself proper, ain't I?'"

Since then colonisation has extended.

Sister Grace is the founder of the Guild of the Brave Poor Things, a most interesting branch of the Bermondsey work. The idea was suggested by Mrs. Ewing's "Story of a Short Life." The Guild is a band of men, women, and children, of any creed or none, who are disabled for the battle of life, and at the same time determined to make a good fight. Anyone who is crippled, blind, or maimed in any way is eligible.

The keynote of the Guild is struck in the motto, "Laetus Sorte mea"—"Happy in my lot." A motto, asserts the founder, "which stands for no mere acquiescence in fate, for no cheap optimism or inadequate sense of the rights and wrongs of human life. The right explanation of our motto is found in our Guild hymn:—

The Son of God goes forth to War,
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
Who follows in His train?

"It is a moving sight to see at the Guild Headquarters at the Bermondey Settlement two hundred Brave Poor Things—blind, hump-backed, crippled, some bent double, all branded deep with the unmistakable mark of suffering—stand as best they can and sing, with the light of new life upon their faces:—

Who best can drink his cup of woe,
Triumphant over pain,
Who patient bears his Cross below
He follows in His train.

At the same time, anything like a sentimental glorification of suffering is strongly guarded against."

The idea of the Guild took definite shape in 1894. At present there are six branches, but through visits of friendship and interchange of help, they are so closely linked as to be practically one.

In some places weekly half-hour lectures are given to certain ambitious members on science, history, travel, etc., and are greatly enjoyed. Members are encouraged to sing or recite, and few Guild afternoons pass without someone mounting the platform to do something towards the general entertainment.

Another picturesque, as well as invaluable department of work is the "Guild of Play," in which old English games are played. By these amusements and fairy tales—training body, imagination and heart—it is sought to supplement the brain training of the day school, as well as to inculcate powers of self-control and comradeship. At the Guild of Play there are no punishments save those which Photograph by W. Wright.

GROUP OF RESIDENTS AT ST. MARGARET'S, BETHNAL GREEN.

Digitized by Google

GROUP OF WORKERS AT GREYLADIES.

follow as the natural penalties of broken laws.

Similarly there are no rewards, save that greatest of all pleasures, the working for others. And the highest prize offered is to be allowed to go and play before old people in the workhouse or infirmary, or before the children's parents or the cripples.

The Brabazon work, named after its institutress Lady Brabazon—now Countess of Meath—is actively carried on among the old and infirm. Its object is to give interest and amusement through work of a very light and pleasant nature to those who were said to be past it. Workhouse and infirmary are visited. The inmates are made cheerful by this attractive employment, teas and entertainments are given to them.

The residents include two Queen's Jubilee nurses, and on the staff is a school nurse, who is also a Queen's Jubilee nurse. The two former visit and nurse the sick poor in their own homes, and the latter visits the schools of the poorest districts in Southwark, attending to those comparatively trifling ailments which, though not sufficiently serious to keep children from school, yet cause them much discomfort and in various ways hinder their education.

How greatly the College for Working Men and Women at the Settlement in Farncombe Street is appreciated is shown in the last report, which gives 1,364 as the number of entries for the previous session.

It is not unknown in this Settlement, as also in some others, that the men and women workers, drawn together by mutual concerns and sympathies, and believing, no doubt, that "two heads," even in the problems of philanthropy, "are better than one," have paired off in holy matrimony. Thus united, some have settled down to work together in the locality, whilst others, though perhaps not dwelling on the spot, keep up a practical interest in the Association.

A beautiful instance of the poor helping the poorer may be cited in the fact that the Lads' Club of the Canning Town Settlement has borne the expense of sending eight cripples to the country for three weeks. A feature of this Settlement is the hospital and dispensary, which, owing to insufficient accommodation of this kind in the locality, have been established by the settlers for the sick poor around them. This hospital is officered by women.

There is a light and humorous side to all this serious work. "Tell the lidy upstairs that a young person wants to see

MISS YEATMAN.
Head of the Greyladies.)

Digitized by Google

her." In such manner is a new resident often introduced to homes in Canning Town. "But," says the relater, "in a week or two you are no longer a 'young person,' you are an old friend, for with the poor friendships are quickly made." Again, "The women are very interested in our affairs, and discuss the Settlement and all its inmates in a sometimes rather embarrassing manner. A Scotch resident discovered that her 'beautiful English' was quite a surprise to many people. On another occasion an old lady, who meant to be kind, told her not to worry about her accent, for she would soon lose it now she was living among the genteel ladies at the Settlement."

Miss Cheetham says:—"No life could be more varied or full of interest than ours. Our work touches every department of human life and is broader than any description of it, and there is endless opportunity of learning. We, who have been at the work longest, know best what an immense gain it has been to ourselves and how all life has become richer, fuller, deeper because of what we ourselves have seen and heard and felt in the varied joys and sorrows of those among whom our lot has been cast. If we thought we knew something before, we know that we know nothing now; and to be humbled is, here as everywhere else, to be lifted up."

AT A RUMMAGE SALE.

The College of Women Workers, commonly called the Greyladies, exists on a somewhat different basis to the majority of associations. The ladies do not live or settle in the midst of the poor; but—about fifty in number—dwell together in three quaint Charles II. houses, opening into one another, on the breezy heights of Blackheath Hill. From thence they descend daily to their respective labours in 24 different parishes, representing upwards of 200,000 souls in South London.

The prescribed dress of the Workers is grey and black of a simple character. There is a branch house at Walworth. The ladies work entirely under the authority of the Bishop of the Diocese, and the incumbent in whose parish they labour. They go into no parish unasked, but so great is the demand that fourteen times the number could be employed, but the difficulty of accommodation is the obstacle to such increase, and one of the rules of the community is that they shall never run into debt.

Miss Shelford, head of the Northern London Ladies' Settlement for Parochial Church Workers, 37, Hartham-road, West Holloway, established seven years ago, tells me that "North London gets poorer and more populated each year, and the need we have for more workers increases." So urgent is the need for one or two extra residents that the usual charges for board and residence would be relaxed to earnest helpers unable to pay. The Council are constantly receiving such appeals as these: "Have you a worker unattached? This parish contains 9,000 people, there is not a person of leisure in it; half the people are 'respectable poor,' and the other half are most 'unrespectable poor'"; or "I have 5,000 poor people and only a Scripture Reader to help me."

St. Helen's, 93, The Grove, Stratford, E., is the four year old daughter of St. Margaret's, Bethnal Green, whose Sub-Warden is Mrs. Crossley, and Warden, Miss Harington, head of the mother house. Its work is both parochial and non-parochial, and its wants numerous. More district visitors—"for when a district contains hundreds of families it takes time to know even some of them well, and you are not much good as 'visitin' lidy' until you do know them and they know you." More toys for the nursery club; a dolly has to be passed round after a "nurse" of five minutes; more money for the sick fund; father or mother gets the "flu," or consumption, or has had typhoid, and must be sent away or die; baby gets a chronic "tar" (catarrh) "in its inside," and has to come on the fund for milk, etc., or else suffer agonies from having "a bit of whatever we has," and so on. The curate in charge of a district of 9,000 seems almost incredible that there exist grown up people in the Isle of Dogs who know little or nothing of London outside "the Island." Many of the women have been taken up by the ladies of St. Mildred's to see St. Paul's and other sights for the first time in their lives. Among such as these the settlers work and are putting a little color and warmth into the drab monotony of their lives. Miss F. B.

Digitized by Google

THE BISHOP OF SOUTHWARK.

entirely poor and uneducated people wants two ladies to work in his parish; he has been wanting them for years, and every now and then he comes across to St. Helen's to ask if they have forgotten him!

The younger daughter by a year of St. Margaret's is St. Mildred's, Westferry Road, Millwall. The house was opened in 1897, accommodates seven residents and is intended for Churchwomen only. It Cayley, the head, speaks very feelingly of the children, as being most engaging and affectionate in disposition. It is in the young that the great hope of the Settlement lies. A luxury of St. Mildred's is a really fine, tiled bathroom, placed at the disposal of the girls and children of the clubs. As in so many other cases, additional workers are required.

At 129, Kennington Road, Lambeth, is located the Lady Margaret Hall Settlement,

Digitized by Google

established also three years ago, for work in connection with Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford, whose principal, Miss Wordsworth, is the Settlement's president, with Miss Edith Langridge as head. Besides supporting the work financially, the students of Lady Margaret Hall come from time to time and act plays for the amusement of the various local clubs, the play last Christmas-tide being written by Miss Wordsworth.

Another association is that of the Hoxton Settlement, 280, Bleyton Buildings, Nile Street, N., of which Miss Honnor Morten is Head.

"I think that I believe more and more in Christianity—not in miracles, or hell, or verbal inspiration, or atonement, but in living for others, and going about doing good" (Jowett) seems to be the feeling that inspires the methods of its work. "Do not give them anything," saith the Saint to Zarathustra, "rather take something from them, and bear their burdens along with them—that will serve them best; if it only serve thyself well!"

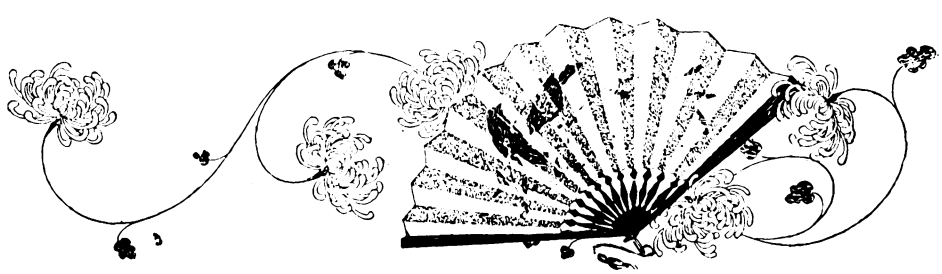
Near by, at No. 90 and other houses in Shepherdess Walk, is the Women's branch of the Maurice Hostel, or Christian Social Union Settlement, founded two years ago, and of which Miss F. Eves is head and the Rev. Canon Scott Holland, who guaranteed the rent of No. 90 for three years, is Chairman of Committee. One of the branches of its constructive work is the Crèche. Very happy and clean the Crèche children all looked when I visited them; some asleep, some at play—all the latter escorting me in a body to the top of the stairs when I took my departure. Miss Eves thinks that still more good could be effected if the Settlements, acting as centres, would disperse their workers in twos, who, taking tenement rooms and furnishing them after the manner of tenement dwellers, would live the life of the poor with the poor. An existence so full of strain and depression would require change of workers from the centre at intervals of a few months—indeed, to be carried to its utmost possibilities would need a divine love of humanity and a life's devotion.

One of the most interesting settlements is that of the United Girls' Schools Mission Settlement, 1, Albany Row, Camberwell, of which Miss Gooch is the head. The Settlement is an outcome of the Mission, was opened in 1898, and is supported by sixty-nine Affiliated Schools and Old Scholars' Associations. "Old girls" become workers, and teachers are known to devotedly spend their holidays helping at the Settlement. The district—near the Old Kent Road—is only 6½ acres in extent, but contains 6,500 people, an average of 1,000 to the acre.

Lastly we come to the youngest, the one year old Presbyterian Settlement of Esk House, 56, East India Road, which has room for seven residents, but contains only two—Mrs. Ellis Hewitt, the lady superintendent, and Miss Barbour. Strange to relate, the Presbyterian ladies do not seem as yet attracted by the life. Whilst the house, bought and well-furnished by Mr. and Mrs. Robson, awaits its tardy occupants, the work to be done is far greater than the two brave ladies who are facing alone the initiatory labour can accomplish.

The people are described by them as "only yearning for the sympathy of a loving heart and the help of a strong hand." "The law of happy life is service," say they, "and we can testify from our own experience, that being near the heart of humanity is being near to Christ, who loved it and for its redemption died."

MARY HIRST ALEXANDER.



Digitized by Google

A BOY'S LOVE.

By E. C. GIDLEY.

SHE had crept into the church porch, and sat down to rest awhile. The July sun had been almost overpowering in its heat, and the three-mile walk along the dusty road from the little village inn where she and her newly-married husband were spending a part of their honeymoon had tired her out completely.

Marguérite Kaithness was lovely beyond all question. Her brown hair curled low, over a broad white forehead; her eyes were a dark shade of blue, that looked purple in some lights, and her complexion was as fresh and delicate as a roseleaf.

Her husband, who at the present moment was searching the little country churchyard for tombstone antiquities, had commanded the regiment in India to which her father belonged, and Marguérite Darling had only just left school to join her parent there, when the colonel had lost his heart to her. Of course Major Darling was delighted, the thought of being father-in-law to his own senior officer was one which made his heart beat high with pride and gratified ambition. It was in vain that his daughter had stipulated for time and urged that her love had been given to a rising young artist ere she had left England.

"Boy's love," her father said angrily when Marguérite had sobbed out her refusal. "My dear child, do you think that anyone ever marries their first love in this world? Your mother was not by any means the first girl I had loved, and you cannot expect to be different from the rest of humanity."

Marguérite had paled at the mention of her mother. Dimly through past years came a vision of that young mother so early taken from her. Alas! she had not been the gallant major's last love either, or she would never have worn so sad a countenance, nor been so glad to lay down the burden of life at twenty-five.

The girl was thinking of her now, as she crept into the church. And then she stopped suddenly as if turned to stone, for at the chancel steps, with the light falling full on his face, which was turned towards the intruder, sat Paul Vincent, the artist, inwardly raging at the interruption. He sprang up, however, when he caught sight of Marguérite, and to his dying day he never forgot the terror of her face when she recognised him.

"This is an unexpected pleasure," he said, offering his hand and looking eagerly into her face. "When did you come back to England, Miss Darling, and is the Major with you?"

He paused; perhaps the expression of his companion's face did not invite further questioning.

"My father is still in India," she said in a low voice, while she strove to regain her composure. That other man, her husband, would soon have ceased his investigations, and might come at any moment to claim her—and Paul—well, Paul must be told the truth, whatever it cost her to tell him; it was useless and unnecessary to pretend that she was still free. Her father had promised to write to Vincent, and enclose her heart-broken letter of explanation in his. Alas! for the promises that are never kept! The letter lay in Major Darling's coat-pocket for a considerable number of weeks, and had at length been consigned to the flames. The announcement of Marguérite's marriage in one or other of the English papers must have caught his eye, the forgetful Major had argued to himself when he turned the unremembered letter out of his coat, and if it hadn't—well—the chances were that they would never meet again, so even his own explanatory letter was never sent.

Digitized by Google

"Still in India?" echoed Vincent with some surprise; "then how in the world do you manage to be here in England? But, since you are here, never mind," he added, boyishly, "come and see my picture and tell me what you think of my latest inspiration."

He led the way towards the chancel without waiting for any reply, and Marguérite followed him, as in a dream. Vincent's easel was just at the steps, and the picture was a view of the little side chapel on the northern side, which contained a very beautiful monument, put up to the memory of some old warrior knight. The light from a coloured window just above caught the full length figure of the Crusader, and warmed into almost life-like tints the marble pallor of his finely sculptured face. The artist had produced a very faithful representation of the monument, and Marguérite, as she gazed at it, became conscious that her former playfellow had fulfilled his aspirations, at least in part. The picture in front of her was by a master hand.

"It is splendid," she said at length, drawing a deep breath, "and it will make your name famous!"

"And yours too, I hope," broke in Vincent quickly, seizing her hand, but Marguérite drew it away again hastily.

"Ah, no! Paul, never," she cried with a little sob, and, drawing off her glove, she pointed to the wedding ring which glittered on her left hand. "I thought you knew; father promised me faithfully that he would write and explain, and send you my letter. I—we—were awfully poor, and the Colonel, my husband, proposed to me through my father. He would not let me have any voice in the matter; he said our love was 'boy's love,' that no one now marries their first love, and that I could not expect to be different from the rest of the world."

Neither of them noticed a tall military-looking gentleman, who had come into the church, as if in search of some one, while Marguérite had been speaking. He had only stayed a few minutes, and then had gone quickly out again.

"He never sent to say; this is the first I have heard of it. Oh, my Marguérite, dearest, could you not have trusted me and waited a little longer for me?" Vincent turned away to hide his emotion, and the girl laid her hand gently on his shoulder.

"I would have waited for you, yes!" she said sadly, "till the end of the world, if there had been the possibility, and—you know it. But it was for my father's sake, and horrible money troubles, Paul, divided our lives. But we must bury the past, and you and I must part. We are not very likely to meet again. Colonel Kaithness and I start for India some time next month, and miles of ocean will flow between us. Perhaps, who knows, God will be kind, and let me die soon. Life is so terribly long!" She threw out her slender arms with a despairing cry, and sinking on the seat beside her, buried her face in her hands.

"We must help each other to be brave, Marguérite dear," he said gently. "It is of no use to give way to our sorrow; you are another man's wife now, and I shall never have one unworthy thought of you, but I shall remember you till I die. Come, Marguérite dear, look up once more, and say good-bye."

She got up then and held out her hand, but her white lips refused to utter a sound; shaking his hand, she turned to go down the aisle, while Vincent sank on his knees and touched the tips of her fingers with his lips. Then Marguérite walked slowly out of the little church into the brilliant sunshine, and found her husband waiting for her at the churchyard gate. Was it her fancy, or did he look a little weary and tired?

"I hope I haven't kept you waiting, Hubert," she said anxiously, "I am sorry I was so long, but it was nice and cool in the church, and I met an old friend who was sketching a portion of the chapel, and we had a little talk."

Colonel Kaithness looked at her queerly she thought, and the path seemed to be sliding away from underneath her in some mysterious fashion. The next moment she found herself on the grass, and her husband was alternately dashing cold water over her face and rubbing her hands.

"How silly of me to faint!" she exclaimed. "It must have been the heat. It is hot," with a desire to hear some one else confirm the fact.

"Yes, yes, it is," answered the Colonel, soothingly; "just lie still where you are, little woman, and you will soon be all right again."

But Marguérite rose up quickly. Paul might come out any moment, and she felt she would rather not meet him again.

Digitized by Google

MARGUERITE HAD CREPT INTO THE CHURCH PORCH AND SAT DOWN TO REST AWHILE.

Digitized by Google

"I feel quite well now, thank you, Hubert," she said, "and I can walk back to the inn perfectly easily."

So they turned their steps resolutely homewards, and neither of them mentioned to the other a word of what had passed that summer day for some time to come. But to one the memory of that day brought an ever increasing pain, and to the other time brought its softening influences, and gradually the remembrance faded away.

* * * * *

Two years later Colonel Kaithness was still discharging the duties of his regimental command. The heat had been intense, and Marguérite had grown thin and pale, even with the little she had to do, and she talked hopefully of the time when they should be able to get away to the hills.

She was sitting in the verandah one exceptionally hot afternoon when her husband came in hurriedly, with a look of uneasiness on his face.

"There is a good deal of fever about, Marguérite," he said, "and you must get away as soon as you can; at once, if you can manage it. I can't come with you yet, but I can get leave for your father to take you up, and see you comfortably settled in."

"And when shall you follow?" enquired Marguérite.

The Colonel looked at his wife a little sadly. Never from look or word had she ever guessed that her husband had been an unintentional and an unwilling listener to some of her conversation with Paul Vincent in that little village church in far-away England so many months ago; but the knowledge which those few minutes had brought him was slowly poisoning his life and taking away his pleasure in existence.

"I am not quite sure," he returned slowly, "perhaps in a fortnight's time—it might not be for three weeks." Then he took some papers off the table and left her.

The next day Marguérite Kaithness and her father moved up to the hills. When his daughter had asked him for an explanation of his conduct about the letters, Major Darling had waved the matter airily aside in his usual careless, débonnaire fashion, and the subject had never been reopened between them.

For some days they enjoyed the change and the cool, refreshing air from the mountains; but gradually Marguérite began to get uneasy in her mind about her husband, and when the fourth day elapsed without bringing any letter from the Colonel she asked her father to telegraph home to enquire if all was well at the station. The message she received in answer was not wholly satisfactory.

"Sorry, too busy to write."

"I am going back the day after to-morrow," she announced to her father's astonishment. "I want to satisfy myself that Hubert is all right."

So the next day but one found her at her own bungalow, gasping for the heat, and wondering at the deserted appearance it presented. Suddenly she heard the sound of voices proceeding from the direction of her husband's bedroom, and going into the passage she ran almost into the arms of the station doctor.

"Mrs. Kaithness!" he ejaculated in surprised tones, "I had an idea that you were up in the hills somewhere trying to keep cool! But I am sure your husband will be only too delighted to have you rather than a native nurse. Don't be alarmed, my dear lady," as Marguérite grew as white as a sheet, "I am happy to say that the Colonel has only a very slight touch of the fever. It is his lack of energy that surprises me most."

Marguérite brushed by him most unceremoniously and entered her husband's room. He was lying, without an atom of colour in his face, in a lethargic sleep on his bed, and, as the doctor had remarked, looking for all the world like a man who has weighed life in the balance and found it wanting. Just a flicker of the eyelids conveyed to his wife the knowledge that he was conscious in a dim sort of way of her presence in the room; but he did not move even when she drew nearer, and laid a cool hand on one of his burning ones.

"I shall not leave you alone again," she said in a soft low voice. "You cannot take care of yourself."

Her husband turned his restless eyes on her lovely face.

"You here?" he remonstrated. "You must not stay, Marguérite. I am so afraid you will get fever. I suppose that it is too late for you to get up to the hill station to-night, but you must promise me that you will go back to-morrow."

Marguérite soothed him with gentle words, and caressed his tired head

Digitized by Google

lovingly. Later on in the evening the air seemed to grow more oppressive as it came in through the thick green sun-blinds, but the Colonel slept feverishly through the long hours, while Marguérite sat patiently by his bedside, waiting for the first sign of consciousness, and me find it out for myself. What was it that artist fellow said in that church? He would make your name famous! And it was money—money, that separated you; money, and I myself! Ah, Marguérite, and I can do nothing. I cannot even die to set you free!"

MARGUÉRITE THREW HERSELF ON HER KNEES.

trying by reading to distract her thoughts from dwelling too much on vain regrets.

Presently he murmured something in his sleep, and Marguérite bent over him to catch the weakly spoken words.

"How could I know?" the sick man murmured. "Ah, Marguérite, why did you not tell me? It was cruel of you to let

As the truth dawned on his listener the scene in the little English church so many months ago came back to her memory, and she sat down, burying her face in her hands. And the sufferer went on talking, each word he spoke entering like iron into her soul. Towards evening he became less feverish, and the eyes that met Marguérite's anxious gaze when she gave him some much needed refreshment were once more calm and conscious.

Digitized by Google

"Are you too exhausted to listen to something very important I have to say to you, Hubert?" she asked quietly; "because there is something to clear up that must have seemed a great wrong to you."

She paused, and the Colonel looked slightly puzzled.

"I am not so tired to-night, dear," he answered. "I think it must be the pleasure of seeing you again. But all the same, it is bad for you to be down here this hot weather, and you must go away to-morrow."

He smiled kindly at her, and Marguérite threw herself on her knees by the bedside.

"Don't, oh don't send me away from you any more, Hubert," she implored. "I have only to-day heard from your unconscious lips that you know about—Paul Vincent, that you have kept it from me all these years. But, my husband, it was all a girlish mistake. I never loved him as I have loved you, and do love you now. Shall I ever be able to make you believe me? Oh, speak, and say that you will forget all this horrid past, and we will begin again from to-day, with no secrets between us——"

"It has been partly my own fault too, dear," he returned gently. "I was to blame for not discovering my presence in the church to you, and then everything could have been satisfactorily explained. I have never doubted your faith for an instant, but I have thought, oh so often, and with so much sorrow, that, perhaps, you really loved him and only married me because your father——"

He paused with a little gasp for breath. The air in the room had grown heavier and hotter, but Marguérite noticed only the man lying on the bed, his breath coming through his white, parched lips in short and painful gasps.

"I don't deserve it," she murmured. "I did think that I loved Paul Vincent in those days, and I wanted to marry him; but after I married you I never saw him except that once in the church, and I think it was very soon afterwards that I realised——"

She stopped and covered her face more closely with her hands.

"You realised what?" he said kindly, putting out a thin hand and stroking the pretty brown hair he loved so well.

"That what I felt for Paul was only 'boy's love,'" she said, raising her face at his touch, and letting her hand close over his.

"And what you feel for me?" asked the other, an incredulous joy overspreading his pale countenance.

"Is the love a woman yields to the man she owns as her master for evermore," answered Marguérite steadily.

Then he drew her down and kissed her.

"You shall stay, little woman," he said, hungrily devouring her beloved face with his feverishly bright eyes; "but not to nurse me. You have done me more good than all the medicine I have taken to please that wretch of a doctor, and in a week at most I shall be quite my old self again. At least, not my old self, but a new and better one, please God."

A fortnight later, Colonel Kaithness, who had recovered with astonishing rapidity from his attack of fever, came into his wife's drawing-room and threw a paper deftly on to her lap.

"I thought you might be interested in that," he said with a smile. "In any case you will like to read it."

And she read—

"At St. Augustine's Church, Canterbury, on December 15th, by the father of the bride, Paul Vincent, R.A., son of the late Dr. Vincent, of Milverton, Somerset, to Agnes Frances, youngest daughter of Frederick Earle, Esq., of West Dulwich."

"Why, it's more than a month old," she said, going up to her husband, who was standing looking out of the window, and laying her hands on his shoulders she turned him round to face her, "and it was 'boy's love,' you see, on both sides!"

Digitized by Google

MISSIONARY PENNIES

And the Work they are Doing.

By GEO. A. ANGUS.

IN these days of awakening enthusiasm in the cause of Foreign Missions, too often our societies have to announce an overspent income, with the prospect of curtailment of present work and the abandonment of contemplated extensions.

It is an astonishing fact that the Christian Church has not responded to her Master's call with that unanimity and zeal which should betoken the followers of Him who said "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature."

Doubtless many explanations would be forthcoming from those who thus withhold themselves or their money from the work of evangelising the world. Into these objections it is not the purpose of this paper to enter. It may, however, be safely stated that the lack of systematic giving, both in home and foreign work, is the great bane of many a noble cause.

We have those who are prepared to go to the "uttermost parts" to preach the Gospel, but, alas, too frequently there are wanting those to "hold the ropes" at home. Only a farthing out of every pound sterling earned in England is spent in spreading the Gospel in all lands. A penny a week extra from every church member in the United Kingdom would double the amount subscribed to missionary work.

Eight years ago an unpretentious society, having for its name the Missionary Pence Association, was started, with two main objects—that of promoting the work of evangelising the world, and encouraging a systematic giving to Missions. Sir George Williams, founder of the Y.M.C.A., is President, the Council consisting of Rev. F. B. Meyer, well known throughout Christendom, and himself a warm advocate of missionary effort; Rev. A. T. Pierson, one of the greatest exegetical teachers of the day, editor of the "Missionary Review of the World," and a powerful writer on Missions; R. C. Morgan, Esq., of the Christian, from whose firm is issued the famous Sankey hymn-book; and Robert Burn, Esq., for

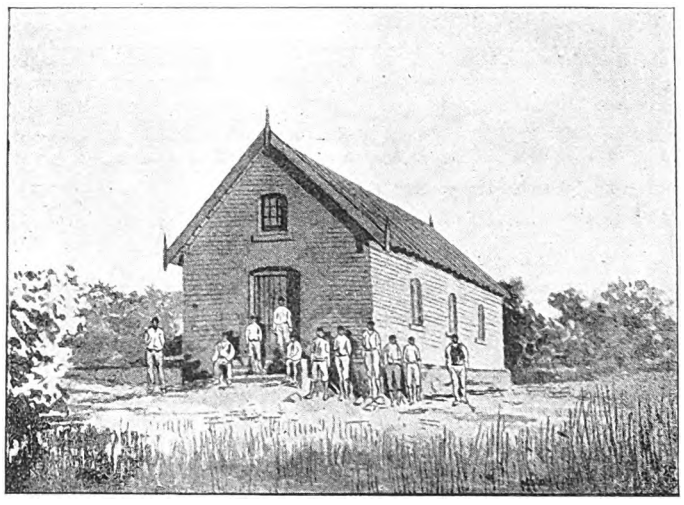
WHAT A FIVE-POUND NOTE CAN DO—THIS FAMILY RESCUED FROM STARVATION DURING THE INDIAN FAMINE.

Digitized by Google



EXTERIOR OF MR. GEORGE WILKERSON'S TRAINING HOME FOR MATABELE.

many years Secretary of the Y.M.C.A., Aldersgate-street, London.

The membership of this unique society now numbers over 65,000, all of whom are giving a penny per week to missionary work, whilst 250 members are contributing a penny per day. In four years £2,156 (517,440 pennies) were received, aiding yearly 120 societies; whilst up to the present time over £14,000 (3,360,000 pennies) have been distributed to various societies and agencies.

Members can assign their pennies to any society or individual, and no matter how small the sum donated, the M.P.A. undertakes to hand over all amounts in the desired direction, without any deduction.

As showing the multifarious Christian enterprises benefited, one week's disbursements often include 130 or more distinct agencies, in sums ranging from one shilling or less to £70, £80, or £100. All the big societies benefit, whilst little known efforts, such as the Sailors' Rest, Grand Canary, Morija Mission, Ngelani Mission, Antwerp Sailors' Rest, Persecuted Hundists, Abor Mission, Korean Orphanage, South Arcot Mission, and many others, are cheered by the receipt of monetary help systematically given. Home Missions are not forgotten; such well-known institutions as Dr. Barnardo's Homes, London City Mission, Mr. Charrington's Mile End Mission, St. Giles's Christian Mission, and Portsmouth Welcome Mission figuring in the list of recipients. Over fifty collectors of pennies have given themselves to the Mission Field. The M.P.A. entirely supports Mr. G. J. Wilkerson, who is working in Matabeleland under the London Missionary Society, and partially supports nearly forty others.

Interesting news is frequently received from those "at the front," telling of the victories of the Cross; and those who have grave doubts as to "whether missions are worth while," might do worse than acquaint themselves with a few facts concerning the preaching of the Gospel in the "regions beyond."

The M. P. A. seven years ago sent Messrs. Savidge and Lorraine to the TOCANTIN INDIANS ON THE UPPER AMAZON.

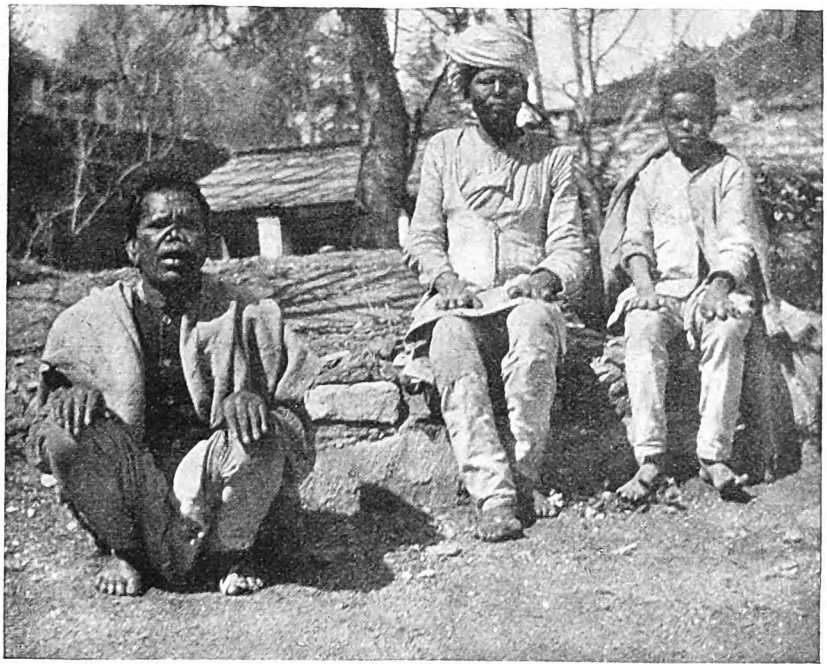
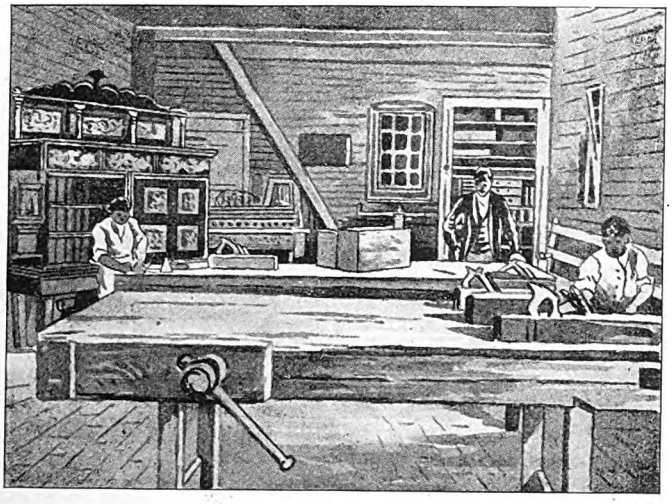
Digitized by Google



THREE LEPERS AT MANDLA ASYLUM SUPPORTED BY THE MILLION FARTHING FUND.

Lushais, a tribe of head-hunters living on the China-Tibet-Assam border. They dwelt in tents among these wild people, and soon gained their confidence. The language was without any literature, or even an alphabet or sign of any kind, to represent the sounds. The two missionaries set about reducing it to writing, and began to teach the people to read and write. The Lushais soon recognised the advantages of reading and writing, and became ready pupils. A manuscript newspaper, written by a Lushai, has been started, which gives news of different villages, and makes known to the various chieftains the orders of the British Government! A grammar of the Lushai language and a dictionary of 7,000 native words were likewise compiled, which works were so valued that they were printed by the Assam Government. The Gospels and the Acts have been translated, the British and Foreign Bible Society printing the same; this making the thousandth language translated into the Scriptures. And all this, humanly speaking, has been achieved by pennies.



INTERIOR OF MR. GEORGE WILKERSON'S TRAINING HOME FOR MATABELE.

Mr. Eglon Harris, assisted by the M.P.A., started a printing

Digitized by Google

A TOCANTIN INDIAN.

press in Mexico, and issued the Gospels and the "Pilgrim's Progress" in Spanish. One of his Bibles fell into the hands of a servant of a Romish priest. The latter seeing it, burnt it, and Mr. Harris thereon called and made a personal demand. There was quartered in the town a Mexican officer and 600 soldiers. He heard of the incident and asked the missionary to come to the fort and explain. The officer became so interested that he begged that the troops might be addressed the next day. However, a notice reached the officer ordering him to arrest a noted bandit in another town, so the preaching was deferred. A week later Mr. Harris addressed the troops (now a thousand strong), at the conclusion of which the officer requested that everyone might have a testament. Mr. Harris had neither testaments nor money, but on going home he found to his joy a cheque for £20 awaiting him and the troops were not denied the testaments.

The crying need for more missionaries to the heathen is borne out by the fact that China has one missionary to 300,000 souls, India has one missionary to 280,000, whilst vast tracts in Africa have never yet been reached by heralds of the Cross. Algeria, bigger than the Transvaal and nearly as large as France, is very inadequately represented by missionaries; Nepaul, with 5,000,000 people, has no Christian worker and has never heard the Gospel; Tibet is at present a closed land, and the tribes of the Soudan are practically unreached.

What can a missionary penny do? Ten members, each giving a penny daily, can support a native teacher or a student in a college; 60 pence per week will entirely support a Christian teacher or Bible-woman; 140 pence per week will support a missionary in China; 20 pence per week will support a child leper; 24 pennies will maintain a starving woman and child in India for a fortnight; 240 pennies will feed a whole family for a month, and 1,200 pennies will feed a family till harvest and provide them with grain for sowing.

Of the appalling famine in India, the Viceroy, speaking in Calcutta last March, said, "If any rich man in this city is in doubt as to whether he should subscribe, I would gladly give him a railway ticket to a famine district and take what he chose to give me on his return. He might go with a hard heart, but he would come back with a broken one."

In conjunction with other agencies the M.P.A. is rendering splendid service in helping the starving millions. Mr. John Jackson (the founder of the Association) is now in India, visiting the famine districts, having been entrusted with £1,000 from collectors, for relief purposes.

The M.P.A. has come to stay. It has created an interest in missionary enterprise where none existed, it has demonstrated the power of the penny, it has been the means of increasing the receipts of numerous societies, it has opened a new sphere of usefulness and tapped a golden stream in "Carey's weekly penny."

GEORGE A. ANGUS.

Digitized by Google

Lord Avebury and His Work.

By WILLIAM SIDEBOTHAM.

(Illustrated by the author's photographs and others kindly supplied by Lord Avebury.)

LORD AVEBURY, better known to the general public as Sir John Lubbock, is a man of many and varied gifts. The son of a distinguished financier, politician, and man of science, he has followed his father in all these capacities, and his works are enriched with many charms gathered from literature, society, and travel. As an authority on finance he commands attention both in the City and in Parliament; as a politician, he represented for many years one of the most important and influential constituencies in the Kingdom—the London University—and as a man of science he has occupied the position of President of the British Association, and of numerous other learned societies. As a man of science he has also brought a mind of quite exceptional powers of observation to the elucidation of such old but nebulous problems as the habits of ants and the characteristics of seeds; as a man of letters his works are not only popular in England, but many of them have also been extensively read abroad; and in Society, as well as in other walks of life, he has for many years commanded a foremost place. To the labouring classes his name is familiar as the originator of bank holidays, the lifelong advocate of shorter hours and other ameliorative measures, which have cost him, a man of affluence, years of unremitting toil, and which in the long run may be more beneficial than more high-sounding or heroic achievements.

Photograph by LORD AVEBURY. Bassano.

In 1832 Dr. Whewell, the renowned Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, wrote of Lord Avebury's father, the then Sir J. Lubbock: "He is an old and much valued friend of mine, whose excellence and merits I need not tell you of . . . He is a most temperate and moderate person, the most conservative of Whigs, and therefore more likely to conserve than a headlong Tory." Little did Dr. Whewell think when he penned those words that after the lapse of half a century the above description would be equally applicable to a son of his "most valued friend."

Digitized by Google

Although the name of Sir John Lubbock—to call Lord Avebury by his more familiar title—is so well known through his works, the general public are little acquainted with his life, his habits, his home and his recreations, and it was with a view to obtaining some particulars on these interesting points that I was recently favoured with an interview with him at the great banking establishment of Robarts, Lubbock and Co., in Lombard-street, of which he is the leading spirit. I was shown into his lordship's private room, and knowing the keen interest which he has always taken in religious matters, I inquired, by way of opening the conversation, what he considered was the effect which science had had upon religion. After a moment's reflection he replied: "Science has done much to raise and purify religion. Among the lower races of men religion was cruel, and the ideas of the Deities, even among Greeks and Romans, were crude and degrading. Even among Christians the persecutions of the Middle Ages, and the dread of witchcraft, which hung like a black pall over Europe down to the eighteenth century, have only been put an end to by the influence of science. The first duty in religion is to form the highest conceptions of the Divine nature, and anything inconsistent with that must surely be wrong."

Photograph by LADY AVEBURY. Lavender, Bromley.

I was astonished at the easy manner in which he could, so to speak, throw off all the cares and responsibilities which his high position entailed, and at a moment's notice enter into a discussion on such a metaphysical subject, which was diametrically opposite to what his thoughts had just been engaged in; and this dictum coming from one who has penetrated into the arcana of nature appeared to me to be a striking and effective answer to those critics who contend that science is undermining the foundations of Christain belief.

Referring next to his early career I asked "What induced you in the first instance to devote your attention to scientific pursuits? and he remarked "I suppose the taste was hereditary," adding, "One of the first things I remember was having a beetle under a tumbler. I was always fond of natural history, but I also took a delight in games, especially in cricket, hockey, and 'fives' at school."

In this connection it is interesting to recall the fact that Lord Avebury was sent at an early age to a private school kept by Mr. Waring, after which he proceeded to Eton. He soon began to distinguish himself there in all branches of learning, but even at that time he exhibited his inherited faculty of investigation, for the study of flowers and insects occupied much of the time not devoted to Virgil, Cicero and Homer. Just after he had succeeded in passing all the examinations, both of his father's partners unfortunately became seriously ill, and young Master Lubbock had at the early age of fourteen to give up all idea of going to a university, having perforce to become initiated into the mysteries of banking. But even this proved no obstacle to the young scientist, for all his spare time was devoted to the study of insects and plants at his father's seat at High Elms, a fine estate of 1,500 acres standing among the woodland country at Down, in Kent. The park which surrounds the mansion is undulating and the beech and chestnut and fir dispute supremacy with those "elms" which have given the estate its name. The landscape gardens have been most artistically laid out; the lawns gradually die away into the park and are so arranged that the thoroughfare is quite concealed from view.

Digitized by Google

Being desirous of obtaining information as to his wonderful literary output and his methods of work, I remarked to his lordship, "How in your busy life do you manage to economise your time so as to attend to your multifarious business engagements, also be perfectly au fait with all the latest scientific developments which must require endless reading and study, and in addition write on such a variety of literary subjects?"

"Ah," he said, modestly, "I do not work so hard now as formerly."

"But you must have some wonderful method to enable you to do it. For instance, I have read several of your lordship's most famous books, particularly 'The Pleasures of Life,' 'The Beauties of Nature,' 'The Use of Life,' 'Ants, Bees, and Wasps,' 'British Wildflowers considered in relation to Insects,' 'The Senses of Animals,' 'The Origin of Insects,' 'On Representation,' 'On Seedlings,' 'On Buds and Stipules,' 'On Collembola and Mysamira,' and 'The Scenery of Switzerland,' and I have been struck with the immense research which must have been required to even get the facts together, to say nothing of the labour involved in writing those wonderful books; while the works on such recondite subjects as 'Pre-historic Times,' 'The Origin of Civilisation,' and 'The Primitive Condition of Man' must even have taken a much longer time to write."

Beyond merely remarking that the major portion of his spare time had been devoted to these fascinating subjects, his lordship allowed the matter to drop, but I have ascertained from another quarter that for some years, both winter and summer, probably while many of his own clerks were in bed, he was in his study engaged in writing his books, or some paper to be read at one of the numerous scientific societies in whose proceedings he has for very many years taken a warm and active interest. He generally rises about six o'clock in the morning, and sometimes earlier, and after a cold bath, he proceeds to his study, where he is busy until breakfast time. Then comes a drive to Orpington Station, where he takes train to town to begin his ordinary avocations as a banker, and to attend various meetings, notably the London Chamber of Commerce, of which he was for a long period the president; the London County Council, of which he was for several years the chairman, following Lord Rosebery in that position; or attending the Council of Foreign Bondholders, of which he is President, and which has proved so pecuniarily beneficial to the holders of these securities in this country. During the Parliamentary season, he was, prior to his being made a peer, most assiduous in his attendance at the House of Commons, and, although essentially a family man, he was frequently absent from home several evenings in the week, realising the old French maxim "noblesse oblige."

HIGH ELMS.

Digitized by Google

LADY AVEBURY'S BOUDOIR.

Reverting to the subject of literature, I asked Lord Avebury if he could give me approximately the number of books he had read, and tell me how he managed to remember the chief points they contained.

"I have never been what might be called an omnivorous reader, for I could not, owing to my other engagements, afford the necessary time, but I have nevertheless read pretty extensively, and when I have come across anything which struck me as remarkable, or which I wished to remember, I made a careful note of the passage so that I could at any future time tell where to find it. It is astonishing how small a number of books a man, if he reads them carefully, can get through, and this makes it so important to choose the best. My principle has always been to study closely the best books, only devoting a small amount of time to works of lesser importance."

"You once gave a list of the best hundred books which you considered ought to be read and which at the time caused considerable discussion in the public press."

"Yes, that is so. I had often been struck with the little care which people took in the selection of their books, and as the number of books is so large and the hours which can be given to reading so few, I recommended that list. I left out, for obvious reasons, the names of living authors. I ought to state, however, that the books recommended were those which had found most favour with those who were competent to express an opinion, though I must confess to having put in the list a few special favourites of my own. With regard to the 'Koran' and the 'Analects' of Confucius, I recommended them mainly on account of the influence they have had upon the lives of so many millions of men than from any intrinsic merits of their own. I think everyone, on the other hand, should read 'Marcus Aurelius,' 'Epictetus,' and the 'Apology,' and 'Phædo' of Plato. As to the 'Republic,' I question whether it is worth the labour often bestowed upon it, although it is most interesting to those who wish to study the history of human thought."

"Which of your own books have been the most popular with the public generally?"

"'The Pleasures of Life' has had the widest circulation; 200,000 copies of the work have been sold in this country, and there have been twenty-five foreign editions. 'The Use of Life,' having regard to the time since it was published, has had as large a sale; and has been translated in many languages. 'The Beauties of Nature' has also had a large sale; 'Ants, Bees and Wasps' has gone through fifteen editions; while there have been six editions of 'Prehistoric Times,' besides three in France, which is rather remarkable. 'The Pleasures of Life' is also very popular in France, where there have been five editions."

"May I ask, my lord, how you carried on your investigations into the habits of ants? I suppose they took place in a portion of ground which had been specially set apart for the purpose."

Lord Avebury, smiling probably at my ignorance, remarked, "No; the habits of these insects required great care and attention, and much of the work had to be done in the house."

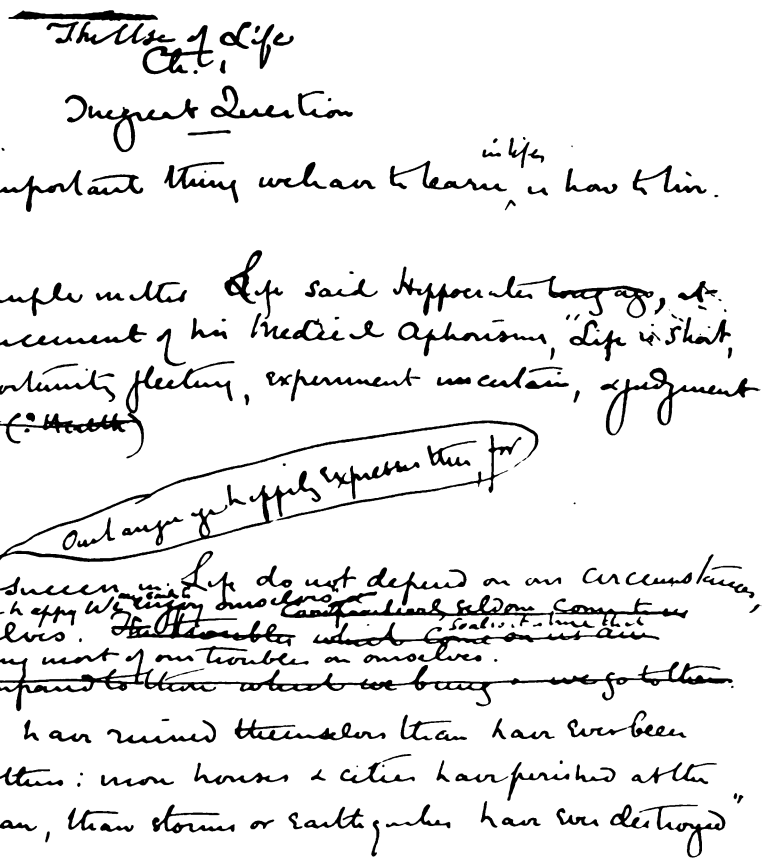
FIREPLACE IN THE HALL.

Digitized by Google

The long and absorbing romance connected with this branch of natural history has engaged the attention of many leading scientists, including Gould, De Geer, Swammerdam, Latreille, Leuwenhoeck and Huber, and the amazing proofs of intelligence and design of ants have excited the wildest admiration, completely putting in the shade the mighty magic of "The Arabian Nights." There are at present more than 700 species known, of which about 30 are in this country. Lord Avebury has kept over half of the British species, and has had at one time in his room upwards of 30 nests. He once watched an ant from six in the morning, and found that it worked without intermission until a quarter to ten at night; while on another occasion he had another ant under observation for several days. When he went to town in the morning he used to put it in a small bottle, but the moment it was let out again it recommenced its work; and, assisted by his daughters and their governess, he once watched a wasp from four in the morning till sunset. He has carried on extensive experiments with ants in order to ascertain their recognition and recollection of friends, their power of smell, their sense of hearing, their organs of vision, their modes of fighting, their domestic life, etc. One Queen Ant he kept for fifteen years—the oldest insect on record!

Lord Avebury's views on some of these interesting points are important:—

"The Anthropoid apes, no doubt, approach nearer to man in bodily structure than do any other animals; but when we consider the habits of ants, their social organisation, their large communities, elaborate habitations, their roadways, their possession of domestic animals, and even in some cases of slaves, it must be admitted that they have a fair claim to rank next to man in the scale of intelligence. It is very curious in my nests to see them divided into groups according to size, so that they remind one of a school



FACSIMILE FROM A PAGE OF LORD AVEBURY'S MS.

Digitized by Google

divided into five or six classes. The food of ants consists of insects, great numbers of which they destroy; of honey, honey-dew and fruit; indeed, scarcely any animal or sweet substance comes amiss to them. Some species, such, for instance, as the small brown garden ant, ascend bushes in search of aphides.

"The behaviour of ants to one another differs very much according as they are alone, or supported by numerous companions. An ant which would run away in the first case will fight bravely in the second. They have been praised on account of their affection for their friends. In this respect, however, they seem to vary greatly. In most species of ants the power of smell is very keen, but as regards their sense of hearing the case is very different. It is remarkable that even now we do not know exactly how an ant's nest is begun. Whether they always commence as a colony from some older establishment, whether wandering workers who chance to find a queen under certain circumstances, remain with her and begin a new nest, or whether the queen ant, like the queen wasp, forms a cell for herself, and then brings up a few workers, who afterwards take upon themselves the labours of the family, as yet we know not.

LORD AVEBURY'S FATHER AND MOTHER.
(Reproduced from Woodcuts.)

"When once started the communities last for years, being kept up by a succession of individuals. The queens themselves rarely or never quit their nests, but receive their food from the workers, and appear to do nothing except lay eggs. In their modes of fighting different species of ants have their several peculiarities. Some also are much less military than others. They have the power of distinguishing colour; they are very sensitive to violet light; and it would almost seem that their sensations of colour must be very different from those produced upon us. When we see a community of ants working together in perfect harmony it is impossible not to ask ourselves how far they are mere exquisite automatons; how far they are conscious beings? When we watch an ant hill tenanted by thousands of industrious inhabitants, excavating chambers, forming tunnels, making roads, guarding their home, gathering food, feeding the young, tending their domestic animals—each one fulfilling its duty industriously and without confusion—it is difficult altogether to deny to them the gift of reason; and all our recent observations tend to confirm the opinion that their mental powers differ from those of men not so much in kind as in degree."

In other branches of science, notably the relations of English wildflowers to insects, Lord Avebury has brought his great powers of observation and subtle intellect to bear on the elucidation of the problems of nature; and he has shown that insects, especially bees, have an important influence on flowers. "To them," he said in one of his lectures at the Royal Institution, "we owe the beauties of our gardens, the sweetness of our fields. To them, flowers are indebted for their scent and colour, nay, their very existence in its present form. Not only have the brilliant colours, the sweet scent, and the honey of flowers been gradually developed by the unconscious agency of insects, but the very arrangement of the colours—the circular bands and radiating lines, the form, size, and position of the petals, the arrangement of the stamens and pistil—all have reference to the visits of insects and are disposed in such a manner as to ensure the great object which these visits are destined to effect."

Digitized by Google

It may be recalled, as showing the wide field there is for investigation, that Lord Avebury pointed out in his presidential address to the British Association at York in 1881, that the total number of animals described was at least 320,000, and that our museums contained probably over 10,000 species of insects which had not been described, while our collections did not probably contain anything like one-half of those actually in existence. He added: "The anatomy and habits even of those which have been described offer an inexhaustible field for research, and it is not going too far to say that there is not one single species which would not amply repay the devotion of a lifetime!"

His lordship further told me, in regard to his Parliamentary work, that he had served on six Royal Commissions, including the Science Commission, Public Schools Commission, International Monetary Commission, Education Commission, and the Gold and Silver Commission; and when the Jubilee coins were withdrawn he was appointed chairman of the Committee by which the present designs were selected. He has succeeded in passing 26 measures through the House of Commons—a record number for a private Member of Parliament. The Bills which he has brought forward, in addition to those benefiting the working classes, have dealt with varied interests—the medical profession, and the literary and mercantile world.

"And what are your recreations, if you can find time for any in your busy life?"

"In recent years I have taken to golf," adding, with a smile, "and I consider it is a very good old man's game."

Lord Avebury, before he became a peer, received many honours, for, amicus humani generis, he has devoted the major portion of his time to proving the dignity and nobility of life, and in showing the endless vista of absorbing problems which remain still to be solved. For his humanitarian efforts, he has, among other honours, received the following: D.C.L., Oxford; LL.D., Cambridge, Dublin, and Edinburgh; and M.D., Wurtzburg. He is a member of the Privy Council, and may be said to stand at the head of his own profession, being Chairman both of the English Bankers and of the Associated Chambers of Commerce.

The name he chose when he was raised to the peerage, derived from a property of his in Wiltshire, was in every way most suitable, for according to his own description "the Temple of Avebury, in Wiltshire, was the greatest of all Druidical monuments. It is, indeed, much less known than Stonehenge, and yet, though a ruder, it was a much grander temple. On the whole, this appears to have been the finest megalithic ruin in Europe, but, unfortunately for us, the pretty little village of Avebury, like some beautiful parasite, has grown up at the expense and in the midst of the ancient temple, and out of 650 great stones not above 20 are still standing. Aubrey states that Avebury 'did as much excel Stonehenge as a cathedral does a parish church.'" And Sir R. Colt Hoare, in his great "History of Wiltshire," commences the part devoted to Avebury as follows: "With awe and diffidence I enter the sacred precincts of this once hallowed sanctuary, the supposed parent of Stonehenge, the wonder of Britain, and the most ancient, as well as most interesting relict which our island can produce.

Our conversation here came to an end, and as his lordship shook me by the hand and wished me "Good-bye," I felt honoured in having been favoured with an interview with one of England's most famous and popular men of science, of whom Dean Fremantle once said, they, and not the clergy only, are ministers of religion.

WILLIAM SIDEBOTHAM.

Digitized by Google

THE CHRIST CHILD.*

By FLORENCE MARRYAT.

THE old man and woman sat staring at each other in silent despair. Outside, the landscape was one uninterrupted sheet of white. The snow had fallen with little cessation during the past few days, and the north wind had driven it in places to the depth of several feet. Even the narrow path that led to the wicket gate of the little cottage was almost impassable by reason of it, for Robert Hazel's strength was unequal to clearing it away; he was nearly seventy, and his hands were knotted and gnarled with rheumatism. His companion, but a few years younger than himself, was still more feeble and almost as incapacitated for active labour. She had been a very pretty girl once, and was a sweet-looking old woman now, but her features were pinched from want, and her limbs shivering with the cold. There was no fire in the grate, and no wood to kindle one with; the cupboard was empty—there was nothing in the cottage either to eat or drink.

"I suppose," said the old woman in a tremulous voice, "that there is no help for it, master, and that it must be!"

"It shall never be, whilst I have the power to take your life and my own!" replied her husband sternly.

"Why! whatever do you mean, my man?"

He left his seat and came and sat on an old settle by her side, where he could touch her hand.

"I mean just this, my woman," he said kindly, "I swore years and years agone that I would die sooner than go to the union, and I meant what I said!"

"But what can we do else, Robin?" she asked, with piteous eyes fixed upon his fine old face. "Neither of us can work, and we're a'most starved with cold and hunger. What's before us but the union? Oh! deary, deary me," she continued, "to think we've brought a son and daughter into this world and neither of them can't save us from this!"

"Listen to me, my woman," said Hazel. "It isn't fair of us even to think of coming back upon our children. The poor things can't do more than keep themselves. What can Patty do—with ten pounds a year wages, and got to keep herself in decent clothing into the bargain? And as for Joe, why he's been the best of boys, as you know well, but he works hard enough to support his wife and little ones, and a man can't be expected to do more. I'm sure he must have sorely missed that sovereign he sent us last Easter; p'raps it was wrong of him to send it, for you remember what the Scripture says—that a man shall leave father and mother and cleave to his wife?"

"Ah! I'm sure our Joe would never have left us, if he had known what we was a-going to suffer for want of him!"

"Perhaps not," replied her husband; "but what's done can't be undone, and it's better to make an end of it, once and for ever!"

"But how, Robin?" demanded the old woman in a frightened voice.

There was something in her tone which recalled the past to him, and he remembered how, when she was a timid, blue-eyed girl, she used to fly to him for protection against every fancied danger. He put, with some difficulty, his stiffened arm round her bent body, and inclined his grizzled beard a little nearer to her face.

"We've been man and wife, Mary, now, for over forty years," he said, "and you know that during that time I've worked for you and yours to the best of my power."

"Aye! that you have, Robin, my man," she cried. "You've been a good husband and a good father, and the Lord will reward you for it! And for more than forty years we've slept on the same piller, and never lay down at night with a hard word atween us, have us now?" she added, forgetting the pain of labour in the sweetness of love.

"Yes, yes! but that's all over now. They don't let husbands and wives see each other except at meals, when they

* This is the last story that Miss Marryat wrote before her death.

Digitized by Google

gets their skilly in the work'us over the hill there."

"They'll go to part us?" exclaimed his wife in horror.

"Aye! that they will, Mary, if they gets the chance. They'll make us live out the rest of our lives pining for each other's company. You'll never make me a good hot cup of tea again, nor yet darn up my old socks, nor rub me for the rheumatics."

"Oh! it will break my heart!" cried the old woman.

"Wouldn't it be better to go away together, Mary, to some place where no one can part us, and we shall be free from all pain and hunger and dread of the union for evermore?"

"Yes, sure, if there is such a place; but you frighten me when you talk like that, Robin! There's something strange in your eye as I never saw before, and which makes me think of your oath! But you'd never hurt me, my man, I'm sure of that!"

"No, not for worlds! There's never been a time since I fust courted you, that I wouldn't have laid down my life for yourn. But my life's already over. My strength has gone from me and I can't lift my hand to get you even a bit of bread! If folks would be a little patient with me, I might still do a little work in gardening and such-like, but they're all so quick nowadays, and want everything finished in a hurry, and I can't hurry any more, my woman. I have pains all over my poor limbs."

"It's the want of a good fire and a good meal," said Mary, weeping. "My bonny Robin, as was the strongest man for miles round—it's cruel to see you come down to such a pitch."

"Well, you see, my dearie, I'm no good in the world, and there's none as we can justly call upon to help us, so the sooner we're out of it the better for all of us. But I couldn't go and leave you behind, Mary. We've been too long together for that. If I go, you must come along of me."

"Where to, Robin?" she inquired tremblingly.

"Ah! that's more than I can tell you, my lass; but anyways, we'll go together. Don't look at me like that, Mary; it's nothing that will hurt you, only a little drink as will put you into a beautiful dreamless sleep and make you forget all your troubles."

"Where is it?" she asked, guessing what her husband meant.

He drew a small vial from his pocket.

"I've had it by me for weeks," he said, as he held it up to view. "I saw what was coming on us, and I determined neither you nor I should spend our Christmas in the union. No, no; we'll spend it in Heaven, my woman, and it couldn't have been long fust, anyway."

"But, Robin," said the old woman in an uncertain voice, "will it be in Heaven? Is it right, think ye, to go there before the Lord has called us?"

"Do you think He wants us to stay here, starving and frozen? Why if we don't drink this or go to the work'us, you'll be dead of cold afore the morning, Mary."

"Yes, I expect so," she answered in a meek voice.

"Well, then, I won't wait to see it!" exclaimed the man roughly. "If you won't come along of me, I'll take the whole lot and go by myself, and you can shovel my body out in the snow; for if you let those work'us authorities give me a pauper funeral, I'll never rest quiet in my grave, but rise up again and haunt you."

"Robin, Robin! Don't!" cried the terrified woman, as she hid her face in her hands. In a minute he was bending over her and soothing her.

"You'll go with me, Mary, won't you?" he whispered; "for if not, it'll be the fust time in over forty years that you've held back when I led the way."

"Of course I'll come too, Robin," she answered. "Why, what should I do without my man, as has been all the world to me for so long? But give me a little time to prepare myself, for it's a new thought to me. To go into His Presence so soon and before He's called us! Ah, Robin, if He's angered at fust, you'll tell Him, won't ye, that I did it because you asked me and I couldn't stay here alone without you? And it won't hurt much, you say?" she continued, eyeing the vial wistfully, as if it would explode in her face like a bomb.

"Hurt much! It won't hurt at all, I tell you. It's what the ladies take to make them sleep sometimes, but when the dose is big enough, you don't wake again, which is a blessing! It's what the chemist chaps call laudanum. Don't you mind, you had some once for the tooth-ache?"

Digitized by Google

"Aye; and it will take us to Heaven. That's strange; but if you say so, it must be true. I would have liked to kiss my Joe and my Patty fust, though. They'll be main sorry when they hear what we've gone and done."

"They oughter be more sorry to see us dragging out our last days in the union," doggedly persisted her husband, "though I thought Patty made pretty light of it when I told her there was nothing else for us last Thursday. Young people don't know what old people feel. What's death to us is play to them."

"But they've been good children to us, Robin. Do you mind the day when our Joe was born, and you laughed at me for being so proud at having a son, and I told you he'd be working for us when we was past work? Aye, but his heart would be sad to-day if he knew that we should never see another Christmas morn. And Patty too—she was a main pretty little thing with her curly head and her big blue eyes. You used to say you never wanted a better lad than she, and you was just as cockered over her as I was over my boy. I suppose we couldn't put this off, just for a day or two, my man, till I had kissed my Joe and my Patty again?" said the old woman wistfully.

"And where should we be to-morrer if we did?" demanded Hazel; "dining in the union! No, my woman; I won't force you to go with me, but I takes my journey before nightfall—alone or together."

"Ah! never alone, Robin, never alone!" cried his wife, as she put up her withered hand and stroked his rugged cheek. He was only a common labourer, and had been so all his life, but he kissed the withered palm as it touched his mouth.

"I was only thinking," continued Mary, "that the Lord might help us if He would. I remember a pretty tale I read a long while since, in which two poor people, just like you and me, was sitting before a bare table, and didn't know where to turn to get food or firing, when the door suddenly opened and a beautiful Child stood on the threshold, and waved his hand, and directly the table was covered with smoking meats and loaves of bread, and a fire sprung up in the grate. And it was the Christ Child, Robin, Who had heard their prayer and come to answer it Himself.

"That there was a Papish story, Mary," said Hazel, frowning, "and all rubbish. You might tell that for yourself. You've been praying to the Lord, I know, all along to relieve us, for you're a good woman, and believe in such things, but He hasn't done it, you see, nor will He neither, for there ain't no miracles in these days. The table's bare, and the cupboard's empty, and the union stands a-frowning on that there hill ready for us if we haven't the sense to look after ourselves."

At that moment a sudden gust of wind blew the ricketty door of the cottage open, and there, on the threshold, stood a boy child, whom the old people had never seen before. His curly head was bare save for a wreath of Christmas roses twined in his golden curls. His dress seemed, to their purblind eyes, to consist of some white woollen material, but his rosy arms were bare. He did not speak, but stood there, pointing with one hand towards the hill on which stood the workhouse, of which they had so great a dread. Both the man and the woman were awed, and Mary was the only one who found her voice.

"It is the Christ Child!" she said, in tones of the deepest solemnity. Robin glanced intuitively towards the bare table, but no viands had made their appearance thereon. Mary crept almost fearfully towards the little child, who turned at her approach and fled, and by the time she had crawled to the door, no trace of him was to be seen. Only his little footmarks were left behind in the thick snow.

"What are we to do now?" she said to her husband, when their first astonishment had waned.

"I don't understand what you mean," he replied.

"It was the Christ Child," she said, "and He pointed towards the union. He has come to teach us our duty, my man. We may be cold and hungry and miserable, but we are not forsaken. This is a message from Heaven! It means that we are to be brave, not cowardly, that we are to pass our Christmas in the union, not in Heaven, and that if we do the best that lies before us, God will protect our future as He has done our past. Come, Robin, my man, you have never turned a deaf ear to my pleadings for over forty years—listen to me now. Pluck up your courage and come with me along the path which leads to the union. I know it's hard, but we've got something to do for Him as has taken care of us for so many years, and I feel convinced that if we follow the Christ Child something will happen to show us He is right."

Digitized by Google

The old man, who had been somewhat awed by the apparition they thought they had seen, yielded at last to his wife's entreaties, and, putting on their poor outdoor clothing, the aged couple, clinging closely to each other, stepped out into the snow-covered road and commenced with slow and feeble steps to walk towards the workhouse, to which an order for admittance had been granted them some days before. They were very sad the while, and so weak from hunger and cold that they hardly thought they should have strength to reach their destination. The extreme cold, indeed, seemed to have affected Mary's head, for she prattled on, as if they were going for a pleasure stroll in the height of summer, instead of nearly falling every second step they took. But her old husband kept up bravely, though every now and then he felt if the vial of laudanum were safe in his coat pocket. "We shall pass Ladymead on our way," prattled the old woman. "I wonder if Patty has any idea we are going to the union to-day, and if she will run out and give us a kiss. I mind when we passed Ladymead one day last summer, that I thought it the prettiest little place I had ever seen; and it made me think of our Joe and how, when he was a lad, he longed to be a farmer, until his godfather Mr. Wilkins came to see us and offered to 'prentice him to the boot trade. Aye; but I fancy poor Joe can't like sitting in a shop in Lunnon all day and never seeing the country from one year's end to another. Ladymead is all set in fields, and with the barns and granaries close agen the house, and a sweet dairy. Patty is a lucky gal to get a place there; she seems main happy, too, and says her missus won't let her work too hard. Well, poor child, all her life is afore her and all ours is behind us — but we mustn't grumble, Robin. We've had our day, and a very pleasant day it has been, too; and now the winter's come, with the frost and snow around us, and we oughter be thankful that there's a shelter ready for us, though it ain't, maybe, all we should choose. I think that's the message the Christ Child came to bring us anyway!"

As she was babbling on they dragged their weary limbs past the farm where their daughter had lately found a new service, and, to their delight, there she stood at the outer gate, heedless of the cold wind, or the snow, on the look-out for her parents on their way to the union. As she ran to meet them Hazel thought, with an inward grumble, that she might have seemed a little more sympathetic with the terrible journey they were bent upon.

"Oh, father and mother," she exclaimed, cheerily, "I've been on the look-out for you ever so long. I thought you would be passing in the morning. But you stayed to have some dinner, I s'pose."

"Aye, my gal," replied the old woman, "we had some arrangements to make, and so we didn't start till the afternoon. But it's bitter cold and we must be getting on, for we've better than a mile to go yet."

"No, no," cried Patty, "you must go no further to-night. My—my mistress says you must turn in to Ladymead and have some tea with me, and stay over to-morrow for your Christmas dinner."

"Aye; but that's kind," said Robin.

"She wouldn't hear of your spending Christmas in the union, and no more would I," continued Patty, "so give me your arm, mother, and we'll soon have you beside a nice warm fire."

It was about time, for poor Mary Hazel was half dead with fatigue and cold. In a few minutes their daughter had the old couple seated beside a splendid fire in a wide old-fashioned kitchen grate, and was plying them with big cups of hot tea and plates of bread and butter and fresh eggs from the farm.

"We have very few eggs now," said Patty, laughing, as she placed them before them, "but I saved them expressly for my dear father and mother. I wish I could have saved you the walk here, too, but there was nothing to send for you or —or the mistress of the farm would have let me have it at once."

"But my dear daughter," said Mary, who was much revived by a little food, "you musn't take advantage of your missus's kindness. You are quite sure she will not be displeased at our taking tea with you."

"Displeased? Why, mother, she has made me watch for you ever since twelve o'clock. We hoped you would be here to dinner. But father is falling asleep. He is tired, poor dear, and so are you. I should think the best thing for you both was bed, and then you will be nice and fresh to-morrow to spend a happy Christmas Day."

Digitized by Google

"Ah! Patty, you forgets there's nothing but the union afore us," replied her mother in a plaintive tone, "but there, I won't be ungrateful. But, as you say, my dear, I think your father would be glad of his bed, for he's spent a trying day, if ever man did."

Patty thereupon led the way to an airy, comfortably-furnished bedroom, with a large, luxurious feather bed for the old people to nestle into, and a bright fire burning on the hearth.

"Oh, ain't this lovely?" exclaimed Mrs. Hazel, as she took a survey of the apartment, "but you mustn't make too much of us, Patty, for it will make the difference all the harder to bear. Well, my man," she continued, when her daughter had left them alone, "the Blessed Christ Child has brought us one more happy Christmas Day, at all events, hasn't He?"

"Seems so," said the old man, who, between the cold he had been subjected to and the hearty meal he had consumed, was almost too sleepy to reply.

"And you won't say nothing against Papish stories again, will you?" pleaded his wife. But Hazel had curled himself round in the feather bed and was already sunk in sleep.

The old woman—his sweetheart of over forty years—crept in beside him and laid her hands upon his. They were old and faded and crippled, but the freshness of their mutual love, his tenderness for her and her trust in him, was pathetic in its simplicity.

They slept till late in the morning. No one came to disturb them, though Mary thought once that she heard a footstep creep about the room and had an indistinct remembrance of a form bending over the bed; but she was utterly weak and worn-out, and Nature was taking her revenge by closely sealing the eyelids of both her husband and herself. Not even the cock-crowing that went on under their window as soon as the day had dawned, served to disturb their rest, and it was not till nearly eleven o'clock that Mrs. Hazel woke to the consciousness that someone stood in the room. As soon as she had opened her eyes, she shook her husband's shoulder.

"Wake up, Robin," she exclaimed, "Look! See! The Christ Child has come to us again!"

At those words the last cobwebs were swept from Hazel's eyes and he started up in bed by the side of his wife. She was right. There on the threshold of the opened door stood the same child who had visited them in their cottage the day before. The wreath of snowy Christmas roses was still upon his broad open brow, but he was now clad in white linen, and his look of uncertainty had disappeared.

"Danfather, danmother, is 'oo velly well?" he exclaimed. "I'se bringed 'oo a lubly bit of holly for Christmas. Fader said I vas to bring it for 'oo!"

"Robin, my man, who—what can it be?" cried Mary, in a voice of mingled fear and pleasure.

"I'm sure I can't tell you, my woman! Who are you, my little feller?" he continued, addressing the child, when a tall stalwart form appeared beside it, and came forward with outstretched hand. It was that of their son Joe.

"Joe—my Joe!" said the old mother, folding her first-born in a close embrace.

"My boy! Is it possible?" exclaimed the old man.

"Yes, dear mother and father, it is I, and I hope you will forgive me for having played a little trick upon you. I have only been in Lillyvale a week, and I did not know, till I met Patty, of the straits you were in, and when I did, I thought I should so much like to give you a happy surprise on Christmas Day!"

"But I do not understand. Have you come to live in Lillyvale, Joe?"

"Yes, father; not only that, but as the master of Ladymead. That is my great surprise for you. My godfather, Mr. Wilkins, died about a month ago, and was good enough to leave me five hundred pounds in his will; so the first thing I thought of was to rent Ladymead farm and turn my back on London for ever. And when I arrived here and Patty told me how badly you and mother were getting on, I was gladder than ever that my godfather had thought of me in his will."

"Aye, aye, it's a good thing for you, my son, and it'll make your mother and me glad to think of your happiness and prosperity. But it's all up with us, my lad. We're too old and feeble to work any more, and we wouldn't be a burden on anyone, least of all on you, with a family to support; and so we've made up our minds to go into the union. I was sorely against it at fust, but your mother is wiser than I, and she's persuaded me as it's the right thing to do, and so I'm 'most reconciled to the idea!"

Digitized by Google

"And do you s'pose that I'd keep my wife and children at Ladymead wanting for nothing, whilst my dear parents was in the work'us?" cried Joe, indignantly. "What do you take me for? Why, who was it as bringed me up from a baby and had me taught my trade, and well-nigh starved theirselves sometimes to keep my sister and me well fed? Do you s'pose I can forget all that? No, father! I don't live at Ladymead Farm unless you and mother live here too. Besides, I wants you—what does a London shoemaker know about farming, do you think? I hardly know a cabbage from a tater! But father can put me up to everything, and help me a bit in the gardening too, if I'm not mistaken."

"Oh, yes, Joe!" said the old man with trembling eagerness. "I can garden a bit still, if people would have a little patience with me, and not want too much hurry, for my hands is terribly crippled with the rheumatics, you see, and my sight is not as good as it was; still, I'm not quite useless, my boy. Oh, no, indeed; if it were for you and yourn, you'd find I can get through a goodish bit of work in the day, I know!"

"And then we shall want mother in the dairy—just to show my wife; a nice gal she is, as I'm sure you'll say, and she's called Mary the same as yourself, mother, which was the first reason I took to her, I think. But she's a duffer at country ways; it couldn't be expected otherwise when she's been in London all her life; but Patty and mother will help her a bit, and we'll all be as happy together as a lot of sandboys!"

"Robin," said Mary suddenly, turning round to her husband, and hiding her face in his breast, "let me cry a bit, there's a good man, or my heart will burst."

"Seems to me as if I'd like to have a bit of a cry myself, Mary," replied her husband, "for it's all too wonderful to be true."

"Nonsense! we can't have no crying here—and on Christmas Day, too!" exclaimed a merry voice, as Patty with her sister-in-law and a cluster of little children burst into the room. "Why, father and mother, you haven't spoken to Mollie yet, and here are your grandchildren come to kiss you and bid you welcome!" and as she spoke she lifted a bonny boy upon the bed. It was he whom they called the Christ Child!

"Joe, who is that?" exclaimed his mother.

"Why, that's my boy—my only son—my little Robin, named for father there, and ever so anxious to see his granddad! But you mustn't spoil him, mother, for he's a handful, and wants a deal of looking after. Fancy what the young rascal did yesterday, when we was all busy arranging the farmhouse!—runned away by himself with only that wreath of white and green, that Patty made him, on his head, right through all this snow, and never come back for an hour or more! There was his mother, sure that he would never be found again, and me and the farm hand shouting all over the place as loud as we could bawl, when in comes my young master as cool as a cucumber, and says he's been trying to find his granddad and grandmammy! But he says he won't do it again. He's never seen such a fall of snow before, and he thought it was sugar till he tasted it, and since then he's been trying to take in his little sisters and cram their mouths full of it! He is a handful, I can tell you!" concluded the proud father, with his eyes fixed lovingly on his son and heir.

"Now, Joe, if you've done talking of that boy, you'd better let father and mother get up and dress themselves, for I expect they must be about ready for their breakfast, considering it's past eleven. Why, you'll never be able to eat no Christmas dinner at this rate!" Patty continued, addressing her parents, "and that would break Mollie's heart and mine, for we're preparing it all ourselves! Come along, children; come along, Mollie and Joe; and, mother and father, your breakfast will be ready for you as soon as you're ready for it."

And laughing and talking, the merry party filed out of the room.

The old couple turned and faced each other with solemn wondering eyes.

"Robin," said Mary presently, "maybe it was the Christ Child, after all, as put it in his little heart to visit us and save us from ourselves."

"You are right, my woman," replied the old man. "It was the Christ Child, and this is His own day. Let us rise and worship Him."

Digitized by Google

The Club Doctor's Wife on "Clubbers."

By ELLA JEFFERISS.

"OH, it's quite simple," Tom was explaining to me at breakfast on our first morning in Casktown, where he had obtained an appointment as doctor to the "Casktown Friendly Societies' Medical Association."

"You see all the Foresters, Oddfellows, Rechabites, Druids, Shepherds, Buffaloes, Comical Fellows, and other friendly societies are strong enough here to combine and engage a medical officer for themselves. Each member pays something like a halfpenny a week, and a committee of themselves manage affairs——"

Here Kirsty, the Scotch servant we had brought with us from the country village in Perthshire, where Tom had started, burst into the room with a scared face.

"Doctor, there's twa patients already, and mair comin' in. What's tae be dune?"

"Oh, just let them sit. It's not nine o'clock yet. I'm told there are often as many as sixty or seventy in a day."

"Losh presairve us a'. Is there a plague?" she ejaculated, shutting the door.

In the old practice there were seldom more than six surgery patients a day, so it was little wonder that this wholesale depôt for advice and medicine astonished Kirsty.

From this morning until we left Casktown she waged unceasing war with the "clubbers," who made a mess on her clean linoleum with their muddy boots, cheeked her at the door and laughed at her Scotch accent, and who were the cause of her being kept cleaning the rooms after nine o'clock at night when she might have been sewing. A few days after we came I heard a scuffle going on downstairs in the passage. A woman had brought her "pram" inside, and Kirsty, always on the look out, had straightway bounced out of the kitchen and jerked it on to the street. When I looked over the banister the woman had evidently brought it in again, and Kirsty, triumphant, with cap awry, was for the second time wheeling it out, the owner declaiming loudly to the grinning patients and breathing out threats of complaints to the committee.

"The impidence of some trash is enough to fell a body. A nice thing, indeed, if the likes o' you is to bring your clarty machines into decent people's houses," our maid was declaiming to the waiting-room in general, when Tom came out of the consulting-room to see what the noise was about—Kirsty returning to the kitchen with uplifted nose and a scornful "Set them up indeed," as he explained to the woman that there was no room for "prams" in the passage. Kirsty had her hours of triumph, however. It was her business to close the outer door against "thae cattle," as I regret to say she termed the patients, at 10.30 a.m. and 8.30 p.m., and sometimes a woman who had dawdled over her marketing would come for her medicine after the door was closed, and on Kirsty's appearance would demand to see the doctor.

"Aye," would come the reply, "ye canna' see 'im the nicht. Yer too late."

"Whoi, it aint 'arf past ite yet."

"Aye, is it. It's five and twenty to nine, and gin ye can read, an' I hae ma doots, ye'll see marked on the bottle labels that half-past eight is the closing 'oor," and she would bang the door.

We often had to warn her that if she was rude to the patients she would be brought before the committee.

"An' wha's the committee? A wheen auld drucken cobbler bodies. 'Am no' their servant, thank guidness," she would say with a fine contempt, and one could not contradict her, for there certainly was one cobbler who came to the meetings drunk on occasion.

Digitized by Google

The taking down of messages was a source of perpetual tribulation to Kirsty. One day she wrote on the slate, "Mrs. Eowse, 5, Awning Glow-street." Neither name nor street was to be found, and when in the evening an irate Mr. "Eowse" came to see why the doctor had not come, Tom elicited that the name was "House" and the street "Horninglow." No wonder Kirsty, unused to broad Staffordshire, had not got it correctly. However, she had orders to make messengers write down their addresses in the future. On my coming in one day she met me with an irate countenance.

"Eh, mem," she burst out, "there's been twa men in the waitin'-room. I was jist sweeping oot some o' the dirt thae cattle bring in when my gentlemen mairched as bauld as brass straucht intil the waitin'-room."

"'An' what may you be wantin'?' says I.

"'Oh, we're the visitin' committee,' says they, an' they poked their noses intil everything; drawed their fingers along the mantelshelf tae see if there was ony dust, clawed the bottles in the dispensary, keeked in the cork drawer, smelt in the coal scuttle till I was ready to shove them heid foremost intil it. Syne they starts writin' in the big buik that lies in the dispensary with 'Visitors' on it, an' I could stan' it no longer, an' says 'Gin yer quite finished, gentlemen, I'd like tae get on wi' ma wark, for I canna stop here watchin' you a' day. Jist send word neist time ye think o' calling, and a'll hae the bedrooms ready for yer inspection, and the mistress 'll, nae doot, be pleased tae let ye gang through the linen press'. They've written a fine pack o' lies in yon buik I can tell you."

I was thoroughly indignant, and going into the waiting-room found, as she had said, a book in which appeared such

"'WE'RE THE VISITIN' COMMITTEE,' SAYS THEY, AN' THEY POKED THEIR NOSES INTIL EVERYTHING."

remarks as the following in different hands:—

"January 5th. 7 o'clock. Waiting-room fire very low. (R. Chowles, visitor.)"

"Feb. 18th. 12th o'clock. Cusultin' room untoidy. Waste o' cawks goin' on, namely, 3 or 4 in slop-pale in dispensory. (Thomas Brown, visitor.)"

Digitized by Google

"May 10th. 10 o'clock. Dr. eowt. Reason why? (T. Lobb, visitor.)"

Subsequently I found out that the club appointed visitors, whose duty was to visit men receiving sick pay and to inspect the medical officer's business premises, and enter any complaints in this book, which was brought before the committee every other Thursday evening when they held their meeting in the waiting-room, and the odour of shag and the buzz of their wrangling voices was wafted upstairs, the doctor or dispenser being frequently called to answer for real or imaginary misdeeds. The committee consisted of working men, and it was most galling for an educated man to be called to order by ignorant chawbacons, who thought they were fully competent to advise him as to the details of his professional work. Some of them were kind-hearted fellows, however, although they had most offensive ways of showing their good-will. Once, for instance, when they had had a big club dinner, there arrived the following day, with the chairman's compliments, a couple of roasted pheasants—one complete and the other cut into—remnants of the feast!

One of the things that perpetually scraped up my temper was the fact that my house was never my own. It might as well have been a shop or a public-house for all the privacy or quiet we had. I could not accompany a visitor down to the door without jostling past one or two "clubbers," who, in spite of Kirsty's vigilance, would insist upon standing in the passage in the hope of being able to rush into the consulting room out of their turn, or because they considered themselves too superior to sit in the waiting-room with the common herd. Then they would insist upon keeping the waiting-room door open, and we had to run the gauntlet of their curious eyes every time we went up or down stairs with a tray of dishes, for we had to have our dining-room on the second floor. "Shut the waiting-room door, please," became the most familiar sentence in our house. Then would ensue a hurried scurry past, not always, however, successfully performed, for often they would manage to open it just at the critical moment. I think, however, that the worst of my woes was that Tom never had a free evening, and if by chance he tried to get off to a concert with me he was certain to be detained. He would get himself quite ready to rush off as soon as the last patient had gone; Kirsty would have strict orders to close the door punctually and admit no one after 8.30, and I could tell that he was "polishing them off," as he elegantly termed it, by quick succession of rings on the bell that ushered in each patient, and the dissatisfied expressions on the faces of the "chronics" as they went out carrying their bottles of lotion. The "chronic" loves to dilate on his ailments, and finds it distinctly annoying to be told—

"All right, my man. Tablespoonful in a little water three times a day. Continue the lotion. Come and see me in a week's time. 'Night," just as he has got into a flowing recital as to "jest eow them prickin's and shootin's tykes 'im." At eight-thirty I would be waiting ready at the top of the stairs, and there would still be two or three in the waiting-room as Kirsty shut the outer door. Then as Tom was getting on his overcoat there would come a ring at the door, and "Please, tell doctor to come at once to Mrs. Vokes."

Tom would come back after a short parley with the messenger, and I would take off my hat and gloves and anathematise the "clubber" and wish we were back in the country. Medical associations are, no doubt, excellent things from the club patient's point of view, but it takes almost a superhuman effort for the club doctor's wife to see things with the eyes of the "halfpenny a week" club patient.

Digitized by Google

BLIND GIRLS AT THE ROYAL NORMAL COLLEGE, UPPER NORWOOD, OUT FOR CYCLING EXERCISE.

WONDERS OF THE BLIND AND THE DUMB.

By J. A. HAMMERTON.

IT was one of the crowning glories of the century just closed that during no similar period in the history of the world has so much been done by science and the inventive genius of man to make up, in some degree, by artificial means, for what the blind, the deaf and the dumb have been deprived of by Nature.

Behind all the inventions for assisting our afflicted brethren is a strong humanitarian feeling, the existence of which is one of the most gratifying features of our times. To know the condition of the blind at the beginning of the last century and to contrast that with what now exists is nothing short of wonderful; for we might say, indeed, that the advantages enjoyed by the blind of to-day compared with the disabilities of their class at the beginning of the nineteenth century are even greater than the advantages of the seeing compared with the blind of to-day.

In a word, the sightless members of the community no longer live in a dark world unable to work for themselves, a burden on their fellow-men; but thanks to the efforts of those who have devoted their lives to their service, they have become as valuable members of society as their sighted fellows and are able to enjoy many of the good things of this world. Just as fighting against adversity makes one stronger, more resolute, so in surmounting their natural difficulties the sightless would seem to acquire new qualities which enable them not merely to rival the seeing but in certain branches of education and work even to excel them.

Of course, great things have been achieved by men deprived of sight long ago, and it is only necessary to mention the name of Homer to realise how far back in the history of the world blind men arose to fame. Our own Milton, too, is an oft-quoted example of patience and performance under blindness. A name that is less known, but really stands for more remarkable things, is that of Nicholas Saunderson, a mathematician, whose strange fate it was to teach the laws of optics, to explain the nature of light and color, the theory of vision, and the transmission of rays by waves of ether to the students of Cambridge University, and be withal blind!

Digitized by Google

The triumphs of Postmaster-General Fawcett over his affliction are well-known to all readers, and one of the most remarkable blind men of to-day is Principal Campbell of the Royal Normal College for the Blind, Upper Norwood, who was born in Frankland County, Tennessee, 66 years ago, and lost his eyes as the result of an accident when three years old. Dr. F. J. Campbell, in order to prove that the blind are capable of almost incredible performances, has himself ascended to the top of Mont Blanc. Another remarkable blind man of the present day is M. Vidal, the French sculptor, who has produced many beautiful pieces of statutary chiefly illustrative of animal life, which the blind artist can only study through his fingers. M. Vidal in the pursuit of his art has even entered a lion's cage in order to receive an impression of the animal's form by feeling with his fingers. It was in this novel way that he made his study for one of his masterpieces, the "Lion roaring," a sculpture so vigorous in outline, and so suggestive of the finest qualities of the king of the forest that one can scarce believe it was chiselled by a man who could not see his work.

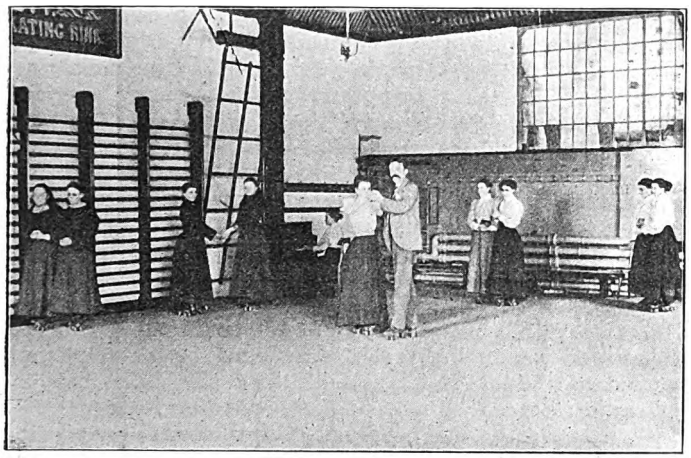
BLIND GIRLS AT DRILL.

These, however, are the exceptions in the world of the blind; they are not typical, yet do they prove most eloquently that it is given to men of patience and determination to rise triumphantly above the greatest physical defects.

It is a common belief that the economy of nature supplies the other senses in increased proportion to those who are robbed of one or more of the alloted five, but the best authorities dispute the supposition, and contend that the blind in all other respects are "even as you and I." It is true, however, that the senses of feeling, smelling, and hearing are as capable of development as any muscle of the body, and the blind have of necessity to develop these to a point of perfection quite unnecessary in those who possess sight; in fact, the average person would be greatly surprised to find how necessary the three senses just mentioned are to sight. It is not only with our eyes that we see, but with our ears, our nose, and our hands, just as our eyes are used to assist us in hearing, a fact which can be proved by a very simple experiment. Shut your eyes and get someone to click two pennies together in a far part of the room, and it is ten chances to one you will be quite unable to locate the point within a yard at which the sound was made. This phase of the subject is so very interesting that the following passage from a remarkable book, "The Blind, by a Blind Man," written by M. Maurice de la Sizeranne, is worthy of quotation here:—

"Touch is not localised in the hands. It is spread all over the body. Even through the shoe the foot can feel differences in the ground it treads. Stop up a blind man's ears and he can tell whether he is walking on stone or wooden pavement. Every odour is very distinct and characteristic. Raw meat, pomade, damp tobacco, fresh leather, fish, hay, freshly-printed paper and flowers have such distinct odours that we know them without the shadow of a doubt, so that we know when we pass a tobacconist's, a shoemaker's, a chemist's, or a newspaper shop. This is how a blind man makes his way through a crowded city. By combining his senses of touch and smell, and sometimes of hearing, he knows almost as much as of what is going on around him as any one else. He can tell where a house is being built, where the children are playing, where the pavement requires repairs. In the country his joys are just as great, or greater, for here every scent of wood or crop, of flower or weed, is distinguished. He knows the direction of the wind by the scents it brings to him of the woods to the east, or the flowers to the west. On a train or steamboat much of the blind man's joy of knowledge is lost, for the noise of the engines and the smoke and cinders obscure all other sounds and scents."

Digitized by Google



TEACHING THE BLIND TO ROLLER-SKATE.

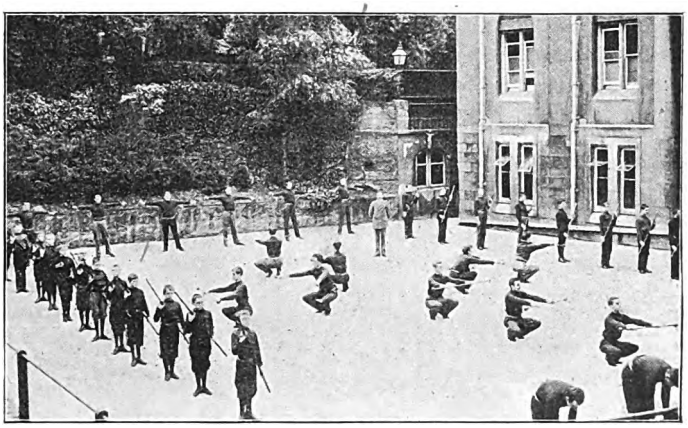
It is on the lines laid down by M. de la Sizeranne that most of the aids to the blind have been devised. The first of these was the invention of printing in relief, made as long ago as 1784 by M. Valentine Haüy, whose system has never been superseded, although in 1827 it was considerably modified by Mr. James Gall of Edinburgh. Since then many other alphabets have been devised and several are now in very general use, probably the simplest and best known being that of another Frenchman, M. Louis Braille, who in 1834 introduced a modification of another Frenchman's system. Its root is simply six dots thus—(⁚ ⁚) from which no less than sixty-two variations can be made in this way :—

A	B	C	D
⠁	⠃	⠉	⠙
E	F	G	H
⠑	⠋	⠛	⠓

The Braille system, which is very easily embossed, can be more readily felt than that of Dr. Moon, himself blind, who in 1875 invented his well-known alphabet, which contains several of the ordinary Roman letters and a number with parts omitted. The Braille alphabet also occupies much less space and has been made the base of a thorough musical notation. In New York Mr. Waite, the Superintendent of the great institution for the blind in that city, has further improved on Braille's and considerably reduced the space occupied by it, merely by laying the root on its side, thus—(:::).

With the introduction of a system of reading the possibilities of educating the blind became at once unlimited, but we can scarcely suppose that even in their wildest dreams the inventors foresaw such developments as have now been achieved. Most of the great libraries throughout the country contain books for the use of the blind, and a magazine in raised type has even been issued, but it is to America that we have to go for the most practical demonstration of what the community may do in providing literature for the

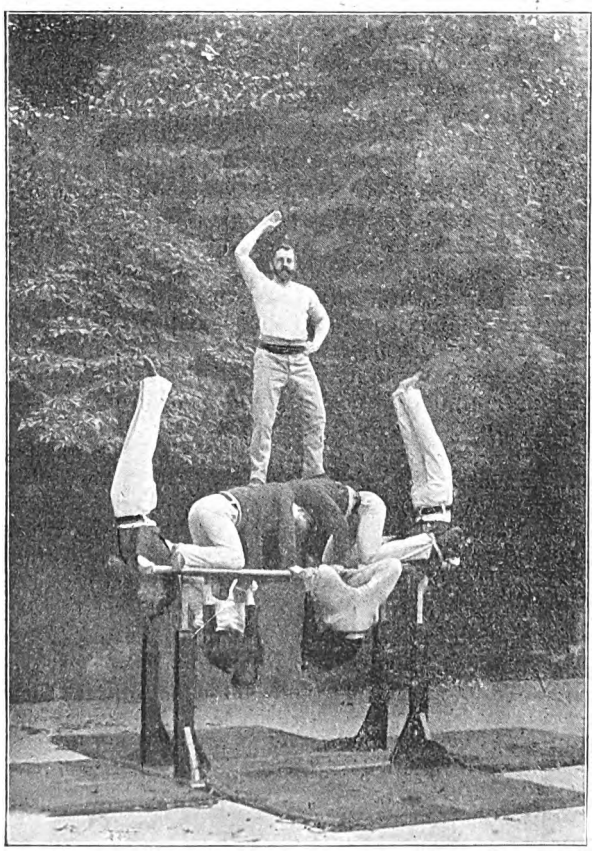


YOUTHS AT DRILL, ROYAL NORMAL COLLEGE.

Digitized by Google

sightless. The Pavilion of the Blind in the magnificient Congressional Library at Washington, is a splendid institution whose work cannot be too widely known. It originated in the mind of a blind girl, who suggested to the librarian the idea of devoting one room to the use of the blind. In this handsomely furnished apartment all the available books in raised type have been gathered together. A lady superintendent is specially engaged to assist the readers, and, entering upon her work in that true spirit of social service with which so many American ladies seem to be blessed, she has not stopped at the mere discharge of perfunctory duties, but has made the Pavilion of the Blind a great centre of social life. The cream of Washington's "society" ladies actively assist in the work, and many leading American authors come to the Pavilion and read selections from their works to sightless audiences, while some young ladies have even been enthusiastic enough to learn the Braille and Waite systems of writing, and every month translate articles and stories from the magazines into embossed characters for the frequenters of the Pavilion, so that the blind readers of Washington can literally keep "in touch" with current literature. Committees of fashionable young ladies have also been formed for the purpose of piloting the blind to and from the library on the occasions of literary or musical gatherings which take place every week, and one could not wish those "butterflies of fashion" better employed.

But, although the perfection of reading for the blind has opened up to them great fields of knowledge, this side of education only represents a small part of what has been done for them. In music particularly wonders have been achieved, and during recent years a great many blind musicians have gained the highest honours in musical examinations, both in Great Britain and America, blind teachers of music being now to be found in most of our large towns, and excellent teachers they prove, with their acutely developed sense of sound. Mr. Waite, of New York, has also done much to further this branch of their education by the invention of the Kleidograph, a machine which enables blind musicians to compose as readily as their seeing brethren, and by its aid the most intricate compositions may be copied without the slightest difficulty. It is on the principle of the type-writer; and the ordinary type-writer has also opened up new paths of usefulness to blind workers, as it can be readily mastered by them with even less instruction than is necessary in the case of those who possess their eyesight.



BLIND GYMNASTICS (INSTRUCTOR ON TOP).

The Institution for the Blind at Birmingham has the honour of developing type-writing by the blind to the highest stage of perfection. There the students have not only been thoroughly grounded in the use of the ordinary machine, but a system of embossed shorthand has been invented, whereby a blind operator can take down shorthand notes from dictation at the rate of one hundred words a minute, and then transcribe them by means of the type-writer. I have inspected scores of letters and manuscripts written in this way, and seeing operators would be pleased indeed if they never produced manuscripts with fewer mistakes. In Birmingham this branch of work has really been perfected to a degree that is wonderful, blind typists being constantly employed in commercial work, and even undertaking to teach the art to seeing pupils. The machines can also be fitted with an ingenious contrivance which enables blind operators to reproduce elaborate accounts and statistics, and they can actually go back to any point at which a mistake has occurred and correct it themselves! Mr. Henry Stainsby, the Secretary of the Birmingham Institution, is mainly to be thanked for all this.

Digitized by Google

DR. CAMPBELL.
(Principal of the Royal Normal College for the Blind.)
Photograph by W. J. Wright, Upper Norwood.

In all branches of physical culture the blind are now as fortunate as the rest of us, and nothing can be more interesting or gratifying than a visit to a playground in any large institution for the blind, where we shall find the young people engaged in all sorts of recreations, vaulting, cricket, running, skipping-ropes, or playing at "fire brigades" with the aid of a large wooden engine. In the gymnasium we shall find the youths and young men going through every athletic exercise known to us, with the exception of the trapeze. In the swimming bath they have been taught to dive as fearlessly as if possessing sight, and even in the streets we may see companies of them pedalling merrily along on a "multicycle," under the lead of a seeing companion. The girls, of course, are instructed chiefly in cooking, sewing and all domestic accomplishments calculated to make them excellent housewives.

What a delight it is to record such things as these, when we remember that less than 20 years ago the only occupations open to the blind were such simple work as basket-making and cheap upholstery. For the greater part of this century their education had been left largely in the hands of philanthropic workers; they were regarded chiefly as objects of charity. But to-day the Education Department, the School Board, and the Board of Guardians are co-workers everywhere with the institutions for the blind, and progress is the watchword all along the line.

Another aspect of our subject which is worthy of some attention is the work of those who are experimenting with a view to restoring visual power to the sightless. In an age when science has achieved some of its greatest marvels, and the Röntgen rays have rendered transparent substances previously considered opaque, it is not too much to hope that some invention may yet be contrived whereby the blind will see something of the beautiful world which is now shut out from their view.

The discoveries of Mr. Peter Stein, a Russian scientist, certainly encourage us in this belief. He has demonstrated that the eyes are not essential to vision. A representative of a most trustworthy London newspaper was securely blindfolded, so that he could not even see a lighted candle held before him. He was then connected with Mr. Stein's apparatus, and his sensations are described in the following words:—"I felt a slight sensation of electrical current passing through my body. Then, quickly, the darkness passed away, a dull grey took its place, and was succeeded by a light, clear and bright. I saw fingers held up before me, and a disc that looked like a coin. And when I was disconnected from the apparatus I found I was standing just where I was when the eyes were bandaged. Mr. Stein had been by my side all the time, and there was no one else present."

Digitized by Google

This surprising invention has not yet been perfected, but we may reasonably hope that it will be found of great value in the education of the blind, even should it do no more than assist them to distinguish the outline of forms. At present this is one of the great difficulties of their instruction. Having to picture in their minds the outlines of animals and other forms merely by the assistance of wooden models and the information of their teachers, they experience much difficulty in realising proportion, since, for instance, it is scarcely possible to supply a life-sized model of an elephant alongside that of a cat. Mr. Stein also claims that by a somewhat similar means he can enable the deaf to hear.

Photograph by Harold Baker, Birmingham.

BIRMINGHAM INSTITUTION FOR THE BLIND—IN THE BOYS' WORKSHOP.

A word or two may be added about the teaching of the deaf and the dumb, which has also been greatly improved of recent years, and especially since the introduction of lip training. By the latter it is now possible for the dumb to communicate to each other without the old finger alphabet, although that is still universally known amongst them. The deaf and dumb start with a great advantage over the blind, as their mind can be reached viâ the eye, and the verses recited with lip and finger movements to Princess Henry and Princess Christian on the occasion of their visit to the great deaf and dumb institution at Cabra, near Dublin, in April last, draw rather a gloomy picture of the condition of the deaf and dumb—

"Ah, pity the poor little deaf and dumb girl,
Whose pleasures in life are so few;
Since nature with less of benignity smiled
On her than she has upon you.

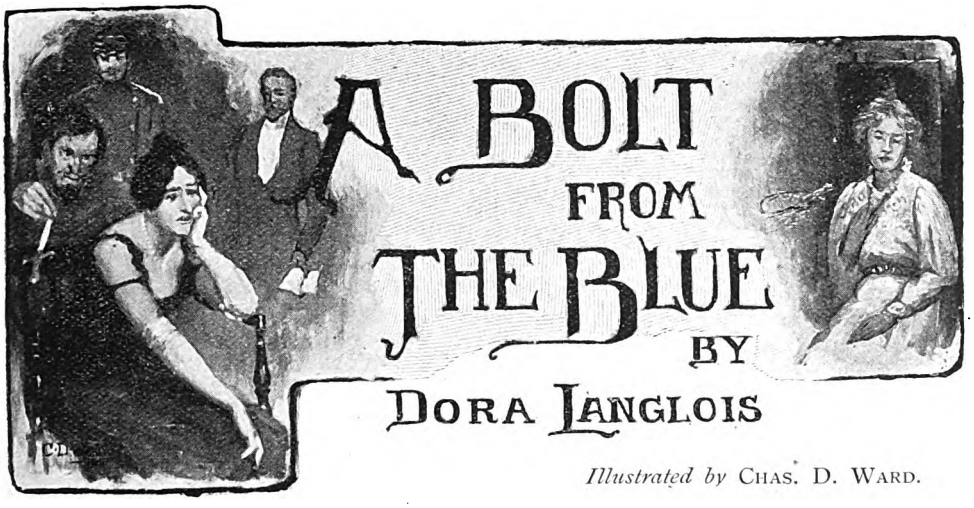
"No words from a fond loving mother I hear.
To soothe me in sickness or woe;
No sounds of affection to dry up the tear
That sorrow bids oftentimes flow."

For, after all, Gounod, to whom one might have thought the sense of sound was everything, was right when, in answer to the question, "Which would you choose to be, deaf or blind?" he replied, "The deaf man can live in constant communication with all of human thought by reading the historians, poets, philosophers, and by seeing the work of artists. The blind man is shut off from everyone and everything. He is the beggar of beggars, the most abject of prisoners."

To be blind, deaf, and dumb, however, is the very height of affliction. One case alone need be mentioned, which in itself is an epitome of the Book of Job. In an American almshouse lives Mattie Morehouse, now thirty-four years of age, who has been blind, deaf, and dumb since seven, but thanks to the painstaking and perseverance of loving teachers she is able to knit lace of the most beautiful pattern, and to read the Bible and other books in the Braille characters.

J. A. HAMMERTON.

Digitized by Google



A BOLT FROM THE BLUE

BY

DORA LANGLOIS

Illustrated by CHAS. D. WARD.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Frank Osborne, a rich man with socialistic ideas, has become entangled with a certain Helga Katiskoff, who passes for a widow. His sister Maria and his cousin Eva are in Paris with him at the time. Eva is in love with Frank herself, but stifles her feelings, and endeavours to help him with Helga, who is avoided by persons in good society. Though Frank does not know it, Helga's husband is still alive, in an inebriates' home. She herself is a member of a formidable secret society, and has in the past plotted against Russia for the liberation of Poland.

The members of the society look upon her entanglement with Frank Osborne with dislike, as in case of marriage she would be lost to them. Osborne has already gone through a form of marriage with her, when anonymous communications are made to him concerning her past, which lead him to leave her. Helga drifts into further conspiracies with the secret society. Frank, while in England, hears she is in St. Petersburg, and, guessing that she must be in imminent personal danger there, all his love returns, and he desires to rescue her. Arriving at St. Petersburg, he finds his fears partly realised. An attempt had been made on the life of the Czar by a woman named Helga Lavinski, who was transported to Siberia soon after Frank arrived in St. Petersburg. Frank follows her, setting out in the character of a sportsman. He obtains an interview with a sick convict woman who has been left behind the gang. She proves to be the Countess Lavinski, but not the Helga whom he married. It was this woman who had attempted the Czar's life.

Frank writes to his sister and Eva, informing them of his journey and telling them his wishes with regard to the disposal of his money should he never return. Eva is much distressed. Meanwhile the Countess Lavinski begins to tell Frank a sad story.

CHAPTER XV.

"I WAS but seventeen," Alexis Lavinski began, "when I was married to a Russian official high in the favour of the Emperor. I was never happy with him. In the second year of my married life I discovered an intrigue of his with a woman of birth attached to the Czarina's person. I was young and passionate; and in my resentment committed the folly of threatening my husband that I would expose this woman to her Imperial mistress. He made me no reply, but the look in his eyes I shall never forget. That very night, at a ball in Moscow, I received a summons from a special messenger to attend the Czarina immediately at the Kremlin. I entered the carriage which awaited me without suspicion, and was driven at once, not to the Kremlin, but to the depôt of the secret police. I was conducted into a room in which one of my husband's confrères was seated at a desk writing. I said: 'I am summoned by the Empress; why have you brought me here?'

"He answered without even looking up: 'Go into the next room and put on the clothes you will find. You are about to take a journey, and cannot travel as you are.'

"So far I had no suspicions, but when I entered that room I guessed the truth; for the clothes that lay in readiness for me were those of a convict doomed to exile. Twenty minutes were allowed me, but at the end of that time when the official and his messenger entered the little ante-room, I was still standing in my white satin ball-dress with the wreath of stephanotis in my hair. My captors make no more ado, they laid rough hands on me at once, tore my ball-dress from my shoulders, forced me into the coarse woollen garments, bound my hands and feet, and would have gagged me, I believe, had not a fainting fit saved them further trouble. I was placed in a closed carriage and did not come to myself till we must have been some time on the road, for we were out in the open country.

Digitized by Google

"I was carried on in this way, surrounded by a mounted guard by day, locked into some cell or barrack room at night, for three or four weeks at least; always going north, as I knew by the change of temperature, but to what destination or by what route I could not tell. At last we passed a little hamlet, and just beyond it came to a building divided into two tenements, surrounded by an enclosure walled in with high walls. Into one of these tenements I was thrust, and left under the charge of an official from the hamlet. His duty towards me consisted in providing me with the bare necessaries of life, and in giving me permission to go into the open air of the enclosure by day, while locking me into my cell at night.

"For two years, as nearly as I can count it, I lived thus, seeing no face save that of my gaoler; hearing no voice but his, save the voice of my neighbour who occupied the other half of the dwelling, and sometimes sang to himself, 'Pestel's Lament,' and the songs our peasants sing in the harvest fields.

"One day, as I sat idle in my cell, I heard the sound of wheels, then curses and expostulations in a strange voice; and my neighbour suddenly ceased singing. Two minutes later my door was unfastened, a man in convict garb was thrust in, and the door again locked upon him.

"'What does this mean?' I asked, starting up. The new-comer, a man of sad but noble aspect, looking at me in surprise as great as my own, answered:

"'I cannot tell you. A stranger has arrived and they have put him into my cell. Have patience. Possibly I am to go on to the mines; or you are to return. The hour of the evening inspection is at hand; we shall know then.'

"Presently our gaoler arrived, and my companion addressed him: 'If I am not to return to my cell,' he said, 'how are you ordered to dispose of me?'

"The man lifted his shoulders: 'I have no orders as to you,' he said. 'You must remain here.'

"'Here?' I cried. 'You have no orders, and yet you do this thing?'

"'Is the lady then released?' the stranger asked.

"Our gaoler shook his head. 'It seems one of you has been forgotten,' said he. 'I have received a prisoner with instructions to keep him alone, where he can have speech with none. There are these two apartments only. I cannot make a third by whistling for one; and so the thing rests. I have made a report, if that will satisfy you; and I must wait for instructions.' Then he went out and locked the door upon us.

"My heart was burning with indignation; if my rank was forgotten, if I was no longer a Russian Countess, but only a number, did they dare to take from me the privileges of my sex? Ah! I did not know then that a convict is only one of a flock who may be herded together without distinction like beasts of the field.

"My companion sought to calm my wild outburst of passion. He told me that in a few weeks, at most, instructions would come, that surely he would be moved on to the mines, where he could no longer offend me; or that this, which now caused me to rebel, would prove the herald of my own freedom.

"I listened in sullen silence, and soon my companion decided that the best way was to leave me to feel myself as lonely as I could. It was then the brief summer, and as many hours as he could he spent in the enclosure. Every morning I asked my gaoler: 'Have you instructions yet?' and, on receiving his answer, said not another word from sunrise to sunset.

"At last I knew, from the arrival of a new sack of meal and cruise of oil, that a post had arrived with supplies.

"'Your instructions?' I demanded.

"The gaoler looked at me, his own face showing surprise. 'There is no answer to my report,' he said.

"'But there has been time?'

"'It seems that one of you two is not only forgotten, but that someone wishes to forget,' he answered. 'I was told that

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

my report had been received and that there were no instructions.'

"When our gaoler left us, I wept, and yet in my heart there was relief, for I felt, even when I demanded to know what the instructions were, that had they contained an order for my fellow-prisoner's removal to the mines, the silence of the place would become intolerable to me, could I no longer hear his rich voice singing the sad sweet songs of our country.

"As I sat weeping, he spoke to me for the first time since I had rejected his consolations, on the day they brought him to my cell.

"'It seems that the world has forgotten us,' he said; 'but perhaps God has remembered our loneliness. Let us not reject the good gift of human sympathy and companionship.'

"Still weeping, I held out my hand to him who was to be my friend first, and then my lover, and my husband in heaven's sight, and more to me than man has ever been to woman since the days when God gave our first parents to each other.

"I cannot tell you how we lived in those days, only that the once leaden hours flew by like thistledown. We told each other of our past, always with this difference, I told him all; he spoke only of his youth, and spoke guardedly of that.

"'Do you not trust me, Paul?' I would say.

"'Ah, little one,' he would reply, 'my crime is that I know too much; some day my heart tells me that you will return to the world; and then your safeguard will be that you know nothing.'

"So the time passed, and in the fourth year of my imprisonment there was another companion for our solitude—our little son.

"O God! The holy joy of teaching this child, born in exile, whose whole world was contained in the four walls of our prison; of uniting with each other to map out, while he slept, means of enlightening that baby brain. Think of it! A little child who has all his faculties, and yet has never seen a cat, a dog, a butterfly, or a rose.

"To me the three years he passed with us were years of great content, but the father would say with a cloud on his brow: 'Some day, and that soon, beloved, we must part with him. If we keep him till he has knowledge of right and wrong, his father's crimes will doom him to life-long imprisonment.'

"Ah, me! Before the Czar could rob me of my child, death came. One night the gaoler came with a pick, and broke the frozen ground that we might lay our little son to rest at the bottom of the enclosure.

"The years rolled on; thirteen years Paul and I had thus lived together, forgetting the world; and then 'the instructions' I had once looked for so eagerly came at last.

"One day we saw a strange face over the shoulder of our guardian, and I heard my name pronounced.

"'Alexis Helga Petrona Lavinski; step forward.'

"I saw my beloved companion turn white and press his hand to his side. I laid my hand on his wrist and answered:

"'There is no such person here.'

"It was an officer with a small party of cossacks behind him, who had addressed me.

"'The woman deceives your Excellency,' our gaoler cried. 'Look at her. Is she not as described? By all the saints I assure you that this is she; at least, this is the woman I received on the date named in the report.'

"The soldier, much puzzled, turned from one of us to the other; then he said: 'I hold here an order for the immediate release of the prisoner Lavinski. Who is this woman?'"

"He addressed himself to Paul; and Paul, drawing his hand gently from mine, answered:

"'She is the Countess Lavinski.'

"Then I threw myself at the officer's feet.

"'I admit it,' I said. 'I admit it. I am that most unhappy woman, but leave me, sir; leave me; I have never injured the Czar. I have done nothing that he should punish. Let me remain here. Do not drag me away.'

"'The Czar's orders must be obeyed,' he replied. 'He has in mercy pardoned your offences; come.'

"I wept, I cried for mercy. I exerted my strength; and through it all my beloved stood there with his hands over his eyes, and said never a word. To what end were my struggles? I might by patience have obtained time for a last farewell; as it was I was hurried away without a touch of the lips, a pressure of the hand, without even an opportunity to implore my Paul to tell me something by which I might identify him and find him again.

Digitized by Google

"Oh! That long weary journey back to Moscow! It passed like a hideous dream, till I found myself again in the little bureau of police, before my husband's confrère who still sat at his desk as though he had never left it all those years.

"'Go into the next room,' he said, calmly, and put on the clothing you left here. You are about to return home.'

"I cast myself at his feet. 'Let me return to Siberia,' I said. 'I cannot go back to the Count Lavinski.'

"'There is no need, madam,' he said. 'The Count Lavinski is dead. On his deathbed he obtained your pardon from our Merciful Sovereign the Czar. Return to your home; you will find that a provision has been made for you by your late husband.'

"I still refused to rise or leave him. 'Have mercy on me!' I said. 'I have no part in life here. I am a ghost among the living; mention me to the Czar and have me sent again into exile.'

"He pushed me away impatiently with his knee, to which I clung. 'Have a care,' he said. 'Siberia is wide; you may return there, but you will not in that case take the same road.'

"I dragged myself to my feet, cowed at last into compliance. I staggered into the inner room, and there, as if in mockery of my misery, lay my white satin ball-dress, and my wreath of stephanotis, yellow with age, and covered in the folds with dust.

"I put off my coarse woollen clothes and kissed them because his hands had touched them. I put on the faded ball-gown with its torn fastenings hanging by threads, the ball-gown of a fashion of a decade and a half ago, in which I resembled some scarecrow figure from a village show; a thing for even babes to jeer at. I even pinned the wreath upon my head, and passed out humbly.

"'I have obeyed the Czar,' I said. 'I will walk through the street thus, if it will prove my submission. I pray you forward my prayer to him.'

"'Enough,' he said, 'go home. Your presence is required in Moscow.'

"And what think you it was that they required of me? My Paul was right. They thought that I should know his secrets, and those of his one-time comrades. I was interrogated once, twice, half-a-hundred times. My answer, my broken-hearted answer, was always the same. 'I know nothing; not even the name of him to whom you gave me. I am useless to you, permit me to return.'

"I wrote and forwarded a petition to the Czar, Alexander III. It was unanswered. I spent the principle of the pittance my husband had left me in trying to bribe those who might have helped me to discover the name of the place to which I had been sent, and from which I had returned. I failed.

"Then I went mad at the thought of my dear one—singing, perhaps, no more, but keeping his lonely watch by the grave of our little child. I went mad; I saw blood. I said to myself that the Czar, whose mercy had been cruel as death, should die; that I would avenge my wrongs and those of him whom I might see no more. Then came August 13th last; the attempt, the failure, and—I am here."

The unhappy woman covered her face with her hands and dry sobs shook her wasted frame at the memory of the sorrows she had endured. "He will never know that I was faithful," she moaned. "He will never know. That thought it was that made me what I am; and, knowing it, dare you condemn?"

"No," Osborne answered, solemnly. "God keep me from the sin of judging."

There was silence between them for a little space; then she said, more calmly: "The snow has ceased to fall, my friend; to-morrow you will set out."

"No! No!" he answered.

"It will be so, I think," she insisted, with a faint sad smile. "You are but waiting for me. The chain galls, but it cannot hold much longer. To-morrow, or the next day you will set out, and I too shall have departed."

She was right; not the next day, but the day after, Osborne was again on the road; but Alexis Lavinski had reached her journey's end.

CHAPTER XVI.

The horrible famine winter of '92 had passed, and two hundred and twenty thousand Russian peasants had perished of hunger, or its grim attendants—typhoid and scurvy. Things had fallen out much as Professor Jonas had anticipated; thousands had flocked to the frontier towns. Government had bestirred itself as usual too late, and, in consequence, the drastic measures which had then to be resorted to, to check the spread of disease, had had, at least to the sufferers, the appearance of cruelty rather than kindness. Wives were separated from their husbands, children from their parents, the sick taken forcibly to the hospitals.

Digitized by Google

Immediately a yell of execration went up, a popular clamour and outcry that this new pestilence was the work of the doctors. "It is they," the infuriated peasants said, "who have brought this upon us. They hounded us out of the cities, they dragged our wives and children away to die in their hospitals. They are in league with the devil. They grudge us bread, and so they kill us. Resist them, brothers! Resist them, have no more of their false help." What wonder then that when ignorance and superstition leagued itself with such a fell agent as cholera, the people died off in their thousands like rotten sheep.

It was towards Russia in this gloomy springtime that Francis Osborne was returning. He had been compelled by red-tapeism to complete the whole of his journey to Vitinsk. There the signing of his papers was delayed till the roads became impassable; then his cash ran out and he had to wait for further supplies; and every day of this vexatious delay the craving for home was growing more intense. All the passionate emotions that had stirred in him at the thought of Helga an exile and in chains, seemed to have burnt themselves out. She was not there, she was safe; it was of that lover of hers whom she had sent to this awful fate, that he thought by day and dreamt by night. He dreamt that having married Helga they met this man, and that he claimed her by the right of priority, and the bitter price he had paid for her love. That dream, which might possibly have become a grim reality, brought about in him a terrible revulsion of feeling, and increased his longing to return to Eva, and forget the past. It was just at a time when this longing was becoming so acute as to be unbearable, that he received a letter from his sister, which had been delayed at Troitsk, and which, after sundry business details, concluded with the following paragraph:

"My health is pretty good. Eva's, when I saw her last, might have been better. She, like you, has gone suddenly mad on the Russian question. She is now completing her preliminary training in a fever hospital at Nottingham, at the termination of which she will be drafted to the depôt of the Red Cross Society at Kassan, and from thence she will go where they choose to send her, I suppose. She wishes me to tell you that by next summer she will be back in England, and that wherever she is she will endeavour to carry out your wishes (whatever they may be). I had to have Gyp poisoned, as he was certainly going to contract rabies. Old dogs are very dangerous. You shall hear all news regularly. I daresay you won't get it, but I shall do my duty.—Ever your affectionate sister, MARIA OSBORNE."

Osborne put down the letter in astonishment. Eva was in Russia then. If so he would not leave the country till she returned with him. It was not too late to get his passport altered to go south instead of west, join the high road for Moscow, and so pass through Kassan. With this idea hot upon him, he started at once for the residence of the Governor. He found that personage (a young man) smoking the eternal cigarette, and was immediately offered tea from the samovar.

"So you wish to leave us immediately?" that gentleman said. "Ah, well; no wonder. It is not surprising. The mystery is how you ever chanced to come here. They say you came to hunt, but our fur-bearing animals have not suffered much."

Osborne murmured a confused request that the alterations in his passport might be make as quickly as possible.

"All in good time. I will give directions," the genial officer replied, seating himself at his desk. "I am in no hurry to lose your pleasant society, you see. By the way," he added, taking up his pen, "you were in Paris some eighteen months ago, were you not?"

"I was," Osborne answered, turning pale in spite of himself.

"Ah! I was there myself at that time. Was it there, par example, that monsieur learnt first to take an interest in the subjects of the Czar?"

A spasm of dread clutched Osborne's heart. He could make no answer; and the other, enjoying his confusion, said:

Digitized by Google

"Ah! Do I rob monsieur of the belief that he has deceived a Government, the most paternal in the world, by hazarding a guess that he thought to find here, in Siberia, someone he met in Paris? Well, well, be easy. Did we not suspect this we might make difficulty about that little detour to the police hut where a certain convict woman was lying sick."

Still Osborne found it impossible to rally from the horror of the idea that his pursuit of Helga might some day be a source of danger to her, till the other added:

"Do I not tell you, my good friend, to be easy? The lady you come to seek is an old friend of ours; but we have not yet tempted her to pay us in Siberia her long promised visit. You have not done her any harm. By the way, they said in Paris that you were affianced."

"I was affianced at that time to a lady."

"How droll! You did not know the husband then? But naturally, you would not be introduced, though she visited him with praiseworthy regularity during your stay."

"Visited him?"

"I have said it—visited him, at Monte Rouge, at a home for inebriates. It was not far to go, and any day her journey might have been repaid by news of his death. Eh bien! I will get these papers drawn out afresh, and, meanwhile, will you gratify me with a game of chess?"

. . . . .

"Your Excellency is weary." It was Ivanovitch who spoke, looking in the watery spring sunshine dirtier, if possible, and more frowsy than ever. "Hey! Good horse, come up, Over the brow of the next hill is Saratoff, and there, Excellency, you shall sleep in a good bed."

"Ivanovitch, look at the sunset! It is surely very red?"

"Yes, Excellency."

"Look! The light is flickering! There's smoke in the sky. And yes, look that was a tongue of flame!"

"Something burning," replied Ivanovitch, with the true fatalist's indifference. "No matter; Saratoff is large, and one inn will hold us."

. . . . .

"How many new cases to-night—six, did you say?"

"Yes, sister. There were seven, but the last one died on the way. Four of the others are nearly gone. I was sent on to tell you to prepare for six."

A woman with the red cross on her arm turned to another.

"It is always so," she said. "They hide their sick away from us. We have to take them by force, and then it is almost too late. If it were not for the infection it would be almost better to leave all cases that have reached the third stage."

"The English sister blames Dr. Arkalich. She says he is too peremptory. She has gone by permission to fetch these people with him."

"Did he not object? He is not fond of interference, as we all know."

"Object? Not he. The fact is that the other day the people frightened him. He thought that a woman might do some good, and she volunteered. Ah! What's that?"

The two women, who were talking softly at the upper end of the ward of the Saratoff Cholera Hospital, faced round to the window, one of the panes of which was open. The sleeve of a ragged craftan had been thrust through it, a sinewy hand grasped the inner frame, and a face distorted by hideous passions looked down upon them.

"There they are, there they are, the witches! I can see the pots and the little phials in which they make their poisons!" the man shrieked, turning his head outward again and addressing persons evidently below the vantage point to which he had climbed. "And look, I say, the smoke is rising again from their devil's furnace," and he pointed to the left, on which, a little apart from the main building, stood the newly-erected mortuary, and the out-house in which infected garments were destroyed, or vermin-infested ones purified in the ovens. Look! Look! Do you know what that smoke is? That's where they burn the bodies of your wives and children.

"Who says I lie? Who dares to say it? Have we any funerals? Do we ever see our dead? No, they burn them, they burn them! There stands Nichol, the little mason. He built the dead-house, and he built its neighbour, the devil's oven. They are side by side. The oven is large enough to hold a man, and that is what it does hold. It's smoking now. How do we know that they are all dead that go there? How do we know, I say?"

Digitized by Google

The frightened women, clasping each other by the wrist, drew closer together, for of the wild, hoarse shout that followed this harangue nothing was intelligible but its fearful menace, and that it sprang from a myriad throats.

A few moments of breathless suspense passed, and then a young student burst into the ward, his face white as curds.

"Fly! Fly for your lives!" he said. "They have fired the hospital."

"But the patients? They will burn in their beds."

"Take those who have a chance and leave the others. In any case the exposure must kill them. Make haste! Make haste! They will surround the place and kill you otherwise. I left Arkalich truggling with the mob, and Niviski is lown, I saw him fall."

The two women wrung their hands.

"Oh, what a death! What a horrible death!" one woman moaned, moving to the door, but turning her wild eyes upon the helpless wretches who were already screaming and endeavouring to struggle from their beds.

"I will not leave them," said the other.

"Smother them! Smother them!" urged the student. "Their cries will be heard; they will still further enrage the mob. I tell you they are doomed."

What counsels would have prevailed in the end among the terrified staff of students, servants, and nurses who had flocked into the ward, it is impossible to say, but suddenly someone fell against the door, burst it open, and entered.

It was a woman, slight and frail, with the red cross on her arm, and on her brow and cheek a replica of the cross in her own blood, flowing from the gash a well-directed flint had made.

She placed herself against the door and held it closed.

"Listen," she said. "If you leave the patients you yourselves are doomed. Carry them with you, let the people see them living or dead, let them only see their bodies, and you may pass. I say may; it is only a chance, but it is the only one. Attempt to pass without them and I tell you you will be cut to pieces. Arkalich is in the court-yard, and they have ripped his heart out. Quick! Bring the stretchers."

As she spoke she moved to the bedside of the nearest patient, and commenced to wrap his blanket round him.

"Two only to each stretcher," she cried again. "Two and a patient may pass, three will not. If we have not enough stretchers take the rest, head and feet, in their blankets as far as our numbers go. We shall not be allowed to return. The crowd must save the others."

There were women there tearing off their linen caps and the red cross from off their arms. That sign—to which the veriest pagans have paid homage as to a symbol of mercy—was discarded by them as though it had been some badge of iniquity. But the pale, frail Englishwoman still wore hers.

The last couple had snatched a patient, and she was left the odd number.

She looked round her. Dense volumes of smoke were rolling in through the door. She caught sight of a youth of some twelve years as high as her own shoulder.

"Come," she said, "I may carry you at least half-way."

She braced herself up, and, with the lad's feet trailing, staggered to the door. The mob were surging in, and someone taller, fairer, and better clad than the ragged rabble, passed her, touching her shoulder.

"O God!" she cried. "How like. I must be mad!"

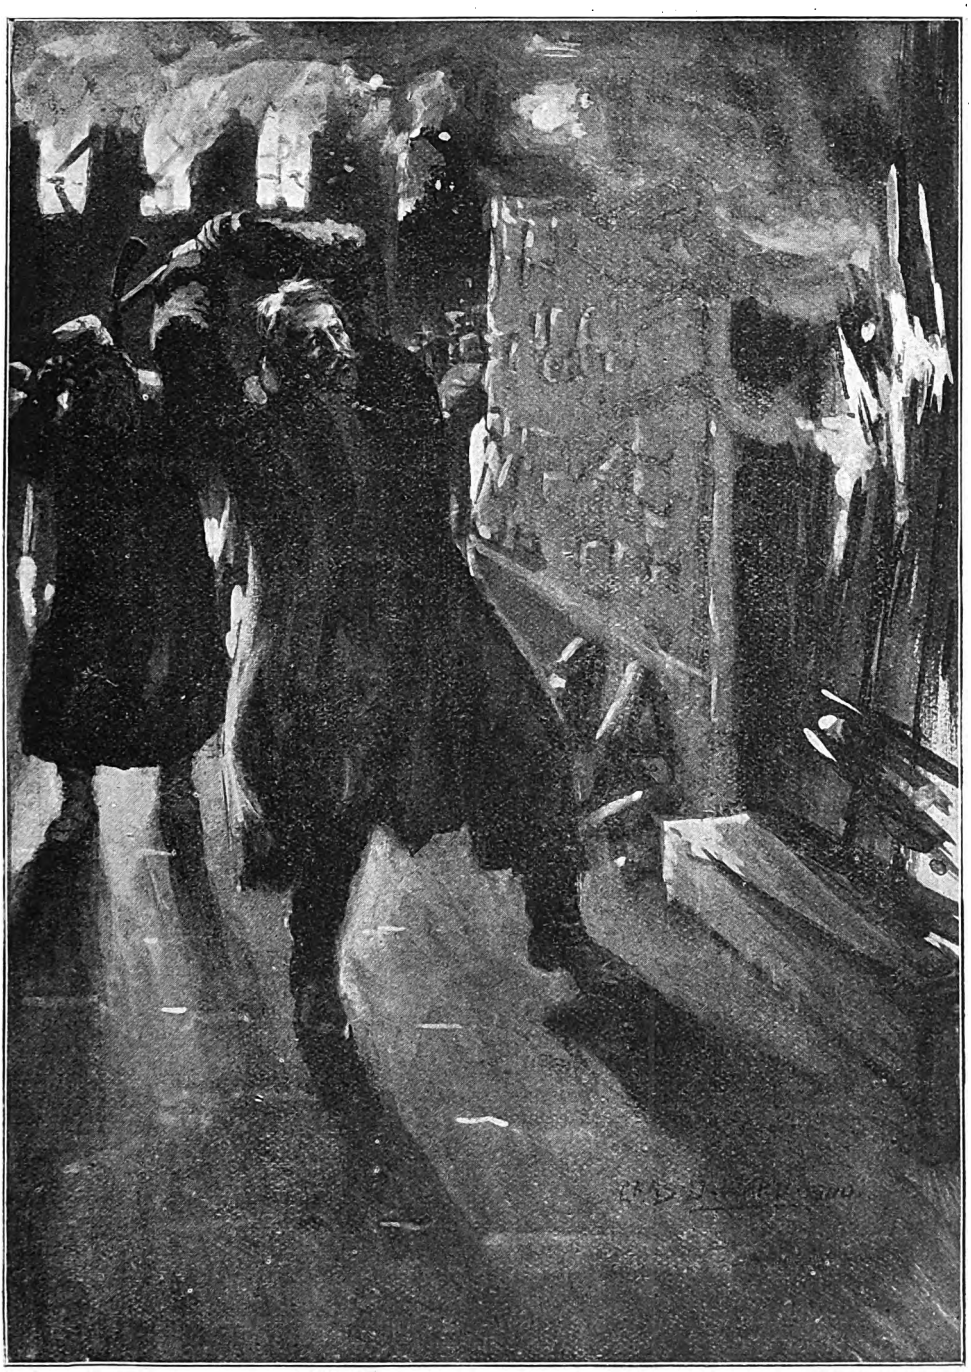
Then the boy was snatched from her arms, a fierce voice cried: "Ah, witch, I know you! This is the she-devil who stole my wife just now." A heavy fist struck her temple and she knew no more.

Into the hurly-burly of fighting, struggling peasants and shrieking patients Francis Osborne made his way, followed by Ivanovitch the faithful, as far as the foot of the staircase. He understood nothing, knew nothing, but that the hospital was on fire, and that hapless creatures were lying there to be roasted to death if help were not forthcoming.

Through the dense smoke, directed more by ear than eye, he groped his way to the nearest bed, caught up a living burden, and made his way out; for his quick perceptions showed him that the ward was well alight in two places, and that the flames could not be battled with yet awhile.

He was surprised that it should be so, but never imagined that the catastrophe was the work of an incendiary, till, crossing the courtyard to take the poor wretch he had rescued to the shelter of a distant outhouse, he stumbled over something on the cobble stones, and paused to look down on it. The sight he saw in the red glare of the conflagration was one that will haunt him in dreams for many a year; such a sight as no pen can describe with propriety; the mutilated body of the murdered Dr. Arkalich.

Digitized by Google



IN A FEW MOMENTS THE DOOR GAVE WAY.

Some of the crowd, seeing him stagger, caught the sick man from his arms, and bore him away.

Digitized by Google

"O God! Whose work is this?" he cried.

"Theirs, Excellency, theirs," answered a voice at his elbow. "They are killing the doctors and the nurses. Come away; come away."

"The nurses! The women! Have they touched the women?"

"Who knows what they have done? Ah! Your coat, your beautiful coat, it is ruined. Excellency, I will buy it of you for half a rouble. Faith! I will give half a rouble and ten kopeks — twenty kopeks. No, I will give you a rouble" (about three shillings English money), "but it must not be further damaged. Excellency, have a care, and remember that you owe me four days' wages."

Poor Ivanovitch fell with a groan of disappointed cupidity as his employer tore once again like a madman towards the burning hospital. Of the half-hour that followed Osborne never was able to give a succinct account. It was a wild nightmare of tossing and surging forms; he was in the crowd struggling to reach the primitive and totally inadequate appliances for extinguishing fire; then he was fighting hand to hand over the forms of prostrate members of the staff. He was down, he was bleeding; his clothes torn to shreds; he had tremendous odds against him, yet, with the insular tenacity which sees a foe but does not recognise its overwhelming force, he still fought on, as though he had done nothing else all the days of his life.

Then there was a wild rush of cavalry; the crowd fell away before the advance of the Cossack guard. He was among the horses; he faced about to escape, was caught under the armpit and borne along, now on his feet, now trailing on the ground, till a halt was called, and he found himself standing among half a score of similarly rescued Slavs.

"The women! The women!" he shrieked, gazing round him with bloodshot eyes. "One in the hospital was mine; mine; an Englishwoman. Where is she?"

"The English nurse? The English sister? Who has seen her?" The men gazed from one to another; and then one whom Osborne had dragged on to his feet in the first wild mêlée, said, in an awe-struck whisper, "I saw her in the crowd, and they dragged her to the ovens."

"The ovens! Where?"

The man pointed to the mortuary and the adjoining chamber, the windows of which were already emitting flames.

With a yell that seemed to come rather from a demon's throat than his own, Osborne rushed across the square, threw himself against the door of the out-house, and found it locked.

"Quick! A beam! A hatchet!"

A student who had snatched a small pick from the coalhouse, and used it to defend himself, thrust it into Osborne's hand, and in a few moments the door gave way. Dense clouds of smoke rushed out to greet him; in the interior he could see nothing. He threw himself down on his hands and knees, and crawled along the stone floor, feeling his way. Ah, God! His hand touched something; a woman's gown, a silent form.

He did not dare to rise, for he had been some seconds finding her, and the smoke was already overpowering him; but still on hands and knees, that he might have the benefit of the clearer air near the ground, he caught her gown firmly in his teeth and dragged her to the door.

Out in the open the red glow fell upon the fair scorched tresses, the scarred forehead, and the pale closed lids of Eva Rayne. He bent over her in an agony of despair.

"Eva! Eva, my beloved! O God, spare her to me; spare her! I have borne so much."

The pale lids quivered, the great eyes opened and looked into his own; and her voice, faint and far away as though it came from some spirit world, murmured:

"Frank! Dear Frank! Oh, I thought I was in hell, but this is heaven."

He caught her in his arms and strained her to his heart. It seemed to him that in that one half-hour in which he thought her murdered, he had suffered more than he had borne for Helga's sake in all these eighteen months. His bearded lips sought hers; he had never kissed her before save on the cheek and brow; but even as he stooped the rising wind blew a hot gust from the furnace into his face, and with it came a whisper from the past. "Love if you can, or dare; you will but find my kisses on other lips."

CHAPTER XVII.

On a broad green mead near a stream, itself a tributary of Shakspere's Avon, a mixed party of youths and maidens, with their more sedate guardians, were gathered together for that rural form of gaiety entitled a picnic. Tea was in active preparation, and while the youngsters busied themselves over the matter and enjoyed each other's blunders, two of the party, both middle-aged ladies, sat apart, busied in an occupation as appropriate as the tea-making itself. In other words they were talking scandal.

Digitized by Google

"If half what people say is true, Mrs. Gunter," remarked the younger of the two women, a pale, colourless, fragile matron, "it is enough to make his father, the judge, turn in his grave."

The person addressed, whom the reader met before, when she was filling the post of society stop-gap in Paris, shook her head mysteriously and answered:

"It has always been my opinion, my dear, that Francis Osborne's troubles on the Continent unsettled his brain. There is no smoke without flame, you know; and I can testify that very few people know half that goes on in that house. I have always entertained a sincere regard for Maria Osborne, his sister, who was an old school friend of my own, but I can't close my eyes to what I consider her culpable weakness in permitting such a state of things."

"You know the family better than we do, of course," murmured Mrs. Trevor, the colourless lady. "Our acquaintance was commenced in Paris, and you know my daughter Diana is so impulsive, she fell in love with Miss Rayne then and there. We met again the following autumn at my sister Lady Grove's house; but I had no idea they were to be such near neighbours. They have only been a year at Beverly House, you know; and Mr. Porcher, our neighbour, says that for his part he thinks it has been a year too long."

"Of course; Mr. Osborne only came into possession of the estate on the death of the philanthropist, Miss Wilfred. He was like a son to her, she used to say; and he has taken a much greater fancy to this place than to his late father's, which he has let. I can quite understand Mr. Porcher's disapproval of him, with his queer domestic arrangements and his fads," and Mrs. Gunter's shudder of disapproval shook the camp-stool supporting her not inconsiderable weight, until it creaked again.

"Is he a Socialist, Mrs. Gunter?" demanded Mrs. Trevor, lowering her voice as though fearing to scandalise the pendulous foliage above them. "It would really be dreadful for the head of one of our best families to go over to that lot."

"Well, of course, it may only be a coincidence," whispered Mrs. Gunter, "but Socialists certainly don't believe in the institution of matrimony, and Mr. Osborne doesn't seem likely to get married, that's evident."

"Oh, my dear," cried Mrs. Trevor in alarm, "he is not much more than thirty-three or four, is he? One can hardly say anything on that head yet awhile."

"I don't know," responded Mrs. Gunter. "There are some people who express great surprise at the freedom with which he and Miss Rayne go about together."

Perhaps even she might have held her peace, and spared the world this last sickening piece of venom, but that having had an invitation to spend a week at Beverly House, she had not been asked to extend her visit to a fortnight or to an indefinite period.

Maria Osborne had invited her because she was not well able to help herself; but she had said a week, and she meant a week, and at the end of the week Mrs. Gunter had had to go. In that brief space, however, the worthy woman had feathered another nest for herself; and was now installed as the guest of Francis Osborne's near neighbour, Mrs. Trevor.

The latter was a poor weak piece of conventionality, and Mrs. Gunter—finding that certain domestic innovations, imported from his old home by the new master of the Hall, had startled and offended a certain section of county society—had worked on Mrs. Trevor's easily alarmed nature, and so obtained for herself a footing in her establishment.

"Oh! Good gracious! I never heard a word against Miss Rayne before," ejaculated Mrs. Trevor (and it was certain that no one else had, until Mrs. Gunter evolved an objection from her inner consciousness). "My daughter Di dotes on her as an ideal woman."

"That only shows how careful one ought to be in the selection of friends," remarked Mrs. Gunter; though she failed to explain whether her trite remark applied to the woman of whom they spoke, or to perfidious busybodies like herself.

Digitized by Google

Mrs. Trevor's faded countenance, which had at one time possessed a sort of nondescript kind of prettiness, took on a sort of guilty flush as she looked up at this adipose disciple of the famous Mrs. Grundy.

"They are very near relatives, you know," she suggested, faintly, "and Miss Rayne is Mr. Osborne's ward. In fact, my son and daughter speak of them as being just like brother and sister."

"Diana and Herbert are mere children, Mrs. Trevor; besides, it's all very well to go about like brother and sister, but if Miss Rayne and Mr. Osborne are not brother and sister——"

"Oh, yes, exactly," assented Mrs. Trevor. "I quite admit that; but somehow I've always taken it for granted that it would lead to an engagement."

"It is not Miss Rayne's fault that it has not done so. She has made herself indispensable to him, there's no doubt, by taking up all his fads and all his hobbies. If a woman wants to catch a man they say there is no better way; it's a clear case of 'love me, love my dog,' don't you know?"

"So you don't think Mr. Osborne cares for Miss Rayne in that way?"

"I don't enter into the question of his affections, Mrs. Trevor. He seems very liberal with them. I only said she would not be his wife."

"Ah!" murmured the younger lady. "I seem to recall now that his name was mentioned in conjunction with Lady Emilia Dachet's."

Mrs. Gunter indulged in one of her short unpleasant laughs. Lady Emilia, the exclusive, was no favourite of hers.

"As far as that goes, she was as much to blame as he, for at one time she encouraged him considerably," she said. "I think she was taken with the man's appearance, which is rather prepossessing, I admit, but I tell you, my dear, he can't marry; there's a mystery somewhere, and not a very creditable one either, I should say. He was engaged, or secretly married, or something, three years ago, to a foreign woman in Paris. She disappeared, and he came back in a bad state, and spent a year at home. It was during that time that Lady Emilia made herself conspicuous by the notice she took of him. They say she went to Russia to visit her sister, the Princess Benkendorf, just to avoid him, when she found that he had no serious intentions——"

"But he followed her to Russia, Mrs. Gunter," interrupted Mrs. Trevor. "I know he did; and that looks as though he really had meant something after all."

Mrs. Gunter laughed again.

"If Lady Emilia had any such idea, it only shows how easily a woman's vanity may deceive her," she said. "He only went to St. Petersburg to look for that other woman, who had been his wife, or his fiancèe, or something one doesn't care to find a name for. But, in spite of his object, he hadn't principle enough to keep away from her, and the result of his brief visit was the total rupture of an affair of hers with a Russian nobleman of exalted family, with whom she might have made an excellent match."

"Really! How dreadful," sighed Mrs. Trevor.

"You may well say so," replied Mrs. Gunter. "But there—men who hold Mr. Osborne's views are never to be trusted in their intercourse with the opposite sex. Not content with compromising a woman like Lady Emilia, so much his superior from a social standpoint, he seems to have induced his cousin, Miss Rayne, to come out to Russia to relieve the tedium of his stay in that country.

"Oh, no," interposed Mrs. Trevor. "Miss Rayne went out there as a Red Cross Sister. I know that because my own brother, Professor Jonas, assisted her to obtain an appointment."

"But who suggested that she should go out, my dear Mrs. Trevor? Tell me that, pray! I have it on my poor friend Maria's authority that she took up the idea all in a moment immediately after the receipt of a letter from him saying that he was going to be in Russia for some time. It is certainly well known that as soon as he knew where to find her in Russia, he went and joined her at Saratoff. There was some talk of her being ill, or his being ill, I don't know which, but the fact remains they spent a rather considerable time alone together on the Continent before they wrote for Maria to come and join them to take Miss Rayne to some health resort."

"It does seem very shocking, their having been alone on the Continent together so long," said Mrs. Trevor. "But you know what a scare there was about the cholera just then, and it is quite possible, you know, that if one of them couldn't be moved, and Miss Osborne didn't dare to venture out to them, why then——"

Digitized by Google

"There was more in it than that," insisted Mrs. Gunter; "we may rely on it. It quite cured Lady Emilia of her infatuation for him. She is still single, they they say, entirely on his account; but she treats him merely as an acquaintance when they meet, and avoids him as far as possible without giving rise to remark. Besides, if one places the most charitable construction possible on Miss Rayne's Continental escapade, what about her conduct during the last two years since their return? You know she goes everywhere with him, don't you?"

"They have a common circle of acquaintance, haven't they?" suggested Mrs. Trevor, faintly.

"My dear, I don't refer to social functions, of course; there everyone knows their movements. I speak of Mr. Osborne's slumming expeditions. He took the craze up first and went about in London and other great cities with General Booth, Cardinal Manning, and Mr. Sims, the newspaper man. But of late Miss Rayne has been his sole companion.

"Oh, dear me! This Mr. Osborne must be a dreadful person," sighed Mrs. Trevor. "I shall really begin to think that he is a regular sheep in wolf's clothing, that we have all been nurturing in our bosoms."

"That's precisely my opinion," coincided Mrs. Gunter, who, in her spiteful disappointment and chagrin, was not disposed to quarrel with her new patron's rather mixed metaphor. "And now that these things are beginning to be talked about——"

"Talked about? Good gracious!" ejaculated Mrs. Trevor, with the intense horror of a woman who had never had heart or brain enough to think and judge for herself. "Talked about! Well, that settles it. If Miss Rayne is being talked about I really must drop her, and insist on Diana doing the same."

"Are you speaking of Eva Rayne?" demanded a bright young voice. "Do come along, mamma, tea is almost ready."

"Miss Rayne?" interrogated another member of the party, a gushing young lady. "Who is she? Oh, I know, the fair girl at Beverly House, who gets her pictures hung at the Academy. Do tell us something about her cousin, Mr. Osborne, who is always doing such queer things? You and Mr. Trevor are great friends of theirs, aren't you?"

"We should all owe you a deep debt of gratitude, Miss Trevor," interjected a plethoric, purple-visaged gentleman, "if you could give us some useful information about the man. What's he driving at, that's the question?"

"I think we know," answered honest Di, a bonny lass of some eighteen summers; "but Bertie and I"—here she indicated her almost equally youthful brother—"are hardly clever enough to explain it to you."

"Is he a red-hot revolutionist, or what?" demanded Mr. Porcher.

"I think reformer, not revolutionist, is the better name for him," Di interrupted. "He has seen a great deal, and has had, I sometimes fancy, some sort of painful experience, which makes him mistrust any attempt to fly to extremes, but——"

"Excuse me, my dear young lady," exclaimed Mr. Porcher, shaking a fat forefinger argumentatively, "we don't want to find out what he is not. We know, unfortunately, that he is not many things we should like to see him. What is he, that's the question?"

"A very good and generous man, I should say," replied Di, softly. "A very strange man, too, most likely because he feels deeply himself and has strong convictions, yet admits the possibility of his being sometimes in error."

"He is very fortunate in having such a champion," sneered a thin individual in clerical garb.

"Oh, really!" expostulated Mrs. Trevor. "I'm sure my daughter doesn't wish to pose in any way——"

"Of course not, mamma. Mr. Osborne is quite capable of taking care of himself," interupted Di, her colour rising as she flashed an indignant glance at the Roman-nosed vicar.

"I fear," remarked Mr. Porcher, expanding his chest till his watch-chain rose as on a billow, "that even your charming daughter, acting as Mr. Osborne's mouth-piece, could not succeed in making some of his nauseous opinions palatable, Mrs. Trevor."

Digitized by Google

"I don't think he has ever expounded any of them to us," the girl replied, slyly; "though he has talked to Bertie and me often of the many wrongs there are to be redressed, the many false ideas and cruel codes to be swept away. We call him Mr. Greatheart, and think that the name fits him well,"

"Humph! Ah, yes," responded the vicar. "He has done good work, we'll admit, in Russia for instance, among the cholera-stricken peasants and so on; but here in England, where we have—er—a constitution and—er—I may say a Church and State, Mr. Porcher, intent on the welfare of——"

"Itself," interjected young Bertie Trevor sotto voce.

"I was about to say of the community in general," continued the vicar, with a heavy frown at Bertie, who immediately retired behind a vivid blush. "Such interference is out of place."

"Oh, do go on, Di," exclaimed Miss Lane, the gushing young lady, who dreaded, above all things, a dissertation more political than personal. "Did he go to Russia lately and get into trouble? I've heard that he did."

"He certainly went," replied Di, "a short time before he came to live here; and many of the London papers spoke highly of him and his adventures and what he did there."

"With a certain set anything he could do would be considered right," Mrs. Gunter remarked, cynically. "But there are some people who think that his romantic errand to St. Petersburg was purely personal."

There was nothing invidious in the mere statement she made, for to any man a personal motive may be allowed as not being in itself unworthy because personal; but, in the way she made it, it distinctly conveyed the idea that Francis Osborne's mission would not bear the light of day.

"It was personal," said Di. "I don't think he has any reason to make a secret of the fact, though he doesn't care to discuss it. Bertie and I happen to know the truth about it because he was talking to us once about Russian matters generally, and we asked about his travels there, and he was very much——"

"Cut up," said Bertie, who generally backed his sister up with monosyllables when he could find them, and with many nods and approving glances when he could not.

"Yes," continued Di, "he told us that he went there at first with no fixed plan in his head, such as he afterwards carried out among the sick and suffering, but simply and solely because he knew that St. Petersburg was in a ferment, that some outrage on the Czar was premeditated, and feared that someone in whom he was interested might be implicated in the plot. His object was to prevent a crime, I think," she added in a lower voice. "For if he had found this particular person in the Russian capital at that time he would have known that there was grave danger."

"A very romantic story indeed," from the vicar.

"Oh, quite delicious!" from Miss Lane, who did not catch the sarcasm, as her eye was now on the now nearly boiling urn. "Did he find the person? Is it true that he followed a train of convicts and found his friend dying?"

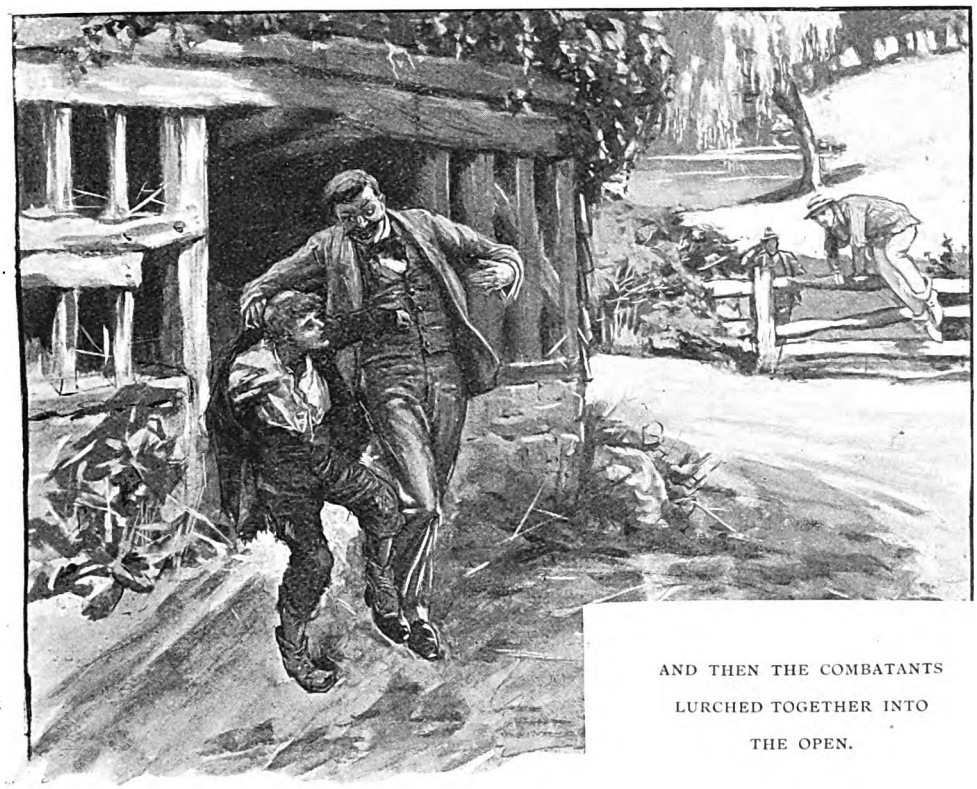
"I believe he followed the train of some unfortunates who had departed before his arrival, under the impression that the person he was seeking was among them. But it was a mistake; and the sights he saw, and the hardships he underwent——"

"Knocked him all into a cocked hat," interjected Bertie, coming in at the critical moment, just in time to cover the fact that his sister's sympathetic voice quavered a little.

"All that kind of thing is very entertaining, no doubt," said Mr. Porcher, "but in this country, as there are no convict trains and no—no hardships, it would be a satisfaction to us if Osborne would come out and let us have his views before continuing on his present mad course, which is certain to make the lower classes round him dissatisfied with their position. If he is a Socialist, why doesn't he wear a red necktie and call himself so at once?"

"We asked him what he called himself, didn't we, Bertie?" said Di. "His answer was just like himself, frank and straightforward. 'I should wish,' he said, 'to keep my sympathies too broad for any name to cover them. I call myself nothing; I leave that to my neighbours, they have a rather large selection, I daresay,' and when he had laughed at himself and us, he added gravely that, in spite of all he had seen, or rather because he had seen so much, his one desire was like Goethe's dying request: 'More light.'"

Digitized by Google



AND THEN THE COMBATANTS LURCHED TOGETHER INTO THE OPEN.

"Meanwhile," said Mr. Porcher, stirring the tea he had just received so violently that Miss Lane pulled her skirts away in haste—"meanwhile he is giving donations to men on strike one day, urging other men not to come out the next and —and generally making such an exhibition of himself that one does not know what to think of him, except that he is quite unfit for the society of county magnates, and of no earthly use to any respectable party."

Here Bertie, who had been busily handing cups of tea, waved his own particular allowance in the air, and dug the following classical quotation (probably from the liberetto of some pantomine) out of himself in jerks:

"If some fellows thought less about their party—and more about the nation, Affairs would not get into such a botheration."

The vicar turned his eye-glasses full on the luckless youth; Mr. Porcher uttered the angry exclamation; "Upon my soul!"—but before he could get any further with his remonstrance, a loud cry from an adjoining barn drew the attention of the entire party in another direction.

"Oh, dear me! I'm afraid it's a party of tramps. I'm sure they are fighting," exclaimed Mrs. Trevor. "Somebody will be killed; I know it. Oh! Why are tramps allowed to come about? Mrs. Gunter—Mr. Porcher—do, somebody, go and stop them. Tell them they mustn't, they really mustn't upset people so."

"Here's a go!" exclaimed her son, who it somewhat slow of speech, was lithe and active of limb, and had bounded over the fence which separated the public land, on on which the party had pitched its temporary tent, from Beverly Park.

"It's a little shaver, and that Frenchman, what's his name, who is staying with Mr. Osborne. Come on, Di, here's a lark!"

"Le' me go, will yer? I didn't go fer to do no 'arm, and I 'ain't done none. Le' me go, d'yer 'ear?"

"What you do yere, you villain child? Eh? Say then what you come for, eh?"

The rustling and tumbling noise within the barn here culminated in a heavy thud against its side; and then the two combatants (the hand of one on the collar ot the other) lurched together into the open.

Digitized by Google

They were certainly ill-matched in point of size, for the first speaker was a youth who might have been any age between overgrown twelve and under-developed sixteen. His antagonist and captor was a middle-aged Frenchman. But, in spite of his superior height, weight and strength he had his work cut out for him, for the boy struggled, ducked, and squirmed in his grasp, and showed his milk-white teeth, too, like a weasel.

"Tuck in your twopenny and butt him in the bread-basket!" suggested Bertie, who, though very sportsmanlike as a rule, apparently thought that the Queensberry rules did not apply in this case.

"What were you up to yerself? You ain't got no more right there than me. I haven't took nothing, have I? I sp'iled yer little game, did I? Le' go, or I'll bite yer; fer two pins, I will!"

"Mesdames et messieurs, I demand pardon. I not think to disturb a pique-nique. I find this little vaurien in the barn of my friend, Osborne, and I bring him out," apologised the Frenchman, letting go his hold of the boy to wave his excuses with outstretched palms; while the urchin, abashed by the assemblage of men and dames, hitched his ragged coat again into position, and stood still at last.

"Boy, come here!" said Mr. Porcher, severely, creating himself spokesman of the party, in view of his right to append J.P. to his name. "Don't you know that you had no right to be in that barn?"

"I wasn't doing any harm, sir," replied the boy.

"That may be your opinion," retorted Mr. Porcher; "but you must know, my lad, or we shall have to teach you, that everyone who breaks the law does harm. You were trespassing on private ground, in the first glace; you were concealed in a building or erection devoted to—er—private agricultural purposes. Now, how are we to know that you were not lurking on those premises with intent to commit a felony?"

"I dunno, sir," was the boy's vague response, as he pulled his ragged cap off, and began twisting it nervously in his hands.

"Don't be flippant!" cried Mr. Porcher, sternly. "Mark my words, sir; don't be flippant. This gentleman," bowing to the Frenchman, "very wisely and properly ejected you ——"

"He tore my coat and shook me, and tre't' me worse ner a dawg," interjected the boy. "That's what he done, sir."

"He ejected you. Now, why did you go into that barn, where you had no earthly right to be? Don't try to evade the question. I am a Justice of the Peace, and I can commit you to the lock-up, if I like."

The boy began to whimper, and Di, laying her hand on his shoulder, said:

"Don't you think we had better send for Mr. Osborne? If the boy has done any damage, he will be able to judge—"

"Be quiet, Di, I insist—I beg!" cried Mrs. Trevor. "The boy may be a dangerous character. Leave it to Mr. Porcher and Mr. Lechlade, do."

"I'm afraid," whispered the vicar in the J.P.'s ear, "that no action for trespass or wilful damage could lie, unless Osborne would prosecute; and he certainly won't. Better let the youth go with a warning."

The mention of Osborne, however, was like a red rag to a bull. Mr. Porcher expanded in his just wrath.

"It's not a question of Osborne's views, I take it, Mr. Lechlade," he answered. "His house is already becoming known as a centre for tramps and vagabonds for miles around. There are, I suppose, other mansions in the vicinity to be considered. The lad appears to me a truculent young ruffian. What's he doing here? What are you doing here, you, boy—eh?

The boy opened his mouth to repeat the stereotyped excuse that he was doing no harm; but remembering the former caution, substituted the following:

"I was done up, sir, I was, and I sees the barn door a-standing open, and I just walks in and lies down for a bit; and he comes in and he collars me, and pulls me abart."

"Ah! Now we are coming to it. You saw the barn door open and you walked in. I suppose, if you were to see my hall door open, you would think you had a right to walk in? You are a tramp, aren't you?"

"No, I ain't a tramp, sir," objected the boy.

"Oh! Do you mean to assert that you belong to these parts?"

"I'm from Lundin, sir."

"Oh, you're from London. Did you come here by rail?"

"No, sir."

Digitized by Google

"By coach, carrier, or private conveyance, then?"

"Please, sir, I walked."

"Exactly. You walked. Now, how can you say that you are not a tramp?"

The boy had evidently a strong objection to the term; but he was not equal to the task of extricating himself from the cul de sac of Mr. Porcher's logic. He hung his head, and his young face assumed a dogged, sullen expression.

"Come, come!" said the vicar. "You mustn't show a bad spirit, my boy. We are questioning you for your own good. You must try and give some satisfactory account of yourself."

"I can't," said the boy. "He collars me for nuthin'," indicating the Frenchman, "and he calls me a tramp, and——"

The rest of the sentence ended in a whimper, choked back by his ragged cap.

"Come," said Di, her little hand tapping the lad's arm, "speak up, my man." Then she added, in a kindly whisper: "Tell them who you are, where you are from, and where you're going."

"My name's Blake," the boy said, "James Blake, and I'm from Lundin. That is, I belongs there; I've come from Evesham now."

"You come from London and Evesham, and you've got here, but you are not a tramp. Now, my boy, be careful. What took you to Evesham? What brought you on from there here? How do you live?"

"Ah, my little friend, you shall tell us that," said the Frenchman, who had been silent so far, regarding the captive of his prowess with no favourable glance. "You shall answer now, though you not tell me what you do in the barn."

"What does he want to put his spoke in fer?" demanded James Blake, who, though awed by Mr. Porcher and Mr. Lechlade—whose authority and importance he could understand—declined to be polite and servile to the foreigner. "He ain't got nuthink to do with it. I couldn't get work in Lundin, and I come out to look for my uncle, a gardener what used to grow

TURNED UP THE STRAW ON WHICH JIM BLAKE HAD THOUGHT TO FIND A NIGHT'S REST.

Digitized by Google

apples for Cuvint Gardin. And I couldn't find 'im, and I come on here a-looking for work, and—and I was tired, and done up, and I dunno why everyone should go agin me," and an unmistakable sob this time found its way into the lining of his ragged cap.

"No visible means of support, that's very evident," said Mr. Porcher.

"I seem to have heard that story about looking for a relative before," mused Mr. Lechlade. "It's an old dodge. Where was it your intention to go to-night, my boy?"

"I wasn't goin' nowhere."

"People mustn't sleep on private premises, you know," remonstrated the vicar. "You'd better beg this gentleman's pardon," indicating the foreigner, "and then perhaps Mr. Porcher will let you go if you promise to go to the casual ward and not loiter about the streets. You can call on me at the Vicarage in the morning."

With a sudden twist the boy disengaged himself from Di's detaining hand, and dodged through the circle of listeners.

"I ain't a going to no casual ward," he panted. "I'm not having any. Le'me alone ; I'm off."

He turned to run, and the next minute found his ragged yellow head in contact with a blue tunic. For once in a way a village constable was on the spot when he was wanted.

"Take charge of that youth, Smith ; take charge of him, constable," cried Mr. Porcher, purple with indignation at having been defied. "I strongly suspect he is a bad character."

"I suppose it's all right if I've your authority, sir," said police-constable Smith, twisting his knuckles into the boy's coat-collar in such a businesslike way that he stood still at once, abandoning all hope. "How shall I enter it, sir?"

"Wandering without visible means of support, of course. I will call and see the inspector presently. Take him away now."

Then Mr. Porcher turned smiling to the Frenchman. "You have shown a very agreeable sympathy for our institutions, sir," he said. "There is nothing of higher national importance than the suppression of vagabondage. You are, I presume, Monsieur Durand, the gifted electrician of whom we have all heard? Let me present you to Mrs. Trevor, our kind hostess on this occasion. I am sure she will be happy to offer you a cup of tea."

The introductions were over before the sound of Jim Blake's sobbing had died away in the distance. Di's face was red, her eyes rebellious, as she took her place again at the urn, but she managed to whisper across the cups as she handed them to her brother :

"Go and tell Mr. Osborne."

And he managed, on his return round, to whisper back :

"Rather! You bet I will."

Monsieur Durand made himself excessively amiable, and though his English was fragmentary, his conversation was much enjoyed, and the tea, though not quite as hot as it might have been, having been done justice to, the party melted away.

Jim Blake had answered many questions, but no one had thought of demanding an answer to the question he had asked of the foreigner. No one had noticed his remark : "I sp'iled yer little game, didn't I?" Yet there must have been something in it, for after the picnic ground was deserted the Frenchman, stooping in his walk as was habitual with him, his face thrust forward and his keen eyes glancing furtively in every direction, returned to the barn from which he had ejected the intruder, turned up the straw on which Jim Blake had thought to find a night's rest, and gazed with satisfaction at a tiny case of tools concealed beneath a plank, which he had lifted and now carefully replaced after assuring himself that nothing was disturbed.

Though concealed so carefully they were not burglars' tools, but possibly they were none the less illegal and more deadly.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

CHRIST'S COLLEGE, BLACKHEATH.

By A. P. EASTON.

A FREE Church College — it is a wide term, and it means a lot! It means that an institution which can claim so honourable a name is a part of the visible life of that great combination of Evangelical Christianity which has come to be known amongst us as the Free Churches. It means, too, that the institution which may by right claim for itself such a name is supplying for the sons of Free Churchmen that foundation in learning which is essential to the upholding of the traditions of the combination to which they belong, and that such an institution has responsibilities as vast as they are sacred, as vital as they are glorious. Of the particular Free Church College with which we are dealing it may indeed be said that its title is no empty one. Ever since the establishment of Christ's College, Blackheath, six and a half years ago, the chief aim of its principal, the Rev. F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc., has been to make it not only a scholastic institution of high standing, but also a veritable nursery of the Christian faith. While never losing sight of the great importance of an adequate training to fit his pupils for the struggle of life, Mr. Aveling has conducted his labours on the principle that no mental equipment, however great, however varied, can be complete or effective unless it is strengthened and leavened by the influence of religion. That he has not been mistaken in his conception of the responsibilities which rest upon him as the head of an important college such as this, is proved by the splendid success to which he and his assistants can point in every direction of study. The motto of his school, "Nihil sine Deo," is eloquent of this spirit, and many a boy bears in his mind to help him on life's way the memory of these words and of the interpretation which they have received and do receive in the life and practice of Mr. Aveling.

Christ's College was, as we have already intimated, established in the year 1894. The educational principle upon which its constitution was based was a strict attention to the requirements of the day—modernity, in fact, was its guiding light. Mr. Aveling does not desire, has not desired, to compete with the older classical schools in the teaching of the "dead" languages, but to modern languages and to the scientific knowledge which is so important an educational asset in these days his attention has been continually devoted. The college itself, of which an illustration is given, is built upon a splendid site facing the Heath, and its healthy situation and surroundings are further improved by the possession of spacious grounds, which include a splendid playing-field for football and cricket, tennis lawns, a chestnut and lime tree avenue, as well as a fine playground. The school itself is divided into two houses, the smaller of which is mainly given over to science. In this house there are no less than five chemical laboratories and a science classroom, and the subjects here taught are always made most attractive and interesting. Fully thirty of the boys learn extra practical chemistry, while all learn chemistry. Perhaps the best indication of the character of the education given and the aspirations of the masters and the pupils is to be found in the pass-list of the College. Glancing at that list we see that the College can claim passes in the Final B.A., London, the Inter B.Sc. and Matriculation, to say nothing of the College of Preceptors and the Cambridge local examinations.

THE HEAD MASTER—REV. F. W. AVELING, M.A., B.SC.

Digitized by Google

THE SCHOOL CHAPEL.

Modern languages—French and German—form a very important part of the curriculum, and it is noteworthy that Greek is only taught to pupils who are working with the intention of entering Oxford or Cambridge, although Mr. Aveling is himself the author of a well known and widely appreciated work on Greek Syntax. In French and German, however, the school is particularly strong, and many boys are turned out who have not only an efficient grammatical knowledge of these languages but are also capable of passing stiff oral examinations such as test the powers of many older boys from other schools. Of the staff which works under Mr. Aveling it is impossible to speak too highly. It consists of six undermasters, all University men, and all fully qualified by experience to undertake the educational charge of classes. In addition to these, however, there is a large visiting staff, the labours of whom are devoted mostly to musical training, which is a distinct feature of the curriculum. This year it may be mentioned that four scholars passed the examination of the Associated Board of Music, one with distinction.

So much for the actual school lessons, if the term may be used. The headmaster and his assistants do not believe that education begins and ends in class tuition. They believe in the education of the playing-field and of the gymnasium. As one of them said quite recently, they "believe in pluck," and to their influence is to be attributed the splendid tone of the school, the absence of priggishness, the predominance of manliness. In athletics the school is, for its size and age, a wonder. To have beaten at Rugby the champions of Christ's Hospital eight times out of eleven is a performance of which any school might well be proud, and it is an achievement worthy to rank in glory with having beaten, as the Christ's College fifteen has done, the King's College School and University College School. At cricket the College is the possessor of a good eleven, and at tennis, and other less popular games, it has its good players. Athletics form a part of the education of the boy of to-day; they are essential to health and strength, alike of mind and body, and in devoting attention to them the headmaster of Christ's College is following faithfully in the footsteps of the greatest pedagogues of the century. The school does not possess a cadet corps—for boys Mr. Aveling does not like such things—but the scholars do not suffer thereby.

Digitized by Google

THE COLLEGE FROM THE HEATH.

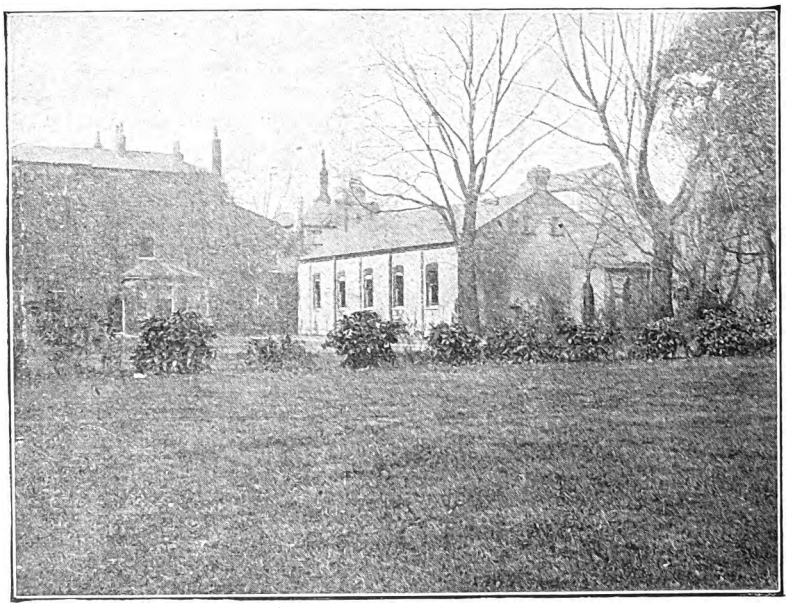
There is the other side of the school life and work upon which we have yet to touch—the religious side. Christ's is provided with a very pretty little chapel, on the stained glass memorial window in which the motto "Nihil sine Deo" stands out bold and challenging. Mr. Aveling is himself the spiritual guide of the boys. It is he who talks to them at a quiet Bible class on Sunday afternoons; he who teaches them to be brave and manly and truthful. He does not seek to mould their religious opinions—only their characters; nor does he seek to usurp the ordinary ministrations of the Sabbath. On Sunday mornings and evenings the Free Church lads troop to hear the Congregational Minister, Mr. Fotheringham, M.A., at the Blackheath Congregational Church, while the lads who belong to the Anglican communion — and there are several—listen to the Rev. J. Leek, M.A., the vicar.

Such is the life of Christ's College, and it is a life which must bear good fruit. It may be interesting to say a few words about the career of the "head" who has made the College so brilliant a success. Mr. Aveling was born in London and in 1863 went as a pupil to the Independent College, Taunton. Here he did splendid work, and in 1867 matriculated at London with the third exhibition in honours. He obtained the entrance exhibition to University College, London, a year later, took double honours at the first B.A. examination in London and honours in logic and philosophy. He also secured an exhibition at Lincoln College, Oxford, and took his M.A. in 1871. In 1880 he returned, when only 29 years old, to the Independent College, Taunton, as its principal, an achievement which can rarely find its equal in scholastic history. The same success which had attended him in his studies followed him to Taunton and he was beloved by the boys and trusted by the managers beyond other men. Of the splendid work he has done since he came to Blackheath enough has been said to show the sort of man the scholars of Christ's College have over them. As a politician Mr. Aveling is lucid and outspoken, and not afraid of declaring his faith and his opinions. It is this spirit which has made him so popular among residents of all shades of opinion in Blackheath, and has gained him the confidence of his boys. Mrs. Aveling is a lady who is well suited to the task of superintending the home life of the boys, and few can estimate what an influence for good amongst them she is, or how much she contributes to the formation of character which is one of the aims of the school. Mr. Aveling is proud, as any master might well be, of the results of his six years' labour at Blackheath, and the evidence afforded of the benefits of his experience and guidance to the boys. He is a strong educationalist and is on the Committee of the U. E. Association, to which society he recently gave a speech on Training Colleges for Teachers at Newcastle. He has written widely and well, his works ranging from a dissertation on "Free Trade" to a Greek Syntax, and covering, too, a good deal of political ground. Christ's College has, under his headship, a future before it. Free Churchmen may depend that as long as Mr. Aveling is headmaster its aims will not be modified or its standard of excellence reduced.

A CLASS ROOM.

Digitized by Google



BACK VIEW OF THE SCHOOL AND RECREATION GROUND.

A. P. EASTON.

Digitized by Google

In the Public Eye

Men and Women who are Helping to Make the World Brighter and Better.

THE "Enterprise" is the latest club dedicated solely to the use of women engaged in clerical work in London. It owes its origin and success to Miss Mabel Morgan and Miss Evelyn Wills. They recognised that the great need of women employed in offices was to have some place where they could go and rest, see their friends, and have food at a moderate rate. Rooms were taken at 52, King William-street, the preliminary expenses were advanced by Miss Morgan and other friends, but now the club is self-supporting. Over one hundred members joined, which soon increased to two hundred. The fee is 10s. a year; there is a rowing club, holiday and insurance fund, and a registry office. During the winter book and flower teas are held, also concerts, while picnics and cycle rides take their place in summer.

MISS EVELYN WILLS.
(Joint Founder with Miss Morgan of "The Enterprise" Ladies' Club.)
Photograph by Langfier, Ltd., 23a, Old Bond Street.

"ART is long and time is fleeting," sings the American poet. It is only sixteen years since Mr. Joseph Pennell, the American artist, came to England, and during that time he has made a name for himself in art and literature. Highly trained, industrious, going direct to his objects with gifts of sight and hand, who does not remember his sketch of the Houses of Parliament by Night, taken from near the Broad Sanctuary (the police inclined to arrest him for taking it), the sketch of Charing-cross Station on the Underground, the Devils of Nôtre Dame, the pictures of the Jews of Transylvania, and the gipsies of Hungary? He has illustrated articles on travel in picturesque places; cycle rides in England, Italy, and Transylvania; and Macmillan's series of "Highways and Byways." A light touch, an artist's eye, and a genius for producing natural effects make most of his sketches bright, realistic, and striking. His more serious works on "Pen Drawing and Draughtsmen," "Lithography and Lithographers," have given him a sure and a high place in the art world. He is now in the front rank of black and white artists, and his position is acknowledged in America as well as on the Continent and in England.

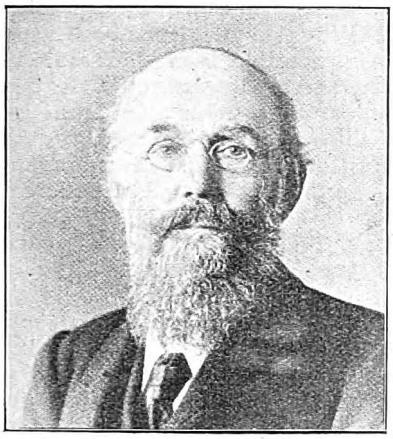
Digitized by Google

ONE of the most courageous, yet, withal, the most genial, of the controversialists who are now carrying on the great argument of Evangelical versus Ritualistic tendencies in the Church of England on the Evangelical side is the venerable Canon Christopher, Rector of St. Aldate's, Oxford. In 1843 he formed one of the crew of the Jesus College (Cambridge) boat, and, as a member of the Cambridge eleven, paid his first visit to Oxford for the purpose of playing in the inter-University cricket match. As he graduated as nineteenth wrangler that same year, Canon Christopher was early "in the public eye." Principal of La Martinière, Calcutta, in 1844, he had among his distinguished pupils a second wrangler at his old university, and, as Government examiner in the colleges of the Bengal Residency, he himself came to the front in Indian scholastic circles. Returning to England, and entering the Church, he was appointed Rector of St. Aldate's, Oxford, in 1859, and for well-nigh half a century has exercised a gracious influence upon undergraduate and city life. The "missionary breakfast" at which he entertains a most catholic and representative company is one of the events of the year at Oxford. Canon Christopher, as host on this occasion, has entertained most of the famous Evangelicals of his time. To-day, at a venerable age, he still pursues his parochial duties, and the energy with which he upholds the Protestant faith might shame many a man with half his burden of years.

CANON CHRISTOPHER.
(A Noted Champion of Evangelical Principles.)
Photograph by Sumner, 110, St. Aldate's, Oxford.

A PREACHER of eloquence and power, possessed of a great gift of organisation and fine scholarly attainments, Dr. John Clifford is a pillar not only of his own, the Baptist, Church, but of Nonconformity generally. An unusual distinction fell to him last year, when on the sudden death of the President-elect of the Baptist Union, Dr. Clifford was for a second time called upon to undertake this important office, which he had filled before with such conspicuous success. On him devolved the great task of directing the raising of the Baptist Twentieth Century Fund—a most important addition to the work entailed by his year of office. At least three days a week were required to look efficiently after the work of the Fund alone, a great call on the time of a man who, besides the ordinary work of the Union, had the care of such a church as that at Westbourne Park, with its ever increasing congregation. Dr. Clifford always conducted the Sunday services of his own church, but he found it necessary to give up for the time the week-night services. Much of his pastoral work was necessarily left to the deacons and other prominent members, who, he says, aided him splendidly. No less than nine meetings a week had to be held on behalf of the Fund, and Dr. Clifford has been in all the principal towns of England and Wales, preaching and giving addresses. The gatherings have been very large, and it was a common experience for numbers of would-be auditors to be turned away from lack of accommodation. This was notably the case at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester, and Norwich. Baptists have responded generously to Dr. Clifford's eloquent appeals, and an instance of the way in which he has charmed the money out of his hearers'

Digitized by Google



REV. DR. CLIFFORD.
(Twice President of the Baptist Union.)

pockets comes from Waterfoot, near Manchester. The Chairman had promised to contribute £10 to the fund, but such was the impression produced on the warm-hearted Lancashire folk by the doctor's address that he was actually encored, and the Chairman declared that he would give pound for pound of the amount subscribed by the audience. And now, turning to the doctor's work at home, we find that the record of his Sunday labours is one of unremitting toil on behalf of his people. He is at the church at ten o'clock, and conducts a preliminary service with the various Bible Classes. Then at eleven comes the ordinary morning service. When the Sunday-school superintendent left, Dr. Clifford took over his duties for the time being. He is, at all times, subject to frequent calls from sick members of his flock. One day, while engaged in directing the Sunday-school, he was called away to minister to a dying friend. Then he entertained a number of young people to tea, and at half-past six came the evening service. But his work did not end here, for he then visited another sick person, and reached home at eleven o'clock; and this is only a typical Sunday. Dr. Clifford is also a power on the London School Board, and is a most strenuous opponent of sectarian teaching in the schools. We have spoken of his attainments as a scholar, and his academical distinctions include the London M.A., L.L.B., and B.Sc. degrees, all with honours, so that he is one of the most learned of Nonconformist ministers to-day.

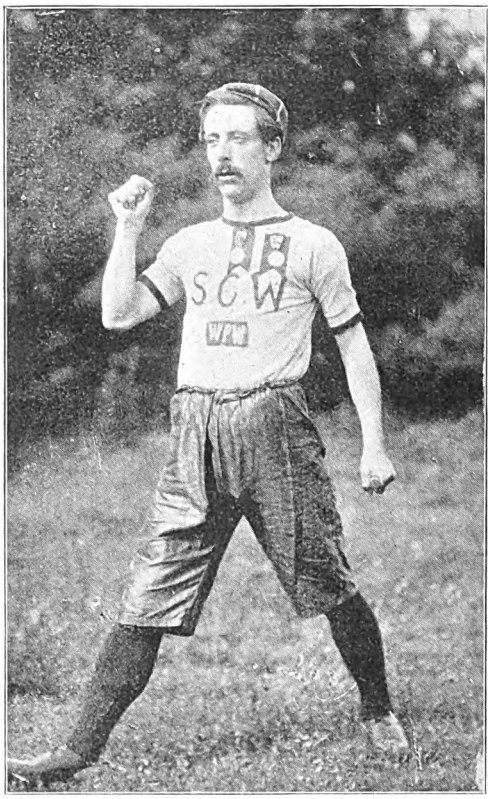
IN Mrs. Jenness Miller of Washington, America possesses a devoted and enthusiastic teacher of the science of healthful living and development. Her creed is that the laws which lie at the foundation of growth and health are the same which evolve the highest personal beauty and attractiveness. They are the divine laws—and to obey them is divine. Mrs. Miller has travelled through many countries in making her researches on the subject of rational physical culture and improvement in dress, and the Jenness Miller publications on these co-related themes are encyclopædian in their special information. As a lecturer on these subjects she is equally well-known, and many exquisitely fitting and comfortable articles of attire in America have been named after this energetic advocate for health, grace, and freedom of movement in dress. Mrs. Miller considers that the profession of wife and mother requires more good judgment and general knowledge than any other, and that every woman who enters upon a domestic career should study the laws of heredity, physiology,

MRS. JENNESS MILLER.
(The Advocate of Physical Culture and Suitable Dress for Women.)
Photograph by the Falk Studio, Waldorf, Astoria, N.Y.

Digitized by Google

sanitation, physical development, and the chemistry of cookery—that these are the everyday sciences which lie at the root of individual health and character. Her aim is to teach that woman's mission in the home is from God, and that when she does not guide her children into paths of health and all of the higher virtues she fails in her duty towards Him who entrusts her with the glorious mission of helping human souls along the upward path. Mrs. Miller insists that suitability is the first law of correct clothing. Dresses for all practical occasions should be designed with the two ideas of suitability and convenience in mind, but for occasions of leisure a woman should make herself as beautiful a picture as possible. This many-sided lady has recently published a novel "The Philosopher of Driftwood," which deals with the problem of the marriage relation.

MR. WILLIAM COCKERTON, son of the Rev. Frederick Cockerton, of Limpsfield, Surrey, may be said to have a wonderful power of walking into the affection of others. Given a drunkard at twenty miles distance, Mr. Cockerton will have reached that man in 3 hours 27 minutes and given him a living proof of what a man can do without beer and baccy in the way of walking. Muscular power always commands respect among the working men, so Mr. Cockerton gets ready listeners, although he, very naturally, throws cold water on all they have to say. The Temperance Cause has him heart and body, and everywhere he walks he tries to make acquaintance with and to help those who cannot resist drink. When only eight he began to walk as fast as possible, liking, he said, "to see the trees moving towards me." He "revels" in climbing hills, doing them at the rate of eight miles an hour with ease. Although a professional, he refuses all engagements where he thinks betting is the motive.



MR. W. COCKERTON.
(Athlete and Temperance Advocate.)
Photograph by Benson, Westerham.

FEW people know the full extent of their capabilities until they have put them to the test, and it sometimes happens that a great talent may lie idle for years until some fortuitous circumstance reveals it to its possessor. A notable illustration of this is to be found in the career of Miss Adeline Sargeant, one of the most gifted novelists of our day. Her father was a Wesleyan minister, and as every three years a circuit minister and his family have to move to a new home, Miss Sargeant saw much of English country life. Her father died in 1870, and, in order to keep the home together, Miss Sargeant took a situation as governess. She was then living at Sevenoaks, but her mother did not long survive her husband, and Miss Sargeant repaired to London, where she continued to gain a living by teaching. As yet she had no idea that she possessed a great gift for story writing, but a competition which appeared in the People's Friend, a well-known Scottish journal, was destined to bring forth her latent powers. A prize of £100 was offered for the best story. Miss Sargeant wrote "Jacobi's Wife," and this won the prize. "Jacobi's Wife" is a very striking story, exhibiting great ingenuity of plot. Her next work was "Beyond Recall," and this has been followed by something like a dozen other novels, all exhibiting great power, both in conception and execution.

Digitized by Google

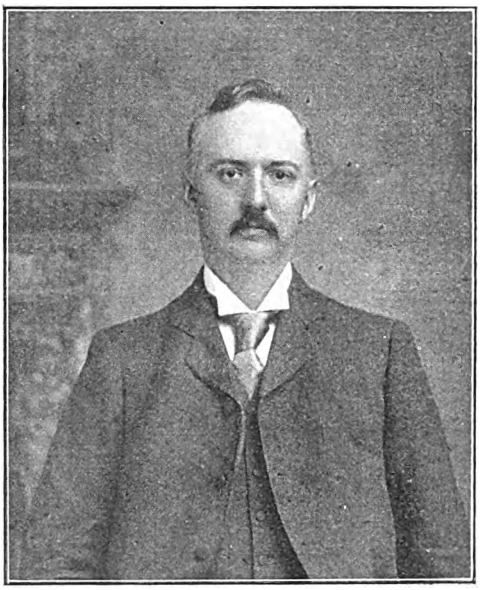
FREDERICK A. ATKINS, the editor of The Young Man, was born in London in February, 1864. He started The Young Man as a small penny monthly when he was twenty-two, and it paid its way from the very beginning. In those days he was editor, advertising manager, and chief contributor. He wrote the leading articles, made out the invoices for advertisements, and addressed the wrappers for the review copies. The third volume contained a serial story by Mr. J. M. Barrie, who was then beginning to make a reputation. It was entitled "The Superfluous Man," and was an admirable piece of work. The following year Mr. Barrie contributed to The Young Man a series of humorous sketches entitled "Young Men I Have Known." The Young Man was afterwards enlarged and published at threepence. When he was twenty-eight Mr. Atkins started The Young Woman, a threepenny monthly which achieved immediate success and which led the way for the numerous ladies' magazines which have since been published. He also started in the same year The Home Messenger, a popular and fully illustrated penny monthly, which had a very large sale, and which is now more successful than ever. In 1894 Mr. Atkins brought out a penny weekly paper entitled The New Age, which was remarkably successful. While it was in his hands the sale was never less than 24,000 a week. When Mr. A. E. Fletcher resigned the Daily Chronicle, Mr. Atkins invited him to become editor of The New Age, and shortly afterwards he sold the paper to a syndicate consisting of Mr. Fletcher and a few personal friends. Two or three years later Mr. Atkins, in conjunction with Mr. Silas Hocking, issued the TEMPLE MAGAZINE, and remained editor for two years. He was urged to continue this work, but he found the management of a sixpenny magazine demanded more time than he could afford, and he wished to devote himself more closely to his three magazines, The Young Man, The Young Woman, and The Home Messenger. He is still greatly interested in the TEMPLE, and



MR. F. A. ATKINS.
(Editor of The Young Man.)
Photograph by Russell & Sons, Baker Street.

rejoices in its ever increasing success. He has written three shilling books for young men—"Moral Muscle," "First Battles and How to Fight Them," and "Aspiration and Achievement." These books have had a sale of over 60,000 copies in England and America. Mr. Atkins has arranged a large number of books for Messrs. Horace Marshall and Son in London, and for Messrs. Thos. G. Crowell and Co. in America. He travelled in America two years ago with his friend, Mr. James Bowden, and visited the principal cities. He has done a large amount of journalistic work, and has contributed at various times to the Manchester Guardian, the Westminster Gazette, the Christian World, the Pall Mall Gazette, and to many American papers. Mr. Atkins has had several books dedicated to him. In a preface to the "Birthright," which takes the form of a letter to Mr. Atkins, Mr. Joseph Hocking writes: "For the sake of our friendship, and because of the many kindnesses I have received from you, I ask you to accept this dedication. Your kindly words and wise counsels have oftentimes been a help and an inspiration to me." Mr. J. A. Hammerton dedicates his book on Barrie to "Frederick Atkins, my ideal Editor, and my very good friend."

Digitized by Google

And Mr. Atkins is proud of his copy of "God's Gentlemen"—a very useful book by Rev. N. E. Welsh (whose early work appeared in The Young Man), which contains this inscription: "To F. A. Atkins —who gave a fellow a chance!—with that fellow's regard." Some years ago Mr. Atkins started the National Anti-Gambling League, which has recently been the means of suppressing certain sporting competitions in newspapers. Mr. Atkins is not yet thirty-seven, but he hopes before long to retire from the editorship of The Young Man and The Young Woman in order to gain time for journalistic work and leisure for a trip round the world. He is married, and lives at Highgate—a few doors from his friend, Mr. Silas Hocking.

THE name of Miss Edith Wilson is rapidly becoming known by the children of the land by reason of her work amongst them. She is the Secretary of the Loyal Temperance Legions in connection with the White Ribbon movement. In America this branch of Temperance work made great headway, and it was a young American lady who introduced its methods into England. Before returning to her own land she induced Miss Wilson to take up the work. Since then it has advanced, and there are legions in many parts of the country as well as in the Metropolis. The methods employed always interest the children and prepare them to become members of "Y" branches afterwards. Miss Wilson is very anxious to extend her work, and says that both public and private schools make good openings, and that some of the most successful legions are in connection with schools. The L.T.L. Secretary is thoroughly in love with her work, and believes it has a great future. There is no class distinction in the ranks, and all children are welcomed. They receive definite temperance teaching, and are also trained for future work by taking office under a grown-up leader. Miss Wilson has prepared some model lessons for the children, and sometimes gives them herself, but throughout all her work she aims at instilling into the minds of her children the meaning of their motto, "Lifting others as we climb."

MISS EDITH WILSON.
(Secretary of the Loyal Temperance Legions.)

MANY and varied are the subjects in which women interest themselves nowadays and one branch of work which has particularly attracted them is "Woman in local government." When the new parish councils were created in 1894, Mrs. E. O. Fordham was one of the pioneers of the movement. She was elected a member of her own local council and has since then devoted much of her spare time to the work. She acted for some time as chairman of an allotments committee and in that position was recognised as a thoroughly good business woman. Mrs. Fordham believes that if women were allowed to sit upon county councils, the women inmates of the asylums and the child inmates of the industrial schools would be greatly benefited. Her faith in this is so strong that she gives addresses and writes on the subject. At the present time she is writing some articles upon "The Evolution of Local and Imperial Government from Teutonic Conquest to the Present Day," and many papers from her pen have appeared upon the Poor Law and other social topics. Mrs. Fordham lives in a charming old country house, and is in close touch with the people in the villages round. As a result of this she says: "In my everyday life here among the people these two questions—the Poor Law and the Housing of the Poor—are those I am most closely brought in contact with, and I am particularly interested in them, as I consider they are the two social questions which require immediate attention if any good thing is to be done for the people in the villages."

THE ONLOOKER.

Digitized by Google

For THE BAIRNS.

Conducted by
THE REV. J. REID HOWATT.

CHILDREN'S POETRY.

THIS is a somewhat ambiguous title; it might mean poetry written for children or poetry written by children—two things very widely different. Of poetry written for children by grown-ups we have plenty, and much of it is very, very good indeed, while there is even more, perhaps about children, but not for them—it is beyond them altogether. But poetry by the children themselves is very rare in print; it does not follow, however, that it does not exist. It does exist, and in a mightier quantity than all other poetry put together.

Where is there a household of bairns without scraps of the queerest rhymes being treasured up somewhere or other? Mother does not profess to be a great litterateur, but she knows poetry when she sees it, and seldom has she seen it more distinctly than in Johnnie's last epic, or Jeannie's "Ode to the New Mirror." Father, of course, must point out defects—it's the way of men folk—but if you take the "spirit" of it, the intention, the yeasting of the imagination, where could you find anything more hopeful?

And all this is as it ought to be, and mother is no doubt the best judge after all, but I have to confess that even my honied inducement of a prize has not been very successful in drawing out these treasures. The competitors have been very few and the themes have been very humble.

Such as they are, however, they have all the marks of first efforts, and to all who love the children these are bound to have a charm of their own—if only by way of dim recollection of similar attempts made by themselves, now, oh! so long ago.

I knew a youth who was a student by profession, but who, of choice, tried hard to be a poet. He scribbled, he sighed, he tore his hair, grew moody, and walked much alone, no doubt communing with the mystic spirit of nature, but the upshot of it was that he took rheumatic fever and died, poor fellow. And this is how a young sister used to tell of his demise. "You see, he was a poet, and he couldn't get the ends of the lines to come right, and it killed him!"

This tragedy is not often repeated, but the trouble itself continues. The ideas come, and they are, of course, beautiful, but when the attempt is made to clothe them in appropriate words there is always the bother of getting the ends of the lines to come right. Some specimens of this will be found in the extracts I venture to give, and if sundry older folks find fault, let 'em; there are others who will remember that children are yet in the gristle only, not toughened enough for the fierce wrestling which is sometimes needed to get a suitable chum for an awkward and opinionative word.

Little Charley Judd is only seven years old, and his handwriting has a fine individuality of its own, but he has his aspirations. It is the ending of the lines that troubles him. I take the liberty to edit his "poem" only thus far—that instead of putting one line under the other, I make it all run on; in this way the poetic thought will be perceived in its charming simplicity.

When the sun comes out, then the flowers come out. The happy hours fly by, and the birds fly overhead. When the sun sinks down, the sweet flowers close, and sweetly sink down to rest.

That's all right!—as good as a good deal we have had from more famous folk. Let Charley go on and he may yet learn the knack of giving his words the wrestler's trick which pitches them into their proper place with the proper sound.

Digitized by Google

This next will refresh us all with its reminder of recent pleasures. I only fear that Ethel has kept the waits waiting a little too long in the cold—from night till morning! But perhaps she means different squads of them—there are always rivals—and it is another of the bothersome things about poetry that we cannot go too much into details.

CHRISTMAS.

Now Christmas comes but once a year,
To all be merry and of good cheer.
Little children good as gold,
Sit to hear some stories told;
Listen quiet on father's knee,
While their bright eyes dance with glee.

When old Santa comes, you know,
You can hear them chatter so,
Orange, apple, doll and ball,
Yes, he brings them, brings them all,
The singers come round in the night,
And sing until the morning light.

ETHEL MARY HEWITT (Aged 11 years).

I was delighted at seeing again the handwriting of Charles Hodges, in a poem called "The Nocturnal King," but regret to find the verses sadly need filing and smoothing.

Charles is fifteen, and must therefore be judged by a higher standard than we could apply to younger authors. There is good stuff in his work, and if he puts it aside for six months or so and then re-studies it he will be able, I have no doubt, to heal it where it is halting. This is the first verse:—

Come, fleeting shadows, speed your way,
Follow the swift retreating day,
But do not now delight
In riv'lling evening's gloomy kiss,
In shadows sprung from murky Dis,
The vanguards of the Night.

For non-classical young readers I may explain that Dis is another name for Pluto—a grim old fellow who lives below, street and number not given.

I print the first of two verses Mary Noelle Walker has sent. I am afraid to insert the second, for when she speaks of eating puddings "by tons," at one sitting, there are people so wanting in imagination that they might fancy this was a little too much of even poetic license.

My twin sister, and I, and my brothers three,
Went out one day to climb a tree,
My big brother went first and then my twin,
When the little one cried out that it was a sin
To leave us three little ones here below
When not one could touch the lowest bough;
So my brother came down and helped us up,
We sat there awhile, then went home to sup.

May Wadsworth, aged thirteen, The Manse Coalville, near Leicester, has a name which is so like the name of the great Lake poet, while it is also one of Longfellow's titles, that she ought to catch inspiration.

She sends two poems; the first, "A Visit to the Dentist," has a good deal of feeling in it, as we might expect, but the theme is hardly one to lend itself to her best powers. Her second is better, has, indeed, been judged the best of this batch, and a handsome volume has been sent her accordingly.

FATHER.

My daddy is a darling man,
Who gives us heaps of money;
He tries to please us all he can,
By singing songs so funny.

The small bald patch upon his head,
Is the dearest spot I know;
I kiss and fondle it every night,
For fear the hair might grow!

He has a voice like a trumpet blast,
Especially when he's hurried.
It's "Get out of my way!!!" in accents mild,
And oh! he gets so flurried!

But dear father is the best dad,
That ever I have had,
And when I think how bad I am,
It makes me feel quite sad.

I thank T. Merton, Laurence Chater, Tom Reighter, and Alec Hughes, for their verses, but cannot find space for all. L. Spencer, Sidney Cox, and Marion Chandler, sent some very good "rambling" letters, but a month too late for that competition.

A nice descriptive piece, in blank verse, together with a very nice letter, came from somebody without name or address.

The following notes speak for themselves.

Ivydene, Gilbert-road, St. Leonards-on-Sea.

DEAR SIR,—Thank you very much for sending me such a beautiful prize. I am so pleased with it, and I shall take great care of it. I like having prizes very much.—Your little friend,

OLIVE CLARA ELDRIDGE.

S. James' Vicarage, Bury St. Edmunds.

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—It was a great surprise when I found your parcel awaiting me yesterday morning, as I never quite expected to get the prize, as this was my first attempt. Thanking you very much for the book which I am sure I will like, I remain, yours sincerely,

CHS. HODGES.

[I think I shall give a rest this month to the competitions.]

THE CRUTCH-AND-KINDNESS LEAGUE.

No one has the least doubt about the fact that the only way to make a swimmer is by swimming, or a carpenter by carpentering, or an acrobat by perpetual gymnastics and contortions.

Digitized by Google

All admit that while books on these subjects may give a useful hint or two, it is only actual "working at the job" that can turn mere theory into useful practice.

Is it not something wonderful, then, how completely many can sheer away from this very common result of experience when it comes to be a matter of the development of a child's disposition?

Like Topsy, it is supposed somehow to grow of itself.

Take an average mother, for example. She sincerely loves her boy, is very careful of what he learns, what companions he plays with, what manners he acquires, and a great deal more of the like. But by-and-bye, when the boy has grown up, it cuts her to the heart to see how selfish he is becoming, how unfeeling, unsympathic. She had her dream, her hope, that he would grow up generous, brave yet tender hearted, strong and yet compassionate. As it is, there is nothing he grudges doing more than a kind act which involves a little trouble, and as for suffering on the part of others, he is perfectly stolid to all he sees or hears about it. He will even show it too often by indifference to her own feelings.

All of which is pain and surprise to her. Is there any such cause for surprise, however? What has she done to mould his nature in the better direction she desires? Perhaps little or nothing! She has been very solicitous, it may be, about the cultivation of his mind and manners, but as for the better dispositions of his heart, these were expected, somehow, to come of themselves! Yet the only way to make a swimmer is by swimming!

Oh, give the children a chance for their heart life! There are hundreds of ways in which they can be trained from the very earliest, and when they are least conscious of being under instruction. Let them keep some pets, for instance; it may throw a little more work upon mother, for little ones will be scatter-brained and neglectful, but the attention they must give, the sympathetic feelings which are aroused when their pets are in any trouble, in spite of all failures will yet leave a good deposit of kindliness, which will remain to build up character. I have before my mind at this moment two families I have known long and intimately.

In the one the mother—otherwise most exemplary—would permit no pets. In spite of all tearful promises on the part of the little ones, she held that all pet-keeping only made more work for her. She had to clean the bird cage, she had to watch that the rabbits were not left without food—and so forth, all of which was doubtless true enough.

In the other family the mother put up with all this, not only without a grumble, but cheerily and encouragingly. And what is the result to-day, after about a score of years have passed? This—that where pets were tabooed the mother is a sore-hearted woman at the selfish callousness of her children; in the other case the mother is a magnet who holds by love a large family of most loving sons and daughters of the manliest and womanliest kind.

No other comment, I think, need be said on this beyond asking each reader to glance round the families of whose up-bringing he or she has known something; in one degree or other similar results will be seen. The heart, like the head, can be trained only as theory is turned into practice.

But while much may be done at the earlier stages by pets of one kind or another, it is only by contact with persons that the best instincts can be drawn out later on.

In the busy life which even children have to live in these days, with school, drill, and necessary games, I know of few opportunities along this line better than those afforded by the Crutch-and-Kindness League. In London alone there are 6,000 poor, young, more or less helpless cripples—all sufferers, anyway, and most of them very, very lonely.

What the League aims at is to do a little to make the lot of these young sufferers a bit more bearable by some such touch of kindness as even a child can give.

A child can write a letter in a thoroughly child-like spirit. What a blessing such a letter would be to a lonesome cripple! And what a blessing it would be to the young writer!

For in this also mercy is "twice blessed"—it blesseth him that gives and him that takes. And it is all that the League asks—that a kindly letter be sent once a month or so to some poor cripple child, about whom all needful particulars are given to the writer.

Even if pressure of work or time should make the writing of the letter sometimes a difficulty, then a picture-book, an old illustrated magazine—anything that would interest a sick child—might be sent instead. Could children have such a kindly and interesting care laid on them without having all their better and more sympathetic feelings roused and trained?

Digitized by Google

All of which holds good of adults, many of whom have the wish to be kind, but from stress of toil, from ill-health, or the remoteness of their dwelling from populated centres, have little chance to practise what they feel. "The good they would do they do not"—for want of the opportunity. The Crutch-and-Kindness League supplies this; it has now its members in every part of the world.

All further particulars concerning the League may be had for a stamp from Mr. John Kirk, Secretary, Ragged School Union, 32, John-street, Bedford-row, London, W. C.

May I ask those who desire to join the League to be good enough to note well that last paragraph? Applications for membership are often sent to me; this only gives me the trouble of sending them again to Mr. Kirk.

As the founder of the League, I managed it all myself when its numbers were few, but when they ran up to the thousands, the writing work was more than I could manage. It now needs a staff under Mr. Kirk's supervision, but all the letters come to me once a month, when I pick out what ever I think might be interesting in this column.

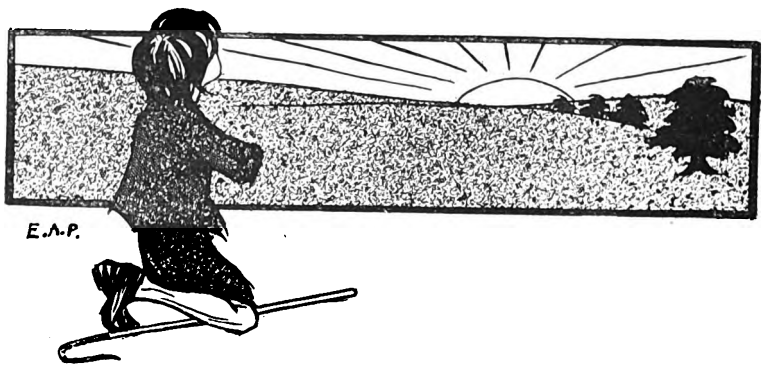
All the cripples I have spoken of are under the care of the Ragged School Union, so far as its voluntary visitors can overtake such a great work.

Having taken up so much space already, I must hold over to another time sundry notable points in the letters to hand.

In the subjoined list of new members for the month, I could not deny myself the pleasure of making Jerusalem stand out boldly. It is a significant and sweet omen.

New Members for the Month.

Miss Constance Gale, Hornsey; Miss S. Fox, Cottingham; Miss B. Mills, West Hartlepool; Mrs. W. H. Campbell, S. Australia; Miss Warwick, Miss Malpass, Mr. Reginald Rutherford, Miss Minnie Smith, Croydon; Miss Pan Stringer, Clonmel; Miss Ellie Hicks, Cornwall; Mr. W. Mackay Baxter, Miss B. L. Baxter, Grimsby; Mrs. W. H. D. Clee, Cheltenham; Miss Doris Hewitt, Ealing Common; Miss Gladys Megghison, York; Miss L. F. Paul, Weymouth; Junior C. E., Baptist Church, care of Miss Mitchell, Erith; Miss I. F. Macdonald, Peckham; Miss Kathleen Mathias, Putney; Mrs. Dayman, North Cornwell; Miss Winifred Ellison, Bournemouth; Miss M. Holland, Tunbridge Wells; Master Frank Dorey, Guernsey; Miss May Miller, Bournemouth; Miss M. H. Stewart, Boscombe; Mrs. Eldridge, Miss R. D. Eldridge, Bournemouth; Mrs. Wainwright, Northampton; Miss Elsie Heslington, Miss May Dumble, Miss Mary Hewitson, care of Miss Richmond, West Hartlepool; Roland Hastings, Nottingham; Miss M. I. Hancock, Miss Clare, Ealing; Miss May Simmons, Coltsworth; Miss Alice Maconochie, Edinburgh; Miss Alice Wyld, care of Miss Richmond, West Hartlepool; Miss Madge Phillips, Miss Dora Yule, Miss Florence Peck, Westgate-on-Sea; Miss Minnie Croft, Belfast; Miss Mabel Awmack, Leeds; Mr. W. J. James, Bournemouth; Mr. F. Nobbs, Miss Byrne, Miss Osborne, Boscombe; Miss J. James, Pokesdown; Mrs. Blyth, Jerusalem; Miss Kate Evans, Miss Maggie Williams, Colwyn Bay; Miss H. M. Sugg, Bournemouth; Miss Wilkinson, Christchurch; Miss Dorothy Baggs, Bath; Miss E. Croker, London, S.E.; Mrs. Parkes, Little Hadham; Arnold Collings, Bridgwater; Miss Louisa Herman, Rainhill; Miss V. Gabriel, Westgate-on-Sea; Miss Gertrude Moulson, Miss Elsie Moulson, Birmingham; Miss Ethel Wareham, Miss Dollie Crawshaw, Miss Beatrice Sibley, care of Miss Eldridge, Bournemouth; Miss May Cass, care of Miss Richmond, Hartlepool; Mrs. Pearson, Netta Pearson, Russia; Mrs. Haine's little girl, Dalston; Jean Whitfield, Daisy Whitfield, Katie Dawson, Frank Charlton, care of Mrs. Duncan, Blyth; Miss Hilda Darley, Dublin; Miss Avice C. Haydon, Tiverton; Mr. J. Mountford, care of Miss Jordan, Croydon; Miss L. Heppel, care of Miss Richmond, West Hartlepool; Miss Beatrice Batt, Devizes; Mrs. A. Dayman, North Cornwall; Master E. Johnson, Master G. Heatherington, care of Miss D. Wright, Westgate-on-Sea; Miss Jeffreys, Lee-on-the-Solent; Miss May Osborne, Theal; Miss Helen Hinton, Pokesdown; Mrs. Rudford, Nottingham; Miss Mildred Trotter, care of Miss Richmond, West Hartlepool; Miss B. Twycross, Worthing; Miss Marjorie Pullen, Brighton; Miss Constance Edmonds, Cape Colony; Miss N. E. Beck Miss G. Arnold Jones, Birmingham; Miss Minnie O'Neill, Miss Henrietta O'Neill, Ireland; Miss Annie Pegler, Stow-on-the-Wold; Mr. J. Biles, Winkton.



Digitized by Google

GLOBE METAL POLISH

THE finest and most economical Polish in the world for every description of Metal Work. Absolutely non-injurious to either skin or metal work.

USED IN THE HOUSEHOLD OF THE QUEEN.

IMPARTS a brilliant and lasting polish to all kinds of Furniture, Papier Mache and Leather Goods, Brown Boots, &c.

Sold by all Grocers and Stores.

GLOBE FURNITURE POLISH

RAIMES & CO.,
Stockton-on-Tees,
and Bow, London, E.

Digitized by Google

METROPOLITAN CREAM

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS FOR BOOTS AND SHOES

W. CLARK, 528, Oxford St., London, W.
(Near the Marble Arch).

The Sound-Board of a Piano being convex in shape, the continual strain of the wires upon it causes it to buckle, and the Piano in consequence is never in tune; but this cannot happen if your Piano is fitted with

RUSHTON'S

Patent

GUY CORD SOUNDING-BOARD.

Upon application a booklet containing full particulars of this invaluable Patent (which can be fitted to any Piano) will be sent you free of cost.

T. H. RUSHTON, 34, Cleethorpe Road, GRIMSBY.

FARDONS' SAUCE

Every Housewife knows that a good sauce gives an appetising flavour to the plainest of fares, and everybody should know that FARDONS' New SAUCE is an unequalled appetiser possessing characteristics found in no other sauce.

stimulates the appetite, promotes digestion, and is consequently invaluable as a flavouring with Soups, Fish, Meats, Gravy, and many other dishes.

A DAINTY TASTING SAMPLE

Is Obtainable Free

by forwarding your name and address to FARDONS' VINEGAR Co. Limited, Birmingham, who will also send you the name and address of their nearest agent, should you experience any difficulty in obtaining it locally.

In Bottles, 4½d., 6d., and 1/- each.

THE OLDEST AND BEST.

UNEQUALLED FOR ITS BRILLIANCE AND CLEANLINESS.

ADAMS'S FURNITURE POLISH

FOR FURNITURE, BROWN BOOTS, PATENT LEATHER, OILCLOTHS,
AND ALL VARNISHED AND ENAMELLED GOODS.

THE QUEEN says: "Having made a fresh trial of its virtues after considerable experience with other compounds of the same nature, we feel no hesitation in recommending its use to all housewives."

VICTORIA PARK WORKS, SHEFFIELD.

Agents for Australasia and the Colonies: R. A. THOMPSON & Co., Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane, Adelaide, Cape Town, etc.

LONDON: PRINTED FOR THE PROPRIETORS BY THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY, LIMITED, WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, CARMELITE STREET, E.C.

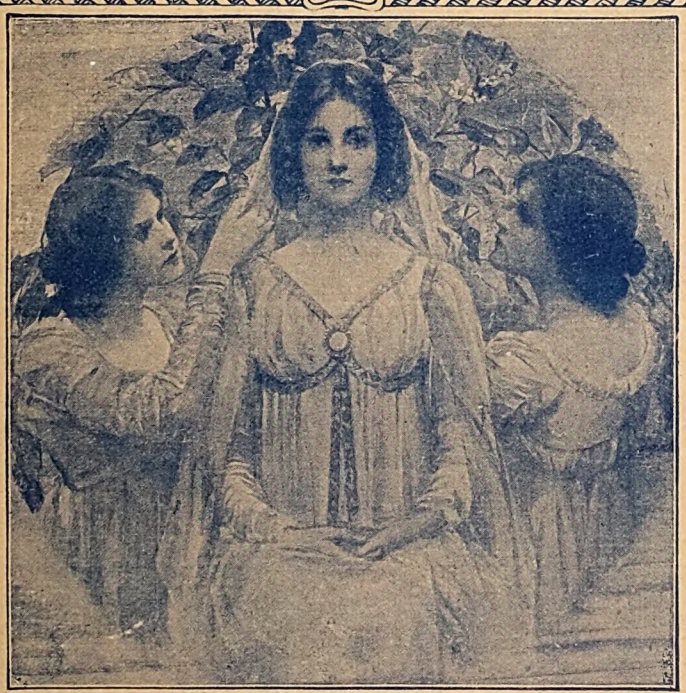
Digitized by Google

PRICE SIXPENCE.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE

FOR HOME AND SUNDAY READING.

VOL. 5. FEBRUARY, 1901. No. 5.



THE BRIDE.

LONDON: HORACE MARSHALL & SON, TEMPLE HOUSE, TEMPLE AVENUE, E.C.

Cadbury's Cocoa

Absolutely Pure, Therefore Best.

"The Standard of Highest Purity." —The Lancet.

Digitized by Google

No 439.

Hall's Wine.

When illness, worry, or age has nearly taken all the life out of you, Hall's Wine will revive and increase what strength you have left. It imparts immediate tone and vigour, and no reaction follows its use. Its recuperative and restorative power quickly tells in all cases of debility, convalescence, and depression.

3/- and 1/9

Bottles in two sizes

Sold by licensed grocers, chemists, and wine merchants. Write for booklet.

Stephen Smith & Co., Ld., Bow. London.

BODLEIAN LIBRARY 16·2 190

Digitized by Google

The

Allenburys' Foods.

A PROGRESSIVE DIETARY, suited to the growing digestive powers.

YOUNG INFANTS thrive and sleep well, and are contented and happy, being saved from the disorders and digestive troubles common to those fed on farinaceous foods, condensed milk, or even cow's milk.

Milk Food No. 1. Milk Food No. 2. Malted Food No. 3.

FOR INFANTS FROM

Birth to three months of age. — Three to six months. — Six months and upwards.

Pamphlet on Infant Feeding and Management FREE. (Please mention this paper.)

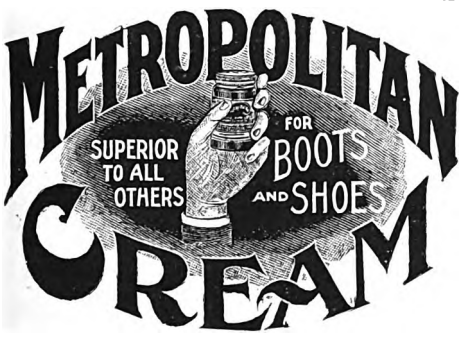
Allen & Hanburys Ltd., Plough Court, Lombard Street, London.

BORD'S PIANOS

25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (second-hand, 10s. 6d. per month) on the Three Years' System. — Lists free of C. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C. PIANOS EXCHANGED.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

These magnificent Pianos for Hire on the Three Years' System, at advantageous prices and terms.—List and particulars free of CHAS. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London. W.C.



W. CLARK, 528, Oxford St., London, W.
(Near the Marble Arch).

THOMAS TURNER & CO. MAKE THEIR OWN STEEL.

Hand Forged. Extra Hollow Ground. Carefully Set. Guaranteed Perfect. See "Encore" on Shank.

IVORY ... 6s. 6d. | BLACK ... 4s. 6d.

Send for Free List of Cases. From all Dealers, or write direct to Makers—

T. TURNER & Co., Suffolk Works, SHEFFIELD,

who will supply through nearest agent.

Ask for "Encore" Pocket and Table Cutlery

Keystone Burgundy.

At our risk and expense you may try a sample of Keystone Burgundy.

We claim that it is palpably superior to all other burgundies and clarets.

Send us an order for one bottle, 1s. 6d., or twelve bottles, 18s., carriage paid, cash with order, and if you do not like it, or consider our claim misleading, return the wine, carriage forward, and we will refund your money.

But if Keystone Burgundy pleases you, we shall be pleased for you afterwards to buy it from a licensed grocer, chemist, or wine merchant.

Half-bottles, 10d.; whole bottles, 1s. 6d.; flagons, 2s.

Stephen Smith & Co., Limited,
Bow, London, E.,
Proprietors of Hall's Wine.

No. 56.

Digitized by Google

FOR MOTHERS AND DAUGHTERS.

KEEPING ONE'S WORD.

President Lincoln was exceedingly strict in keeping faith with his children, and required the same fidelity of others. At one time a visitor at the White House persuaded little Tad to sit on his knee by promising as a reward the charm on his watch-chain Shortly after, as the man was about dismissing the child with no further thought of the lightly spoken promise, the President said, sternly: "Give him the charm, sir." In confusion the man obeyed the bidding. Lord Holland, the father of Charles James Fox, once told his boy that he should witness the pulling down of a stone wall on the estate. Forgetting the promise, he had the masonry restored after it was demolished that he might not fail in keeping his word to his son. Such scrupulous regard for the truth on the part of parents will go far towards counteracting an inherited tendency to falsehood on the part of children.

SOCIETY LADIES' PET NAMES.

Many ladies nowadays drop their actual names in favour of some prettier appellation. Lady Ormonde's Christian names are Elizabeth Harriet, but she is known to the world as "Lilah." Princess Henry of Pless was christened Mary Theresa Olivia, but she is known to her friends as "Daisy." Her sister's real name is Constance, but she never uses it, and appears to her intimates and to the world in general as Miss Shelagh Cornwallis West. Lady Warwick's name is Frances Evelyn, but her family and friends call her "Daisy." Lady Brougham's baptismal name is Adora, but she signs herself and is always spoken of as "Zoë." Her daughter, Miss Eleanor Brougham, is known by the name of "Baba." Lord Feversham's youngest daughter, Lady Ulrica Duncombe, has been called "Mouche" from her infancy, and Mrs. Ronnie Greville, whose real name is Margaret, is now "May" to her friends and relations.

FASHION IN WEDDINGS.

In thinking over the social changes of the century that has just come to a close it is interesting to note how the fashionable wedding has developed during the last five decades. Fifty years ago, and even less, a wedding was, practically speaking, a family function. Outside the circle of relatives on both sides of the families, only immediate and very old friends were invited to the ceremony and subsequent breakfast. There was no floral display such as is made nowadays; two bridesmaids, respectively representing the bride's and bridegroom's family, were considered quite sufficient, and only relatives and very close friends gave presents. In short, weddings were conducted with possibly more solemnity but certainly less show than is now the case. Perhaps they were not less impressive on that account, but the modern fashionable wedding is now so bright and usually charming a function that one would not willingly see it altered, especially now the race of life has become so strenuous, we cannot afford to dispense with any harmless pleasure which brings life, color and vivacity into our lives.

FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE.

Miss Florence Nightingale, whose work among the wounded in the Crimea and subsequent labours in connection with hospital nursing give her a high place among the heroines of the century, owes her Chrisian name to the Italian city in which she was born, now more than eighty years ago. Miss Nightingale, familiarly known to the veterans of the Crimea as the "Lady with the Lamp," from her nightly visits—like those of an angel—to succour and comfort the sufferers in the camp hospitals, has, though entirely confined to her room, taken a lively and practical interest in all the efforts that have been made to provide sufficient hospital accommodation and comforts for the troops engaged at the front.

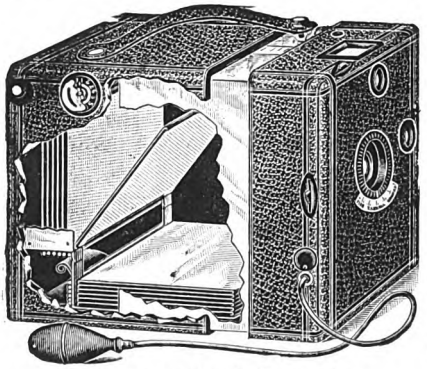
Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

VIVE

New

M.P.C. Vives.



With or without Focussing.

Every Camera Guaranteed.

Before buying elsewhere send for our Art Catalogue and Illustrated Brochure Free. Embossed mounted photo, 2 penny stamps extra.

Guinea Vives.—Largest pictures (4¼ × 4¼, adaptable to any smaller size) for plates, cut films, or roll films.

VIVE CAMERA CO., MANUFACTURERS,
No. 15, Regent House, Regent Street.
LONDON, W.
NEW YORK.
CHICAGO.

CAMERAS

LEAD EVERYWHERE

PRINCESS DRESS.

The Princess dress is not always very successful in a walking costume. The sketch shows one of these dresses in black cloth, bordered with Indian red cloth, embroidered in gold and silver. The bolero is similarly bordered. The vest, neck-band, and undersleeves are in the Indian or tomato red, with the gold and silver embroidery. The little buttons on the vest are gilt. The black satin tie is very much stitched, and has gilt ornaments sewn on the ends.

THE REAL AND THE IDEAL.

No man can rise higher than his ideals. "The boy is father of the man." The future of realisation is enveloped in the aspiration of the present. Civilisations, constitutions, systems of thought and action, however vast and controlling, were once but thoughts, volitions, and aspirations within the souls of men. There is a constant and definite relation between doctrine and life, between faith and works, between the ideal and the real, between the burning thought and surging impulses of young manhood and the ripe and garnered harvest of age.

Digitized by Google

EDNA LYALL'S

NEW NOVEL,

"In Spite of All,"

Full-length Romantic Serial Story of the Great Civil War,

BEGINS IN THE

"CHRISTIAN WORLD"

THIS WEEK—JANUARY 3rd, 1901.

"IN SPITE OF ALL." By EDNA LYALL.
"IN SPITE OF ALL." By EDNA LYALL.
"IN SPITE OF ALL." By EDNA LYALL.
"IN SPITE OF ALL." By EDNA LYALL.
"IN SPITE OF ALL." By EDNA LYALL.

"IN SPITE OF ALL." By EDNA LYALL.

A Full-length Romantic Serial Story of the great Civil War commenced in "The Christian World" of January 3rd, 1901.

"In the 'Christian World' for January 3, commences 'Edna Lyall's' new serial entitled 'In Spite of All,' a tale of the great Civil War. The tens of thousands who religiously read everything that 'Edna Lyall' writes will be charmed with the new tale. Despite the large circulation of the 'Christian World,' such a story by such an authoress is bound to create a larger demand."—THE IMPERIAL NEWSAGENT.

"The appearance of a new novel by 'Edna Lyall,' and one dealing with her favourite century, the seventeeth—will be hailed with pleasure by many thousands of readers. In the 'Christian World' this week begins what is, perhaps, the most fascinating and finished of her fourteen novels. It is a tale of the great Civil War, entitled 'In Spite of All.' Our portrait of Miss Bayly is from her latest photograph. 'In Spite of All' is the third of her novels to be published serially in the 'Christian World.'"—THE LITERARY WORLD.

THE CHRISTIAN WORLD may be obtained of any Bookseller or Newsagent, or from the Publishers,
JAMES CLARKE & CO., 13 AND 14, FLEET STREET, LONDON E.C.

3 Dainty Samples for 1d. Stamp.

HILLABY'S PONTEFRACT CAKES LIQUORICE WAFERS & PELLETS

EVERY WINTER adds to the reputation of Hillaby's Liquorice as a remedy for Coughs, Colds, Sore Throats &c. A natural medicine in the form of a delicious confection. Prepared from the purest liquorice.
Superior to all other remedies.
HILLABY'S Ltd., Pontefract.

CONGREVE'S Balsamic ELIXIR

Admitted after 70 years use the world over to be the BEST REMEDY for

CONSUMPTION

CONGESTION OF THE LUNGS
CHRONIC BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA,
COUGHS, COLDS, INFLUENZA.
Sold by all PATENT MEDICINE VENDORS.
Congreve's book on Consumption, 6d. or 1s. post free from COOMBE LODGE, PECKHAM, LONDON, S.E.

A delicious, highly nutritive, and most easily digested Food, specially prepared for Infants and for those whose digestive powers are weakened by illness or age.

Benger's Food is sold in tins by Chemists, etc., everywhere.

Benger's Food

FOR INFANTS, INVALIDS, AND THE AGED.

The London Medical Record says: "It is retained when all other foods are rejected. It is invaluable."

The British Medical Journal says: "Benger's Food has by its excellence established a reputation of its own."

Digitized by Google

"VETEDACEO"

(Registered),

THE GREAT AUSTRALIAN HERBAL REMEDY,

CURES

CONSUMPTION,
BRIGHT'S DISEASE,
LIVER COMPLAINT,
RHEUMATISM,
and all
BLOOD & SKIN DISEASES.

"VETEDACEO"

is made entirely from Herbs imported from and grown in Tasmania, and is absolutely free from poisonous Drugs or Chemicals of any kind, and can therefore be taken with perfect safety by the youngest infant or most delicate person, and has been given to an infant of two weeks old which developed skin disease, with satisfactory result.

As a TONIC for that Tired out and Run down feeling it is without an equal, while for graver and more complicated cases it has been most successful in the Australian Colonies.

"VETEDACEO"

stands alone as THE remedy for
JAUNDICE, NERVOUS DEBILITY,
POVERTY OF BLOOD, GALL STONES,
SCIATICA, CANCEROUS GROWTHS,
&c., &c.

Read the following:—

"Dec. 28th, 1899, Alma Road, Greaves, Lancaster.

"DEAR SIR,

"About eight years ago I became a subject to that fearful Complaint Rheumatism, and during that time tried various so-called remedies, all in vain, so thought I must go on suffering to the end, with sleepless nights. But reading of the many wonderful cures effected by taking 'VETEDACEO' I made up my mind to give it a trial, and am truly thankful to say, after taking 10 bottles, I am not only cured of Rheumatism, but better in general health, feeling quite ten years younger, and shall ever be glad to tell to those suffering the good 'VETEDACEO' has done me. I would answer any questions, accompanied with stamped envelope. You are at liberty to make what use you think proper of this.

"Yours very truly,
"(Signed) A. THORNTON."

Price 4s. per bottle.

"VETEDACEO" is a Friend of the Suffering!
"VETEDACEO" gives back lost Health!
"VETEDACEO" is a Pure Herbal Remedy!

Compounded by a most skilful expert, the Proprietor, "VETEDACEO" is the world's Remedy, and should be in every home. Sold by all Chemists and Medicine Vendors. If any difficulty in obtaining it write to –

WEBBER'S VETEDACEO AGENCY,
Oswaldestre House, 34, Norfolk St., STRAND, W.C.

A WALKING COSTUME.

Almost every walking costume now is finished with a short bolero coat matching the skirt exactly. To add to the becomingness of such attire, many tailors are sending home with such costumes a well-made black satin belt. Of course, these corslets have to be most beautifully made. The satin is cut upon the cross, and the whole is elaborately bound, while there is no question that they add a great smartness to every figure. These satin corslets are very often finished with four or six very good cut steel buttons, or even buttons of good enamel or pierced silver are seen. Frieze and faced cloth are the two most fashionable materials for walking costumes, while the revers of such dresses are distinctly plainer than they have been for some time. Instead we seem to be elaborating our wastcoats and underfronts.

Home is the first and most important school of character. It is there that every human being receives his best moral training, or his worst; for it is there that he imbibes those principles of conduct which endure through manhood.

Digitized by Google

Ashville College,
HARROGATE.

TERMS:
January, May, and September.

FEES:
£45 and £50 INCLUSIVE.

Illustrated Prospectus from
JOHN BOWICK, Esq., M.A., LL.D.,
Headmaster; or
Rev. JOHN MOORE, "Denehurst,"
12, Baker Street, NOTTINGHAM.

Never Fails.
Established
26 YEARS.
Have you a Cough?
A DOSE WILL RELIEVE IT.
Have you a Cold?
A DOSE at BEDTIME WILL REMOVE IT.

WHEN YOU ASK FOR
Owbridge's Lung Tonic
BE SURE YOU GET IT.

Try it also for
Bronchitis, Whooping-Cough,
Asthma, Consumption.

Prepared by
W. T. OWBRIDGE, Chemist, Hull.
Sold everywhere
in bottles, at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d.,
4s. 6d., and 11s.

COPYRIGHT.

The
SMITH PREMIER TYPEWRITER
Is the embodiment of STRENGTH
and SIMPLICITY

It has no complicated mechanism to get out of order.

Each part has its own work to do, and is not forced to bear the strain of performing several functions.

For delicacy of touch and steady easy working qualities it is ahead of all competitors

Send for Art Catalogue

THE SMITH PREMIER
Typewriter Co.
14, Gracechurch St.
London E.C.

Digitized by Google

Fascinating Flowers

To make . . .

A PERFECT PICTURE IN YOUR GARDEN,

to last for years.

NOW IS THE TIME TO PLANT

Kelway's

Lovely New Paeonies

The Fashionable Flower; in an almost endless variety of lovely tints, and, in many cases, with the fragrance of the Tea Rose; Kelway & Son's celebrated improved kinds certificated by the Royal Horticultural Society. Strong country grown plants for flowering next and many succeeding seasons in the hardy perennial border or bed, or in shrubberies, drives, grass, park or woodland. The cut flowers are gloriously decorative.

Collection C .. .. 30/- per dozen.
„ D (extra fine kinds).. 42/- „

Carriage paid for cheque with order to those mentioning "Temple Magazine."

130 Gold and Silver Medals.
London, Paris, Chicago, etc.

KELWAY & SON, The Royal Horticulturists,
LANGPORT, SOMERSET.

BROOME'S MUSIC

See that the name "BROOME" is on every copy.

*938 For Liberty, March. Fabian Scott.
*956 Imperial Volunteers, March.
*987 Night Attack. Fabian Scott.
*988 The Departure of a Troopship. Fabian Scott.
*992 Ladysmith March. Fabian Scott.
*993 Kimberley March. Fabian Scott.
*994 Mafeking March. Fabian Scott.
*995 Bloemfontein March. Fabian Scott.
*996 Pretoria March. Fabian Scott.
*997 Relief March. Fabian Scott.
1009 Pigtail Polka.
*1010 When the Boys Come Marching Home, March. Theo. Bonheur.
1017 Chinese March. Ezra Read.
1018 Pekin, Chinese Carnival. Ezra Read.
*1025 Cock-a-Doodle, Schottische. m.
*1026 Tearless Life, Sacred Song.
1028 Won't yer let me kiss yer? Coon Song.
1029 The Handy Man. Naval Fantasia. m.
1030 Follow Your Leader. Barn Dance. m.
*95-4-5 Going to Table Bay. (Descriptive Fantasia on the War.) By Alan Macey. Post Free, 7d.
*998-9-00 March of Peace. d. Post Free, 7d.
*1001-2-3 „ „ e. „
1011-12-13 Blossoms, Waltz. m. „
1014-15-16 Suspense, Waltz. m. „
*1019-20-21 War on the China Sea. m. (Descriptive Naval Fantasia.) Post Free, 7d.
*1022-23-24 When the Boys come Marching Home, Song. By Theo. Bonheur. Post Free, 7d.

* War Numbers 2d. each; post free, 3d.

W. H. BROOME, 15, Holborn, London, E.C.

WORLD — TRAVEL

Organised by

HENRY S. LUNN, M.D., F.R.G.S.,
W. HOLDSWORTH LUNN,
AND CONNOP F. S. PEROWNE.

CRUISES

On the Magnificent Ocean Yacht, "ARGONAUT," Tonnage 3,254, H.P. 4,000. Electric Light. First-class Cuisine.

SAILING FROM Marseilles AS BELOW TO

Feb. 16th.—Crete, Piraeus, Smyrna, Constantinople, Beyrout, Palestine, Egypt, Malta, and Marseilles. A 44 days' Cruise for 46 Guineas and upwards (Return Ticket, London to Marseilles via Dover-Calais included).

April 24th.—Naples, Ancona, Venice, and the Istrian and Dalmatian Coast, for Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Montenegro. A 21 days' Cruise for 25 Guineas and upwards (Return Ticket, London to Marseilles viâ Dover-Calais included).

May 17th.—Naples, Algiers, Gibraltar, Tangier, Lisbon, and Tilbury. A 17 days' Cruise for 16 Guineas and upwards.

£10 10s. & £13 13s. TOURS TO ROME.

Extensions to Naples, Florence, Venice, the Italian Lakes, and the Riviera.

Full Particulars from the Secretary—5, ENDSLEIGH GARDENS, EUSTON, LONDON, N.W

Digitized by Google

The Gregorian is distinctive in the exquisite quality of its tone.

Gregorian Church and Chapel Organs

It is indorsed by leading organists, and meets the demand of critical musicians at moderate expense.

Prices, 70 to 600 Guineas.

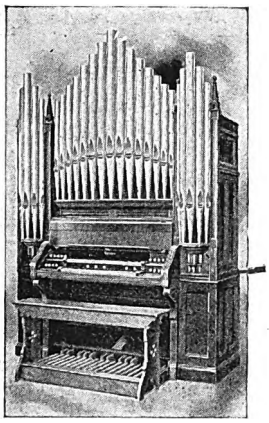
The Gregorian's rapidly increasing popularity for Church and Chapel use is ample reason why it should be investigated by all Churches contemplating the purchase of an organ.

Its method of tone-production is radically different from all others.

Catalogue A2, giving full description, will be mailed on request.

DISTINCTIVE FEATURES.

QUALITY and POWER of tone, Variety of registration, and Price.



STYLE 22.

"These instruments will be extremely desirable for churches and halls. It is a new and original idea, for your have modified the tones of the reeds in such a way as to reproduce perfectly the tones of the pipe-organ, especially diapason and clarabella tones."—ALEXANDRE GUILMANT, Organist and Composer, Paris.

"The voicing of your instrument is noteworthy; each stop has its characteristic quality—the flute is really flute-like, and the clarinet preserves the peculiar wooden character of the original. Most remarkable is the close approach of sound to the pipe-organs, many of these not being its equal in quality and tone. Last, but not least, the light, quick action and never-varying accuracy of intonation deserve special mention."—WALTER J. DAMROSCH.

THE ORCHESTRELLE COMPANY,

225 Regent St., London, W.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS.

ECCENTRICITIES OF GENIUS: Memories of Famous Men and Women of the Platform and the Stage. By MAJOR J. B. POND. With 91 Portraits. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s.

A MISSING HERO. By Mrs. ALEXANDER, Author of "The Wooing o't." Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

GERMINAL: or, Master and Man. By EMILE ZOLA, Author of "The Downfall," etc. Edited, with an Introduction, by ERNEST A. VIZETELLY.

THE MAN THAT CORRUPTED HADLEYBURG, and other Stories and Sketches. By MARK TWAIN. With a Frontispiece by LUCIUS HITCHCOCK. THIRD EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

THE FOURTH GENERATION. By SIR WALTER BESANT, Author of "The Orange Girl," etc. THIRD EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

THE INIMITABLE MRS. MASSINGHAM: A Romance of Botany Bay. By HERBERT COMPTON, Author of "A Free Lance in a Far Land." Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"AS A WATCH IN THE NIGHT": a Drama of Waking and Dream. By MRS. CAMPBELL PRAED, Author of Madame Izan," etc. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top. 6s.

IN THE SOUTH SEAS. By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 6s.

PHILIP WINWOOD: A Sketch of the Domestic History of an American Captain in the War of Independence. By ROBERT NEILSON STEPHENS. With 6 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

THE "PRETTY POLLY": a Voyage of Incident. By W. CLARK RUSSELL, Author of "The Wreck of the Grosvenor," etc. With 12 Illustrations by G. E. ROBERTSON. Large crown 8vo, cloth, gilt edges, 5s.

THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH. By CHARLES READE. A LARGE-TYPE, FINE PAPER EDITION. Pott 8vo, cloth, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net.

HANDLEY CROSS: or, Mr. Jorrocks's Hunt. By ROBERT SURTEES, Author of "Mr. Sponge's Sporting Tour." With 79 Illustrations by JOHN LEECH. A NEW EDITION. Post 8vo, cloth, 2s.

A HISTORY OF OUR OWN TIMES, from 1880 to the Diamond Jubilee. By JUSTIN MCCARTHY. A NEW EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

LONDON MEMORIES: Social, Historical, and Topographical. By C. W. HECKETHORN, Author of "London Souvenirs," etc. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martins' Lane, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE MEDICINAL QUALITIES OF LIQUORICE.

The earliest recollections of our childhood are bound up with that toothsome sweetmeat, liquorice, whether it first preferred its allurements to our infant minds in the shape of Pontefract cakes, or the more substantial form of long solid sticks. But liquorice by no means becomes a mere memory when the days of childhood are past, for many children of a larger growth own to a fondness for this sweet, and it has a yet higher claim from the fact of its possessing medicinal qualities. Dr. Keith says: "It certainly relieves in a very remarkable way, the innumerable pains and discomforts — mental and bodily—which arise from irritation of the nerves, headache, sleeplessnsss, lowness of spirits, and general misery." In our variable climate, rapid changes of the weather and consequent alteration in costume, often lead to colds, sore throat, and the risk of "taking a chill," and liquorice has been proved to be a very simple and effective remedy. The leading firm of liquorice manufacturers is Messrs. Hillaby's Ltd., of Pontefract, the purity and excellence of whose manufactures is testified by the report of the analyst, Professor John Goodfellow, official analyst of the Confectioners' Association, who says that they contain 94·36 per cent of pure liquorice, and are therefore remarkably pure and quite free from adulterants, and that they are scientifically prepared and beautifully refined. Their Pontefract cakes, liquorice wafers, and liquorice pellets are much used by public speakers, preachers, and singers. The wafers and pellets are also specially recommended for cricketers, cyclists, and athletes generally, to obviate any dry feeling in the throat attending physical exertion. Another useful product is their Liquorice and Chlorodine Lozenges, for allaying irritation in the bronchial tubes and inducing sleep.

MIND AND BODY.

The mind and body are too closely allied for one to be able to function properly without the other, or in dissonance one with the other, so that we reach a stage in medical history when the line of demarcation between mind and body is getting less and less obvious every day. The physician of the future is undoubtedly the man who in visiting the sick can be doctor and soul regenerator at the same time.

Profitable Business.

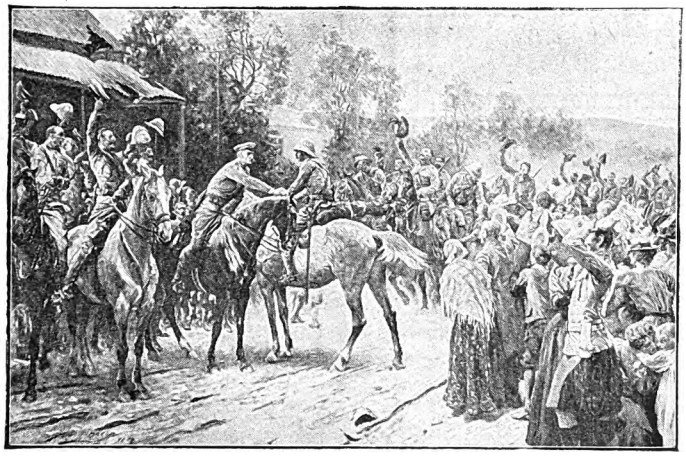
This is what we all want.
You are probably making a good income, but you would like to make a better one.
How are you going to do it?
Can you answer this question? If not, may we help you?
We are business experts.
We know how to make any genuine article sell well.
It is no use having a really good article unless you can make the public realise that it is good, and want to buy it.
You can only do this by means of advertising.
Advertising has made many fortunes. It will make one for you if you handle it judiciously.
Many of our clients are now making thousands a year from an article which was unheard of a few years ago.
We helped them to do this, and we can help you in the same way.
Nothing is too large or too small for us to handle.
All you have to do is to write us a letter stating what your business is, and we will help you.
Our advice only costs a penny postage stamp, and it may lead you on to a fortune.
It is worth trying.

H. DAWSON & CO.,

34, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

BOVRIL WAR PICTURE.



"The Relief of Ladysmith." JOHN H. BACON.

A Magnificent Historic War Gravure, 28-in. by 18½-in., printed on fine Plate Paper, 40-in. by 30-in., free from advertising matter.

COUPON AND PARTICULARS WITH EVERY BOTTLE OF BOVRIL.

"The Sign of the Cross" on the Continent of Africa.

THE Proprietors of the "WIDE WORLD MAGAZINE," Messrs. GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd., have much pleasure in announcing that they have made arrangements with Major A. St. HILL GIBBONS (3rd East Yorkshire Regiment) for the immediate publication of his Two-and-a-quarter Years of Travel in Central Africa.

Major GIBBONS has absolutely beaten the record in South African travel, his expedition covering 13,000 miles, exclusive of rail and steamboat travel.

The routes of the GIBBONS Expedition now form a cross on the African map—one line from the Cape to Cairo, and the other from Chinde, on the East Coast, to Benguela on the West.

Here are some of the principal points of Major GIBBONS' wonderful narrative:—

The DISCOVERY of the SOURCES of the ZAMBESI.
Although MAJOR GIBBONS surveyed over 20,000 miles he never used a rifle against a Native.
The DISCOVERY of a CURIOUS RACE OF BUSHMEN.
CURIOSITIES OF THE SLAVE TRADE.
DIFFICULTIES WITH CARRIERS.
ATTACKS BY LIONS.
PERILS ON THE ZAMBESI.
The EXPLORATION OF THE MYSTERIOUS LAKE KIVU.
The "COOKING RANGE" VOLCANIC COUNTRY.
WITH THE BELGIANS ON THE UPPER NILE.
AMONG THE FLOATING SUDD, &c., &c.

Major GIBBONS commences his absorbing narrative in the April Number, published on March 22nd.

The "WIDE WORLD MAGAZINE" contains the cream of authentic personal adventure of the World, and the arrangements for the coming year embrace the narratives of all the distinguished explorers. No other Magazine in the World like it.

Do not forget that "THE SIGN OF THE CROSS ON THE CONTINENT OF AFRICA" starts in the April Number.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Digitized by Google

LINES

Each thing has its own business; most things attend to something else.

It is the particular business of Orain Tablets to cure Indigestion—they do that.

Dyspepsia and its uncomfortable family, Flatulence, Acidity, Heartburn, Pain, Weight and Fulness after Meals, etc., are bad lodgers. They require eviction at short notice. Orain Tablets will attend to this matter.

Indigestion will make a man a misanthrope for years—Orain Tablets will make him love his neighbour inside a week.

Orain Tablets are compounded from the prescription of a fully qualified specialist of wide experience. This is a humiliating confession, but it has to be made.

A spoonful of truth is often taken with a grain of salt; sometimes it is not taken at all, which is foolish.

You must remember that there is a chance—possibly in your opinion a long-odds chance, but still a chance—that, though this is an advertisement, its contents are in line with the truth; and if you have the misfortune to be dyspeptic, you don't need to be told that the merest chance of unloading your burden is worth more than an average risk. Orain Tablets are guaranteed innocuous, so that the risk in their case figures out at 1s.; that being the sum (in stamps) for which we will send you a bottle, post free. Is it too big?

THE ORAIN CO., LTD.,
8, CATHERINE COURT,
LONDON, E.C.

GIRL'S EVENING DRESS.

The sketch represents an evening dress for a girl of fourteen or fifteen, in pale blue Canton silk with wide insertions of Valenciennes lace on both skirt and bodice. Horizontal, on the former they serve as a sort of heading to the accordion-pleated flounce, made of the same material as the dress, and edged with yet another row of Valenciennes insertion. The fichu-revers are edged with a ruching of lace, and have appliqués of lace laid on. The end that crosses over is fastened at the waist with a cascade of blue ribbon velvet, matching the tint of the Canton silk. The upper part of the sleeves is accordion-pleated, like the flounce, a band of lace heading the outward flow of the silk above the elbow. It overlaps the gloves. The open work blue silk stockings match the pale blue satin shoes and the silk in the frock itself.

Earnest moral principle is the balance wheel of character. It regulates and keeps the whole man in order.

We are apt to measure ourselves by our aspiration instead of our performance. But, in truth, the conduct of our lives is the only proof of the sincerity of our hearts.

Digitized by Google

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

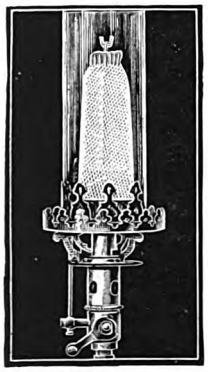
for FEBRUARY contains

SHOULD PEW-RENTS BE ABOLISHED?

A concensus of Representative Opinion.

6D. Monthly.

ALSO CONTRIBUTIONS BY
THE BISHOP OF LONDON, REV. F. B. MEYER,
DR. HANDLEY MOULE, AMY LE FEUVRE,
SARAH DOUDNEY, AND OTHER WELL KNOWN MEN AND WOMEN.



The Gas Self-Lighting Co., LIMITED.

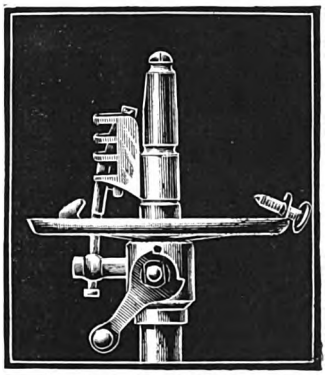
By means of this Company's valuable patents, the use of matches or tapers for lighting gas jets is entirely dispensed with, dispensing also with a bye pass jet continually alight (this saves the expense). A great source of danger from fire is thereby removed, and an annual expense far exceeding the cost of the Self-Lighter is saved.

THE SELF-LIGHTER.

A Simple, Effective, Economical Danger Remover. You turn on the gas and the Self-lighter ignites it. Invaluable to all gas consumers. Remit 3s. for Sample, or send for List and full particulars to:—

The GAS SELF-LIGHTING Co., Ltd.,
130, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.

Telegrams: "SPONGELET, LONDON." Telephone No. 5206, BANK.



HOVIS
TRADE MARK.

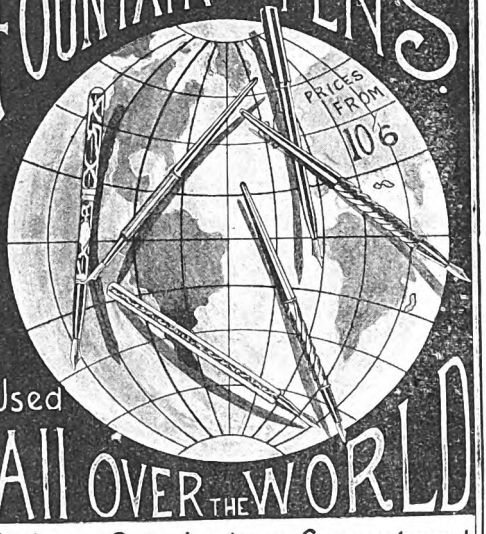
The most tasty and appetising of all breads, with valuable digestive properties.

Makes excellent toast.

Most Family Bakers supply it. Agents' Addresses are sent on application, and 3d. samples of Bread (1/- with Biscuits) on receipt of stamps by HOVIS LTD., Macclesfield.

Digitized by Google

WATERMAN'S "IDEAL" FOUNTAIN PENS



Used All OVER THE WORLD

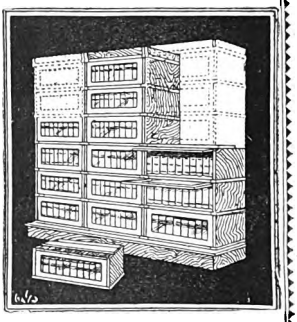
Perfect Satisfaction Guaranteed.

L. & C. HARDTMUTH, Golden Lane, E.C.

The Wernicke Elastic Bookcase

Is the most popular in the World.

Should be in every Home, Library, Office and Institution.



A Living Bookcase—grows with your Library, and always fits it. Small enough for 10, or large enough for 10,000 Books. A system of Units. An ideal Bookcase for the home. Fitted with dust-proof disappearing doors, simple and perfect in operation. Furnished in grades and prices to suit all tastes and requirements.

FREE.—Call and examine the Bookcases at any of our Depots, or write for dainty illustrated No. 92 Booklet, free to readers of "Temple Magazine," or enquire of your Bookseller.

Thomas Turner (Leicester), Ltd.,

44, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

BIRMINGHAM. LEICESTER & BRADFORD.

You want the BEST.

L. & C. Hardtmuth's

KOH-I-NOOR PENCILS

Are the Acknowledged BEST.

TO ASTHMA SUFFERERS.

IMMEDIATE RELIEF in all cases of ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, CROUP, and WHOOPING COUGH is gained by the use of

POTTER'S DATURA ASTHMA CURE.

Sold by all Chemists and Herbalists, in Tins at 1s. each. Free Sample sent on receipt of Post Card to POTTER AND CLARKE, Artillery Lane, London, E.

The "Osman" Turkish Towels and Bath Mats.

OF ALL DRAPERS.

Made by

BARLOW & JONES, Limited,

Manchester, London, & Bolton.

WHAT IS NORMAN AND STACEY'S PLAN OF FURNISHING?

IT is a clever scheme now known and adopted in all parts of the English-speaking world, which enables you to furnish your house or flat throughout from drawing-room to kitchen (even to the extent of linens, silver, cutlery, blinds, etc.) out of income without disturbing your capital, by (instead of paying cash) dividing the whole amount into 6, 12, 24, or 36 equal monthly payments. During the above-mentioned period you can, of course, at any time (should you wish it) pay off the amount, and avail yourself of the cash discount.

NORMAN & STACEY, LTD.,

118, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C.

All goods marked in plain figures.

Country orders receive special attention.

Free delivery and inspection solicited. A beautiful catalogue in colours is given upon personal application.

N.B.—In 1894 we originated the Free Life Insurance System of furnishing.

Beware of Imitators.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS FOR FEBRUARY, 1901.

			PAGE
I.	The Far Away Heart	Frontispiece
II.	The Society of Women Artists. Illustrated.	Mrs. Hirst Alexander	377
III.	My First Sermon	Rev. James C. Brewitt	388
IV.	An Hour with Dean Farrar. Illustrated.	William Sidebotham	389
V.	Nell's Mistake. Illustrated.	Adeline Sergeant	395
VI.	Four-Footed Philanthropists. Some Dogs who Help to Maintain Fatherless Children. Illustrated.	John Bell	404
VII.	The Keeper of the Track. Illustrated.	Harold Bindloss	410
VIII.	Men of Silence. A Visit to the Trappist Monastery at Mount St. Bernard's, Leicestershire. Illustrated.	John Hulme	417
IX.	Do the Churches Need Converting?		423
X.	In the Public Eye. Illustrated.	The Onlooker	428
XI.	Common Sense for Mothers and Nurses	Dr. Julia Holmes Smith	438
XII.	A Bolt from the Blue. Serial Story. Chapters XVIII.-XX. Illustrated by Chas. D. Ward.	Dora Langlois	441
XIII.	French Protestants in England. Illustrated.	Sybil C. Mitford	456
XIV.	Ashville College, Harrogate. Illustrated.	A. P. Easton	463
XV.	The Greatest Need of the New Century		467
XVI.	For the Bairns	Rev. J. Reid Howatt	468

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All manuscripts and drawings must be accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes, or the Editor cannot promise their return. They must be addressed, THE EDITOR, "TEMPLE MAGAZINE," WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, CARMELITE STREET, E.C.

Contributions accepted for "In the Public Eye," are paid for at the uniform rate of 5/- per paragraph including portrait. All photographs, which must be non-copyright, are returned.

Business Communications and Orders must be sent to MESSRS. HORACE MARSHALL AND SON, TEMPLE HOUSE, TEMPLE AVENUE, E.C.

Letters relating to Advertisements must be addressed to MESSRS. H. DAWSON AND CO., 34, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, W.C.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE will be sent by post each month, to any address, for an Annual Subscription of 8s. Binding Cases can be purchased from the Publishers for 1s. 6d.

TO ADVERTISERS.

All communications respecting Advertisements for this Magazine must be addressed to

MESSRS. H. DAWSON & CO.,

34, Norfolk Street, Strand,

LONDON, W.C.

The only

GOLD MEDAL

Awarded for Milk-Chocolate at the Paris Exhibition, 1900, was gained by

PETER'S

MILK-CHOCOLATE,

The Original and Best.

Sold by all Confectioners and Grocers.

Sole Agents (trade only), S. J. MACKENZIE & CO., LTD., LONDON, E.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTURY EDITION

OF THE Greatest History of our Country.

NOW READY. Part I, PRICE 6d., of

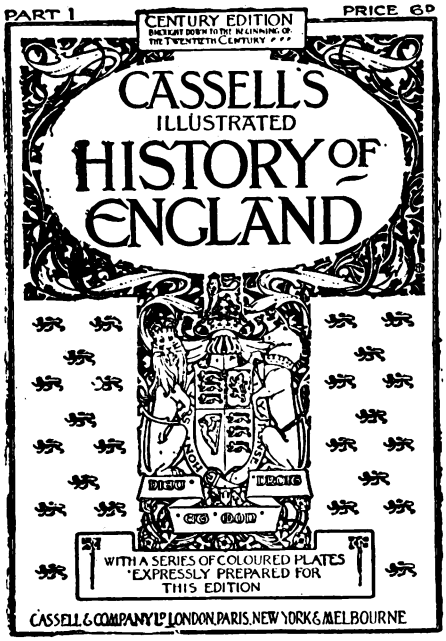
The Century Edition of Cassell's History of England



6d. WEEKLY

6d. WEEKLY

Leading Points of this Edition are :—

SUPERB COLOURED PLATES.

SUPERIOR PAPER.

Nearly 2,000 ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

CASSELL & Co., Ltd.,

LONDON, PARIS, NEW YORK & MELBOURNE.

And all Booksellers.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

THE FAR AWAY HEART.

(By Mrs. Jopling Rowe.)

Digitized by Google

The Society of Women Artists.

By MRS. HIRST ALEXANDER.

THE Society of Women Artists, whose exhibition is now open at the Galleries of the Royal Society of British Artists, Suffolk-street, Pall Mall East, owes its origin, forty-six years ago, to Mrs. Grote, the clever and liberal-minded wife of the historian, to that sweet singer, Madame Jenny Lind Goldschmidt, and some other ladies who gave their help and influence.

It has always been a useful body, and has long been a successful one. It has had for patronesses at different times T.R.H.'s the Duchess of Cambridge and the Duchess of Teck, and for the last six years H.R.H. the Duchess of York has taken her lamented mother's place as patroness of the Society.

But women artists in 1855 were working against great disabilities. So many of the recognised art societies refused to elect women members, even as someobject to do now. Nobody knows why! But there it is, and still more distressingly was in those dark days, before the dawn of the "Women's Era," when all that was expected of "young ladies" was that they should embroider a little, paint a little, play a little; idle, simper and faint a good deal; marry as quickly as possible, and, ever after, lose themselves and their little accomplishments in babies, buttons, and their husbands' dinners.

So these two great and good ladies, interested in art and the employment of women, and with the glimmer of the dawn in their eyes, nearly half a century ago, set about instituting a society which should materially assist those of their own sex, who, also, with their faces to the light, but so heavily handicapped, were turning their talents to account and trying to make a living by art, a society where the work exhibited should be exclusively done by women. A Committee was formed, a small gallery in Oxford-street

WINTER SHELTERING SLEEPING SPRING.
(By Florence Small.)

Digitized by Google

ROYAL HORSE ARTILLERY STUDY.
(By Countess Gleichen)
Photograph by Wm. E. Gray, 12, Queen's Road, Bayswater.

engaged, and the Society was un fait accompli.

It has proved the stepping stone to many well-known and famous artists. Among others, Lady Butler, then Miss Elizabeth Thompson, studied in its Life School (now given up), and first exhibited and sold pictures there. Madame Rosa Bonheur sent bronzes, and her sister, Madame Henriette Brown, exhibited under the Society's auspices, also Madame Bodichon, Mrs. E. M. Ward, and Mrs. Naftely. It has proved especially useful in bringing forward those beginning the work of art-life whose talents needed only a helping hand, a friendly push up to make them known to an appreciative and buying public—for though life may be short and art long, not even artists, however short their days may be, and they seem, as a rule, to span out the average existence of man, can feed, clothe, and house themselves on inspiration and air, colours and canvas alone. If it be for this service only to women, the raison d'être of the institution has been more than justified.

The Society moved its quarters several times during the first years of its existence. In 1865, the original promoters wishing to retire from office, the late Miss Ellen Partridge (sister of the present Secretary), and one of the early professional Members, feeling that failure of the Society would be a great loss to women painters, convened a meeting, the result being a re-organisation on new and improved lines. Miss Mary Atkinson offered to devote

A POTTERY SELLER, TANGIERS.
(By Mrs. Murray Cookesley.)

Digitized by Google

herself to the work as Hon. Secretary. Under her management the Association flourished for twenty years; the name was changed from the Society of Female Artists (its first title), to that of the Society of Lady Artists. Here I may state that it was again changed, three years ago, to its present one, viz.: The Society of Women Artists.

In 1885, the lamented decease of the Hon. Secretary brought other changes. On her death-bed, Miss Atkinson asked Miss Fanny E. Partridge to take her place in the work. Accordingly, this lady was appointed to the vacant position, which she has most ably filled ever since.

A BRIDE.
(By Florence Small.)

For several years the Society located itself in one of the Egyptian Galleries in Piccadilly, where many women artists of standing joined, and where its exhibitions were held with ever increasing success.

Hitherto only pictures and sculpture had been admitted to the exhibitions, but in 1895, after having arranged to hold them in the spacious rooms of the Society

PRIVILEGED.
(By Fannie Moody.)

Digitized by Google

of British Artists, the Committee decided to open two of their five galleries to handicraft-work of a high quality, thus increasing largely the sphere of usefulness, and bringing forward fresh interests with great advantage.

H.R.H. the Duchess of York has shown her appreciation of this department very practically by contributing last year an artistic cushion embroidered by herself. As patroness of the Society, the Princess takes a great and kindly interest in its welfare.

A glance at the membership list of the Society reveals many notable names. Among its honorary members are Lady Alma Tadema, Lady Butler and Lady Lindsay (R. Inst.).

A sick fund exists by which many members, when fallen into difficulties through ill health, have been helped and soothed. To this beneficent fund, the late Miss Mary Atkinson left a legacy of £100, the late Miss Landseer bequeathed a similar amount, another £100 was presented by Mrs. Eleanor Watt, in commemoration of the Queen's Diamond Jubilee and as a memento of her Majesty's well known sympathy with the art work of women. The Royal Academy donated £50, and the members themselves subscribe annually to this sick fund.

Out of fifty-eight members and associates and some four hundred exhibitors, it is manifest that the exigencies of space will only permit of the mention of a few representative ladies and their work.

The fifteen-years' President of the Society of Women Artists, Mrs. Marrable, is also Hon. Member of the Royal Belgian Society of Water Colours as well as Associate of the Roman Water Colour Society, and the M. Vereinder Schriptstellerinnen und Kunstlerinnen in Vien. Her metier is in water colour. For many years she painted foreign scenes and earned for herself the title of the "English painter of the Engadine." Mrs. Marrable still remains the only English depictor of the Engadine mountains, though other painters have devoted themselves to the flora of that beautiful part of Switzerland, only indicating its giant highlands in the distance. Of late years this clever lady has varied her work by painting English garden scenes. Her husband was an architect, and this aided her much in architectural drawing, of which she has made many studies in Rothenberg-au-Tauber, Venice and other places. These have been pronounced architecturally perfect by leading men of the profession. Her studio walls transplant you to the beauty spots of southern Europe, and again set you down amid the seclusion, glow, and colour of some of the choicest of English flower gardens. Her pictures are well known at the Royal Academy. Amongst others, "Moonlight over Sitz Lake, Moloya, Engadine;" and last year her "Old Surrey Cottage in Springtime" and "Cow Parsley" were hung on the line.

That Miss Helen Thornycroft (vice-president) should be an artist seems as natural as that she should be the daughter of her parents; they being both sculptors—the famous Thomas Thornycroft and his wife Mary. Of these two congenial spirits, she is the fourth daughter, one of her brothers being Mr. John Thornycroft, engineer and torpedo boat builder; and the other, Mr. Hamo Thornycroft, R.A. sculptor.

Miss Helen Thornycroft exhibited her first work at the Royal Academy when thirteen years of age—a bust of F. S. Thornycroft. She worked at modelling till she was sixteen, and then took to the brush, entering the Royal Academy Schools for a course of seven years' study. Since then this artist, and daughter of artists, has exhibited nearly every year at the Royal Academy, at first working most at sacred subjects: "St. Margaret," "The Martyrdom of St. Luke," "St. Sebastian" and "St. Rosalie," being among her notable pictures of this class. Although Miss Thornycroft occasionally still paints figures, and in the autumn holidays devotes herself to landscape, her speciality is perhaps flowers, which she paints in almost every variety; orchids more particularly.

The well-known artist, Madame Louisa Starr Canziani, though born in London, is the only child of Mr. Henry Starr of Philadelphia, of Puritan stock. When quite a girl she distinguished herself at the Royal Academy School by first carrying off the silver medal and the following year by capturing the gold medal and the accompanying scholarship of £60. These medals no woman had ever won before. The subject for the gold medal was "David brought before Saul." It was painted with infinite anxiety and trouble, and more than once was set aside in despair, but hope and determination conquered, with what final and victorious results the gold medal testified. The impression made upon the men artists was intense; they felt for the first time that the women painters of England were capable of serious work, and that men must look to their laurels if they meant to keep them. Miss Starr became a constant exhibitor at the Academy, the New Gallery, and at Manchester, Liverpool, and in the United States. Her "Sintram" was purchased by the Liverpool Corporation for the Walker Art Gallery Permanent Collection. In 1882 she married her cousin, M. Enrico Canziani, and four years after went to live in charming old Kensington, at No. 3, Palace Green, a delightful old house next door to Thackeray's abode, where she still resides and prosecutes her art labours.

Digitized by Google

MISS FANNY E. PARTRIDGE, THE HON. SECRETARY.
Photo by Army & Navy Auxiliary C.S., Ltd., Francis Street, Westminster.

Like many other distinguished figure painters, Madame Canziani has made portraiture a feature of her work. Without in the least losing the likeness, her genius transforms her delineations into picture-poems. Her elevated conceptions of art have been set forth in her address on "The Spirit of Purity in Art," delivered in the Art Section of the Women's International Congress in 1899. In it she says: "Is not the object of art to give us high ideals, as well as to open our perceptions to the charms of common life around us, and to bring beauty into our lives? If this be not the underlying motive of all art, should we not be better without it?" Again: "We must not depict the ugly or degraded without the saving spirit of the pathos which underlies all ugliness and degradation; we must not treat of wickedness without the saving grace of pity and horror; and evil must always be treated as what it really is—Tragedy—under no circumstances whatever being touched lightly or for mere amusement."

This gifted lady is a humanitarian as well as an artist, and deprecates the use of birds' feathers as ornaments, except in the case of birds used for food; also she is strongly adverse to the defacement of fields and cliffs by advertisements, and affirms that hoardings, shop windows, and the popular periodicals should be kept pure and made beautiful.

In Mrs. Jopling Rowe we have a living instance of a woman arriving at wifehood and motherhood before discovering her possession of a genius for wielding brush and pastel, and then almost at a bound

ARTISTIC CUSHION WORKED BY H.R.H. THE DUCHESS OF YORK.

Digitized by Google

making herself a name and fame; and yet all through her career never allowing her children to suffer a moment of neglect. She not only believes, but has proved, that women can work for themselves, look after their babies, and enjoy the society of their little ones fully as well as idle mothers. It was to support her two little children when left a widow at the early age of 23 that this courageous lady set herself to work. Hitherto her aspirations had been towards literature and music, for both of which she has considerable gifts, but the Baroness Nathaniel de Rothschild, having discovered her third and, perhaps, greatest gift, advised her to devote herself seriously to its cultivation. To this end she entered M. Chaplin's studio in Paris, where she was living, her deceased husband, Mr. Romer, having been secretary to Baron de Rothschild. In sixteen months her name was found in the catalogue of the Salon. This short course of study and a term at Heatherley's on her return to England, constitute all the regular teaching she ever had in drawing. Necessity, great natural talent and perseverance, did the rest. She wished much to enter the Royal Academy School of Art, but was strangely enough advised not to do so by Messrs. Frith, Tom Taylor, Shirley Brooks, and Mark Lemon. If she did, said they, she would lose all her individuality—her greatest charm. What she knows, this artist has learnt chiefly while working alone. "There is no other road to art," is her dictum, "but sheer old-fashioned hard work" and she maintains the truth of the famous declaration that "Genius is only an eye that can see Nature, a heart that can feel Nature, and boldness that dares follows Nature." She exhibited first at Burlington House in 1871. Since then she has been a regular contributor to its displays and to those of the Grosvenor Gallery and of the Women Artists. Deciding finally to make portrait painting her vogue, she still believed in the day of small things and accepted whatever work came to hand, and has never yet repented it. Mrs. Rowe married, for a second time, Mr. Jopling, employed in the War Office and himself an artist of no mean repute. This gentleman died in 1884, and four years after she became the wife of Mr. Rowe, a clever lawyer—a practical demonstration that matrimony need not in any way interfere with a woman's successful career as an artist.

Mrs. Jopling Rowe is a member of the Pastel Society, the Portrait Painters' and the Leicester Water Colour Societies. Her portraiture of famous people includes Lord Rothschild, Miss Ellen Terry, Mr. Gully, Speaker of the House of Commons, and many other celebrities. Her own portrait, painted by Sir John Millais, is a striking feature of her singularly beautiful and attractive drawing-room at her house in Kensington. This portrait, which was a gift from the painter to his godson—a son of Mrs. Jopling—drew crowds of people when exhibited some years ago in Bond Street. Three of her most beautiful works are "The Far Away Heart," "Blue and White," and "Dear Lady Disdain," which are reproduced with this article.

This artist is the one notable lady painter who has founded an Art School, of which she is herself the presiding genius and directress. The school is erected in the grounds of her residence, and is organised on the lines of the best Parisian Schools. She is a born teacher, and brings her pupils at once face to face with Nature. In spite of her school work, she never fails to send one or two canvases each year to the chief London exhibitions.

To her intense love of animals, Miss Frances Fairman largely owes her unique success as a painter of dogs. She has been called "the greatest woman dog painter of her day and of any day." Life-like presentments of her four-footed friends look wistfully at you from the walls and easels of her fine studio in the Fulham-road, and little bundles of affection in the shape of three live Jap doggies trot after you as you move about the room, insistent on notice and caresses. That the animals return Miss Fairman's affection is evidenced by the delight with which she is hailed by her old sitters when she meets them at dog shows and other places. By reason of this sympathy and the quickness with which she works, she is enabled to portray dogs unmanageable to other animal painters. With a strong leaning towards Art she studied as a girl under Mr. F. Moscheles and afterwards in Paris, but in animal painting she has never had a lesson. It is only of late years that she has turned her extraordinary gift for dog portraiture to any other account than that of pleasure to herself and her friends. But a turn in the wheel of fortune determined her to take it up as a a profession, and in a very short time she has gained the topmost rung of the ladder of notable dog painters.

Digitized by Google

While visiting Sir Dighton and Lady Probyn a few years ago, Miss Fairman made some clever sketches of the latter's Jap spaniels, which were afterwards exhibited at Burlington House under the title of "The Platter Clean." The picture was among the most admired of canine canvasses. Whilst on this visit the artist and her work were presented to H.R.H. the Princess of Wales, the result being an immediate commission from the Princess to paint her pets, Punchie, Facey, and Little Billie. The first-named is a much-travelled animal. Punchie has accompanied her Royal Highness on all her journeys for several years, sleeping always in her room. Facey was also her travelling companion, but, alas! he has gone to the happy hunting grounds where all good doggies go He was found dead in his basket a few mornings after his portrait was painted. Facey was a great favourite of his Royal mistress, was a splendid sitter, and seemed always to have a special smile for the Princess when

DEAR LADY DISDAIN.
(By Mrs. Jopling Rowe.)

Digitized by Google

she came into the room. Little Billie is a Pekinese spaniel—pure white, with light brindle markings. The Princess, by the way, is a very good artist among her many accomplishments, and had she time to work, would paint dogs very well herself.

Since then Miss Fairman has painted many dogs for the Queen, the Prince of Wales and other members of the Royal family, who have a fashion of getting each other's canine favourites portrayed and presenting them to their respective owners as birthday and Christmas presents. Among them are Oscar, a special pet of her Majesty; Alfio, a son of the famous Marco, who always travelled with the Queen in her own saloon; the Dandie Dinmont, Venus, belonging to the late Duke of Clarence, who ever since the latter's sad death has been the close and faithful follower of the Prince of Wales; Ayah, an old pug, the nursery pet of the children of Princess Beatrice; an aged dachshund belonging to Prince Christian, the picture being a present to him from her Majesty; an Irish terrier belonging to the late Prince Henry of Battenberg, also a present from the Queen to the Princess Beatrice. Many other celebrated dogs has Miss Fairman painted—great ladies' pets, champions and famous prize winners.

BUTTERCUPS.

Portrait of the Daughter of Mr. J. Calvert, by Madame Louisa Starr Canziani. Reproduced by courtesy of the "Lady's Pictorial."

Photograph by Hy. Dixon & Son, 112, Albany Street, W.

Of the work of Miss Florence Small (Mrs. Deric Hardy), which is chiefly in pastel, it has been said that "its charm is the quiet silent spirit of sympathy that runs through it." Born and educated at Nottingham, she studied art in Geneva, Berlin and Paris. Her first exhibited picture appeared at Nottingham Castle, the next year she was represented at the Royal Academy. Among her many well-known pictures are "Welcome News," "Mushroom Girl," "The Poet," "A Dirge," "Autumn Leaves," "Chantry Girls Singing in Marylebone Church," "Winter Sheltering Sleeping Spring," "A Bride," etc. There is hardly any large exhibition where examples of her distinctive and sensitive art are not to be found. Nottingham early began to be proud of her and to refer to her as "their talented and gifted young townswoman," but she has long left her popular studio in "The Park" of her native town, and after her marriage she made her home in London, living in a pretty house near Regent's Park, where her studio is filled with delicately vigorous portraits and subject pictures. A critic has written, "The words that would seem to me fit to associate with her paintings assume the shape of a poem, however small it may be." And yet, like all true artists, Mrs. Hardy is never satisfied with what she has done. She is a member of the Pastel Society. Speaking of her favourite medium she says that with it she can get effects unattainable in any other. Her portraits are remarkable for the masterly hand with which they are drawn, and the knowledge of anatomy, colour, light, and shade shown in every line.

Digitized by Google

Miss Grace H. Hastie is another prominent member. She studied under Naftel, who encouraged her to make art her profession. For the Society of Women Artists, of which she is Auditor and Trustee, she has a strong affection, and says, "To it I owe much. My first pictures were exhibited there, and it proved a 'stepping stone to higher things.'" Her deep desire is, because of this Society's great usefulness, and the encouragement given to its continued helpfulness by the best work being seen there, that all the leading women artists should be represented at its exhibitions.

Miss E. M. Osborn is a very clever figure and landscape painter. A picture of hers which attracted much attention, called "The Governess," was bought by Her Majesty.

The Countess Helena Gleichen, fourth daughter of the late Prince Victor of Hohenlohe and grand niece of the Queen, has inherited her father's artistic tastes. The Prince was a sculptor; the Countess Helena is a clever animal painter; her favourite subjects being horses. Her power to depict these faithful friends of men in peace and of soldiers in war is told to every trained eye that looks upon her pictures.

BLUE AND WHITE.
(By Mrs. Jopling Rowe.)
Photograph by Hy. Dixon & Son, 112, Albany Street, W.

Another animal painter, who, it may be supposed, has inherited her artistic instincts from her father, is Miss Fannie Moody (Mrs. G. King), daughter of Mr. Francis W. Moody, an artist and lecturer for twenty years on Decorative Art at the South Kensington Museum. Owing to the sudden death of this parent, Miss Moody's studies were cut short, and beyond a course of twelve lessons in anatomy, she is entirely self-taught. To her patient study of Landseer's works in the South Kensington Museum and the National Gallery, to her hard work and love of art, she owes her success, and the prominent position she has made for herself. She has been well represented at the Royal Academy, and all the best galleries. She is kept busy with commissions to paint favourite horses, dogs and cats, and illustrates children's books, besides sketching for leading illustrated journals.

Digitized by Google

Mrs. Murray Cookesley devotes her brush chiefly to Eastern subjects, having travelled much in Oriental lands with her husband, Captain Cookesley, and we reproduce two of her pictures, "A Pottery Seller of Tangiers," and "An Indian Doorway." When reverses came, Mrs. Cookesley, like so many brave women, turned her talent, exercised hitherto as a clever amateur, into gold by her felicitous presentments of scenes and people she had become acquainted with in her days of happy voyaging. She is another inspiring example of what women can do under the spur of necessity. Her handsome studio at 7, Cromwell Place—once occupied by Sir John Millais — is adorned with curios picked up in her travels. Pictures on walls and easels are brilliant with the colour and atmosphere of the East. Prominent is one entitled "La Pluie d'Or," representing a dusky beauty in the gorgeous apparel of the Orient, reclining under a yellow rain of laburnum flower. Again there are Meccan watersellers, Soudanese camel drivers, stately mosques, Sheiks and Dervishes and all the varied life of the Nile. So popular are Mrs. Cookesley's pictures that no sooner are they completed than they are sold. The have gone to enrich the collections of many lovers of Art. "An Arab Café in the Slums of Cairo" was her Academy success of 1895. Among her many well-known pictures are "The Snake Charmer," "The Belle of Pompeii," and "Damascus." She has been equally successful in her Western studies, as her "Puritan's Daughter" and other works of the kind testify. When staying with her cousin, Sir Vincent Caillard, at Constantinople, Mrs. Cookesley was commissioned to paint a portrait of the Sultan's son and heir. So charmed was the Sultan with it when completed, that he invested the painter with a high Turkish Order and a medal, and asked her to sketch his wives. This clever lady designed the beautiful series of living pictures at the Crystal Palace some years ago, and more recently those of "The Harem" in "Constantinople," and "The Temple of Venus" at Olympia.

Mrs. Mary L. Waller, wife of the artist, Mr. S. E. Waller, is essentially a portrait painter. Her endeavour is always to give the most excellent presentment of what she sees, rather than to idealise her subject. She catches a likeness with marvellous power, and her pictures show her to be rich in the qualities that make the art of successful portraiture. Her innumerable commissions, both past and present, are the best proof of the recognition of her talents. Among her late portraits are those of Earl and Countess Fitzwilliam; Lord Cochrane; Lady Marjorie and the Hon. Douglas Cochrane; Miss Dyonis Micklethwait, and Don Marescotti Ruspoli, son of Prince Mario Ruspoli of the Italian Embassy. The two last were exhibited in the Royal Academy (1900), to which parent institute Mrs. Waller has been a contributor for many years. She is a member of the Portrait Painters' Society.

Mrs. Kate Perugini devotes herself chiefly to the painting of children's portraits, but she also finds time for many subject pictures, and in the spring season there are generally to be found one or more of her works reproduced in some of the illustrated magazines and newspapers.

An almost self-taught artist is Miss Stewart Wood, for, beyond a short training at the Slade School and a few months in Paris, her art education is entirely due to her own close study of Nature. Many months of the year she spends in the country for this purpose. Of late years Sussex has been the field from whence she has gathered her best subjects. Amongst them are "Arundel Castle," shown at the Paris Exhibition; "The First Breath of Autumn," exhibited at Earl's Court; "The Sheep Fold," and "Old Church at Sullington." She has been always well represented at Burlington House and other prominent galleries, also at the Guildhall, and three of her pictures are in Mr George McCulloch's collection, Queen's Gate.

In pen and ink work, Miss Lily de Montmorency attracted the notice and commendation of the late Sir Frederick

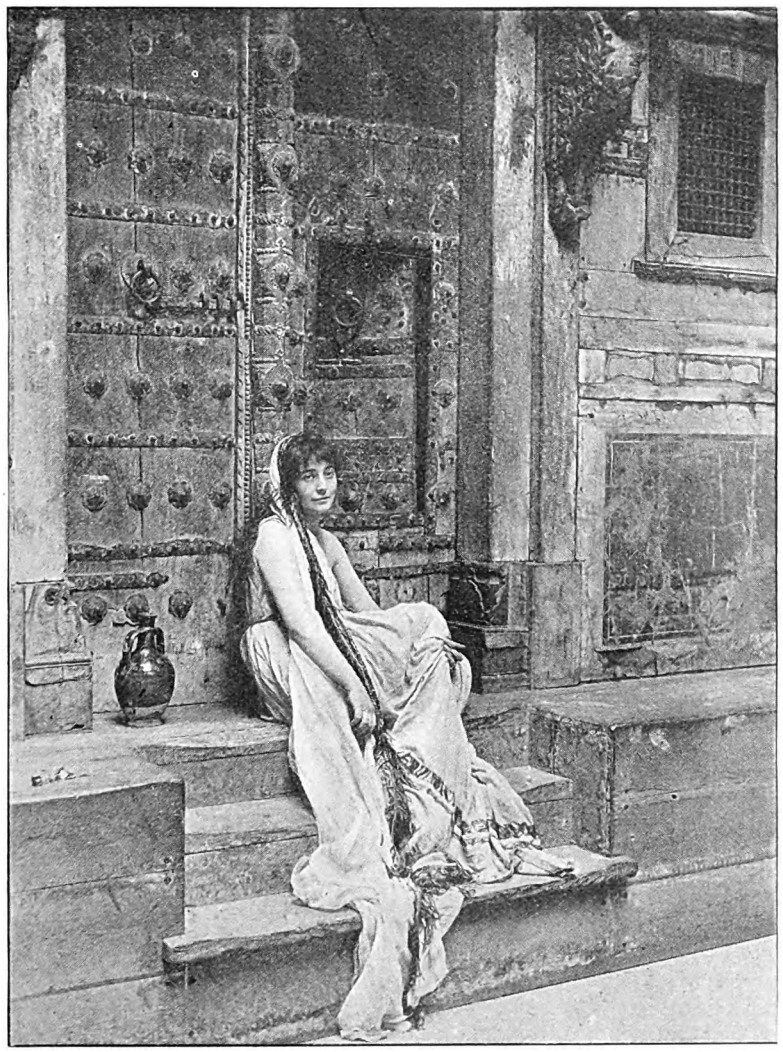
Digitized by Google

Leighton. She was only sixteen when she first exhibited at the Lady Artists' Society. Two years later her black and white drawing was represented at the Royal Academy. She has lately gained Professor Von Herkomer's prize for the best work competed for by the whole of his schools, and may well claim a good place among rising artists.

To the photographic department of the S.W.A.'s Exhibition, Lady Gilmour, of Montrave, is a clever and liberal contributor. She is very enthusiastic in her work and gives no thought to trouble, discomfort, time, or pains, so long as she attains her object—a good, interesting, and artistic photograph.

In her Highland home at Montrave, in Fife, Lady Gilmour, in her launch, steams over the beautiful lochs, with captain, engineer, and maid, on photography bent. Landing on some island, she approaches the haunt of the sea-gulls, and there, stalking them like stags, with infinite pains and manœuvres, she takes shots as opportunity offers. Or again held by the skirts she leans over a cliff to get a snap at a nest built in its crest, the birds swooping down angrily on the disturbers of their seclusion. The work is thoroughly enjoyed by this true lover of her art, as also are the tossings and fresh breezes, while, rolled up in Highland plaids, she drinks tea afloat; and the rest after the day's exertions, with a good Highland supper ashore. Some of her camera expeditions are made on pony-back.

The Society make it a feature of their annual displays to show the artistic creations of women of any period—a very practical and attractive method of comparison between ancient and modern Art, as well as source of information as to the progress and development, or otherwise, of the ideals of each generation represented.



AN INDIAN DOORWAY.
(By Mrs. Murray Cookesley.)

MARY HIRST ALEXANDER.

Digitized by Google

My First Sermon.

By THE REV. JAMES C. BREWITT.

(Ex-President of the United Methodist Free Churches.)

ONE Saturday afternoon in the month of March, 1862, a good minister came to the shop in which I was serving as an apprentice. My calling was that of chemist and druggist. The shop and the town, Spalding, have little altered since then, and my master still lives, doing goodly service, although bent by the weight and covered by the snows of more than fourscore years. A little chapel in the village of Cowbit, well known to the skating fraternity, needed some one to take the service on the following afternoon. In spite of remonstrance the good minister left the responsibility with me, and went his way.

Without text or sermon, and without any knowledge of making one, the burden pressed upon me. Whilst attending to my calling, the text came. On the Sunday afternoon with great fear I found my way to the village. Passing the parish church, where about a dozen lads and young men were loitering, one of them said, "There goes the Methodist preacher." Having arrived at the chapel and announced to the official that Mr. B—— was too ill to take the service, with solemn visage he conducted me to the pulpit.

The service began in the usual way, and before the prayer, the village lads, who had declared me to be "The Methodist Preacher," came in. I prayed for them specially. In due course I gave out my text—"Behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation." My introduction was a few words on the differences existing in St. Paul's two letters to the church in Corinth. My two points were—

I.—Salvation needed.

II.—Time for salvation—now.

I spoke about 20 minutes. Excitement prevented me breaking down. Walking home with a man of years, he asked, "How long have you been preaching?" "Not long," was the reply. "Are you an Independent?" "No." "A Baptist, then?" "No." "What are you?" "A Free Methodist," I replied. Said the man, "But I never heard of you before!" To which I replied, "That is very probable." Not content, the good man asked, "Why don't you stop and take the night service?" The astonishment of the man was great, and his questioning ceased when I said, "I could not stay, for all the sermons I have you have heard." We walked in silence for a time, and then turning to me he said, with some emphasis, "I thought you were an old hand!"

REV. JAMES C. BREWITT.

Digitized by Google

An Hour with Dean Farrar.

By WILLIAM SIDEBOTHAM.

THE question is often asked, "Who is our greatest and most popular preacher?" If a plebescite were taken on the point it is probable that the present Dean of Canterbury would be assigned a very prominent place by the public voice. For about twenty years he was, in addition to being Archdeacon of Westminster, Rector of St. Margaret's—more popularly known as the House of Commons' Church—and succeeded by his intellectual precedency in attracting immense congregations, comprising all classes of society, from peers of the realm to the poorest people in his large parish. He had previously been one of the assistant masters at Harrow under Dr. Vaughan and his successor Dr. Butler. He subsequently held with great distinction the Head-mastership of Marlborough College, and among other important positions he has occupied are: Hulsean Lecturer at Cambridge, Bampton Lecturer at Oxford, and Select Preacher at both these Universities, besides being one of her Majesty's chaplains in ordinary.

He has written numerous philological and theological works, which have had a permanent influence on our national habits of thought and expression, and in his earlier years he wrote several works of fiction.

I was recently favoured with an interview with the eminent litterateur and theologian, and succeeded in obtaining some interesting information for the readers of the TEMPLE MAGAZINE as to his home life and surroundings at Canterbury—that venerable city where Christianity in England had its birth.

Nor is this all its claim, for, as Dean Stanley points out, "from the Christianity here established has flowed by direct consequence—first, the Christianity to Germany; then, after a long interval, to North America; and lastly, we may trust, in time to all India and all Australia.

"The view from St. Martin's Hall is indeed one of the most inspiriting that can be found in the world; there is none to which I would more willingly take anyone who doubted whether a small beginning could lead to a great and lasting good; none which carries us more vividly back into the past or more hopefully forward to the future."

Photograph by CANTERBURY CATHEDRAL. Colborne Canterbury.

The Deanery is situated on the eastern side of the Green

Digitized by Google

Court, which is entered by the Prior's Gate, where, from a porch opening from the infirmary cloister (now known as the Dark Entry), was formerly the great outer court of the monastery. The fine trees and turf contrast admirably with the ancient buildings by which the court is surrounded. The scene is, indeed, a remarkable one; and it is stated by those who are competent to give an opinion, that the precincts of no great church or cathedral either in this country or on the Continent are more striking or more beautiful. On every side are the ancient buildings which are hallowed by the memories of the past; here formerly existed the dormitories, refectory, butteries, kitchen, and cellars of the monks, together with the chambers for hospitality, built by Prior Chillenden, about the year 1400.

The Deanery is formed, for the most part, from the edifice called the New Lodging, built as an hospitium for guests by Prior Goldstone in 1495. It at first contained many "chambers, dining halls and solars," and was chosen by the first Dean, Nicholas Wootton, as his residence. The interior has, however, been altered from time to time. From the Deanery a commanding view of the Cathedral is obtained, and the student of history, as he gazes at the stately edifice, cannot but recall the important events which have taken place there since the landing of Augustine: the conversion of Ethelbert, the crowning, marriage and burial of England's Kings, and the murder of Thomas à Becket, which inspired those pilgrimages which were regarded throughout the middle ages as a mark of especial piety. Chaucer in the prologue to his "Canterbury Tales," sings:

"Thanne longen folk to gon on pilgrimages,
And Palmers for to seeken straunge strondes
To ferne halwes, Kouthe in sondry londes;
And specially, from every schires ende
Of Engelond, to Caunterbury they wende,
The holy blissful martir for to seeke,
That hem have holpen whan that they were seeke."

When I called at the Deanery, Dr. Farrar had not returned from officiating at the morning service in the Cathedral. I was shown into his study, and while waiting had the opportunity to "look round." It is a large room, most handsomely and artistically furnished; there are books, rare editions and in various languages, in bookcases along the two principal walls of the room; beautiful oil paintings, the chief of which are portraits of some of the former deans; and tables containing choice curios from all parts of the world.

A flood of sunlight enters the room by two large mullioned windows, in one of which Dr. Farrar sits at his table when engaged in literary work. I saw the tall and erect figure of the Dean coming along the garden path. He was carrying a bible under his arm, and was attired in his white surplice and doctor's hood, and was wearing a college cap. A few minutes later he entered the room and greeted me most cordially. On stating the object of my visit, he modestly remarked: "I am afraid I cannot give you much information, but I will do what I can for you."

By way of opening the conversation I observed: "I should be glad if you would give me some reminiscences of your early life."

"That subject is too large for me to refer to in detail," he said, "but I may briefly state that my education began at a small Latin Grammar School at Aylesbury. I then went to the Isle of Man to live with my parents, and was a student at King William's College. My parents only stayed in the island for a year, and when they returned to India I became a boarder at the College.

"I remained there until I was sixteen, when my father was appointed to the charge of the Parish of St. James's, Clerkenwell. I again went to reside with my parents, and became a student at King's College, in the Strand.

"After being there for three years I was fortunate to obtain the Matriculation Scholarship and also the B.A. Scholarship at the London University, gaining the first prize at both examinations.

"I then proceeded to Trinity College, Cambridge, where I gained the Chancellor's prize for English Verse and the Le Bas Classical Prize. I became also Norrisian Prizeman, and was eventually elected a Fellow. While I was studying at Trinity, Bishop Cotton asked me to help him at Marlborough College, and after graduating, I went there, taking charge of the sixth form. One of the first boys under my charge, whom I took a special interest in at Marlborough, is now Archbishop of Sydney, another is the present Archbishop of Glasgow."

Digitized by Google

"What led you to take Holy Orders, may I ask?"

"It was always my intention to enter the Church. I was ordained deacon in 1854 by the Bishop of Salisbury, and three years later was admitted into priest's orders by the Bishop of Ely."

After being a short time at Marlborough College, Mr. Farrar, as he was then, was asked by Dr. Vaughan to go to Harrow, and, from first to last, he was there for sixteen years. He afterwards became head-master of Marlborough, staying there for nearly six years.

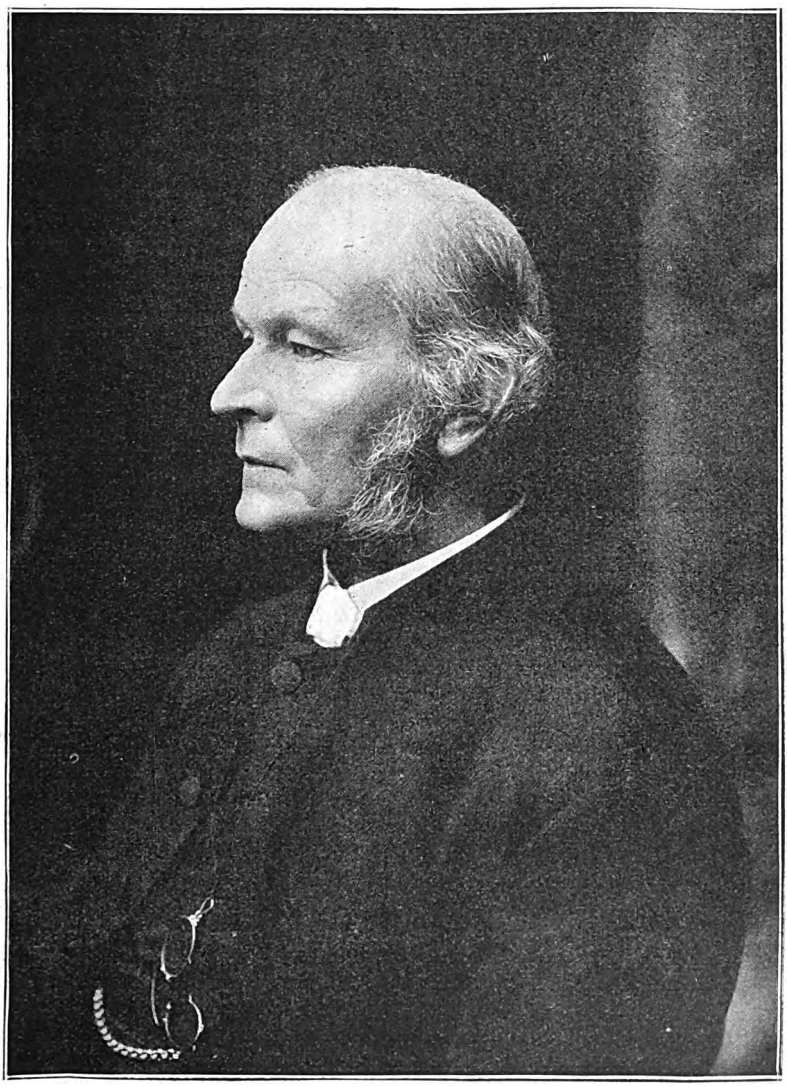
Lord Beaconsfield then offered him a canonry in Westminster Abbey, and the rectory of St. Margaret's, which he accepted. Eventually he was appointed Archdeacon of Westminster. Some years later he became chaplain to the House of Commons, many members of which had for years attended St. Margaret's.

Dr. Farrar spoke with affection of his old parish, saying: "I spent nineteen very happy and active years at Westminster. The parish, always an interesting one, was, when I became rector, very different from what it is now; it contained a great many slums which have since been demolished; but I had an army of most excellent workers, including a staff of admirable curates (among whom was my son Eric, who is now vicar of Hoxton), who rendered invaluable aid in attending to the spiritual needs of my parishioners."

"I suppose during the time you were at Harrow and Marlborough you had under your charge a number of boys who have since become distinguished in the Church and in other walks of life?"

"Yes; seven or eight are now Bishops; a number are members of Parliament; and others have become prominent in other ways."

The battle for educational reform has for many years been raging in academical circles. Lord Rosebery, in his Rectorial



Photograph by THE VERY REV. DEAN FARRAR, D.D. Colborne, Canterbury.

Digitized by Google

Address to the students of Glasgow University, lamented the fact that the most illustrious of our public schools have no modern side. He pointed out that both Oxford and Cambridge still exact their dole of Latin and Greek, and expressed the opinion that from an Imperial point of view, having regard to the changed conditions of the world, this was neither necessary, adequate, nor wise. The ex-Premier conceded Latin as a training instrument and a universal language; but in regard to Greek, while admitting that it enshrined perhaps the noblest of literatures, and that to learned men it was a necessity, he deprecated the idea that it was the imperative equipment of the ordinary youth of the nineteenth century, who had so many other things to learn in order to be equal to his age. He added that when our national ignorance of foreign languages had become not merely a by-word, but almost a commercial disaster, we might reconsider part of our educational apparatus.

TABLE IN THE STUDY AT WHICH THE DEAN COMPOSES HIS SERMONS.
Photograph by the Author.

As a distinguished man of letters and as one who had had the control of a large public school, I asked Dr. Farrar what his views were on this subject, and he replied: "Latin and Greek are, for a large number of boys, invaluable, because they are the key to the highest ancient history of the world. They are great languages in themselves, besides possessing the most splendid literatures. But when I was a master at Harrow, I very strongly opposed the wasting of time of a large number of boys who had no capacity for the study. I also in 1868 delivered a lecture at the Royal Institution urging that science should be introduced into our schools. A committee was afterwards formed which included myself, Professor Huxley, Professor Tyndal, and Archdeacon Wilson, and we drew up a report on the subject of scientific education, and I spoke on the subject at a meeting of the British Association in the same year. That was really the beginning of a very great impulse towards introducing science into the curriculum of our schools. There is now scarcely a single grade school which has not got its science master. When I went to Marlborough one of the first things I did was to appoint a science master. A large number of the boys took up the study with most beneficial results."

This naturally led me to ask the Dean, in view of the claim put forward by certain persons that science is antagonistic to religion, what his views were on the subject. His eyes sparkled and he replied with vehemence that those who taught such a doctrine as that were either very ignorant or were possessed of very shallow minds, adding that "science is the interpretation of the laws of God's universe; it deepens our belief in everything that is lofty and ennobling, and it increases the knowledge of our conception of God and religion."

Photograph by THE STUDY. the Author.

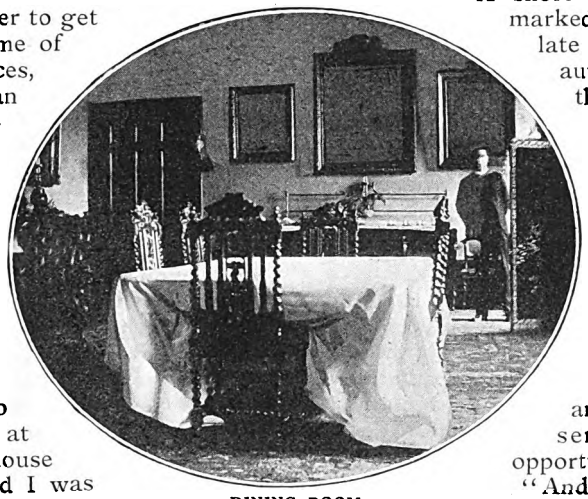
One of the most eloquent and original preachers of our time, and displaying in his sermons the ripest scholarship, Dean

Digitized by Google

Farrar also possesses the happy knack of adapting his discourses to the congregation he addresses. As a temperance advocate and lecturer he is unsurpassed; as a writer he has contributed to commentaries both in Greek and English editions, and has written widely on various educational subjects. In order to get him to relate some of his early experiences, I asked the Dean whether he remembered the first sermon he preached. He smiled and said: "I preached my first sermon on the very day I was ordained at Salisbury. A clergyman who was to preach at Salisbury workhouse was taken ill, and I was asked to officiate for him. I remember it was a Christmas day, and that very afternoon I went to the workhouse and delivered my first sermon."



DINING ROOM.
Photograph by the Author.

"Have you any idea as to the number of sermons you have preached?"

"No, but ever since I was ordained, except in the holidays, there have been very few Sundays for a period of about forty-five years on which I have not preached. I have also preached on weekdays, besides delivering numerous speeches and addresses. I have preached in every cathedral in England except three — Carlisle, Exeter, and Lichfield. In regard to these three, I have often been asked to preach there, but owing to various causes I have been prevented. I have also preached in almost every great city in England and several in Scotland; also at the chief universities in both England and Scotland. At Canterbury I do not officiate so often. According to the statute, a Dean has only to preach three sermons a year, but I preach much more frequently than that, and I am constantly called upon to go elsewhere."

DRAWING ROOM.
Photograph by the Author.

"A short time ago" I remarked, "I read in the late Mr. Spurgeon's autobiography that the famous preacher used to devote a certain portion of each Saturday to the preparation of his sermons. Do you adopt a similar method?"

"No, my time is very limited, and I write my sermons whenever opportunity offers."

"And now as to your books. Which do you consider your magnum opus?"

"Oh, undoubtedly the "Life of Christ," which reached its twelfth edition in a single year. A remarkable feature of this work is that there have been two separate translations in Russia; it has also been translated into French, Swedish, Norwegian, German, Italian, and Dutch. Many of my other works have also been very popular both at home and abroad."

"But what about the works of fiction you have written?"

"You mean the boys' stories which I wrote when I was a young man—'Eric,' and 'Julian Home.' Yes, they also have been very successful. There is scarcely a week passes in which I do not receive some letters of thanks or commendation from perfect strangers who have read these books. My 'Eternal Hope' has also had a very wide circulation all over the world, and I constantly receive letters in regard to this book."

Digitized by Google

"Much has been said about the poverty of the clergy and the falling off in the number of persons admitted into Holy Orders. I should be glad if you will tell me what your views are as to the prospects of young men of talent who enter the Church?"

The answer of Dr. Farrar was significant. He said: "Any one who takes Holy Orders must do so from the highest possible motives. If a young man enters the Church merely to get rich he may be grievously disappointed, for he may be appointed to a country parish and stay there for years. I think the extreme poverty of some of the clergy is a very serious evil, and often leads to a vast amount of distress.

"A clergyman ought not to marry unless he sees some prospect of maintaining a family. Cases of destitute children of clergymen often come before me. We have an admirable school here—St. Edmund's—which provides education for the sons of clergymen without means. However, I think that a young man who has real ability and does his work thoroughly is not very likely to be passed over. He, in all probability, would be appointed to a living.

"One more question and I have done. What are your recreations?"

"Well," answered the Dean, with a smile, "I have not much time for recreation, and I am getting an old man. In the summer I occasionally join in the ancient game of bowls, and I sometimes play chess in the evening."

Dr. Farrar then pointed out to me the most interesting features of his beautiful home. During a period of 350 years—since the Reformation—there have been thirty-one Deans, and all their portraits, which are painted in oils, adorn the walls of the Deanery. No other cathedral has such a complete record. I was shown over the various rooms and gardens, and granted permission to take photographs of them. At the conclusion of my visit I shook hands with the Dean, and expressed my gratitude to him for his kindness in granting me the interview.

Photograph by THE CATHEDRAL CLOISTERS. Colborne, Canterbury.

WILLIAM SIDEBOTHAM.

Digitized by Google

NELL'S MISTAKE.

By ADELINE SERGEANT.

I.

"SHE is a dear child," said old Mr. Essendine kindly. "A little too frivolous in her tastes, perhaps; a little too much inclined to take things lightly. But, no doubt, seriousness will come with years."

"Who could think of wanting Nell to be serious?" said Richard Talbot, with a smile in his dark eyes. "She is sunshine incarnate. I would not have her changed, sir, for the world."

He was always more deferential to Mr. Essendine, the Rector of Little Easton, than to other people, and this, not because he had been the Rector's pupil in bygone years, nor even because he was betrothed to Eleanor Essendine, the Nell of whom they were speaking, and Mr. Essendine's grand-daughter, but because he had a thorough respect and liking for the dear old man, who seemed to him the perfection of a scholar and parish priest. Richard Talbot was a man who appreciated true worth whenever he encountered it; and since those days of his pupilage he had made it a frequent practice to appear at the Rectory for a Sunday or a longer holiday at Easter and Whitsuntide, pleading in excuse that it was to him the most home-like spot in all the world.

He was a barrister, with chambers in town. Everyone said that he was a rising man. He was fortunate enough to be tolerably independent of his profession, at which, however, he toiled as though it were his only means of procuring his daily bread. But at his busiest seasons Little Easton had periodical attraction for him; and it was during one of these visits that he engaged himself to Nell Essendine, who had lived with her grandparents at the Rectory since she was two years old.

"I believe he loves grandpapa and the Rectory a good deal more than me," Miss Nell had been heard to say, with a toss of her dainty head. But Richard Talbot repelled the accusation with a smile.

Nell was one of the most winsome little maidens in the world. She was twenty now, but she scarcely looked more than seventeen, for the little figure was wonderfully slight and lissome. The brown eyes smiled in company with the rosy mouth, aud the dark, short curls danced as if with glee about her broad brow and delicate pointed little face. It was not everyone who discerned that there was plenty of intelligence and thoughtfulness in the broad brow, or resolution in the curve of the pretty lips. To almost all, she appeared simply a child, happy in the pleasure of the moment but hardly grown to the full measure of her womanhood.

And Richard was a peculiarly grave and serious man; somewhat austere in manner, perhaps, somewhat more frigid than his good heart justified him in being, a lover of books and of what is best in literature and art, ten years older than Nell Essendine, and looking older than his years. Many a person said that the two were not very well fitted for each other, and wondered that the Rector and his wife were so well satisfied with the engagement. But Mr. and Mrs. Essendine understood Richard Talbot's nature, and were delighted to think that he would some day become the husband of their little Nell.

"Sunshine incarnate!" the Rector repeated slowly, when Talbot had said the words. "Well, it describes her fairly. But what if the sunshine should fade, Richard? What if tempest and storm should come?"

"I shall think of the sunshine behind the cloud, sir," said the young man with a smile, "and remember that even the clouds of life are not permanent."

"Perhaps not, perhaps not," murmured Mr. Essendine. "Yet some of them may last us all our lives."

Digitized by Google

His fine, gentle face was overcast with a shadow that Richard could not understand.

"There is nothing wrong, I hope, sir?" he said, solicitously.

"Nothing is wrong that God sends, Richard. Still, some things are hard to bear. There is a trial coming upon me. God grant I may bear it patiently. My boy, I am fast losing my sight—I am going blind!"

Talbot uttered a shocked exclamation, and then asked a few rapid questions, the answers to which speedily convinced him that the Rector had had the best advice, and there was no possibility of mistake about the matter. No operation, no form of treatment, could avail. In a very few weeks the sight of both eyes would be gone for ever.

"But you must not say anything about it to my wife, or to Eleanor, Richard," said the Rector. "I have not told them yet. My wife knows that my sight is defective, but I have not dared to tell her that it is practically gone."

"You will have to tell them soon, sir."

"Yes, Richard, I shall. But I must take my own time. It is fortunate for me that my curate, young Gaylord, is such a capable man. He can help me a great deal. I know the service by heart, and I shall still be able to preach to my people."

Talbot was a good deal moved. He put out his hand almost involuntarily and grasped that of the elder man. "If there is anything I can do, sir, you will let me know."

"Thank you, Dick, but there is nothing. You will be kind to little Nell when she is your wife? That is all I ask."

And Dick Talbot's answer rang strong and true: "Kind to Nell, sir? I should be a brute if I were not."

They sat in silence for a little while after this, and then the Rector got up and moved away through the ivy-covered porch into the house, declining the arm which Talbot would so willingly have offered him.

"I can find my way as yet, Richard. By-and-by I may be glad of your help," the old man said.

And Richard sat down again on the bench upon the little terrace above the lawn, and wondered whether Nell knew anything about the misfortune which hung over the Rector's head.

She was flitting about in her white gown in the rose-garden beyond the lawn. And as the sun sank in a golden flood of glory, and the heavy scents of the tall white lilies and damask roses were wafted to Richard's nostrils, he was saying to himself, half-impatiently:

"She does not know. She does not guess what the poor old man is feeling. Is he right? Is she merely a child—too young, too shallow, perhaps, to grasp the meaning of life?"

He was ashamed of himself a moment later, as she came towards him with shining eyes and a great bunch of roses in her hand.

"I saw that grandpapa had left you alone," she said. "I waited until he had gone; he does so like a talk with you, Dick, dear."

She generally called him Dick. It had always been his name in those far-off days when Mr. Essendine had coached him for his examinations, and Nell had been only a plaything of a tiny girl. Somehow the name seemed less appropriate now.

"Have you not noticed that he is looking very sad, Nell?" he asked her, rather wistfully.

"Well, now you mention it," said Nell brightly, "I think he has been a little down in the mouth of late. What is the matter with him, poor old dear? It must be the prospect of losing me, don't you think so?"

Richard did not answer. He was a little jarred by Nell's manner. Perhaps, in spite of his declaration that he would not have her other than herself, he did feel at that moment as if she ought to be more serious. Yet, how could she know, poor child, that her grandfather had such trouble hanging over him? He reproached himself for his momentary impatience, and turned towards her with a caressing gesture and a smile.

"Who would not be sad at the prospect of losing you?" he said; and Nell laughed happily, as though she had not a trouble in the world.

But when he was gone, and the rosy glory of sunset was fading into the twilight of a summer's night, she stood gazing out across the garden and into the purple distance with a new thoughtfulness, a new, strange gravity upon her delicate little face.

"What is it?" she said to herself. "What makes him speak to me as if I were only a child? I feel sometimes as if he thought, as grandpapa thinks, that I am not in earnest about anything. Ah, well, some day they will know better. And after all," she added with a smile at her own complaint, "after all, it is better that I should laugh and joke and try to keep people merry than to sit down and weep, because Dick looks on me as a baby and grandpapa thinks me frivolous. I wonder what the oculist said to grandpapa about his eyes? Does he think I have not noticed how blind he is getting? Oh, of course, they think I never see anything, but that is their mistake."

Digitized by Google

And again Nell laughed rather ruefully, but there were tears in her eyes.

When she stepped into the old-fashioned little drawing-room, where her grandparents were sitting, however, her smile was as bright, her voice as joyous as ever.

"Did you think I was lost?" she said. "I have been for a run round the garden before settling down to read to you, grandpapa. And I shall read you a very interesting story-book to-night; for Margaret will read you all the grave and sober things when she comes next week, so we won't begin them now."

"Ah! child," said Mrs. Essendine, shaking her pretty grey head at the girl, "I wish you were like Margaret."

"You forget that Margaret is several inches taller than I am, grandmamma," said Nell good-humouredly. "I could not possibly live up to that height of wisdom"; and then she began to read.

NELL JUST CAUGHT THE SOUND OF RICHARD'S LAUGHING REPLY.

Her friend, Margaret Landor, who was about to pay the Rectory a visit, was the daughter of a clergyman who had lately left the neighbourhood and accepted a London living. The Landors had always been on friendly, even intimate, terms with the Essendines, and the visit that Margaret was to pay them had been arranged long beforehand. Otherwise, Nell could almost have wished that a comparative stranger had not been coming to the house just then, for her grandfather's depression and coming blindness, and her grandmother's increasing weakness of health, were matters to which Nell was quite alive, although she did not choose to betray her knowledge to the outer world.

But when Margaret arrived, Nell began to think she had been churlish in wishing her guest away. Margaret was a comfort in the house and not a trouble. She seemed to know by instinct what to say and what to do. She even understood Nell and Nell's difficulties in a marvellous way. Once she came up to the girl, laid her arm around Nell's shoulders, and kissed her softly upon the brow. "Poor

Digitized by Google

Nell!" she said. "Poor little girl!" And the sob that rose in Nell's throat would not let her reply.

It was just then that the blow fell. Mr. Essendine could no longer hide from his family and friends the fact that his sight was gone. He had to he led from room to room, from house to house. It was less of a surprise to his parishioners than he had anticipated, for his failing eyes had long troubled him, and people had taken it for granted that he would soon be blind. But poor old Mrs. Essendine was curiously taken by surprise. She went out so little that she had not noticed how helpless her husband had become; and she was so distressed by the thought that he would never see her face again, nor the church he had served, and the garden-flowers he loved, that she fretted herself almost into illness, and was much more difficult than usual to please in consequence.

"Nell does not have an easy time," said Miss Landor to Richard Talbot as they walked round the garden together. They were old friends; their parents had known each other well, and both Richard and his younger brother were always welcome at the Landors' vicarage in town. Her remark seemed to surprise her companion.

"Not an easy time?" he repeated in a rather puzzled tone. "Why, she is as light-hearted and playful as a kitten."

"She is a brave little woman," said Margaret.

But Richard did not respond. He scarcely thought of Nell as a woman at all. She was his pet, his plaything—not his confidante and friend. Really Margaret was that, although he had not thought of it before.

Nell was very busy. She had to guide her grandfather's footsteps through the village, to read to him, to look out references for him by the dozen. The old Rector did not realise how much of her time he took up. Then Mrs. Essendine, who objected to paid nurses, made heavy demands on her granddaughter's strength. Nell had little leisure to bestow on Margaret, or even on Richard, who had come down to the village inn for a fortnight's holiday. She was glad that they, her visitors, were friends, for they could amuse each other. She planned excursions for them, she sent them out walking, she encouraged Richard to find his way to the rustic summer-house where Margaret often sat. And she was genuinely pleased to see how much they enjoyed each other's society.

Now and then she felt a trifle lonely. When the two old people were more than usually trying, or she had tired herself out with waiting upon them, the impulse would come upon her to lay her head on Richard's shoulder and cry her heart out in his arms. She had never done such a thing in her life, but she fancied sometimes that she would like to do it now. But she seldom had a chance of seeing Richard alone for more than a minute or two. He was walking with Margaret, reading poetry to Margaret, smoking a cigarette (Miss Landor did not object to tobacco) with Margaret at his side. There was no place for Nell.

"What a jealous little wretch I must be!" Nell cried, when she found one day that this fact gave her a stab of pain. "As if I were not pleased and proud that Richard should be kind and good to my friend! I must be degenerating sadly; I must be growing selfish and base! Be ashamed of yourself, Nell! I did not think you were quite so small-minded as you are proving yourself nowadays."

And in pursuance of her good resolutions she set herself to be so merry, so gay, so full of quips and cranks and youthful jollity, that her grave lover looked at her aghast, and the two grandparents murmured little criticisms to each other on her frivolity. The old people were very fond of Nell, but they had never loved her mother very much, and it sometimes happened that she reminded them too strongly of the woman who had won their son's heart against their will.

But Nell flagged occasionally, and felt so tired and weary that she would try to get away from everyone who knew her, and sit for a few minutes in some out-of-the-way nook, where she could recover her spirits before anyone knew that she had lost them. One of her favourite haunts was a rustic wooden seat beneath a spreading elm-tree at the extreme end of her grandfather's garden. Here the ground rose a little, and was softly carpeted with grass. Some clustering rhododendron bushes hid the seat from the house, and also from the lane which ran past the garden, so that a more secluded spot could scarcely have been found. In old days it had been a very favorite resort of Mr. Essendine's pupils, for they could see and hear all the persons who passed up and down the lane, while remaining themselves unseen.

Digitized by Google

Nell sat down and closed her eyes. She was not sleepy, but she wanted a moment or two of rest and peace. The sun was sinking below the horizon, and the shadows were very long. Scarcely a sound came to her ears save the twittering of birds in the trees above her head.

Footsteps were coming slowly down the lane. Two persons were speaking in low tones—lovers, probably. The lane was a favourite strolling-place with the village lads and lasses; and Nell did not even care to open her eyes in order to see the couple until, quite suddenly, a voice fell on her ear.

"We must be patient, Margaret."

Was it Richard who spoke?

"I know—I know," Margaret was saying, and there was a thrill in her voice which Nell had never heard. "But, oh, Dick, it is so hard! If I did not care so much——"

"Don't cease to care, dear," said Richard, very gently—and Nell's straining eyes could see that he had taken Margaret's hand within his own—"don't cease to love. Matters must right themselves in time. You surely cannot think that a man could care for a flighty, frivolous creature, who has neither mind nor soul, even though he may have been caught by her for a time. It is only for the sake of appearances that this engagement has lasted so long——"

"But I could not bear to think that anyone should suffer for my sake," said Margaret.

They were passing slowly out of hearing. But Nell just caught the sound of Richard's laughing reply: "She suffer!" he cried, "She's not capable of it; she can neither suffer nor love as you and I can do."

The voices died into silence. Nell heard no more.

II.

She sat motionless for a time, huddled together on the bench as if for warmth, and, indeed, she felt strangely cold. What did it all mean? Was it possible that Richard and Margaret loved each other. Was it of herself that Richard spoke in such contemptuous tones? Yet, who else could it be? The phrases rang in her ears: "A flighty, frivolous creature who has neither mind nor soul." "She can neither suffer nor love as you and I can do." "It is only for the sake of appearances that the engagement has lasted so long."

"It will not last much longer," said Nell to herself, with a sharpness which came of pain. "Have they to be patient on my account? Am I to wait until Dick jilts me? I will be beforehand with him there?"

And, smarting at the remembrance of her perfect trust in Richard, of the way in which she had thrown him into Margaret's company, and the faithlessness of the friend who could sacrifice her at the first moment of temptation, Nell dragged herself homeward, and was just in time to read prayers for her grandfather, and to hear that Richard had gone back to the inn earlier than usual as he had a letter to write.

"No wonder he did not want to meet me," said she to herself, with a little natural blaze of indignation. And she felt almost sick and faint when Margaret commented on her pale looks, and asked her whether she had not caught cold with being out so late.

"I wish I could stay longer and take care of you, dear," said Miss Landor, affectionately; "but you see I must go up to town to-morrow, and Richard Talbot is so kind as to say that he will escort me."

"He had better see me first!" flashed out Nell; and then she coloured hotly and tried to soften down her words. "I mean – he never said that he was going away so soon; and I want—I want——"

"A good long chat with him? Of course you do," said Margaret; and Nell hated her for her sympathetic tone. "We do not think of going until the afternoon train, so there will be plenty of time, and I will read to Mr. Essendine in the morning, if you like."

She could not understand why Nell looked so white and strange, and turned such a cold cheek to her nightly kiss; but Margaret had many things of her own to make her anxious at that moment, and it did not occur to her that Nell's pallor had any particular reason beyond a physical one.

So they separated, and Nell spent the night in wakefulness and tears. At first she wept passionately, but later the tears flowed more gently, and were less bitter and resentful. It came to her mind that it was a better thing to know now that Richard did not love her than to find it out after marriage. "If I had been his wife, and found out that he had not cared for me, what should I have done?" she said to herself. "And, perhaps, after all, he is right. I am not worthy of him. Margaret is far more fit to be his wife than I shall ever be. Why should I be angry

Digitized by Google

"MISS ESSENDINE! NELL, DO YOU MEAN TO THROW ME OVER?"

because he loves someone better than myself? It is very selfish of me," said Nell, her tears again flowing at the thought; but the real sweetness of her nature prevailing more and more over her first hurt and angry sensation, "but I have fancied lately that I was growing very wickedly selfish, and now I know it. I will try at least to do what is right. How lonely it will be when Richard goes away and never comes back again!"

She thought of the weary days that stretched before her, of the ever-increasing solitude of her life with the two old people that were her care, and her heart sank at the prospect. By-and-bye a little gleam of comfort stole in: she remembered her own helpless condition as a tiny orphan child, and the kindness and affection with which her grandparents had received her into their home: it was her turn now to give them as much love and tenderness as she could and thus to make some sort of return for their goodness to her. She had already experienced certain qualms of feeling on this subject; she had wondered whether it would ever be possible for her to leave the Rector and his wife to the careless attentions of servants—now it seemed as if the way were opening out for her to remain with them as long as they needed her.

"Perhaps that is God's will for me," said Nell, staring into the darkness with wide-open, aching eyes. She had her serious thoughts, her lofty aspirations, this light-hearted little girl, whom people called frivolous. She would hardly be frivolous again, she reflected. How could she look gay and cheerfnl when she had thus learnt the meaning of loss and sorrow aye, and of treachery, too?

In spite of all efforts to obliterate the signs of her tears, it was a very woebegone, white-faced Nell who confronted Richard Talbot next morning, when, in accordance with her request, he met her in the Rector's library." Why, child, what is the matter?" he said, in his kindly voice.

Digitized by Google

"Don't call me 'child' please," she responded, with downcast eyes. "I am a woman really, you know, although you seem to think that I am so very young. And I wanted to tell you that I—I have changed my mind. I would rather not be engaged to you any longer, please, Dick. Will you let me go?"

She had spoken very childishly, and she had meant to be so staid and serious, and grown up! Richard almost smiled as he looked at her.

"My dear Nell, what folly is this?"

"It is no folly." The word put courage into her heart and words into her lips. "A woman has a right to manage her life for herself. If there is a change of feeling on—on either side, she is justified in breaking off an engagement before it is too late."

"Do you mean to say that you have ceased to love me, Nell?"

"I think it would be better if you began to call me Miss Essendine, Mr. Talbot."

"Miss Essendine! Nell, do you mean to throw me over?" said Richard, with a rather angry glint in his eye.

"I suppose that is what the world will call it."

"Ridiculous! I was afraid you were going to say your grandparents wanted you at home——"

"So they do," said Nell, quickly. "Now that they are so helpless, my duty is to stay at their side."

"There are plenty of people who could take your place with them. That cannot be the only reason. Someone must have come between us."

He spoke with astonishing heat, and Nell waited for a moment or two, the colour creeping into her cheeks, before she answered him.

"Yes," she said at last, very slowly, "someone has come between us. That is quite true."

Richard stiffened suddenly, and assumed a tone of extreme frigidity.

"You need not fear that I shall ever try to interpose myself between you and anyone you love. I am obliged to you for your frankness, Miss Essendine, I can only hope that you will be kinder and truer to your second choice than you have been to your first."

He bowed to her formally, and turned to leave the room. Nell stood looking after him with yearning, pitiful eyes. She could almost have found it in her heart to call him back; she longed to explain his mistake to him—to tell him that she was true and that he was false, and that it was for his own sake that she set him free. But at that moment her grandfather's stick sounded in the corridor; he was on the point of entering the library, where he would meet Richard Talbot face to face. It was too late to say anything. Nell turned and fled by another door.

So Richard Talbot went his way and pursued his own career. But he came no more to Little Easton, and he did not write to the Essendines. He had shown himself very much offended, very much hurt, Nell's grandfather told her; and the old people were extremely grieved and annoyed by the whole affair. Nell was in disgrace for a long time, but she brought her grandparents to confess at last that they would have been very miserable without her, and that she was the greatest blessing of their lives. She managed to settle down to her quiet country duties, without repining at her lot. But she found it better not to hear too much about the world outside.

"Talbot's married," someone said in her hearing one day, not knowing the history of Nell Essendine's broken engagement. "Married Miss Landor, daughter of the man who had the Chesterton living at one time. Doing very well, they say; though at one time things went wrong with him—some silly entanglement——"

Nell escaped into a crowd—she had gone with a friend to a flower show—and vowed to herself that she would never come out again. She read in newspapers of Richard Talbot's continued success, of his gaining a coveted legal appointment in Egypt, and she wondered sometimes whether his wife had gone to Cairo with him, and whether they should ever meet again.

They did. They met in a place where there was no chance of escape from each other—the deck of a Channel boat. It was a wet day, and the wind was sufficiently gusty to drive most of the passengers below. The vessel plunged and bounded like a restive steed, but Richard Talbot was a good sailor, and preferred the fresh air of the deck to the stuffy cabins and saloons. He had established himself and his belongings on a deck-chair, and was rather wishing for a cigar, when his attention was attracted by the movement—it seemed like a quick start, which caused a book to fall to the ground—of the passenger on the chair beside him. He picked up the book and was presenting it to its owner with a bow, when he too started—just as she had done. For he found that he was looking straight into Nell Essendine's face.

Digitized by Google

But such a face!—so changed, so white, so wasted, above the sombre black garb which she wore. He was changed too, but for the better; he was browner, more alert, less austere, perhaps, than he used to be. But Nell had changed for the worse.

Perhaps that was just why his eye softened a little as he looked at her.

"I beg your pardon," he said, involuntarily, and he saw the colour flash up into her thin face at the word. "I am afraid my things incommode you, I will remove them——"

"Oh, no. They are not in my way at all. Please sit down," said Nell, hurriedly. "I did not see who it was at first—I thought you were in Egypt."

"I am on my way to Egypt; I go by Marseilles. Are you bound for the South, Miss Essendine—at least, if——"

His eyes fell on the ungloved left hand which held the book. It bore no wedding-ring.

"Oh, yes, I am still Eleanor Essendine," said she, with a little smile. "I have been ordered abroad; I have been ill."

"I was afraid so. And—the Rector?" He began his question diffidently. He did not know whether the Rector was alive or dead.

"I have lost both my grandparents," said Nell, gravely. "My grandmother died first, about a year after your last visit to Little Easton; and my grandfather had a paralytic stroke, which made him almost childish. It was very sad to see him—but he is at rest now."

"You stayed with him? You nursed him?"

"Oh, yes."

"And nearly killed herself in the process, I suppose," he said to himself. "And then you were ill?" he said aloud.

"Yes, for a time. But it was nothing; I was only a little overworked. So I am going to the Riviera for the winter; I have some money of my own, and I shall be idle until I am well again."

"And then?"

"I don't know," she said, with sudden blankness. "You see, I have no relations, and during the last few years I have been too busy to keep up my friendships. I think I shall go back to London when I am well enough, and try my hand at slumming."

He sat dumb. He was angry with Fate, with Nell, with himself, because he could not mould life to his liking. He sat silent so long that she ventured on a question.

"How is Mrs. Talbot? I hope she is well, and that she likes Egypt."

"Mrs. Talbot? But she is not in Egypt," as if surprised by the question.

"She likes London better, perhaps?"

"Possibly, but I can't answer for her tastes. She is with her husband in Australia you see——"

"But I mean your Mrs. Talbot—your wife," said Nell with a nervous little laugh. "I mean Margaret Landor."

Talbot deliberately turned round and looked at her. "Do you really not know," he said, "that Margaret married my brother John?"

"And threw you over, after all?" said Nell with indignant eyes.

"You are under some mistake; I never thought of marrying Miss Landor," said Richard rather coldly. "Even when she visited the Rectory she was more than half-engaged to him. But he was, in those days, a very reckless fellow, and had been drawn into an engagement with a pretty, silly little actress, whose beauty had attracted him. I was then doing all I could to break off the connection, but I had great difficulties. We paid her a large sum of money at last to set him free. Margaret most generously forgave him, and they were married about six months after—after that visit—that unfortunate visit of mine to the Rectory."

How white she had grown! She looked almost ready to faint, and yet there was a strange little smile upon her lips.

"I beg your pardon," she faltered. "I made a mistake."

Richard Talbot kept dead silence for a minute or two. A perfectly new idea had entered his brain, and rather stunned him by its force.

Digitized by Google

"You thought I wanted to marry Margaret? Did you think so at the Rectory that year?"

His voice had grown harsh and strained, but it was no longer cold.

"Yes, I did. I overheard you, accidentally, Richard," the name slipped out before she was aware, "and I thought you spoke of me."

"Of you!"

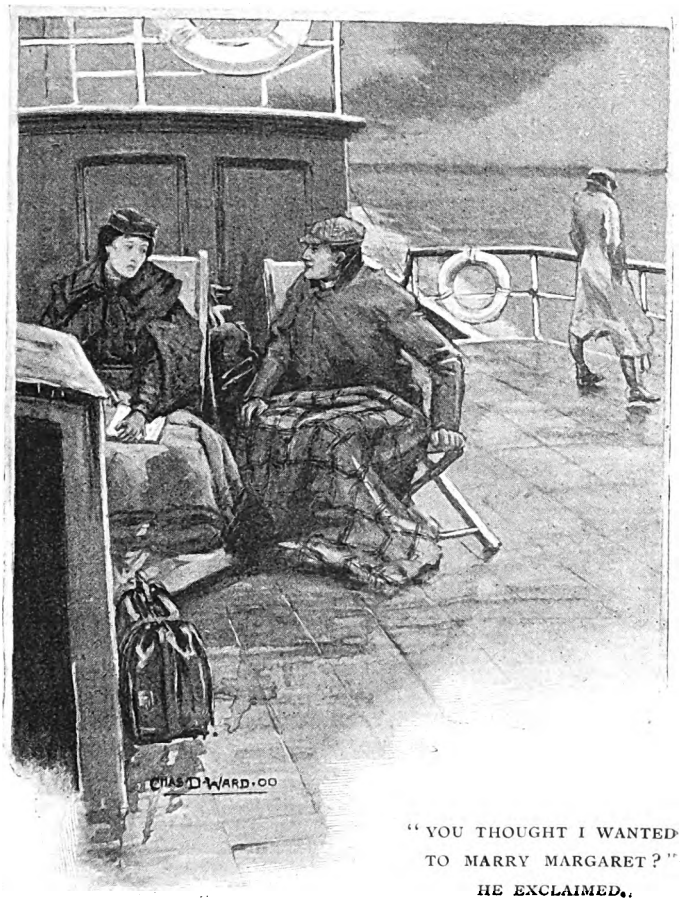
"Yes, of breaking an engagement, which had lasted so long only because of appearances——"

"I was speaking of John's wretched little actress. How could it apply to you?"

"You said she could not love or suffer—as you and Margaret could."

"Nell! Nell! is it true? You were jealous?" cried Richard, with a passionate rapture in his tone.

"I thought you were tired of me. I tried to set you free," said Nell softly.



"YOU THOUGHT I WANTED TO MARRY MARGARET?" HE EXCLAIMED.

"But what about the other man?"

"There was no other man, Dick. I thought Margaret had come between us, that was all."

"I have never loved anyone but you, Nell. Can you care for me still?"

"O Dick, I have been so lonely," Nell Essendine replied; and under the rug that was folded round her knees Dick Talbot's hand grasped hers in token of the love that was never to fail her for the rest of her mortal days.

And Nell did not go to the Riviera after all. She went to Cairo instead.

[THE END.]

Digitized by Google

Four-Footed Philanthropists.

SOME DOGS WHO HELP TO MAINTAIN FATHERLESS CHILDREN.

By JOHN BELL.

THE railway dog has long been recognised as an institution. He hangs about stations, makes it his business to scrape acquaintance with every man and boy about the place, and is particularly anxious to keep on good terms with the porters.

There is no particular reason why he should regard himself as a permanent member of the station staff. He has no defined duties. He likes the place, the men, and, best of all, the morsels of bread and meat flung to him at meal times. That is all.

But there is another kind of railway dog—the railway collecting dog, who, it seems to me, is not so well known as he should be to those who do not happen to find themselves on his beat. For a dog who has certain duties to perform, who realises the significance of his work, and takes a real pleasure in doing it, is a dog to know.

I have made it my business to seek acquaintance with some of these dogs—with Tim at Paddington, London Jack at Waterloo, Bournemouth Nell, Basingstoke Jack, and Southampton Gyp, all of whom are cognisant of their exalted mission, and mighty proud, as is evidenced by their wagging tails when they hear the rattle of coins in the boxes on their backs. All these dogs are doing admirable work, copying as far as possible the brilliant example set before them by the prince of railway collecting dogs, Help, who long since finished his course and was laid to rest with all the honours befitting a dog who had laboured so unweariedly in the service of his masters — the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants.

Help's record was indeed a noble one, and justifies the monument to his memory in Brighton Station. The dog's body was interred, but his skin was saved, and Help, in his habit as he lived, occupies a glass case, serving as a reminder to the philanthropic of what a dog can do in the HELP'S MONUMENT AT BRIGHTON STATION.

Photograph by D. Blagrove & Son, 72, High Street, Lewes.

Digitized by Google

cause of the fatherless. Help hailed from Scotland. He was a collie, bred by Mr. W. Riddell, of Haddington, and became a collecting dog through the instrumentality of the Rev. Dr. Macleod. The idea of getting a dog to collect on behalf of the orphans of railway servants killed in the performance of their duty originated with Mr. John Climpson, the guard of the night boat train on the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway. The venerable Dr. Macleod was made acquainted with the project; he took kindly to it, and looked amongst his friends. Help was the result of his enquiries.

What a labour of love to Mr. John Climpson, now enjoying his pension, was the training of Help for his duties! There never was a more patient trainer, and in justice to Help it must be said that there never was a more obedient dog. He had no antics, was a very proper dog, sober and demure, with a great liking for children, as was only natural, since his mission in the life allotted to him was to help bairns who had lost their fathers. When off duty he liked nothing better than to romp with children and had frequent opportunities for this diversion in the course of his itineraries throughout the United Kingdom. Every railway man was his guardian and friend. His love for black corduroy and buttons was indeed ineradicable, and he would follow without leading any railway servant after a few hours' acquaintance.

TIM, WHO COLLECTS AT PADDINGTON STATION.
Photo by R. E. Dukes, Buller Road, Kensal Rise.

Help came into the world in 1878; he left it in 1891, but not before he had collected over a thousand pounds for the A.S.R.S. Orphan Fund. He travelled all over British and Irish railways, being invariably in charge of a guard. But he knew the Brighton line best, and Guard Climpson best of all guards. For a long time his weekly takings were over five pounds a week, and the sale of the song in praise of his work written by his trainer, and composed by H. Schallehn, also added to his receipts. The chorus was irresistible:—

My name is Help, the collie dog,
And I travel on the rail,
To canvass for the Orphan Fund
In slow train or the mail.
My post is trusty, you must know
The cause is good and true,
And worthy of the kind support
Which I now ask of you.

Help not only had a song in his honour; there were Help brooches, and Help watch pendants, which had a large sale amongst railway men and their wives and daughters.

Knowing the value of the dog, his masters used him well. He had a lengthy period of rest between each journey. He often made his home in London with Mr. Henry Mady in St. Luke's. And there he was at home, frisking with the children, as though he was one of the family by prescriptive right.

But every dog has his day. Poor Help, the railway dog of England, grew old like all of us. The time came when his masters considered that he had worked sufficiently long—that he had earned his right to spend the winter of his days away from the shriek of engines and the bustle of railway stations. And so he was sent to Newhaven, in the charge of a shepherd, to roam about the fields at his own sweet will. He liked the change, but he often yearned for the sight of his white-headed trainer, and of the men in black corduroy hurrying along station platforms. There was great lamentation when he died. Children cried over his loss, and the railway servants of the United Kingdom felt that, as a collecting dog, they would never see his like again.

Digitized by Google

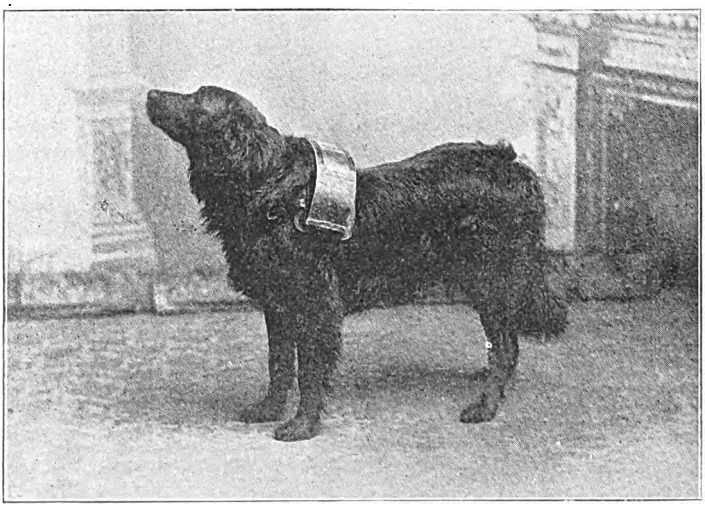
Twelve months after Help departed this life there came before the notice of the philanthropic public another railway collecting dog whose name at the present time, the heyday of his usefulness, is one to conjure with. I refer to Tim, the collecting dog at Paddington. For the last eight years Tim has been an institution at this busy terminus. He is an Irishman with a dash of the canny Yorkshireman about him. That is to say, he is an Irish and Airedale terrier. He has all the vivacity and drollery of the former, and the perspicacity and shrewdness indigenous to the county of broad acres.



SOUTHAMPTON GYP.
Photograph by E. Mentor & Co., Southampton.

Originally Tim belonged to a Great Western guard, who gave him to his present master, Inspector Bush. He was then thirteen months old, and in a weakly condition. It was some time before his new master could bring him round. But as soon as the dog became himself again, Inspector Bush saw possibilities in him. "There's money in that dog," thought the Inspector, who has been forty years in the service of the Great Western Company, thirty having been spent at Paddington—"there's money in that dog for the widows and orphans of our poor fellows who may lose their lives." The prophecy has been justified. There has been money in Tim—something to the tune of £700.

I cultivated Tim's acquaintance one sunny afternoon when the bustle at Paddington was greater than usual. The arrival platforms were strewn with luggage belonging to people who were just returning from holiday-making. It was a busy day for Tim. He had just returned from his holidays—enforced holidays, for he had been a little off colour, the result of the heat wave. He walked up and down the platforms as the trains came in, went the rounds of the waiting rooms, and comported himself as though he was the chief police inspector at the station. Only once did he lose his dignity, and give way to the curiosity of his kind. It was when he came in contact with a paper bag on the platform. Visions of ham sandwiches rose before him, and he applied his nose to the bag. But he got nothing; there was nothing; and when this fact became apparent to him, he stalked away, ashamed, as I thought, of his temporary aberration from the path of duty.

Tim is no ordinary collecting dog. He is intensely patriotic, most fervently loyal as befits a dog who has been privileged to have more than one audience of Her Gracious Majesty the Queen. When this fact is borne in mind need it excite the least wonder that his collecting box is decorated with the red, white and blue?

Thrice last year did the Queen show her high appreciation of himself and his mission. The month of May must ever remain a memorable one with him. It happened to be the month in which the son of Mr. W. Waldorf Astor, the American millionaire, attained his majority. Mr. Astor knew Tim, knew his worth and work, and clinched his friendship with him and also commemorated his son's majority by presenting to the Great Western railwaymen's fund through the dog himself a cheque for £200. One can imagine the surprise of Inspector Bush when he emptied Tim's box at the end of his day's labour—his best day's work.

Digitized by Google

It was during this same month that Tim was presented to the Queen by special command. A telegram from Windsor commanded him to be in readiness to enter Her Majesty's saloon carriage on her arrival at Paddington. Tim was duly led into the presence of his Sovereign by his master. The Queen patted him tenderly, said kindly words to him, and placed a bright sovereign in his box. Now Tim has a way of his own of showing gratitude for a special contribution. He does it by standing on his hind legs and giving three barks, short, sharp, and vigorous. But being a wise dog—almost human, as his master truly believes—he did not dare to bark in the presence of his Queen. It was an occasion when respectful homage was required; and so he swung his head from one side to the other, and then let it rest on the floor of the carriage for a brief space. That was his bow.

The audience did not end with the Queen dropping a sovereign into his box.

"I hope he is treated kindly," said her Majesty to Inspector Bush

"He is treated with every consideration, your Majesty."

The Queen smiled.

The dog and his master were about to leave the Royal presence when her Majesty, still smiling, said:

"Wait a minute, the Princess wants to give him something."

Princess Henry of Battenberg, pleased to note the kindly face of her august mother wreathed in smiles, also extended her patronage to Tim. Then her little daughter, Princess Ena, tripped forward and dropped a coin into the dog's box. The little Princess's brother, Prince Maurice, not to be behindhand, also made Tim's box heavier.

It was indeed a great day for Tim, and a further honour was in store for him, for her Majesty accepted his portrait, taken from the same negative as the picture of him which I reproduce. The Queen was much interested in the portrait, and moved nearer the window of the carriage, so that she might see it better.

Of all the dogs engaged in collecting, whether for railway employés' funds, hospitals, or lifeboats, probably none has had such an adventurous career as London Jack, who does business at Waterloo, and goes to other places where he thinks he can lend a helping hand. Jack, like Help, hails from beyond the Tweed. Probably this fact accounts for his keenness, for his trainer and custodian, Mr. W. D. Wickens, of Hartingdon-street, South Lambeth, will tell you that there is not a more willing worker than he is. You will have to travel far before you meet with a dog who more jealously guards his money once he has collected it.

Here is an anecdote showing his sensibility of his responsible position. When Jack's box becomes unduly heavy, he knows that copper has been plentiful, and he scurries to the stationmaster's office in order to get relieved of his load. Before access can be had to the stationmaster's office, a clerk's office has to be passed through. Jack's box is taken from his back in the clerk's office. He watches it with eagle eye—never allows it to pass out of his sight; in fact, he is close on the heels of the clerk who takes it to the stationmaster. Jack sees his box unlocked and emptied with his own eyes; and having assured himself that everything is right, he scampers away to his post of duty.

Jack achieved world-wide fame in the month of August, 1899. The newspapers told the story of how he was lost for a month and three days, decoyed away by dog stealers, and how he was found; but the true inwardness of the tale has yet to be narrated. In consequence of his being the instrument of running the Chelsea dog stealers to earth, London Jack became covered with glory. But the glory has been at the expense of his health, for he has never been himself since, and even now he is under more than one skilled veterinary surgeon. During his incarceration, his prison being a small back yard, where, with numerous other dogs, he was chained up night and day, he caught cold in the lungs which it is feared are permanently affected. Besides having the best veterinary attendance he has had a holiday at Ryde. He made many friends in the Isle of Wight, and was fêted and petted by the children who showed their love for him and his noble work by spending their coppers upon him in sponge cakes. The brightness returned to Jack's eyes; his step was more nimble, and he wagged his tail gaily as much as to say "I am all right again." But he is not all right, and his considerate trainer and his wife fear that he will never completely recover from the effects of the treatment he received at the dog stealers' hands.

Digitized by Google

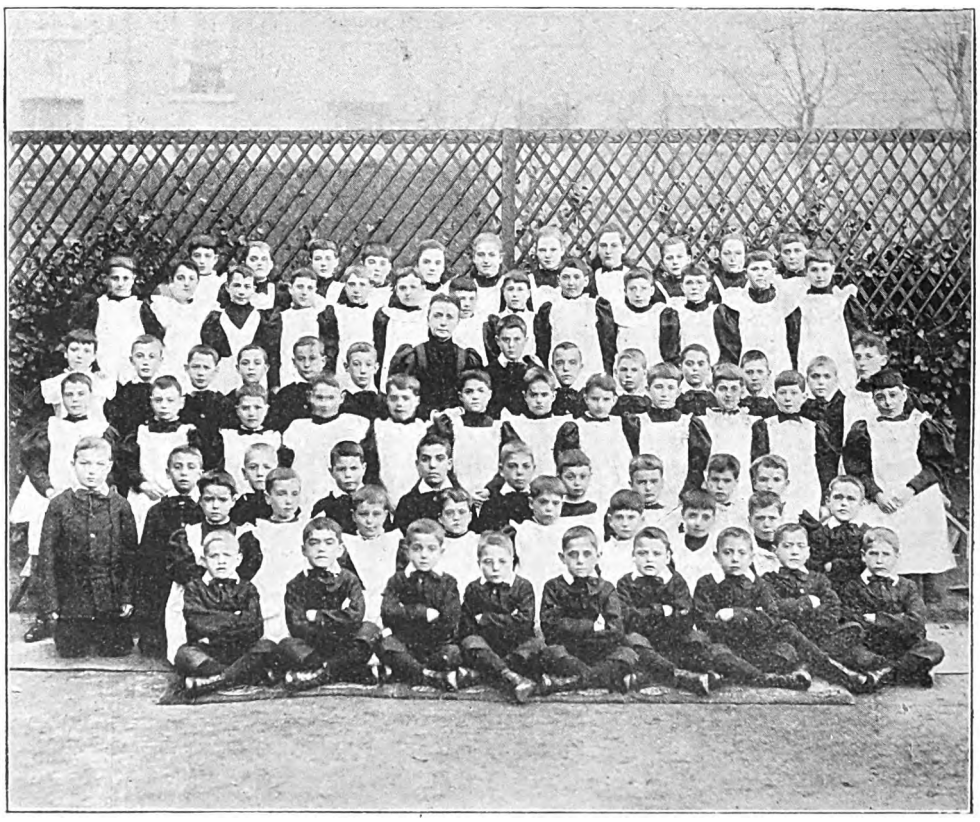
LONDON JACK, THE ORPHANS' FRIEND.
Photograph by H. Holbrook, Battersea.

He has, however, not left off work. Far from it. He can collect between two and three pounds at Waterloo any Saturday. In spite of his illness the present year has been a record time for him. The war in South Africa has had injurious effects on many concerns, but it has been the means of bringing more patronage to London Jack. On his departure for South Africa Lord Roberts remembered in a practical way the noble retriever and his philanthropic mission, and so did the Duke of Connaught and his son Prince Patrick. The latter was much taken up with the dog. "Oh, papa, give me something for Jack," he exclaimed, and the Duke, whose interest in children's hospitals and orphanages is practical as well as sympathetic, noted his son's exercise of charity with delighted eyes.

Jack had a most successful day when Sir Charles Warren left Waterloo for



THE CHILDREN OF THE L. AND S.W.R. SERVANTS' ORPHANAGE FOR WHOM JACK COLLECTS.

Digitized by Google

South Africa. The General put a sovereign in the dog's box. The officers who were with him were not slow in extending their patronage also, with the result that in less than a quarter of an hour money amounting to three pounds ten shillings had found its way into Jack's box. His largest collection is six pounds eighteen shillings, and this sum was collected in less than six hours.

London Jack goes about his work in a painstaking way. Platforms No. 1 and 2 are where you will find him, and no matter how crowded they are, he patrols them from one end to the other, unperturbed by the bustle and commotion. You never catch him crossing the metals; he reaches the other side by the proper way — the bridge. At the present time he is collecting every Saturday at Waterloo, and is invariably in the charge of Mrs. Wickens, who, since the adventure with dog stealers, keeps a watchful eye upon him as though he was one of her own children. The money he collects goes to the London and South-Western Railway Servants' Orphanage in Jeffreys Road, Clapham, an admirable institution, of which Mr. H. G. Warne is the energetic secretary. It has a splendid record in rearing and educating the children of London and South-Western Railway men who lose their lives while following their employment, or who die leaving children to be provided for.

BOURNEMOUTH NELL ON DUTY.
Photograph by H. Prin, Bournemouth.

But railway collecting dogs are not all of one sex. There is at Bournemouth a lady dog collector, who, according to her opportunities, is as zealous as the rest of them. She is Bournemouth Nell, and to know her is to admire her, not only for the great good she accomplishes, but for herself. For she is a handsome dog, a pure bred black retriever, with a beautiful wavy coat, which has attracted to good purpose the notice of the charitable.

Bournemouth Nell is seven years old, and she has collected since she was six months old. From the first she took kindly to the work, her trainer and owner, Mr. A. W. Williams, porter at Bournemouth Central, not having the least trouble with her. The dogs I have dealt with have collected for railway-men alone, but Nell is cosmopolitan in her sympathies. Her philanthropy is universal. She is willing and eager to go anywhere, but naturally has a predilection for Bournemouth. She has won golden opinions at Winchester, Salisbury, Southampton, Swanage, Weymouth, Parkstone, Lymington, Basingstoke, and even at Wimbledon and Clapham, and her collections on behalf of the Lifeboat Institution have also brought her into prominence.

Another black retriever who is in the collecting line is Southampton Gyp. Gyp is a most intelligent animal, quiet and very fond of children. He is four years old, and has been on duty since 1897, and during that time has collected over £70. Gyp is mostly on duty at Southampton Station, where he is in charge of Mr. Edward May, booking office, Dock Station. When, however, his master has occasion to meet the homeward bound boats, Gyp follows, and never returns with an empty box. Besides collecting for the South-Western Railway Servants' Orphanage at Clapham, he has done duty in behalf of the War Fund.

Basingstoke Jack, owned by Mr. Slark at Basingstoke, was like his namesake at Waterloo, a very knowing dog, making the most of his opportunities to swell the funds of the orphanage.

JOHN BELL.

Digitized by Google

THE KEEPER - - - OF THE TRACK.

By HAROLD BINDLOSS.

IT was a still evening after a hot autumn day, and two sunbronzed men wearing blue canvas garments quaintly patched were glad of the coolness, as they lounged outside a cedar-bark shanty under the western edge of that giant rampart of broken peaks—the Canadian Rockies.

Aitchison lay with one elbow buried in crackling fir-needles, a young, toil-hardened Englishman, from whom, nevertheless, several years of very rough living had failed to erase a certain stamp of refinement. For the rest, he in no way differed from many others among the legion of broken men who, after laying the foundations of its future greatness, still bear a principal share in the harder work of the mountain-ribbed province of British Columbia. On his companion, Forsyth, the stamp was fainter, for he had long lapsed into the ranks of the forgotten, while the lines on his forehead and tinge of grey in his hair told their own tale of arduous labour as well as a hidden bitterness.

Aitchison glanced eastwards towards the saw-edged line of eternal snow, which rose serenely majestic against crystalline ether, a stupendous barrier dividing the sweep of whitened prairie from the forest garden of the Pacific slope. Sheer walls of a curious steely blue led his gaze downwards to the sombre green of climbing pines which were old ages before the first white man entered the mountain land. Then the slender fretwork of a trestle bridge caught it, and he followed the snow-fed torrent which foamed below into the dimness of a gorge. White mist rolled slowly out of its hidden depths, and across the wider valley's western end the smoke of a forest fire hung in heavy wreaths above the darkening pines, while the last flicker of sunset faded behind the peak that shut it in. There was a strange subduing sense of unearthly grandeur about it all which weighed upon Aitchison who was of a mercurial disposition, and he found it almost a relief to glance at the sinuous belt of metals winding through the pass with its accompanying litter of empty tin cans, which evidence of modern civilisation broke the spell of the primæval wilderness. That was part of the thin steel highway which binds the old worlds together across the breadth of the new, one link in the chain stretching from Shanghai to London. He and his companion were also section hands, whose present business—and each had followed many—was to watch over a certain portion of it, an occupation which, after deducting living expenses, netted them about one dollar a day.

"Makes one feel cheap, doesn't it?" said Aitchison, who had adopted the easy colloquialism of his new country, "the way one feels in an old cathedral, and yet it was a piece of low-grade comedy that sent me here. Did I ever tell you how we put off the director?"

Forsyth, who was meditatively watching the broken edge of a glacier which still scintillated under the afterglow, signified dissent, and Aitchison continued, "They sent me out from the old country with good advice and two hundred pounds to make my fortune on the prairie, but though I worked twelve hours a day that fortune couldn't be made; harvest frost ruined two crops and the gophers ate a third. Then when I hadn't a dollar, and wouldn't ask for more, an introduction landed me on to the C.P.R. There was a friend interested, and promotion followed—made me a full conductor, and I worked the Winnipeg section. We were ready to haul out from that city one night in winter when a man muffled in a fur robe came along, and said he was played out over a wheat deal and could sleep through an earthquake. Wanted to know would I put him off, by force if necessary, at a desolate flag station on the Assiniboia prairie. Gave me his berth ticket, number six, and I said I would.

Digitized by Google

"We reached that dismal station in the thick of a blizzard, and the engineer who was running reduced schedule with the Vancouver mail wouldn't stop two minutes to put off a director, so I and the coloured porter had no time to lose in rousing the man in number six. He wasn't quite half-dressed, and wouldn't get up, the loco whistle was screaming to hurry us, so not hearing what he said we just dragged him out and put him off. He didn't seem to want to go. Ran at the platform, and missed it when the train pulled out, while I told him what I thought of his obstinacy, and we left him alone, gasping in the snow.

"We made next stop at daybreak, and there was trouble, for a very angry man came along and called me unpleasant things for taking him a hundred miles further than he told me to. The coloured porter had mixed the berth numbers somehow, and I had put off the wrong man way back on the forlorn prairie; also, as it happened, he was a director or something of the kind, and the chief said he thought I might do better as a section hand. Still there are chances in a new country, and I am hoping to go home to the old one with that fortune yet."

Forsyth smiled a little, he was usually a silent man, indeed his former comrade hinted that eccentric fancies troubled him. The last shimmer of the afterglow had faded now, and the snows loomed solemn and ghostlike under the stars, while a deep stillness descended upon the mountain chaos, through which the boom of the river rose up brokenly. Aitchison felt the spell of the silence close round him again with its indefinite impression of unreality, and the presence of a power all-pervading, hidden, and yet far greater than any of the things he could hear and see. In this he was not singular, for other men who have lived under the twilight of the tropic forest, where no sunray ever falls, or amid the solitude of frozen peaks, know that feeling, and some have fled in blind panic from it.

Therefore he was glad to hear his comrade's voice when Forsyth said softly, "There are chances, and with a life before you they may come to you. Mine have gone with my strength, and I only wait the end, in a place I feel is good for me. Strange talk for a section hand, isn't it, but we were not all born navvies or choppers among the forgotten. There was no railroad in this province when I came into it, but seven in number we made our way up beyond Caribou—the gold was already failing there—into the snows of Cassiar. Two years we worked, and four of us returned, when I changed enough alluvial dust into paper at Quesnelle to start a store in Victoria. I was married when financial disaster drove me out from the old country, and with money already sent her my young wife had sailed to join me. There was no stage for several days, and the roads were bad, so three rode south by a shorter trail, and, as fate would have it, one had talked too much of our prosperity. We slept by the trail the fourth night, and the man who should have watched refreshed himself unwisely with bad whisky.

"It was an old story when we were awakened. Four masked men with Winchester rifles stood over us, and they wanted everything we had. They also got it—yes, we tried resistance—it failed, and I rode south at daylight a ruined man with a 44 bullet hole in my shoulder. Alice was waiting me at Port Moody, and when the wound was healed we went back together to try for fortune again, but this time I did not find it, and her strength gave way. Never complaining, smiling for my sake to the last, she died, and she lies alone far up there among the northern ranges. I went back to Quesnelle, hopeless, almost mad, and was known as the conceiver of many a rash enterprise which ended in disaster, but I saw two of the men who robbed me caught. Snowslide, frostbite, starvation, thinned out those I led, until even the most reckless adventurers avoided me, and when the new railroad came I took my share in its building. The past would not be forgotten, some whispered that I was mad, and promotion passed me, but it seemed good to live way back in the wilderness on a lonely section.

Digitized by Google

Little by little I learned there was no use protesting against one's part in the business of the universe, and now I'm waiting —it will not be long, for Alice knows the end, and she is trying to tell me. Wild fancies—yes, I know, but in the great silence here one stands as it were on the verge of secrets no man may fully understand. Well, meantime I'm a section hand. Turn in and forget it ; I'm going to patrol the track."

He moved away, a shadowy figure, and Aitchison sat still wondering, for there were times at night when in that region of supernatural grandeur nothing seemed impossible, until at last from out of the frozen stillness far up under the stars a faint throbbing sound fell vibrating. The pine needles shivered as it swelled in long pulsations, growing steadily louder, and Aitchison lay still listening, held silent by something which was not physical fear. Riven by winter frost, softened by autumn thaw, shaly hillside and snowfield were coming down he knew, as at that season they sometimes do, and the valleys lay

'MAKES ONE FEEL CHEAP, DOESN'T IT?" SAID AITCHISON.

Digitized by Google

hushed and trembling while the great peaks spoke. A crash of shattered pine trees, the roar of charging boulders joined in, and the hillsides flung the sound of their descent in reverberations from one to another, as it were the antiphones of a majestic Benedicite. Of all that ice-ground débris nothing would be lost, for the torrents would bear it south and west until a great river used it to spread new wheat lands of rich alluvial westwards into the Pacific.

Then suddenly the tumult grew fainter, fainter, and ceased, the last rumble of sliding gravel was lost in the echoes of a rocky valley, and soon the torrent which foamed beneath the trestle bridge diminished in volume. Now Aitchison was comparatively new to the mountain land, or he might have deduced several things from this, but instead, with faith in Forsyth whose watch it was, he crept into the shanty and fell asleep. He was awakened some hours later by a grasp on his arm, and saw his comrade bending over him with a lighted lantern.

"Get up; there's a log dam threatening the trestle, and the Vancouver express will be down upon us before long," he said. Aitchison lighted another lantern with hurried fingers, and following Forsyth down the track after stepping from sleeper to sleeper which trembled under him stood staring down bewildered into the gulf below the open trestle bridge. The torrent was many feet higher than it had been before, and roared in a mad, seething stream across the mass of drift-wood which stretched from pier to pier, while the slender timber structure groaned distressfully under the strain.

"It's a simple matter," said Forsyth. "Snowslide made a dam higher up. Now that dam is giving and the water is bringing the wreckage down, while one big log jammed in the trestle is holding up the rest. The bridge won't stand much more. Well, we'll go down and look at it."

Clinging to the spikes driven in, they lowered themselves into blackness, feeling with cautious feet for the next grip below, until the froth of the river was close beneath them. Then Forsyth, standing knee-deep in water on the submerged foundation, which rattled beneath him, said: "It's this pine, you can see the butt, that is keying them. I should cut it enough in twenty minutes for the stream to do the rest If I can't the bridge will go, and unless we stop the Atlantic express there will be a big accident. You'll run back to the top of the long straight and wait until she comes through —you can see my lantern there, and stop her unless I signal 'Open way.' Still, somehow, I must clear it; we've never held up a train on this section."

He stood erect a moment, a gaunt figure with the fitful light of the lantern falling on his bronzed face, apparently pitifully helpless against the mass of grinding timber which threatened the bridge, and Aitchison never forgot that picture with its background of tossing spray. Then a heavy pine log drove crashing against the pile, the trestle shivered in every beam, and Forsyth whirled the axe aloft. Aitchison climbed to the rails again, ran his hardest backward along the track, and only halted breathless on the edge of a natural gateway in the rock, from which down an incline the metals led to the bridge. With the lighted lantern so placed that its glare might not dazzle his eyes, he waited, watching the head of the bridge for the flash that might appear if, when Forsyth hewed through the huge log, the river swept the wreckage clear. It did not come, and the suspense grew trying, for he knew the driver of the huge mountain locomotive, trusting blindly in their watchfulness, would race his long train down the incline at headlong speed to save the time he must lose in the laborious haul through the passes of the Rockies.

For a space there was only the chafe of the river, while white mist rolled out of the gorge, and then at last a sharper note broke through its monotone. A distant yellow glimmer flickered for a moment and was lost among the pines, a vibratory rattle that was not the voice of the river grew louder, and when the glimmer reappeared it had increased in size to the fan-shaped blaze of a huge American headlamp. Streaming athwart the blackness of the towering pines, which appeared before it, and then vanished again, it reeled down the track with a comet-like rush, and already a tremor ran along the metals. The whirr of wheels swelled up into a confused roar, rolling repeated and magnified along the steep hillside, and Aitchison's throat grew dry under the weight of a heavy responsibility.

One of the Pacific liners had that day

Digitized by Google

reached Vancouver, the extra cars would be crammed, he knew, while the blink of a lantern was a small thing to see. Should the driver's eyes one moment be turned from the glasses it would be too late, and yet somehow he must stop that train. Standing between the metals he waved the lantern above his head, and shouted his hardest, as with red sparks hurled high aloft and a wisp of wind-cut vapour streaming behind, the mountain locomotive running her part of a fierce race across two oceans and a continent thundered down on him.

He leapt for his life, still holding the lantern aloft, and was only just in time, for a storm of dust and shingle whirled about him, and a rush of wind drove him sideways while the long lighted cars lurched by. Then the tail-lamp glimmered through an eddying haze, and Aitchison felt suddenly cold and sick, for no answer to his signal reached him from the locomotive cab. Next moment the blood stirred in his veins again, for a hoarse-hoot of the whistle rang out through the dry grind of the brakes. Fire flashed from the metals, with a clang of slackened couplings the cars decreased their pace, then the whistle spoke again as a yellow flash, thrice repeated, signalled "Come on."

The huge engine snorted as the driver wheels bit the track afresh, the couplings clashed, then the short blasts from the funnel ceased again, and once more there was a vicious scream of brakes.

The tail-light became stationary, a clamour of voices rose up from the car platforms, and Aitchison ran forward with a horrible suspicion that there was something wrong. A group of excited men opened up at his approach, and hearing the cry, "His partner! Way for his partner!" he caught his breath as he pushed through them. Then the cold fear was justified, for the bewildered engineer stood holding a lantern over a limp object stretched beside the track, and a kneeling conductor silently beckoned him. Forsyth lay there very still, one hand still clenching an extinguished lantern, dust smeared thick upon his face, and the back of his head crushed in. Aitchison gasped and set his teeth, while the group of puzzled passengers, lighted cars, and clustering pines all reeled together about him, and like one in a dream heard the engineer say :—

"I can't figure all this out nohow. One man signals danger, and while we wrestled with the brakes—you can't bring up a big express all standing—we get the signal 'Open way' from his partner. I whistled 'Let her go' again, and I saw this poor fellow right under the head-lamp waving me on. Saw his face clear as daylight; he was running towards the track; didn't even seem to notice he was too near it—then the cowcatcher got him, and he never knew what hurt him. What's the matter with this section? I can't understand the thing any way."

Aitchison shook himself together, for the interests of a great mail service come before a private grief, and though his voice shook he said, "I think I can. Come with me and look at the bridge."

Then while some of the passengers followed with the railroad officials he stepped out on to the trestle, where all but the railway men declined to venture, because a bridge of that kind is difficult to cross even in bright daylight. The sleepers are spaced an awkward distance apart, and there is nothing but empty air between them. Then the whole story was made plain, for the dam had gone, and the bridge stood solid and firm above a falling stream. A few words were sufficient, because the engineer had seen such obstacles before, and peering down into the darkness he said, "It was like old Forsyth. A queer man, his late partner told me, but there was no one like him for keeping a high-class track. 'Clear-way-Forsyth' they called him in the round house. No man ever knew him hold up a train, and, as you have found out, this isn't a choice section."

They went back gravely silent, and reaching the scene of the accident Aitchison heard a British tourist wearing a solar tope and light garments that bore evidence of Chinese workmanship, say, "A Western railroad section hand! But there's something about him that curiously reminds one of an English gentleman."

"Nothing remarkable in that," broke in a Vancouver citizen drily, for something in the speaker's tone jarred upon him. "There are plenty of the kind grubbing stumps and shovelling ballast in this province, and I don't know that they work any the worse for it. That's not the question, however. I don't quite grasp details, but the poor fellow lying yonder and his partner somehow saved this train.

Digitized by Google

Gentlemen, you'll assess a percentage on what you consider your lives are worth to cover a high-class funeral and—for the widow!"

Rolls of paper money fell into the stretched out hat, but with hot indignation almost choking him Aitchison waved the donors back, crying, "Stop. He was all that tourist said, and a very true comrade—the best I ever had. Alive no man dared have offered unasked help to him. He leaves neither child nor widow, and it's too late for anyone to do him a kindness. No—it's quite impossible. Take your dollars back."

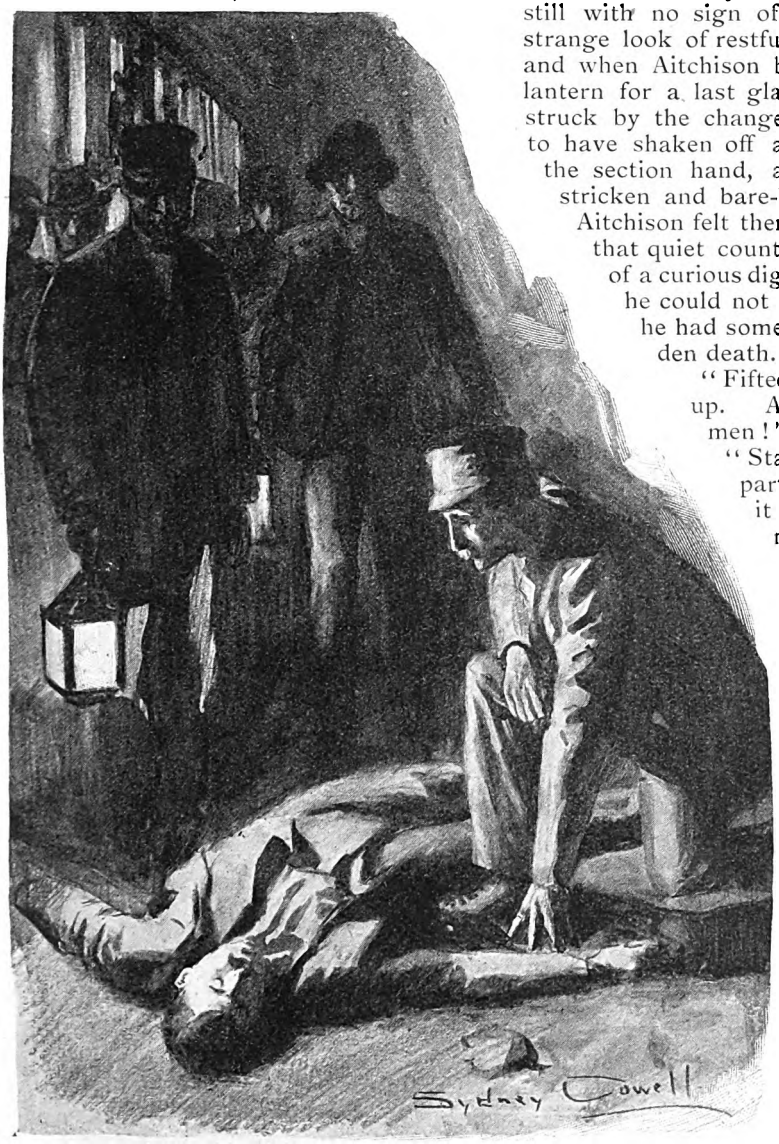
"Made a mistake, gentlemen — I apologise," the Vancouver merchant said, for under the fierce excitement Aitchison lapsed into his old well balanced English intonation. "Another gilt-edge Britisher —met your kind before, but why don't all you millionaires stay at home? Anyway, I'm proud to make your acquaintance; here's my card, and if after what has happened you want a change of air call right in on me."

Meantime Forsyth lay there silent and still with no sign of pain, but only a strange look of restfulness upon his face, and when Aitchison bent down with the lantern for a last glance at him he was struck by the change. Forsyth seemed to have shaken off all that pertained to the section hand, and, standing awe-stricken and bare-headed beside him, Aitchison felt there was frozen upon that quiet countenance the impress of a curious dignity whose meaning he could not clearly realise—and he had some experience of sudden death.

"Fifteen minutes to make up. All aboard, gentlemen!" said the conductor.

"Stand by to help his partner to lift him," and it was the Vancouver merchant's hands which grasped Aitchison's under the load; while the last the latter heard was, "I'll see all done fittingly at Calgary. Vancouver train, flag-station Carson's trail, Wednesday, I'll step off and talk to you."

Then the trestle rattled under the beat of wheels, sinking in long cadence the vibration died away into silence, and Aitchison sat down, strangely desolate, beside the track. He dared not leave



FORSYTH LAY THERE VERY STILL

Digitized by Google

it unwatched even to follow a tried comrade to his last resting place. He flagged a train next morning, and transmitted a brief account to head-quarters, after which he was summoned to Vancouver, and there offered promotion. He did not take the position, for the Vancouver merchant had heard of a better one, and good fortune at last commenced to smile upon him. Still, sometimes amid the bustle of a Western town he looks back half-regretfully to the days he spent in the wilderness with Forsyth, the dreamer.

Up there in that wild region where primæval chaos was intensified yet softened by a grandeur and beauty which seemed beyond the rest of earth, he stood, as his comrade had said, upon the verge of a great yet hidden verity. Now the faint glimpse he had into it grew dimmer in the turmoil of the city. Forsyth had passed that verge, and, perhaps, understood all clearly, but he could not return to tell him so. He slept unknown, forgotten, save by one comrade, where the foothills melt into the prairie close by the straight-ruled track along which the tide of commerce flows from eastwards round half the world to the east again, and a wooden cross bears, beside his name, the one word, "Faithful."

A BIRTHDAY SONG.

Her years steal by like birds through clouded skies,
Soft singing as they go;
She viewed their flight with sunshine in her eyes,
She hears their music low,
And on her forehead, beautiful and wise,
Shine's love's most holy glow.

There is no pain for her in Time's soft flight,
Her spirit is so fair;
Her days shine as they pass her, in the light
Her gentle doings wear.
On her fair brow I never saw the night,
But Hope's glad star shone there.

It is a blessing just to see her face
Pass like an angel's by—
Her soft, brown hair, sweet eyes, and lips that grace
The smiles that round them lie.
The brightest sunbeam in its heavenly place
Might joy to catch her eye.

Dear life, that groweth sweeter growing old!
I bring this verse to thee,
A tiny flower, but in its heart the gold
Of lasting love from me;
While in my soul that deeper love I hold
Too great for man to see.

Digitized by Google

MEN OF SILENCE.

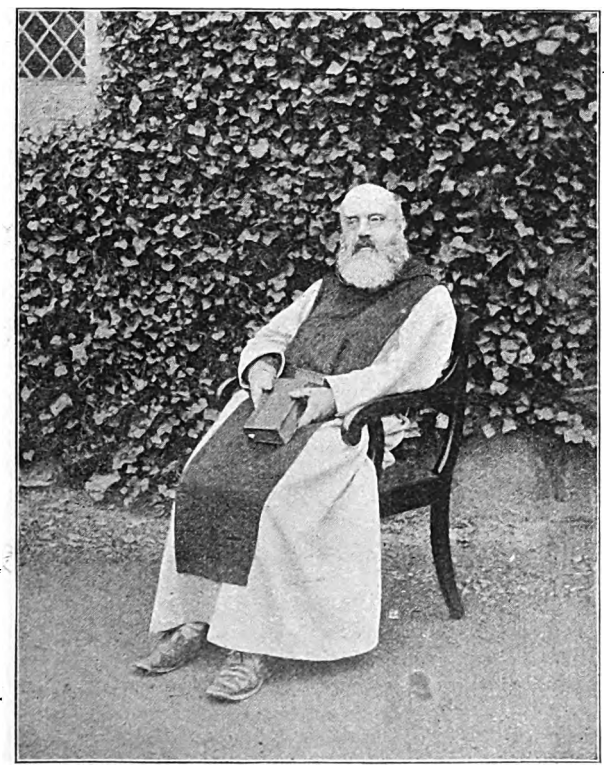
A VISIT TO THE TRAPPIST MONASTERY AT MOUNT ST. BERNARD'S, LEICESTERSHIRE.

By JOHN HULME.

ABOUT three miles from Coalville, two from Whitwick, and seven from Loughboro'; set in an environment of hills, and sheltered by the rocky summit of a hill; the spires of its Chapter House, Clock Tower, and Dormitory peeping from a nest of trees, and with sufficient wooded fringe to indicate the forest out of which its site has been scooped, is the Trappist or Reformed Cistercian Monastery of St. Bernard's—until recently the only mitred abbey in England. The Cross of its Calvary stands out well above its surroundings, a conspicuous object for miles; and it is neighboured by Grace Dieu, beloved of Wordsworth and breathing memories of Francis Beaumont, the poet.

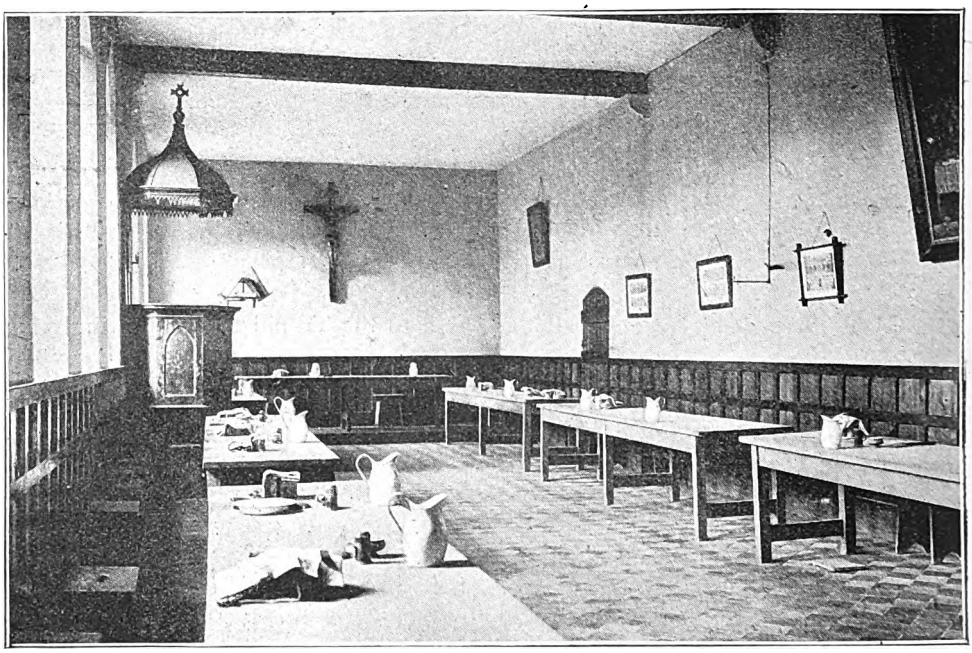
Sixty-seven years ago, a Trappist monk from Waterford was over in this country soliciting aid for some building operations at Mount Mellary, and among other places, visited Grace Dieu Manor, Leicestershire. Two years afterwards, the owner of the latter residence, the late Mr. Ambrose Lisle Phillips, sending a warm invitation to the Trappist brethren in Ireland, asked them to come and establish themselves at Charnwood Forest. It was an invitation couched in material terms—the offer of 227 acres of land; hence it is not surprising that it was at once responded to by an Order seeking fresh spiritual fields and pastures new.

It would be difficult, however, for the survivor of the later thirties to recognise the wind-swept and heather-decked forest and moorland of that period in the agricultural paradise that now smiles upon guest and wayfarer who claim kindred with, and have their claims allowed by, the good monks of Mount St. Bernard's. Nor is it easy for the visitor, viewing the present substantial, ivy-clad building, to picture for himself its progenitor in the humble four-roomed hut, through whose roof the rain percolated, through whose walls the tempest penetrated, and which served as kitchen, refectory, dormitory and chapel for Brother Augustine and the five followers who, leaving the Abbey at Mellarie, France, joined



FATHER BERNARD, THE ABBEY PROCURATEUR.

Digitized by Google



THE REFECTORY.

him here in 1835. Assiduous labour, for two years, saw them in a larger and more suitable building. Even this, however, owing to increase of numbers, in a very short time became too small. But Grace Dieu appears to have always been a name of good omen to the Cistercians, for during a visit to this family seat of the de Lisles, John, Earl of Shrewsbury, accompanied his host to service at the monastery, and was so much impressed with it, as well as the general life of the place, that he gave them £2,000 on condition that a new Abbey be erected, and on the present site.

Of course, the gift and its conditions were eagerly accepted, and in 1843 was laid the foundation stone of the present buildings, which, possessing an interest and beauty peculiarly their own, attract visitors from all parts of the world. There is scarcely an hour of the day that does not find some pilgrim turning in from the main road to the avenue which forms the main approach to the monastery, and passing through the ivy-crowned archway at the end of it, descending the well gravelled walk, from either side of which radiates floral and arboreal welcome, on his way to the porter's lodge. Few are the periods of rest when the bell is not sending its noisy message either to the brother porter, informing him that his presence is requested in the Poor-house for the relief of some needy wayfarer, or to the guest master, intimating that a party of visitors are desirous of being shown through the monastery.

They who wend their way St. Bernard-wards may be divided into three classes: Those impelled by the cravings of an empty stomach, and whose stay ends with the satisfaction of their hunger; those whose feelings are more curious than devotional, and who take their departure when there are no longer sights to be seen, or historical facts to be acquired; and those brought thither more by piety than pleasure, and who frequently remain as monastery guests.

The guests' quarters are situated in the front portion of the abbey, and comprise a reception-room (immediately to the right on entrance), a refectory adjoining (over the fireplace, in which are the abbey arms, as well as those of the Shrewsbury and de Lisle families), whilst, from each side, a staircase ascends to the sleeping rooms. These, though not pretentiously, are yet comfortably furnished, the occupant always finding writing conveniences to his hand, and a few suitable books in the tiny bookcase. On the refectory table will be seen all dishes in reason, and most in season ; for however much the rule of St. Benedict forbids the pleasures of the palate to the monks themselves, this gastronomical self-denying ordinance in no way applies to the comfort of their guests, who may truthfully exclaim : Hospitality and St. Bernard's are convertible terms ; courteousness, thy name is Father Gerome !

Digitized by Google

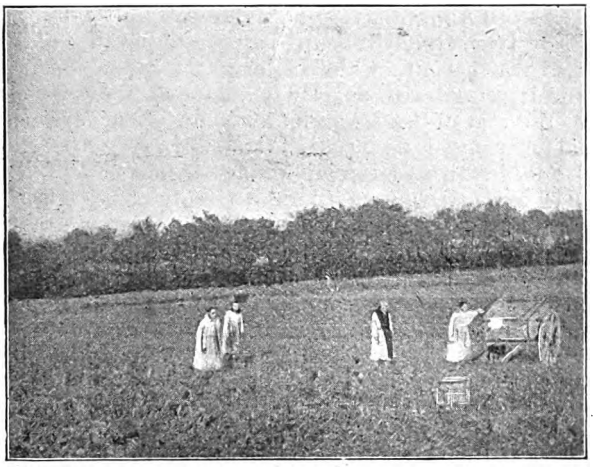
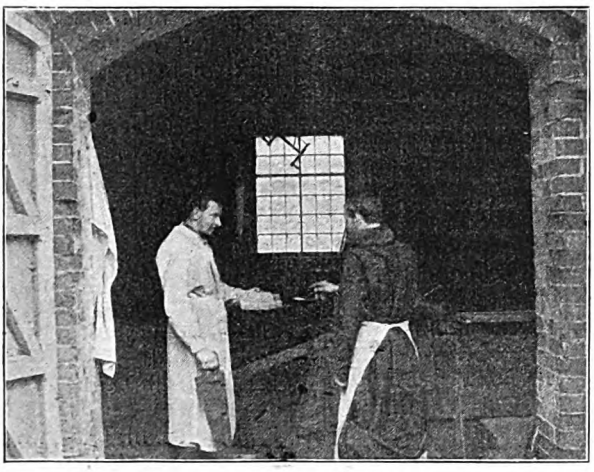
Having taken possession of his room, and with rest and refreshment repaired the effects of his journey, the visitor experiences a not unnatural longing to learn a little regarding the life of his hosts, to know their habits in health, their custom in sickness, their ceremonial at death. So, under the guidance of either the guest master (or one of the community specially permitted), he proceeds along the corridor leading from the guest quarters to the main portion of the abbey, the religious anticipating inquiries by mentioning that the infirmary is immediately overhead, and, after pointing out the kitchen, pantry, and one or two private rooms on the right, coming to a halt in front of a wooden door with a tiny eye-like window, through which can be obtained a glimpse of the library.

Emerging hence, and passing through the adjoining door into another corridor, the man of studious temperament or literary taste feels impelled towards a conversation on the works of theology, history, philosophy and general literature reposing on the well-stocked shelves of the room he has quitted ; but is astonished to find that his monk companion has suddenly become dumb, and gives no reply to his remarks save the raising of a warning finger or the bestowal of an admonitory look. Another of the brethren passes (walking close to the wall) when the astonishment is intensified on observing that no fraternal sound of greeting passes between them, and although a simple door only prevents the corridor he has just left from being directly continuous with the one he has entered, yet he realises that he has crossed from the realm of speech into the sanctuary of silence! It is only when he has reached the end of this second corridor, and passed through a door at the right into the refectory, that he learns from his Trappist companion, whose tongue has now become loosened, that they have just stepped out of one of the cloisters where conversation is never permitted upon any plea whatever, and whose walls echo no sound save the sacred chant and that of human footsteps. In other parts of the Abbey, however, and under special conditions, speech is occasionally allowed.

The Refectory is an oblong room with partly whitewashed walls and ceiling, and at its upper left hand side a pulpit, out of which one of the community reads whilst the rest are eating.



MONKS POTATO PICKING.



THE CISTERCIAN CARPENTERS.

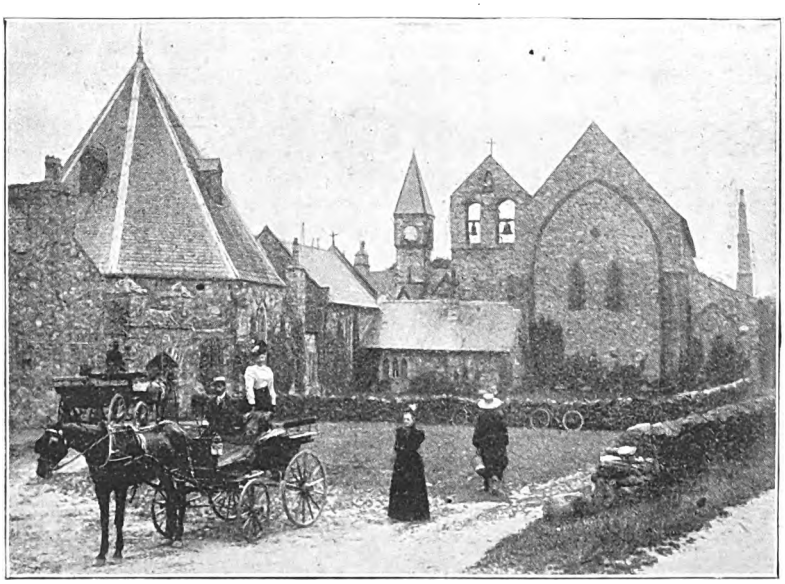
Digitized by Google

The Lord Abbot, having his Prior and Sub-Prior respectively at his right and left, occupies a seat at the head of the room and is served with exactly the same dishes as the rest of the community, who sit at tables ranged down each side. Laying the table for a Cistercian dinner is not a very exhaustive task, since it simply consists in placing on each member's tablet, i.e., marked portion of the table, a wooden fork, wooden spoon, iron knife, two-handled mug and napkin. One of their number is appointed to wait on the lay, and a father told off to perform a similar office for the professed brethren.

No one is allowed to speak; but must communicate his wishes by means of an alphabet of signs. Even in this manner there are only two things for which he is allowed to ask—bread and salt. Flesh, fish, and eggs are forbidden; the dietary being such as would satisfy the most rigid member of the Vegetarian Society:—for breakfast, bread and coffee; for dinner, a selection from vegetable soup, potatoes, rice, pastries, and fruit; and for supper, a cooked dish, bread, and a glass of either milk or beer.

A staircase leads from the dining room up to the dormitory, where the sleeping arrangements for the community somewhat resemble those made for dining, downstairs: the couches consist of a straw mattress, coverlet spread, and resting on a board raised a couple of feet from the floor, a pillow, and second coverlet completing them. They are separated from one another by wooden partitions, which, fronted with an entrance curtain or screen (near which is placed the name of the occupant) constitute the cell. That of the Lord Abbot is in the middle, and all sleep in their robes, with the hood drawn. At the entrance to the dormitory is the bell with which a brother gives the signal for rising, at two in the morning, three minutes being allowed before assembly in church; for the monastery, day begins with the singing of Matins and Lauds, which is generally finished by about four o'clock. The saying of mass occupies some; work and meditation others, until half-past five, when they assemble in church to sing that portion of their daily office called Prime. Then, and for the purpose of chanting a portion of St. Benedict's rule, the choir repair to the Chapter House, an octagonal building having the Lord Abbot's, Prior's, and Sub-Prior's seats facing the entrance, the others being arranged on either side of the Abbot, those of the lay following those of the professed brethren.

Here, on Maundy Thursday, takes place the ceremony of washing the feet of the community by the Lord Abbot, it being also contained in the Rule that he shall, during the day, wash the feet of and entertain a number of the poor of the neighbourhood. Here, also, a brother accuses himself, or is reminded by his fellows, of any fault or deflection from the Rule of St. Benedict, and a spiritual lecture or reading is given every evening here immediately before Compline. But the lay brethren usually assemble in their own Chapter House adjoining, which was formerly used by the whole community, and where the first Abbot is buried.



ABBEY VISITORS, WITH REAR VIEW OF CHURCH AND CHAPTER HOUSE.

Digitized by Google

THE ABBEY PORTER, BROTHER SIMEON.

The Trappist's next task, and before taking breakfast, is to arrange his couch. Half-past seven sees him again in church singing Tierce, followed by Mass (at which the guests are expected to be present), which over, the celebrant divests himself of his robes, and, taking hoe, or spade, goes to join the rest of the workers in the field, until half-past ten—the hour for Sext.

Dinner at 11.30 is succeeded by a recreative interval for reading, writing, or meditation, leading to the singing of Nones at one o'clock, and followed by work until half-past four. Then comes a short period of recreation until Vespers at five, succeeded by supper, assembly in Chapter for lecture, and Compline, at 6.30, in church—a ceremony at which the visitor is requested to attend.

The ringing of a bell, reminding him of this duty, brings him across the outer quadrangle, through the main building entrance, along the west cloister, past the north cloister, or Scriptorium, and into church, when, after having quietly ascended the staircase to the Tribune, or visitors' gallery, he can now look down upon a scene, witnessed once, never to be forgotten :—

The sombre aspect of the darkness-clothed Sanctuary (save for the solitary taper that continually burns in front of the altar) ; the dark habited lay brethren flitting like black spectres into their places, on the left hand ; the spectre-like white-robed monks gliding into their appointed stalls, in the middle ; the almost sepulchral tones of the responses ; the beautiful, instrumentally - accompanied rendering of the Salve Regina, followed by a period of meditative silence broken only by the rustle of a robe, or the click of a worshipper's rosary beads. Suddenly a spectral form rises from his knees, and silently moving away, vanishes in the darkness, and in a few minutes is heard the solemn vibrating tones of a bell, adding its share to the general impressiveness, and announcing that the devotional exercises of the Trappist-day are over, nothing remaining now but to receive the blessing of the Abbot and holy water sprinkling on passing out of the church ; after which, until two o'clock next morning, "darkness again and a silence."

The whole service is like a chapter from the middle ages, sending one's thoughts back to the old days of monastic England, and banishing, for the moment, all

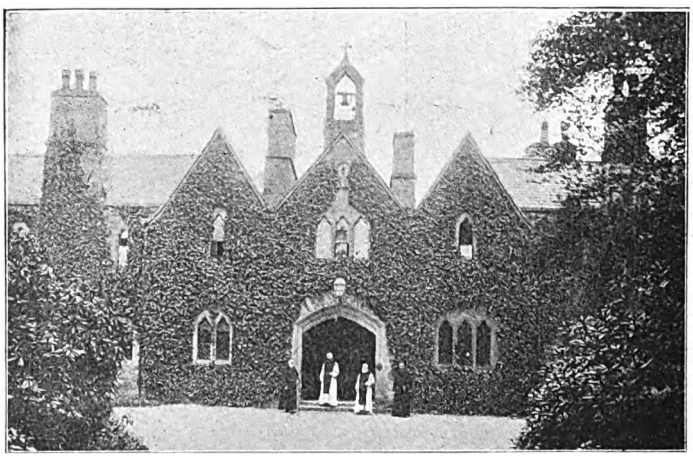
TAKING A STROLL IN THE GARDENS.

Digitized by Google

consciousness of the fact that we are living in the nineteenth century, and within a few miles of a large town.

The austerities of the Order are at once softened the moment one becomes sick or infirm; for then a brother is appointed to wait upon him tenderly, and his dietary may contain any dish whatever, except such as flatters the appetite without improving health, whilst close by the infirmary is a chapel for the especial use of the sick.

One day, many years ago, a certain gentleman, bidding his wife and family a temporary good-bye, announced his intention to spend Christmas in a unique manner—out of the world, as it were, with a body of Trappist monks in a corner of Leicestershire. At that time the brethren had charge of a boy's reformatory, situated on the monastery's former site. An expressed desire to see the inmates of this institution, and both guest and guest master have sallied forth into the night, and are making their way across the frost-bound fields towards the Colony, as it is called. Scarcely, however, have they arrived, when, and in the act of responding to the greetings of his young charges, the Cistercian suddenly staggers, is caught by and in a few minutes breathes his last in the arms of his visitor — none other than Charles Dickens!



FRONT VIEW OF THIS IVY-CLAD RETREAT.

The body, as is the case whenever a Cistercian dies, was washed, clothed in full habit as worn during life, and carried on a bier to the Chapter House, where it lay until the time appointed for burial, a lighted candle being placed at the feet and a crucifix at the head of the corpse. Arrangements were also made for continually having two monks to watch by the side of the corpse. This duty was taken in turns by the members of the community whose names and watch hour were written on a notice board.

From the Chapter House the body was then conveyed to the Church, where a solemn requiem Mass was sung previous to the transference of the body to the grave, whither it was borne in solemn procession, preceded by cross and acolytes, and accompanied by the Lord Abbot and brethren. After the body was lowered into the grave a brother went into it, placed a freshly-cut sod under the head of the deceased, and, after pulling the cowl over the head, laid a black cloth on the face. Each member of the community then threw a handful of earth into the grave before withdrawing and leaving it to the two brothers to whom had been entrusted the task of filling it up. A short time afterwards the usual small wooden cross bore the name and marked the last resting place of the beloved Father Lawrence.

To sum up, then, a Trappist's life, though certainly hard, is beautiful in its utter self-effacement and regard for others. Laborare et orare: They till the soil, bake, brew, make butter, keep poultry, build, do their own gas making and carpentry, besides smithing, working in the laundry, and on the tailor's board. The Abbey Poorhouse is always open for the temporary reception of the vagrant train. No one is ever sent away unrelieved, and many receive further assistance with money, whilst, in times of distress, it is a beacon light for the poor for miles around. The total of cases relieved every week averages five hundred, which speaks much for the open-handed charity of the monks of St. Bernard's.

JOHN HULME.

Digitized by Google

DO THE CHURCHES NEED CONVERTING?

EVEN in the affairs of everyday life no greater misfortune can happen to a man than to lose sight of his ideals, and one of the most necessary attributes of success is a constant watchfulness lest unsuspected evils creep in to mar his undertakings. If this is true of material things, it is still more so in spiritual matters, but with this difference: that the interests involved are infinitely more important. There never was so great a trust given to mankind as that which is the heritage of the Church of Christ, nor one entailing such a heavy weight of responsibility, for to it our Divine Master assigned the task of carrying His Gospel to the world.

No men can, therefore, less afford to neglect constant self-searching, both in their individual and corporate life, than Christians who, in our Lord's own words, are the light of the world, and to whose lives mankind looks for a practical demonstration of the truth of Christianity.

Is the Church in need of a new revival, or is it as strenuous as of yore in combatting the forces of evil?

Has its influence on the world increased, or that of the world upon itself become more marked?

Does it, or, does it not, attach too great weight to mere material considerations, and prize earthly honours and rewards before the fulfilment of its own God-given mission?

These are weighty questions, and cannot afford to be lightly brushed aside, even when we feel that, as a whole, the Church has been true to her ideals. It has been the duty of Christians to face them in every age, for they indicate real dangers with which the Church has been threatened before, and to which she has sometimes succumbed—as, for instance, in that dark period preceding the Reformation, and in England after the Restoration—so that, with such examples before us, we cannot afford to abandon our watchfulness.

In a remarkable article contributed to the Symposium on the "Greatest Need of the Century," in the January issue of the TEMPLE MAGAZINE, the Rev. Silas Hocking said:—

> What is needed more than anything else is a genuine ethical revival—the creation of a finer moral sense, of a purer moral atmosphere. I would say nothing in disparagement of creeds or ceremonials, or modes of worship—these things are important, no doubt, but they are not of supreme importance—the one essential thing is character.
>
> . . . . .
>
> I fear we must hold it a truth that however successful the Church may have been in christianising the world, the world has been far more successful in secularising the Church. The merely rich man has far more influence to-day in Church Councils than the merely godly man. Big houses count for more than great souls, and small sins are winked at when covered by large contributions. If the Kingdom of Heaven is represented by the ecclesiastical organisations that we call the Church, then a golden key will unlock the door, and money will purchase the highest seats.
>
> The Christian Church to-day is suffering from precisely the same evils that affected and paralysed the Jewish Church in the time of Christ. The points of analogy may be easily traced by anyone who will take the trouble to do so. Hence the failure of the Church to meet and circumvent the growing evils of the land. The power of the drink-seller is steadily increasing both in the Church and in the State. The Stock Exchange gambler is to the front in ecclesiastical enterprises. The company-promoter, the money-lender, the jerry-builder, the rack-renter, have honoured places in the synagogue, and the result is that morally the nation stagnates. Even religiously we make no real progress. There are fewer young people in our Sunday schools than there were five years ago; fewer adults, relatively to the size of the population, attending our churches; fewer additions, in proportion to the agencies, to the roll of Church members.

Digitized by Google

As the question raised by Mr. Hocking was of such vital importance, we sent a proof of his article to some of our religious leaders and requested their opinion upon it, and we are now able to place before our readers the replies we have received, which are as follow :—

Rev. J. MONRO GIBSON, D.D.

Minister of St. John's Wood Presbyterian Church.

The Church of Christ in our time is certainly very far from what it ought to be; and in particular it needs a great awakening as to its duty to those who are outside its pale. It, moreover, especially requires to be very much more in earnest in fighting against the vices which are eating like a canker into the community. As to the character of its members, however, and especially of its leaders, I am happy to say that my experience has been quite different from that indicated as the general rule by Mr. Hocking. I have often found, when I have had the opportunity of close and intimate acquaintance with Christians whom many looked upon as worldly, that they were far better men than was supposed; and as to those who have been leaders, I have in the course of thirty-six years known only one case, in the churches with which I have been associated, that would come under the roll of infamy of those who are represented in the letter as having "honoured places in the Synagogue," and that one lost his position in the Church immediately; while the great majority of them have not only been men of the strictest honour, but even of a saintly and Christlike character. To refer to only one of the Christian graces, I am continually coming upon illustrations of brotherly love and helpfulness, which I dare not publish, as they were never intended to be known; and, on the other hand, I cannot at this moment recall any surprise of meanness or wickedness (except the one already mentioned) to set over against these. The experience of others may entitle them to bring severe indictments against the disciples of Christ, but for me to do this would be to incur the self reproach of the Psalmist, "If I should speak thus, I should offend against the generation of Thy children."

As to the need of ethical preaching, I heartily agree that Social Ethics have been left far too much in the background; but I do not think that in the last quarter of the century there has been much preaching of mere creeds. The experience of a man who is always kept preaching himself is perhaps not decisive; but so far as mine goes I can say that the main object of the preachers I have known, however unsuccessful they may have been in attaining it, has been to lift the people up to the righteousness of God and the self-denial of Christ. I confess, however, that I am not one of those who think the best way to do this is to omit what many call dogma, viz, the truth concerning the Lord Jesus Christ, His Person, His Work, His Atonement, His Resurrection, His Reign. I do not believe that the Apostle weakens his exhortation to "walk in love" by adding "as Christ also hath loved us and given himself for us an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet-smelling savour"; nor do I think he was leaving the ethic of liberality for the dogmatic of a dry theology when he plied the Corinthians with the high motive, "For ye know the grace of Our Lord Jesus Christ that though he was rich, yet for your sakes He became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich."

But the Church has, and all of us have, much need of new life and new power. May we all seek it and find it in the new century.

J. Monro Gibson.

REV. JAMES ORR, D.D.

Professor of Church History, and Editor of United Presbyterian Magazine.

One would require to answer this question with a distinguo. It could not be fairly answered with a blunt and indiscriminating "Yes," or "No." "Conversion" itself is an ambiguous word. If to deny "conversion" to church or individual means to deny all possession of a true divine life, I should refrain from describing as "unconverted" many in whose character and life I yet see many faults, one-sidedness, imperfections—even, often, tempers and passions—that, judged by themselves, must be pronounced decidedly unchristian. Man is a strange compound, a bundle frequently of contradictions, erring, unwise, inconsistent, standing daily in need of cleansing grace and charitable judgment. If, however, the word "conversion" is used as Christ uses it in Matthew xviii, 3, to denote the need, even in Christians sometimes, of change in the dominant temper of mind, I say emphatically that Mr. Hocking is right, and that there is clamant need for "conversion," both in churches and the individuals who compose them, if the work of the Kingdom of God is to be done in the 20th century. I do not think lightly of the churches or their work, or care to endorse all the hard things that are said of them. I believe the Spirit of God is in the churches, and that the influence of this Spirit is felt in unnumbered ways in private, social, philanthropic and public life. We have only to think of what society would be if all that flows from the spirit of Christ's religion, and the disinterested efforts inspired by it, were withdrawn, to see how much the Christian Church, with all its faults, means for our civilisation. But I cannot but feel that the Church, as a whole, is not at the present time rising to the level of its opportunity, or bearing the witness for "the mind of Christ" to the world, it ought to do. In this sense it undoubtedly needs "conversion." Instead of combating the world's secularity, materialism, aggressiveness, it has too often itself fallen a prey to worldly ideals and standards, and become their advocate, defender, or apologist. The Church at the present moment is not a potent witness for national righteousness. Even where it feels aright, its protest is feeble, it is afraid to speak. This timidity must be overcome. There must be more faithful, uncompromising, prophet-like utterance, if the Church is to make any impression on the world. This means that the Church must itself be aroused to a new and more just realisation of what the "mind of Christ" is. The pressing problem of the 20th century will be—How far is the Church able to fulfil its mission of translating the mind of Christ into concrete actuality in all the departments of our human existence? If it can do that, it will prosper; if it fails in that, it will lose its power and will deserve to lose it.

Digitized by Google

JAMES ORR.

REV. E. J. HARDY, M.A.,
Author of "How to be Happy though Married," "Doubt and Faith," etc., etc.

In all ages of the Church there have been those who, like Rev. Silas Hocking, were, and are, impatient to separate tares from the wheat. They cannot allow both to grow together until the harvest. "Wanted—perfection!" is their cry. If things are as bad as Mr. Hocking thinks, we fail to see how it would improve them to take away creeds, modes of worship, and the other crutches which those of us who are very weak and imperfect find helpful. If we are so wicked in spite of these things, what would we be without them? If the good were to separate themselves from an imperfect world they would become self-righteous, and the world would altogether decide for the devil. I agree with Mr. Hocking that the one thing essential is character, and that without the spirit of God nothing is strong, nothing holy, but God has appointed means for the building up of character, and because the end is more important than the means, that is no reason why the means should be neglected or despised.

A common reason why people with noble character do not profess religion is because they have a high standard of it, but surely the spirit of their lives, and the humility of their "Help, Lord, mine unbelief!" will be accounted for righteousness. On the other hand, I have known a professing Christian and a practising lawyer. People are better than they seem, and worse than they seem, and we should obey St. Paul's precept and judge nothing before the time.

As it was in the time of Elijah so it is now, there are many more than despondent people think who have not bowed the knee to Baal. Very often people are only ignorant when they seem to be wicked. They know not what they do on the Stock Exchange and as landlords. The Church should teach them broad principles of duty, but, as business matters are very complicated, she should be careful not to talk about details which she does not understand. The Church is quite right to try and get rich men into her fold, for it is possible that their money, which is a great power, may become consecrated to noble uses.

It is not my experience that there are fewer religious people than there used to be. Or that working men think all ministers humbugs. On the contrary, it seems to me that ours is a very earnest age, and that people in thousands, both clerical and lay, of all denominations and of no denomination, are battling very hard against drunkenness, impurity, gambling, etc. New manifestations of sin, however, arising from causes for which the Church is not responsible, are presenting themselves, and we have to plan new methods of warfare to oppose them. The churches are so good that we must all wish they were better. Certainly, without them, things would be much worse than they are.

Digitized by Google

E. J. HARDY.

REV. J. W. HORSLEY, M.A.,
Rector of St. Peter's, Walworth.

It is difficult to criticise, and even in measure to understand, the Rev. S. K. Hocking's utterance without a definition of some words and an explanation of some phrases therein used. "Do the churches need converting?" Here, in limine, something might be said as to what is meant by "the churches," and still more as to the interpretation of the word "converting." Conversion implies previous aversion, and I am not aware of any religious body that is wholly blind to the light once seen, while of course individuals in all churches may want conversion. This is no new experience, nor one ever unknown, while an organised body is made of units, and human nature and freewill remain. I suppose what he really means is to point out, as we all should and may do, that errors of excess or of defect are constantly arising which should be corrected by reference to the standard of "the faith, the whole faith, and nothing but the faith," and that these errors arise in many bodies and individuals from tenable pious opinions being made into matters of faith, and still more from the perennial difficulty of preserving the proportion and the balance of faith without unduly depressing one article of faith or morals, or unduly exaggerating another. So I find nothing new, nothing that has not always been the cause of a prophet's trouble in the subject of his animadversion. I think we are at one in insisting on the need of more moral teaching and more definite teaching of morality, without any fear of the scowl or the influence of the monied galled jade. Solifidian tracts must be accompanied by sanitary tracts, and commercial immorality denounced even in preference to those ritual practices or those religious phrases which others use and we, perhaps, have not tried to understand. But because we see evil we need not become pessimists; because we feel it our duty to hit at the devil wherever we find him (whether in adultery or in adulteration, whether in religious or in journalistic cant, whether in rack renting or in pew renting), we need not, therefore, omit to thank God for the general advance in the desire to know and practise truth and righteousness. I remember my wise and good old grandmother saying that she believed thoughts, words, and deeds were all better than when she was young. The nearer I get to her age the more I agree with her. It is because we have more light and more desire for its spreading that certain evils become more apparent. They are more visible, but not therefore more numerous or influential. Let us remember that Hope is to be cultivated as much as Faith and Charity. I know what he feels, and feel the same myself; but I think people may not appreciate the fact that he is putting forward a truth, one side of the truth, but not now the whole truth. Things are bad, but not so shocking as S. Hocking might seem to be asserting.

J. W. HORSLEY.

REV. J. C. BREWITT.
Ex-President of United Methodist Free Churches.

I am obliged to you for an advance proof of Mr. Silas Hocking's article. It is full of sweeping accusations. Some are true, others lose power by their exaggeration. The following sentence:—"When the Church herself has been converted to Godliness then shall we make our influence felt upon the nation," even the writer would hardly interpret in an absolute sense.

Surely, no man with experience of Church life in this country will say and believe that all—Archbishops, Bishops, Deans, and the rank and file of the Ministry of all Christian churches, and the entire membership of these churches—are without godliness, and need converting as the first step towards the conversion of the whole nation to Jesus Christ!

Digitized by Google

Without doubt there is much formal religion, and therefore large numbers in the churches need to experience the renewing grace of God. The whole Church plunged into the power of the Divine Spirit, it seems to me, is the prime requisite for the work of the 20th century. Only this will enable her to resist and overthrow the power of wealth, luxury, and pleasure so rife inside the Church, as well as amongst those who are of the world.

J. C. BREWITT.

REV. W. CARLILE.

Founder of the Church Army.

Character creation is the chief object of Christianity and especially of the Church Army. Character can only re-create or re-produce itself. Here heredity binds it. Yes, indeed, the Church does need, not only a sudden conversion of will and affection both to good and to God, but also a thorough gradual conversion from long acquired habits of evil learned from the world, whereby she is taught to call bad "Good;" lust, "Nature;" greed, "Empire;" mammon, "Power;" drunkenness, "Bonhomie;" gambling, "Speculation;" goodness, "Goody;" piety, "Pie;" and the good liver, he who dies worth much. The democracy sees through the sham, having no quarrel with the devoted and self-denying Example from Nazareth, but only with us who are professors of his creed rather than possessors of his character.

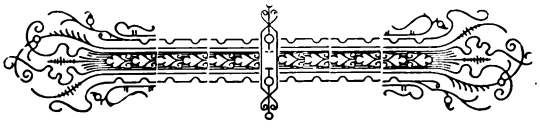
W. CARLILE.

DR. FARRAR.

Dean of Canterbury.

I think that what Mr. Hocking says deserves very serious attention.

F. W. FARRAR.



INTO THY HANDS, O LORD!

The Glow had faded from the west,
The splendour from the mountain's crest;
Stern Day's relentless task is done
And Nature rests at set of sun.
But ere she shuts her weary eyes,
Soothed as by airs of Paradise,
She softly prays on bended knee,
"In manus tuas, Domine!"

O silent hours, how dear ye are!
There is no light of moon or star;
The twilight shadows slowly creep
From rock to rock, from steep to steep;
The trees stand breathless on the hill;
The restless winds are hushed and still;
Only one prayer from land and sea—
"In manus tuas, Domine!"

And, O my soul, be sure when night
In God's good time puts out the light,
And draws the curtains soft and dim
Round weary head and heart and limb,
You will be glad! But ere you go
To sleep, that no rude dreams shall know,
Be this prayer said for you and me—
"In manus tuas, Domine!"

Julia C. R. Dorr.

Digitized by Google

IN THE PUBLIC EYE

Men and Women who are Helping to Make the World Brighter and Better.

FEW names are better known to the reading public than that of "John Strange Winter," the nom de guerre of the author of "Bootles' Baby," who is known in private life as Mrs. Arthur Stannard. Mrs. Stannard is the daughter of the late Rev. Henry Vaughan Palmer, and the gifted authoress was born at York. She early showed a predilection for books, high class fiction being her especial delight. Thackeray, Dickens, Charles Reade, and Whyte Melville were her constant companions. As a child, she gave indications of the waywardness of genius in her disposition, soon tiring of any task which she took up and leaving it before it was half finished. But, fortunately for her readers, "John Strange Winter" overcame this early tendency when she arrived at years of discretion, or our present-day literature might never have been enriched with those delightful books, which the great Ruskin characterised as "the most finished and faithful rendering ever yet given of the character of the British soldier." Her father died when she was twenty-one. Before that time she had made her first essays into the field of literature, having contributed stories to various periodicals. For many years she wrote serials as "Violet Whyte," and as such she became the third most popular contributor on the Family Herald (to which she supplied nearly forty novels before the more remunerative masculine pseudonym caused her to drop writing for them). She assumed the "J. S. W." because her first book was a collection of soldier stories and the publishers objected to a feminine name. Her first great work was "Bootles' Baby," a truly fascinating piece of fiction, and one of the most popular, though some of her subsequent writings contain even better work, as, for instance, "Houp-la," "Mignon's Secret," "My Poor Dick," "Good-Bye," and "Grip." Mrs. Stannard especially excels in her portraiture of the British officer,

MRS. ARTHUR STANNARD.
(John Strange Winter.)
Photograph by Alfred Ellis & Walry, 51, Baker Street.

Digitized by Google

whose aspirations and class feelings she thoroughly understands. Her pictures of child life are also admirable, and every lover of children should read "Mignon." She is a most prolific writer, having sent out more than seventy novels. To all who prize truthful and inspiring fiction, "John Strange Winter" is a true friend.

IT is impossible to look on the noble head of Dr. Storey without recognising a leader of men. Physically and mentally he is a son of Anak. More than any other teacher, perhaps, the personality of the Principal of Glasgow University has influenced and fascinated the present generation of students. Feared for the biting wit which has laid many a folly low, his patriotism, his large sympathies, and the unflinching honesty of his character, have gained him a large measure of love and reverence. He has written some striking books, notably biographies, and is a familiar figure on the golf links. In spite of a certain hauteur of demeanour, and in spite of his position as one of her Majesty's chaplains, he has strong democratic sympathies. Not long ago he championed the cause of the working men of Scotland against Lord Overtoun, who required his employés to work on Sunday whilst at the same time denouncing the opening of museums and picture galleries on that day. The place he holds in the estimation of his brother ministers is shown by the fact that he has already been Moderator of the General Assembly. In the future he is destined to come yet even more to the front. With his indomitable will, and with his unrivalled powers of incisive and sarcastic speech, he will be the most formidable opponent of the rapprochement between the advanced section of the Church of Scotland and the Scottish Episcopal Church.

DEAN LEFROY is probably the only clergyman to whom belongs the distinction of having built an English church in a foreign land while away on his holidays. The Dean can, in fact, claim more than this, for he has founded two churches, both of them in Switzerland, the one at Riffel Alp, and the other at Rhone Glacier. Being an ardent mountaineer, Dean Lefroy has for years spent his vacation among the Swiss Alps,

Photo by DR. HUGH STOREY. Lafayette.
(Principal of Glasgow University.)

and in this way he became acquainted with the fact that in these particular Alpine districts there was no English church where British tourists could worship. Some men would have felt it no part of their duty to concern themselves with a matter which was quite outside the province of their own pastoral work. Not so Dean Lefroy. As soon as he became convinced of the need, he at once set himself to supply it, and that not by applying to headquarters, but by his own exertions. He worked unremittingly on behalf of this object, and was at length successful in raising a sufficient sum to found the first church. This proved such a blessing to English holiday-makers that he undertook the task of raising funds for building the second. His eloquent appeals met with a hearty response, and so one more English church rose up among these mountain solitudes. Dean Lefroy has many notable achievements to record in the course of his brilliant and useful career. When incumbent of St. Andrew's, Liverpool, he formed a special divinity class for his young men, and of the members of this class, who owe their training to him, no less than twenty-five have subsequently taken Holy Orders. The Dean is a fine preacher with a very persuasive style, and the church that can secure his services on behalf of a charitable object has cause to deem itself fortunate. He has raised very large sums of money for Church purposes, and besides those in the Alps has founded several places of worship in Liverpool. It was he who, in connection with Mr. John Torr, M.P., founded the Bishopric of Liverpool, which under its late Bishop, the Right Rev. J. C. Ryle, became such a splendid centre of Christian work. He was also the originator of the Clergy Sustentation Fund. Dr. Lefroy is a great lover of music, and since he became Dean of Norwich has exerted himself most successfully in raising money for a new organ, and for completely restoring the Cathedral.

Digitized by Google

AN English clergyman in the East End of London has set himself to grapple with the difficult task of converting the Jews to Christianity by having sermons preached to them in their own language. This is the Rev. J. A. Faithfull, M.A., Rector of St. Mary's, Whitechapel, in whose parish the Hebrew population amounts to nearly 12,000 souls. Mr. Faithfull keenly felt his responsibilities to these alien parishioners, who are, perhaps, the hardest to reach of any class of unbelievers, because conversion to Christianity means with them ostracism even by their dearest relations and friends. There is an open-air pulpit built outside St. Mary's Church, and this Mr. Faithfull makes a means of drawing the people round him. On the front of this pulpit is a portion of Scripture in Hebrew written in bold characters. After a short service in the open air all are invited to accompany the Rector into the Church; an invitation to which many respond. Mr. Faithfull is not conversant with Yiddish himself, so his curate, Mr. Weinberger, himself a converted Jew, addresses them in their own tongue, which is much appreciated. Mr. Faithfull had a large number of copies of the Epistle to the Hebrews in Yiddish distributed among the congregation, after a sermon by the curate on this Epistle, and they were eagerly sought after. Every week a large Jewish congregation attends these services. Many come again and again, so that the work is undoubtedly bearing much fruit.

THOUGH still a young man the Rev. Hugh Black has earned the reputation of being one of the first preachers in Scotland, a land long famous for the eloquence of its ministers. He was born at Rothesay, a charming seaside resort on the West Coast of Scotland, and was educated first at a private school, and subsequently at Glasgow University, where, he graduated M.A. He entered the Ministry in 1891, and became minister of Sherwood Church, Paisley. Here he soon attracted the attention of a larger audience, for the eloquence of his preaching drew people from all parts to hear him. It was not long before he received a pressing invitation from Edinburgh to become the colleague of the celebrated Dr. Whyte, at Free St. George's, but the General Assembly did not think it wise for him to leave Paisley so soon, and it was not until January, 1896, when the invitation was renewed, that he came to fill this appointment, one of the most important in the Presbyterian Church. In this wider sphere, Mr. Black has become a power in the land, and Edinburgh is justly proud of her gifted young preacher, whose fame attracts many strangers to Free St. George's. When he married, his people showed their high appreciation of the work he has done among them by presenting him him with a purse of £600, and making his salary equal to that of his distinguished senior, Dr. Whyte. Mr. Black is also well-known as an author, and his books have passed through several editions. The best known are "The Dream of Youth," and "Friendship." Though one of the busiest of men, Mr. Black contrives to find time for his favourite recreation, which is cycling, and he may be often seen on the wheel after a hard day's work.

NAMES given by the people are generally deserved. The masses don't flatter, so when the people of Val-des-Bois near Rheims gave Léon Harmel "le bon père" for title there was something more in it than as applied to a mere distributor of village doles. I spent a day at his wool-combing works once. The "works" really include a small village, with church, theatre, playing fields, cottages, general store, infirmary, and schools, and "le bon père" is everywhere. As we walked together the little children ran after him to explore his pockets for sweeties; he listened to a worried, garrulous mother with patience and interest; there was no change of attitude nor did anyone speak as we passed, but everyone seemed glad to see him. He does not believe in profit-sharing as between employer and employed, for to make the employed feel the failures seems unjust—yet to allow them to share success without taking risks seems illadvised charity. All the 1,200 workers have a fair living wage, good houses, marriage portions for the daughters and every encouragement to realise that mutual help is the surest road to self help. Léon Harmel is the Pope's strongest ally in France, and of him the latter said: "I approve of all you have done in the past, all you are doing to-day, and all you intend to do."

Digitized by Google

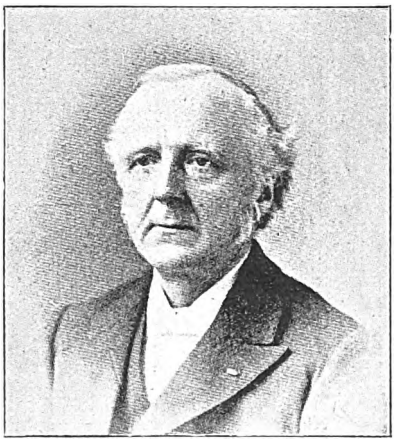
MR. W. R. BRADLAUGH.
(The Strenuous Opponent of Infidelity; Brother of the late Charles Bradlaugh.)
Photograph by Debenham, 12, Clarence Street, Gloucester.

NO two brothers ever presented a greater contrast in character and ideals than Mr. W. R. Bradlaugh, the doughty opponent of Infidelity, and his brother Charles, its most noted champion. Both W. R. and Charles Bradlaugh had a careful Christian training, but the latter early came under the influence of infidels, whose specious arguments seemed unanswerable to the inexperienced youth. His brother was so horrified with this result that he determined to devote his life to combating the insidious evil which lays its traps for the unwary. Mr. W. R. Bradlaugh has rendered great service to the cause of Christianity by the intrepid way in which he has carried on the fight for thirty years, though it has often been an uphill task, owing to that lack of funds which so frequently cripples a good work. Mr. Bradlaugh has allowed the Freethinkers no rest, and whenever he finds that they are arranging meetings he follows them all over the country, energetically bills the districts with warnings against Infidelity, and organises counter demonstrations. He has also to arrange for a Christian evidence debater to be present at each infidel meeting, in order to refute the arguments with which the atheist lecturer hopes to convince his hearers. Such success has attended the efforts of these Christian debaters that the stock infidel objections have become utterly discredited, and Freethinkers are ever at their wits' end to find fresh weapons, such as they are, to attack the truth of the Bible. Mr. Bradlaugh is the editor of the Christian Armoury, formerly known as the Anti-Infidel, and, in this and his numerous published books and pamphlets, his "answers to infidel objections" are most lucid and convincing, and form a valuable vade mecum for combating the arguments of atheists. Mr. Bradlaugh thinks that blatant atheism is on the decline, but that there exists to-day a certain laxity of thought even in the churches, which constitutes a greater, because more subtle, danger. Mr. Bradlaugh, I much regret to learn, has met with a severe stroke of ill fortune, and the work of his life is practically brought to a standstill. By the disastrous fire at Saffron Hill, the whole of the stereo plates of all his books, pamphlets, etc., the result of his labours during more than a quarter of a century, have been destroyed. It is most necessary that all who value the work he has been doing should now rally round him in this hour of trial.

Digitized by Google



REV. F. B. MEYER.
(Pastor of Christ Church, Westminster.)

ONE of the most influential and widely beloved of Nonconformist Ministers to-day is the Rev. F. B. Meyer, pastor of Christ Church, Westminster. This he owes, not only to his abilities as a preacher and a writer, great as they undoubtedly are, but also to that deep earnestness which stamps every word he utters. The writer has spoken to people who, though making no pretensions to religion, have been deeply impressed by his great kindliness and the absence of all assumption from his manner, and have freely acknowledged the uplifting influence of Christianity as displayed in his character. This is what makes Mr. Meyer so beloved by the poor, who are quick to perceive in him a true and staunch friend, sympathetic with their sufferings, and gentle with, though never condoning, their failings. Mr. Meyer has travelled both in India and America. In the former country he was much distressed to find the pernicious influence which the Anti-Christian press exerts over the minds of the natives, and considers this one of the first evils to be combatted in the task of evangelising India's dusky millions. He has given his active support to the world-famous Christian Endeavour movement, and was Chairman of the English society at the great Convention last year. Mr. Meyer sees that one of the greatest dangers to be guarded against in the Christian life to-day is the undue love of pleasure, which is leading many young people to neglect the proper observance of the Lord's Day. Pleasure within its legitimate limits is not only allowab'e but necessary, but there is a growing tendency to permit it to absorb the best energies of our life. Mr. Meyer entered the ministry in 1870, when he became assistant to the Rev. C. M. Berrell of Liverpool. He next had charge of the Baptist Chapel, York. This was in 1872, and two years later he was appointed minister of the Victoria-road Church, Leicester. After working unremittingly among his people for four years his labours became so fruitful in results, and such large congregations were attracted, that it became necessary to build the Melbourne Hall, Leicester, especially for his ministry. Ten years later, in 1888, we find him established in London at the Regent's Park Chapel, and he has finally succeeded to the ministerial inheritance of the Rev. Rowland Hill—Christ Church, Westminster, having been built to carry on the work of the old Surrey Chapel. As an author Mr. Meyer is as widely known as he is as a preacher. "Israel: a Prince with God," "Elijah: tried by Fire," "The Bells of Isis," "Reveries and Realities," "Workaday Sermons," "Blessed are Ye," are amongst some of the best known works which have proceeded from his pen, and which have had great influence on the religious thought of the day.

IT was whilst a boy at Eton that the scheme of forming a polytechnic institute occurred to Mr. Quintin Hogg, the grand result of which is known all over the world. Mr. Hogg's description of the first "Class" that was held is pathetic in the extreme. "With an empty beerbottle for a candlestick, and a tallow candle as an illumination, two crossing sweepers as pupils, your humble servant as teacher, and a couple of bibles as reading books, there was practically started what finally grew into the Polytechnic." Working earnestly amongst the very worst boys of London for many years, it was not until 1881, when the Polytechnic came into being, that this great philanthropist was able to found an Institute which should be absolutely catholic in its tastes and aims, where any reasonable preference, whether athletic, intellectual, spiritual, or social, could be indulged. On the opening night over 1,000 new members were enrolled; to-day the number exceeds 17,000, whilst during the winter there is an average daily attendance of between 4,000 and 5,000 for the classes and societies. The effect for good that such an Institute must have had upon the young men and women of London can scarcely be gauged; but, underlying all the work, the secret of its success is held in the motto chosen by Mr. Hogg, "The Lord is our Strength."

Digitized by Google

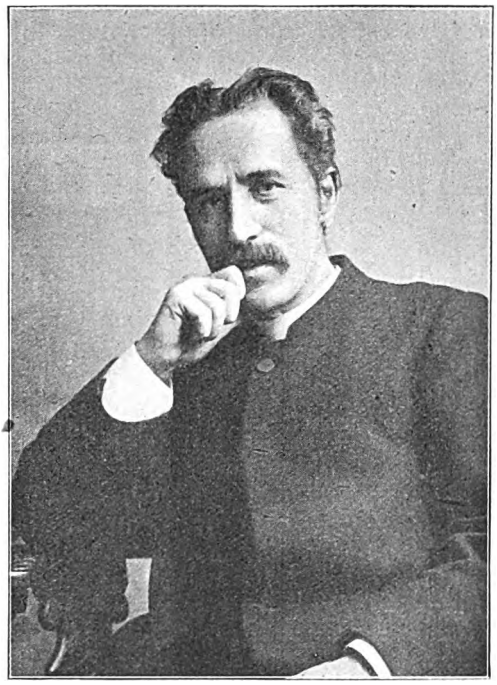
WE are able to furnish our readers this month with a counterfeit presentment of the Rev. J. Reid Howatt, whom readers of the TEMPLE MAGAZINE have come to regard as a personal friend. Mr. Reid Howatt has gained this honour for himself chiefly by his unwearied efforts on behalf of the poor cripple children in London; and his pages "for the bairns" in the TEMPLE MAGAZINE have made his name something of a household word in many homes in Britain, as well as beyond the seas. The minister of Camberwell Presbyterian Church has, however, other claims besides that of being founder of the Crutch and Kindness League, to a place "In the Public Eye." It will perhaps surprise his youthful readers—and some, too, of mature years—to learn that the



THE REV. J. REID HOWATT.
(Who started the Crutch and Kindness League.)
Photograph by W. A. Brown & Son, Camberwell Road.

MR. QUINTIN HOGG.
(Founder of the Polytechnic.)
Photograph by Henry T. Reed, 16, Tottenham Court Road.

conductor of "Our Children's Corner" has actually passed his semi-jubilee as a minister. This event was celebrated in October last when Mr. Reid Howatt, among other gifts evoked by the occasion, was the recipient of an album containing the good wishes and autographs of from three to four hundred members and old friends of the Camberwell Presbyterian Church. Mr. Reid Howatt has the distinction of having occupied his first and only charge for a longer period than any of his brethren in the two Metropolitan Presbyteries; he has, at various times, had tempting offers to change his field of ministerial labour, but for a quarter of a century has loyally and courageously maintained the cause he took in hand as a young pastor in the summer of 1875. The gift of Mr. Reid Howatt as a preacher to children is well-known in Presbyterian circles at home and in the Colonies, and has received recognition beyond the confines of his own denomination. The faculty of speaking to children from the pulpit in a way that rivets attention and is both interesting and instructive is indeed a rare one, but it belongs in an almost unique degree to the Presbyterian minister of Camberwell.

Digitized by Google

Many of his sermonettes or addresses to little folks have been published, the titles of some of his volumes—"The Children's Pulpit," "The Children's Angel," "The Children's Vow"—sufficiently indicating their contents. It was in a review of one of these that C. H. Spurgeon designated Mr. Howatt "The Prince of Preachers to Children." Other works such as "Agnostic Fallacies," "Jesus the Port," and "After Hours" have come from the facile pen of Mr. Reid Howatt, who was a journalist in early days and left Glasgow—he is by birth a west of Scotland man—when barely out of his teens to edit a paper in Dudley—a work he maintained throughout his theological studies and only relinquished when his settlement at Camberwell had been finally decided upon. He has contributed also to periodical literature, as the files of The Young Man, Home Messenger and other monthlies testify. A singular honour was conferred upon Mr. Reid Howatt in 1894; in that year he was asked to write the jubilee report of the Ragged School Union. His review of the fifty years' work of this noble philanthropic institution secured the approbation of the directorate of the Union, and the report, issued as a neat booklet entitled "Then and Now," had a wide circulation. When his work is finished—and may that day be distant—Mr. Howatt has no higher desire than to be remembered as one who "loved the bairns."

FEW clergymen can boast of such a unique record as the Rev. J. Glynn Childs, B.A., Rector of St. Dennis, Cornwall. Born on May 10th, 1810, the rev. gentleman has now nearly reached the good old age of 91, and has the distinction of being the oldest beneficed clergyman in Cornwall, though he has now decided to retire from active work. He was Curate of Tregony, 1835-37; St. Blazey, 1839-42; and Perranarworthal, 1842-44 (Truro diocese); also St. Paul's, East Stonehouse, Devon, 1844-47 (Exeter diocese), becoming the first resident Rector of St. Dennis in the year 1852, which living he has held ever since. The Church has recently undergone complete restoration at a cost of over £1,000. This ancient edifice dates back to Norman times. A convenient Rectory house has been built by Mr. Childs, and there is a small glebe, but the stipend is not large. The venerable rector enjoys excellent health, and has rarely been absent from his people during the long period he has resided with them, which extends to over 48 years. He at present carries a physique which would do justice to a much younger man. Greatly to the regret of his parishioners—both Churchmen and Nonconformists, the hearts of both of whom he has long ago won by his many kind acts and words—he came to his decision to relinquish the duties of his parish.

REV. J. GLYNN CHILDS.
Photograph by Wheeler, Weymouth.

IT would be hard to find a philanthropic work undertaken on behalf of Tommy Atkins in which Colonel James Gildea, C.B., has had no share. Great as is the number of organisations which he has started and still continues to direct, he is never too busy to lend a helping hand to the inauguration of any new scheme likely to prove beneficial. Nor is his philanthropy confined to organisations; it is personal as well, and the Colonel's residence has been justly named "The Soldier's House of Call." Thither flock almost every day some of his humble red-coated friends, whose tales of distress are always listened to with an attentive ear, and who seldom go away without some mark of practical sympathy. The greatest work of his life was the establishment of the "Soldiers and Sailors Families' Association." This Association has branches all over the Kingdom. It was founded to meet exactly the wants that we have experienced during the last 12 months, and without such an organisation it is impossible to understand what would have happened, or the terrible distress that would have occurred. Little less than three quarters of a million have been given since the commencement of the war, and there are at the present time on the books of the Association 80,000 families, representing, with children, not less than 200,000 souls. This, as will be seen, is a truly national work. Colonel Gildea's active sympathies with those who pay the price of war in suffering were early manifested. The breaking out of the Franco-German war gave him his first opportunity. He proceeded to the seat of war and served as one of the agents of the National Aid Society for the sick and wounded in war, and was present at the capitulation of Metz. The terrible disaster of Isandlana in 1879 left hundreds of widows and orphans face to face with destitution, for no fund was available for their assistance. He raised no less than £12,500, and undertook the distribution himself. His efforts to form a permanent fund proved fruitless, but the Government undertook to render the necessary assistance. How inadequate this assistance has been, recent events have proved but too clearly. With his own hands the Colonel packed up 25,000 volumes and dispatched them for the use of the soldiers in hospital during the Afghan War. After the Maiwand disaster, widows and orphans again were many, and the help forthcoming scanty, but the Colonel, by his tireless efforts, raised £10,700, which he distributed amongst the sufferers, the work of distribution taking two years, as each case had to be carefully investigated and the necessary grant apportioned. The same story is repeated again and again in the successive wars which have broken out: the first and second Soudan Wars, the Burmah War, and lastly, the present South African War. Hospital comforts and books for the sick and wounded,

Digitized by Google

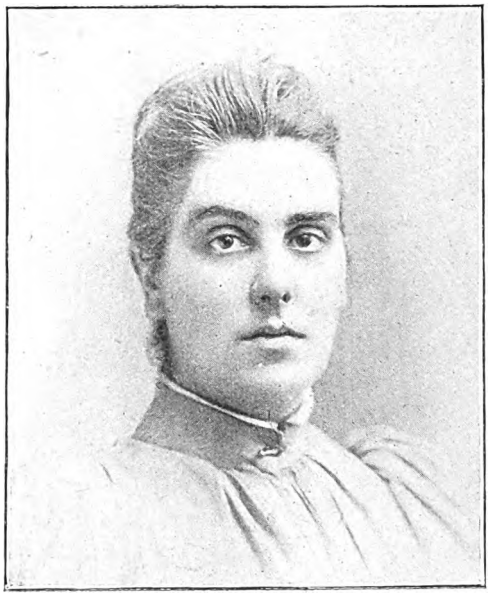
COLONEL JAMES GILDEA, C.B.
(The Soldiers' Friend.)
Photograph by Martin Jacolette, Queen's Gate.

and relief for the widows and orphans at home have all been generously provided through the Colonel's personal efforts and the effective organisations he has started.

DR. JANE WALKER has taken a leading part in introducing the open air treatment of consumption in this country. Miss Walker, who is a North Country woman, a native of Dewsbury, and has studied both in this country and the Continent, had her attention first drawn to the subject by a friend, who asked her if she had ever heard of Nordrach in the Black Forest. Up to the spring of 1892, in common with most of the medical profession, she had believed in the climatic treatment of tuberculosis. But here was a method that gave good hope of permanent cure, and a cure that could be carried out near home and for a comparatively small cost. At Cheshunt and in Suffolk Miss Walker has found suitable positions for two sanatoria where the treatment is now being carried on with wonderful success. Amazing quantities of food and no

Digitized by Google



DR. JANE WALKER.
(The Advocate of the Open-Air Treatment for Consumption.)
Photograph by C. Vandyk, Gloucester Road, Queen's Gate.

windows seem to sum up the treatment. It is wonderful how people get used to the floods of fresh air, even amongst the poor people who formed the bulk of Miss Walker's first patients. "I wish I could get rid of the side of my room," said one poor woman who had at first been with difficulty persuaded to unfasten her window. Though all are not of course cures, yet a new era of hope seems to have opened for consumptives. No doubt Miss Walker's genial personality does a great deal to inspire her patients with confidence. "It is wonderful," she says, "how cheerful our patients are, indeed a stranger would hardly believe they were invalids."

MR. HENRY WHITFELD is a living illlustration of what a man imbued with an enthusiasm for humanity, and a strong spirit of local patriotism, may do for his town without the employment of any capital other than a powerful pen and an eloquent tongue. Mr. Whitfeld belongs to a very old Plymouth family, and one of his ancestors was associated with Winstanley in the erection of the first Eddystone Lighthouse. He himself began life as a reporter, and early gained distinction in that capacity by a series of articles on "Overcrowded Plymouth"; resulting from a personal tour of its slums. The outcome of his disclosure was the formation of a company by which several big blocks of artisans' dwellings were erected, and the preparation of the public mind for subsequent schemes of municipal housing on the immediate outskirts of the town. After serving the Western Daily Mercury for some years as a reporter, Mr. Whitfeld became its Editor, but he eventually left that paper to take charge of the Western Independent in the sister borough of Devonport. Here he found even worse overcrowding than had previously existed at Plymouth, the evil in this case being aggravated by manorial restrictions on the sale of land. This system Mr. Whitfeld denounced in a pamphlet entitled "The Curse of Devonport," purporting to express the thoughts, feelings, and experiences of an imaginary slum dweller, who figured in its pages as "A Boy from the Back of Morice Square." Twelve thousand copies were sold on the day of publication, and the "Boy's" revelations so profoundly moved the town that Mr. Whitfeld was expressly

MR. HENRY WHITFELD.
(Who has done so much to improve the Housing of the Poor.)
Photograph by John Hawke, Plymouth.

Digitized by Google

returned to the Council to inauguarate a scheme of working-class houses, and he last year laid the foundation stone of the first of two extensive blocks of model dwellings already provided for under this movement. He has always enunciated the principle that such buildings should be occupied by the largest families with the smallest wage-earning capacity, and in the flats completed up to the present time this principle has been rigidly respected. Mr. Whitfeld last year still further earned the gratitude of his native place by publishing a quarto "History of Plymouth and Devonport in times of War and Peace," of so fascinating a character that a competent critic has declared the author to have done for his town what John Richard Green did for the country at large.

THE man who dares assert from a Presbyterian pulpit his belief in the Intermediate State, Ministerial Absolution, the real Presence, and Apostolical succession, has evidently before his eyes no fear of Jenny Geddes and her stool. Courage is the keynote of the character of Dr. Cooper, Professor of Ecclesiastical History at Glasgow. Regarding himself as a member of the historic church of St. Ninian and St. Columba rather than of John Knox, he has laboured to bring back the sweetness and the light which he deems to have been lost to Scottish faith and practice through ultra-Puritanism. He it was who restored daily services in St. Nicholas', Aberdeen, discontinued since 1715, revived the ancient practice of having sermons every evening throughout Holy Week, and marked out such festivals as Christmas Eve, and the Ascension Day for special distinction. As a member of the Church Service Society he has done much to improve the worship of his own religious communion. At present he is best known as the leader of a remarkable

DR. COOPER.
(Who is trying to promote the Union of the Church of Scotland and the Scottish Episcopal Church.)
Photograph by Edmund Geering, Aberdeen.

movement in the direction of unity between the Church of Scotland and the Scottish Episcopal Church. A conference between the Bishops and some prominent members of the three Presbyterian bodies has taken place, but its result has been more a studied ambiguity of speech than a definite scheme of union. Dr. Cooper is in the prime of manhood, and of an appearance so ecclesiastical that he might easily be mistaken for Cardinal Perocchi or a younger brother of the Bishop of Winchester. In his youth he travelled much. He was in Rome when Victor Emmanuel made his state entry, and heard him speak from the Capitol. His experiences have been varied. He has been haled before the Synod by elders suspicious of heresy, and he has been commemorated in stone and glass windows, and presented with a jewelled chalice by the admiring citizens of Aberdeen.

THE ONLOOKER.

Digitized by Google

COMMON SENSE FOR MOTHERS AND NURSES.

A SERIES OF ARTICLES

By Dr. Julia Holmes Smith.

NUMBER ONE.

Some Hints to Mothers, with Suggestions for the Baby's Wardrobe.

OBSERVATION always proves that women have been left too much the prey of sentiment—that, in the culture of the maiden, little attention has been paid to the possibilities which may tax her mature life; and that girls who are well read in literature, art and science find themselves many times at a disadvantage in the presence of a tiny baby whose distressing cries suggest disease, but really indicate a tight bandage or misplaced pin.

It seems a grave pity that our daughters, who in this present century are enjoying equal opportunities with our sons, should be in want of the definite instruction which will make them as thoroughly fit for their share of life's duties as are their brothers.

Some one has wisely said: "Every child has a right to be well-born." To this end it is full time that mothers, and fathers as well, were taught the responsibility they owe to their children; not only the duty which provides home and clothes, but the higher obligation to develop to the utmost the possibilities, physical, mental and moral, which may have been born in the infant.

It is the purpose of this series of articles to present some suggestions to those enjoying the dear delight of little children in their own homes.

The brain, in early infancy, is soft; its convolutions few and shallow, material ready for the hand of the moulder. Despite hereditary tendency, which must be recognised as a potent factor in the formation of character, that mother has much to answer for who fails to avail herself of all the aids to development which wise management can give. Children learn much by observation, and most profound impressions are made upon the sensitive organisation long before the child is able to speak a word.

How great, then, the responsibility of the woman who has the care of a young child! The very first requisite in preparing for such a vocation, either as mother or nurse, is to be quite well. A woman with shattered nerves is utterly unfit for the duties of the nursery.

Diffuseness is a sex characteristic. It should be the aim of educators to train women to concentration. I would emphasise this thought; for, if overtaxing of the nervous system be hazardous to the débutante who robs herself of a week's strength for a night's pleasure, or to the elderly woman who wears herself out in church or charity work, verily there is a fourfold danger to the young mother, who, by thus trying to do too many things, not only hurts herself, but robs of part of its birthright the child she loves; for a child has a right to a healthy, happy mother, who can make a happy home. Such health can be attained by attention to the ordinary rules of hygiene in eating, drinking, sleeping, and in the matter of out-of-door exercise, and last, but not least in importance, by attention to the construction of the clothing, which should be warm and light in weight.

No woman, under any circumstances, should wear a garment which will not admit of full respiration, nor should she overtax her strength by heavy skirts. Surely on this topic a word to the wise will be sufficient.

It is natural to woman to sew. The well-born child is as eager to make her own doll's clothes as the peasant maiden. In this century needlework is the recreation of the fortunate few, the support of the many. Thought is busy while the fingers fly; and sweet love grows in meditation. What so natural, then, as the impulse of most young mothers to prepare the dainty little garments for the baby? And this desire, within bounds, is as healthful as natural. But common sense will say there are in the shops, at a comparatively low cost, complete outfits for babies of every degree.

Digitized by Google

The mother whose income is small and who has in her home insufficient help and must spend many hours of every day in domestic affairs, should not tax herself to make everything her child may need. She should remember that upon her depends, in a large degree, the mental as well as physical well-being of the child; and while she cannot create in her baby a musical, artistic, scholarly or business temperament at will, she certainly can give to the inherited impulse a certain amount of encouragement. A few moments each day of music, half an hour of reading, possibly the study of a new language, will so keep in perfection the intellectual and artistic powers with which she commenced married life, that the child need not miss any of the elements which go to make up a well-developed boy or girl. Therefore, it would seem wisest that this mother should avail herself of the ready-made garments offered by the trade.

The woman of leisure can gratify her taste in many directions. She can do marvels of embroidery on dainty little garments, while her foot is on the cradle-rocker and her voice attuned to nursery song; but to rich and poor alike I would commend for every child when it is very young the use of a bandage round the body, a flannel pinner, and for ordinary wear a simple slip. These articles cannot be bought made after the pattern which I consider sensible, and which many mothers to whom I have suggested them most highly endorse.

Every little baby should have six bandages, six pinners and eight slips.

The bandage should be cut crosswise from a light weight of all-wool flannel, and should measure six inches in width by twenty-three inches in length. It should be overcast loosely all around with very fine cotton thread, because any hem or binding will be apt to chafe the tender skin, with which it must come in contact.

Midway from each end, on one side, should be sewed firmly a strap, made of double flannel, two inches square, to which is to be pinned the diaper. This strap serves to keep both articles of clothing in place, and prevents exposure of the lower part of the child's tender body to the air. The bandage should be loosely but evenly pinned at the back with tiny safety pins, and the child ought to wear it until at least three months old, when it may be exchanged for the knit band, on sale in all shops.

I think every baby should be thus covered, by flannel or knitted goods, until all its teeth have come. It is thus saved from colic, caused by cold, and many other maladies.

Grave enteritis has as often been caused by the accidental change in the amount of clothing covering the bowels of the child as by any other cause. It may be objected by modern theorists that the flannel bandage will confine the abdomen by not allowing the passage of food in process of digestion.

The answer is that in case of distention, from any cause, it is easy to loosen the bandage, which has length enough allowed to meet just such emergencies, and which is held together only by safety-pins.

The next garment, which cannot be bought of the shape I conceive best, is the pinner; the object of which is to keep the baby warm to its very toes.

To this end the garment should be snug around the body; sufficiently long to pin up over the feet, and at the same time be wide enough to allow the little limbs full play to kick and grow.

To make this pinner, take a square yard of flannel of light weight and cut from one corner a semi-circular piece, of which the straight edges shall be thirteen inches long. This will leave an open skirt of which the front sides will measure twenty-three inches, and the middle of the back will be on the bias, falling like the point of a shawl. The cut edge to be attached to the waist will allow two inches for fullness. The waist is made of flannel, high in the neck, with no sleeves, and in order that there may be no compression let it have a girth, when finished, of twenty-three inches, the same as the bandage. Stitch on the skirt, putting all the fullness in the back, and bind the whole garment on every side with silk binding.

Thus made, the pinner meets the needs of the baby until its body acquires larger girth than twenty-three inches, when a new waist will have to be made, and the fullness let out of the skirt.

Digitized by Google

This garment should be worn by every child until shoes and stockings take the place of long flannels; for in this way the feet and legs are kept warm, and there is one danger less for the little one.

The slip comes next on my list, and the ordinary pattern answers for this, except that I would open it the whole length of the front, and allow sufficient width to lap quite over, at least three inches, and have buttons down to the bottom of the skirt. The advantage of this device will be evident from the following description of my method of dressing a little baby:—

Arrange the clothes before the baby is taken up; open the slip; lay inside the pinner, and inside that the dainty, all-wool woven shirt, which must button down the front. Put the sleeves of the shirt inside the sleeves of the slip and then all is ready to begin.

Put on the bandage, fastening it behind, placing the pins a little toward the side of the spine, thus avoiding any accidental pressure when the child lies on its back, and being careful not to have the band too tight. While the child lies thus on its stomach take the clothing and slip on both sleeves; then turn the child over, pin diaper, button up undershirt, fasten the waist of the pinner well over in front, then take the shawl-like point, fold up and pin with large safety-pin, either to the waist or below, according to the size of the child. Button up the slip and the feat will be accomplished of an infant's complete toilet made with only two turns of its body, and in very little time.

The advantage of this simple method is very evident, when one recalls the discomfort of the baby, who frequently is turned over and over half a dozen times while dressing, and whose piteous cries protest against the infliction.

Little girls who read this article can try this experiment first with their dolls, and when all the difficulties are conquered, ask mamma to let you try to dress your baby brother or sister—that is, if the clothes are properly made.

Of course, I do not mean to limit all babies to these few garments. Far from it. Dainty dresses, pretty petticoats, comfortable wrappers, plain or embroidered flannel shawls are all needed; and of these the young mother will buy or make as many as suits her taste and her purse.

But few serviceable articles are for very wee folk, who, until they are two months old, should sleep three fourths of the time, and not be exposed to changes of temperature. One of the great mistakes is to keep a baby weighted down with clothes. Be sure it is warm, but never cover its head in the crib, or throw a blanket over it unless when it is exposed to a change of temperature.

Pretty comforters are very important; but no baby's outfit is complete without two woollen blankets, either knitted or woven, in which the child may be wrapped when ill, or covered for sleep. Nothing is so nice or so healthful about a child as soft woollen wrappings; and even the comforters should be made with wool wadding.

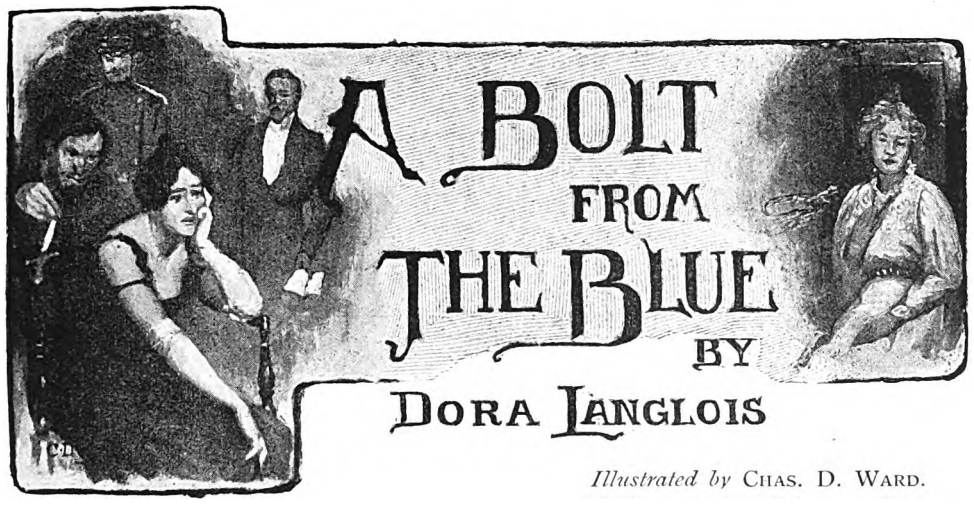
Experience has proved that too much handling is as bad for babies as for kittens; and a dainty receptacle can be prepared for the child at small cost. The materials needed are a good-sized, deep clothes basket, some coloured silesia, a few yards of dotted muslin and some lace edging.

Line the basket throughout with the silesia, which must be heavily wadded, especially that for the bottom, and make a ruffle of the same to fall on the outside, completely hiding the wicker. The muslin is plaited for the inside of the basket, and the muslin ruffle is edged with lace. Put in a little hair pillow and you have a bassinet fit for a prince.

Mothers who have well-filled purses can readily buy bassinets more beautiful and costly, but none more dainty or more comfortable than the one described above.

Whether every article a baby wears is bought or each made by loving fingers, there is no service in all the round of woman's duties so full of pleasure as this of preparing dainty things for her child. The mother's dreams are veritable poems as she idealises a future for the tiny son or daughter, who sleeps in sweet unconsciousness of her loving care. Self is forgotten, and although coming years may rob her of the presence of the dear one whom she so tenderly rears, neither time nor eternity can rob her of the memory of the exquisite happiness of these all too fleeting months when she watched for the look of recognition, the smile, the pearly teeth, the conscious, loving baby kiss.

Digitized by Google



A BOLT FROM THE BLUE

BY

DORA LANGLOIS

Illustrated by CHAS. D. WARD.

CHAPTER XVIII.

BEFORE a large canvas in her airy studio stood Eva Rayne. The two years that had passed since the memorable affair at Saratoff, when she had turned her eyes from the horror of death to look into her cousin's face, and see in it the glorious dawn of a new and sweet emotion, had robbed her of her lightheartedness, but had not deprived her of any of her girlish charm. The eyes alone were a woman's eyes, for they had looked with love into eyes that seemed to answer them; and then fate had dropped the curtain, and, like some harsh judge, declared the episode terminated ere it had well begun.

At that moment, when in the midst of flames and smoke Francis Osborne had kissed her with a sob, it had seemed to her that at last she had found in him not merely friend and comrade but something else; but through the sickness that followed, though he was almost a slave to her in his intense eagerness for her bodily well-being, he had held aloof. She noted in him a sort of feverish energy and restlessness which seemed to drag him from her side. He threw himself into all sorts of projects for the benefit of the sufferers about them with more than devotion, with absolute recklessness; and it was not till at last he was able to remove her and hand her over to Maria's care that he fell by degrees into the old style, and began once again to accept her presence just as a matter of course.

As she battled against sickness, for the sake of the work that life still contained, not for the sake of any joys or triumphs which it seemed to promise, so she battled against her disappointment.

On the morning when we find her again the picture on her easel was evidently perplexing her. She was not doing well with it, and with a deep sigh she was turning away to throw down her brushes, when a kindly hand was laid on her shoulder, and a masculine voice exclaimed:

"What is the matter, little woman? Has anything gone wrong?"

She turned with a faint blush of surprise, and faced the new comer.

"Nothing in the nature of a public calamity," she answered. "It is only that I can't manage to finish this picture without a model for my principal figure. The sketch I took is too faint and shadowy. Now that I have enlarged it the life is gone, the spirit of the thing is lost; it is nothing, nothing at all. I don't want a mere boy there in the foreground pulling on his jacket, I want a boy with a speaking face. If my picture can't repeat the tale I read on the face of the lad from whom the sketch was taken then I don't want the public to see it at all. It would be nothing but so much vulgar canvas to let."

Still with his hand on her shoulder the man looked at the picture. As he half-turned his head the light from the window, falling on his brow and eyes, passed over and beyond him to the same eyes and brow depicted on canvas with a masterly touch whose power came from the painter's absorption in her subject — the triple fidelity of eye, hand, and heart.

Digitized by Google

It was the portrait of Francis Osborne which Eva had commenced as a wedding present for his bride-elect. After the rupture with Helga in Paris she had not dared to ask him to give her the necessary sittings for its completion; and after the return from Saratoff it was he who had not dared to offer them. But that critical time was passed for both of them. A suggestion of Maria's had led to the completion of the picture. And there it hung in Eva's studio, the silent companion of her hours of labour, those painted eyes allowed to see the struggle and the suffering so carefully kept from the sight of the original.

The unfinished subject on the easel, together with its companion, a canvas temporarily occupying another stand, were to be entitled "Sweets to the Sweet."

The latter showed a dainty child accompanied by a well-dressed matron purchasing confectionery in a West End shop; the former one the tired, under-paid, ill-dressed, and shabby workpeople, hurrying out of the factory where such sweets are made. It was complete save for the principal figure, a boy pulling on his coat in the act of running straight towards the observer, as though about to step from the canvas in his hasty stride towards home.

"A model?" murmured Francis Osborne, for it was he. "Well, well, that surely is no great difficulty?"

"No, it's almost an impossibility down here," she said, "for, thank Heaven, Frank, you have no boys on the estate who are lean and hollow-eyed enough to answer my purpose."

"I hope not, but——"

"There's the workhouse, of course," she assented. "But it won't do, Frank. The agricultural tramp has not got that alert something, that keen expression typical of the toiling son of the town. No, no, I must go up to London to find a model."

"If I were to let you go," he responded, "I don't doubt but that some little arab and his family would have cause to bless your visit. But I can't permit it, my dear cousin, for Providence, evidently interested in the success of your picture, has sent a model to your very door."

"Produce your model, Frank," she said, with a gay laugh, "and I shall begin to think that you are capable of transporting us next to the realms of faery."

Osborne stepped to the door, and opening it called: "Come up, Blake. I want you."

"You mustn't thank me," he whispered, coming again to her side. "Your thanks are due to that warm-hearted girl, Di Trevor. I got this piece of city clay for moulding right out of the clutches of Porcher and Company this morning. I shall have a couple of words to say on the subject to Maria's friend and admirer, Monsieur Durand. But for him the boy would not have got into trouble. I don't like that man, Eva. He never looks one straight in the eyes. He is not trustworthy, I am convinced. But Maria is so taken with his foreign accent and manner that I suppose I must put up with his presence for a time."

"I beg pardon, sir."

It was Jim Blake, standing cap in hand at the door, very much awed by his surroundings, and not by any means recovered from his brief acquaintance with the myrmidons of the law.

"Well, my boy," said Osborne, kindly, signing to him to advance, "so they've sent you up here to me. Don't be frightened; you are among friends now. This lady wants to have a look at you. She thinks she may be able to find work for you at once."

"Thank you kindly, sir," muttered the boy, ducking his head and pulling his yellow forelock.

"Nay, there's nothing much to thank me for," Osborne answered.

"Oh, but there is, sir," the boy said, the old rebellious flash returning to his eyes, and the hand that held his touzled cap doubling itself up into a fist. "If it hadn't a-been for you I should have had fourteen days in quod."

"What did he do, Frank? How was it?" inquired Eva, sotto voce.

"Tried to sleep in one of my barns," Osborne answered. "Committed the unpardonable sin of wandering without visible means. It's a hard and cruel law, Eva, that punishes a man for having no roof to shelter him."

Digitized by Google

"I has a roof," the boy struck in, "when I'm in Lundin. I ain't no tramp. I lives wif muvver and sister in Battersea. They works for the slops. But times was hard, and very of'en there wasn't grub enough to go round, and muvver got the influenzie, and my boots and things went to the pop shop, and I wasn't class enough to get a place as errand boy, and—and I hates them slop-shops and factories, so I come out to find my uncle. He was a gardener, and so was my grandfarver afore him; and that's what I'm a-goin' to be, I am, if they'll le'me alone."

Again his young face—brightened for the moment by the announcement of his purpose—darkened with the recollection of what had passed, the knowledge that had come upon him in the cell of the lock-up, that he was only an Ishmaelite after all.

"Well, well," said Osborne, "I like a boy with an ambition, and, what's more, lad, I like your face—there's honesty written on it; and, if you are only willing to work, as I think you will be, your mother and sister shall come here and settle in one of my cottages."

"What, sir! In one of them there cottages wif flowers all up the front? Gawd bless you, sir! Gawd bless you! She's been ailin' this long time, has muvver; but she of'en said she'd be all right if she got dawn into the country for a bit."

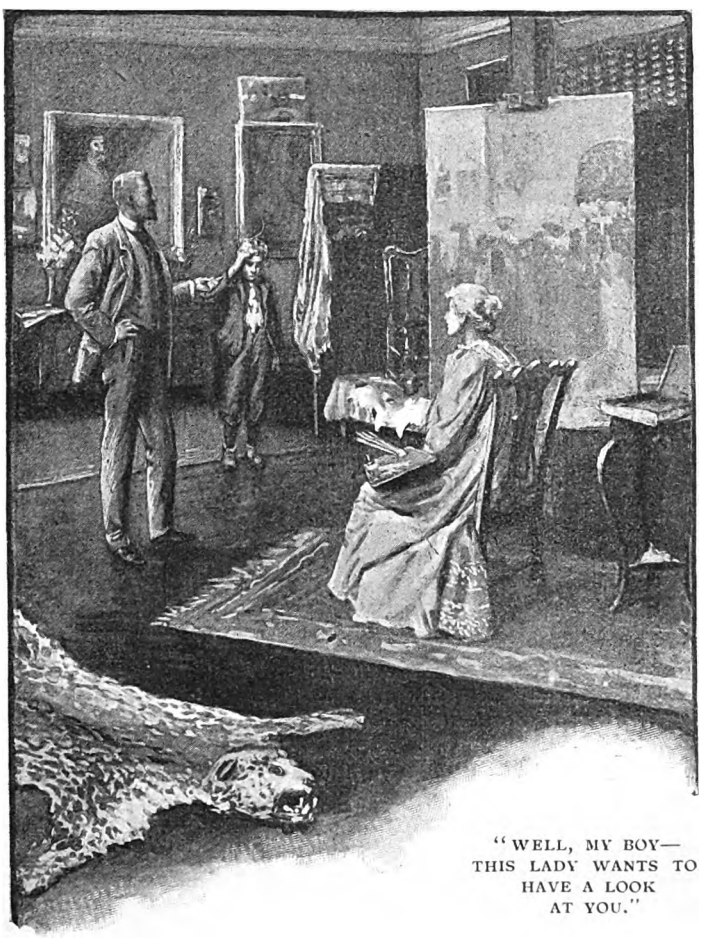
Osborne rang the bell.

"I am going to hand you over to my servants now," he said. "They'll treat you well, never fear. Have a good feed; you look as if you could do with it. I don't think a little fattening will spoil his beauty, do you, Eva? There you are now; trot along."

The boy moved to the door, held open by a smart maid, and turned. There was something he wanted to say; it was struggling from his heart to his lips, but he could not formulate it. Suddenly Eva advanced, laid her hands on his shoulders, and looked long and earnestly into his face. Young and a spinster—and voluntarily so, for she had had many matrimonial chances, and had them still—there was a mother's heart—the yearning of her womanhood—in her maiden breast. Slowly her hand moved from his shoulder to his brow, and pushed back the yellow forelock.

"You shall garden for me, Jim Blake," she said; "and together, if I'm not mistaken, we shall raise some noble flowers."

The boy but half understood her meaning, but the light in her eyes, the ring in her voice, were simple enough in interpretation. From that moment he was Eva Rayne's slave.



"WELL, MY BOY—THIS LADY WANTS TO HAVE A LOOK AT YOU."

Digitized by Google

"Are you satisfied?" Osborne asked. In some slight perplexity he was holding to the light a piece of millboard a few inches square, on which, in charcoal, she had roughed in two thumb-nail heads. Both represented Jim Blake, and both were speaking likenesses; yet they were paradoxically most unlike each other. She had drawn them absolutely while Osborne and the boy were talking.

"I am quite satisfied," she said. "Don't you understand these, Frank? Look again! Which is the real Jim Blake of to-day?"

"This, I should be inclined to think," said Osborne, touching the brighter picture of the two — the one which showed a youth with a frank and sunny face; "and yet, I do not know."

"That," she answered, "is the Jim Blake who said: 'I mean to be a gardener'; this one"—touching the other, in which the brow was lowering, the lips sullen, the eyes furtive—"is the Jim Blake who added: 'If they'll on'y le' me alone.' There, they are the same face; they tell their own story of a destiny as yet unworked out; the issue lies with fate. What shall it be, Frank? Shall Mr. Porcher have a chance to suppress in this boy what Victor Hugo calls 'the never completely out-trampled divine'?"

"You have depicted a possibility, Eva," he answered, gravely, laying the picture down. "Thank God, it was only for a minute that the boy looked like that!"

As he spoke, a sharp voice without exclaimed:

"A nice state of things this! A nice state of things, indeed! There; don't talk to me, girl. I simply don't believe you," and the next minute Miss Maria Osborne was upon them.

"Are you aware, Francis," she asked, advancing, "that a ragged, dirty, disreputable creature is sitting by the kitchen fire and wolfing food like a hog?"

With a slight air of vexation, suppressed as far as possible, Osborne replied, quietly:

"No, Maria, I was not aware of that."

"I thought not," the lady answered. "You are master of this house, of course, and I am careful never to go against your wishes, even when they don't coincide with my ideas; but I thought you could not be aware of this last piece of idiocy; and, now I am sure of my ground, I'll put a stop to it at once."

"Stay—stop, Maria!" Osborne exclaimed. "I am aware that a poor, half-starved lad, who was locked up last night for trying to get a night's shelter in one of my barns, is warming himself now by my kitchen fire and eating food which I shall never miss."

"Then you might have said so before," was the curt retort. "It would have been more courteous on your part. I won't interfere, and I don't wish to; but I should have thought you had enough to do to feed your lazy, idle, pampered servants, without keeping open house for beggars."

"The lad's no beggar," Osborne interjected, "and even if he were I see no reason why you, Maria, should grudge him a few broken meats."

"Broken meats, indeed!" Miss Osborne exclaimed. "Of course I should not object to anything reasonable, though it is just like you to pretend that you think I would; but they have not given him anything of the sort. I positively saw him with a cold sirloin before him, pickles, cheese, and fresh butter, fast helping himself."

"And what if he was?" said Osborne. "Last week, Maria, when your cat was ill it had a salmon cutlet to tempt its appetite; and shall I refuse a slice of cold meat to a sick and suffering child?"

"Thank you, Frank! I am much obliged to you for recalling that little piece of fish. In looking over the week's account, I will see that that item is debited to me personally, and then I shall not feel that the poor defenceless animal is a drain on your resources!"

"Hush, Maria! What nonsense!" laughed her brother. "I hope I can afford to keep Tabby, though he is an expensive luxury."

"Well, one never knows," she answered sententiously. "With a house full of greedy servants, who have little or nothing to do but eat all day, a man's income goes nowhere!"

"My servants work for their wages, and have as much right to the food they eat as I have," he retorted, sharply; then he added, checking himself and speaking more mildly: "Ah, Maria, if you could open your eyes a little wider, and see what goes on in the world around us, you would understand my motives better."

He turned away, with his breast heaving and a sombre light in his eyes. Those

Digitized by Google

Russian experiences of his, of which he never spoke even to Eva, had left an indelible mark on his life. Eva knew nothing, or next to nothing, but that he had not found Helga, and that somehow his passionate love for her had waned, though it seemed to have left only a void, not a heart capable of loving again. She did not know how day and night he had before him the grim procession of the workers at the Vitinsk mines, picturing in some one or other of them that lover of Helga's who had gone straight from the sunshine of Naples and the warmth of her simulated passion, to the snows and the biting cold and misery of a Siberian exile.

"I don't know what all this tirade is about," Miss Osborne remarked. "It seems impossible for me to make an observation, or ask a question, but an argument is immediately commenced by somebody!" and she looked sternly at poor Eva, who had said nothing. "However, I have done. Bring anybody you like into the house, Frank; though some fine day you may repent it, when we wake up in the morning to find ourselves all murdered in our beds!"

With this parting shot she was about to retire, the dignity of her exit somewhat marred by a hearty laugh from her brother and a smaller one from Eva.

He held the door open for her, and whispered quietly: "Don't be uneasy about the boy, Maria. I extend hospitality to your favourities, though I don't know where they come from or what are their credentials; and I must ask you, my dear, to extend the same consideration to my protégés."

CHAPTER XIX.

Hubert John Tressilian Spencer Trevor was a young man who had suffered the misfortune of having too many feminine relations. Of a sturdy though rather diminutive physique, with healthy moral tendencies, and at least normal brain-power, had he had the luck to be born, let us say, the unfortunate tenth, in some struggling professional man's bear-garden of boys, the chances are that he would have knocked about himself, and been knocked about by his brothers, till he had successfully completed that masculine course known as the process of being "licked into shape." No woman yet ever succeeded in doing that for a boy; and Heaven help the unfortunate, fatherless man-child who is taken in hand, as Bertie Trevor was, by a weak and silly mother, a Puritanical grandam, and a couple of spinster aunts!

In short, just at a time when a boy ought to think well of himself, if he is to make the most of such gifts as nature has given, poor Bertie came to the pitiful conclusion that he was in very truth the ugliest, most awkward dunce who ever soiled shoeleather. And but for his sister Diana, who worshipped him and always showed him to himself in his best light, it is probable that he would have become a sulky clown instead of an amiable and warm-hearted nonentity.

At breakfast on the morning which saw Jim Blake installed at Beverly House, Di, looking across the table at her brother, demanded:

"What shall we do to-day, old fellow?"

"Oh, anything. I'm not particular," he responded.

Now, Di knew by experience that when Bertie said he was "not particular" he meant that he had some cherished idea, so she immediately set to work to discover and propose it.

"The river?"

"Too hot."

"Shall we cycle to Overdean for some new books?" This by way of giving Bertie half-an-hour out of bounds.

"Haven't finished the last yet."

"I know. Suppose we go over to Beverly House and find out about that poor little boy?"

"I'll come, if you like."

Di smiled. She knew that she had hit on just what her brother wanted. Mrs. Gunter and Mrs. Trevor exchanged a meaning glance, and Mrs. Trevor, unable to back out of the situation, cleared her throat and remarked:

"You will do as you see fit, Hubert, of course, but I must really request you to discontinue taking your sister into houses which are not fit for her."

"Houses!" stammered Bertie. "What houses?" A guilty spasm of conscience seizing him at the recollection that on their last cycling trip he had inveigled his sister into a lonely roadside inn, and there persuaded her to take with him a glass of cider and an abernethy.

Digitized by Google

"I refer to Mr. Osborne's house," retorted his mother.

"If Mr. Osborne's house is good enough for Miss Rayne I should think it was good enough for me, mother?" Diana interjected.

Here Mrs. Gunter cut in, to give her hostess moral support. "Miss Rayne is, no doubt, a very clever woman, but that does not imply that she is a fit associate for you, Miss Trevor."

"Since when have you formed such a poor opinion of Beverly House, Mrs. Gunter?" Di demanded, pertly.

"Since just before I withdrew myself from the circle there, Miss Trevor," that worthy individual answered, speaking in this case neither more nor less than the truth, as it certainly was not till she had received her congé that she had found the place objectionable at all.

"Do you mean, mater," Di asked, turning a disdainful shoulder on Mrs. Gunter, "that you are absolutely forbidding us to hold any intercourse with Mr. Osborne and Miss Rayne?"

"That is precisely my meaning," Mrs. Trevor responded, fearful of jeopardising her dignity and unable to back out with Mrs. Gunter's eyes upon her.

"But why? Why, for goodness' sake?" demanded Di.

"That is a subject we can hardly discuss at present," said Mrs. Gunter, with a glance at Bertie.

That individual, very red in the face, got up.

"I'm going outside," he said, "to have a smoke, and I'll wait for you, Di."

He moved to the door, and then turned round and delivered himself of this rather remarkable statement:

"Di will do what she likes, in fact, of course she'll have to; but I certainly will not."

"Will not what?" demanded Mrs. Trevor, who did not quite follow him.

"I will not insult a lady," answered Bertie. "No. I'd—I'd rather lose my allowance, or—or give up smoking than do it," and with this heroic determination he left his sister to the solemn conclave of petticoats, which that irreverent girl was wont to term a "hen convention."

At the time Diana was seeking an explanation from her mother and Mrs. Gunter, across the common Mr. Porcher and Mr. Lechlade were walking together in earnest talk.

"Something has got to be done, my dear Lechlade," said the mighty man. "If you are inclined to submit to his hectoring, I am not."

"I must confess," said the vicar, "that he has seriously annoyed me. An insult to myself I hope I could forgive in a proper spirit, but when he tampers with the morality of my flock then it is my duty to put my foot down."

"Is he still opposed to the motion you laid before the reading-room committee, then?" inquired Mr. Porcher.

"Why, yes. He not only refuses to give his sanction to having the sporting items blocked out of the dailies and weeklies before they are placed on the reading desks, but has couched his refusal in what I may call an insulting form. If I move the amendment I propose in committee he assures me he will move his counter-amendment; and, really, it places me in such a position that I don't know how to act."

"What, in the name of commonsense, is this wonderful proposal of his, man?" demanded Mr. Porcher, thrusting his hands deep into his pockets and squaring his elbows and shoulders viciously.

"Simply that on deciding to block out the sporting items in the news-sheets intended for the public, we all agree to have our own private papers similarly treated, not only with regard to those items, but with regard to the dealings on the Stock Exchange also. Now, I ask you, how could I possibly countenance such a suggestion?"

"It's out of the question — out of the question altogether; it's absurd," answered Mr. Porcher. "It would give mortal offence to Sir Henry Flowerby, with his racing stables absolutely in the vicinity; while as to the money market news, I never heard such utter rot in my life."

And the great local man, who had made his pile in stocks and shares, never caring who bought the worthless scrip he parted with, or who sold the good stuff he cheapened in the market and then bought in at panic prices, waived the idea away with his stubby jewelled fingers.

"It seems to me," he added, "that this fellow Osborne will soon make the place too hot to hold him if he goes on like this.

Digitized by Google

There's no arriving at a proper magisterial decision when he is on the bench. He has got that young scoundrel of a tramp hanging about his place now. Well, I wish him joy of him, that's all. Mark my word, Lechlade, that boy will repay him some day!"

"It is my wish to live in charity with all men," answered Mr. Lechlade. "Osborne has ideas, and, as this is a free country, I suppose he has a right to air them; but I wish he would restrain his ardour a little and would pause to reflect. How are the majority—the common herd, I mean—likely to regard this last move of his with regard to Abel Price's widow, for instance?"

"What's that?" demanded Mr. Porcher. "I haven't heard of it."

"Well, it's a very painful story," replied the vicar, "and really one I don't care to have to handle, but, unhappily, these things come in our way. The woman has six young children all bound to attend school, and unable to earn anything themselves, and of course she has been receiving parish relief: six shillings and six loaves per week. Now she is in the way to lose that assistance, and Mr. Osborne has made her case the theme of one of his tirades against our national poor law."

"Oh," said Mr. Porcher, not much interested, "the fool of a woman has got into trouble, I suppose? Well, she knew what the law was and what the consequences might be, and now they've come she must take them. I suppose even this Osborne isn't going to try to tell us that she deserves sympathy?"

"GOOD GRACIOUS!" EXCLAIMED THE VICAR. "IF THAT COULD BE PROVED AGAINST HIM."

"He is so astute," returned the vicar, with vexation. "I never saw such a man for skating round thin ice. He has such a painful way, too, of making every question personal. Now, in my opinion, the personal element ought to be carefully avoided in public matters if we are to be free to act at all. As regards the woman, he said he didn't feel equal to the task of throwing stones; but that her children (her husband's children, of course, I mean) would be the same a fortnight hence, when she will lose the parish relief, as they are now, and that it is a monstrous and iniquitous law that leaves them no alternative but starvation or the workhouse. Miss Rayne, his cousin, has sent the woman's only daughter to that cottage home of hers at Dryfield, and Osborne has promised to do something for the two eldest lads if the man will marry Mrs. Price."

"In my opinion Mr. Osborne is putting a premium on that kind of thing," sneered Porcher. "I daresay there's many an honest widow who will begin to envy this fortunate Mrs. Price."

"I represented as much to him," said Mr. Lechlade. "I pointed out the grave public danger, but he only wanted to know if such scandals were unheard of before in our district. If so, he said, he would stand by and let us make an example, even though the dead man's children had to go to the wall. If not, he saw no reason to alter his course."

"Look here," cried Mr. Porcher, "the man's insufferable! Who wants to make an example, I should like to know?"

The fact of the matter was that Mr. Porcher had long had, as the ambition of his life, those magic letters M.P. To affix them to his name, Samuel Porcher, was his dream. Little by little he had hustled his way into society, just as he had in the times gone by hustled and elbowed his way into the inner commercial ring. The borough of Overdean was his by right of purchase, he thought, as his was the greatest landed interest; and now in one short twelvemonth another man had arisen whose popularity was so certain, so assured, that he dreaded the conflict he had looked forward to so eagerly, for he knew that if Osborne thought fit to oppose him by standing himself, or putting up another candidate, failure for himself was almost inevitable.

Digitized by Google

"I believe he is sailing under false colours, too," he went on, prompted more by what was in his own mind than by what they had been discussing. "I have heard a whisper that he is a married man. Now he has most distinctly given himself out to be a bachelor. What sort of conduct do you call that for a person who aspires to hold a public position?"

"Good gracious!" exclaimed the vicar. "If that could be proved against him I should think it very dreadful. I should really feel it my duty to warn the parents of young women. But, no, it can't be. He and Miss Rayne——"

"I think it would be as well to make inquiries," remarked Mr. Porcher. "I vouch for the truth of nothing. I only say what I have heard. It doesn't matter to me whether he is married or single. I have no daughters. Good-day, Lechlade. You may rely on my support over the library business."

"'Little drops of water, little grains of sand'"—muttered the magnate, recalling some lessons learnt, no doubt, in his youth—"'make the canals and rivers and the something or another land.' You're in the way, Osborne, my boy—confoundedly in the way; and if there's any means of getting up a public cry against you before the next election, I'm the man to start it."

CHAPTER XX.

"Bertie, I can't stand it! She is a meddlesome old cat, and she ought to be——"

"Shot!"

"I mean she ought to be ashamed of herself!"

"There's no shame in her, Di. She's forgotten how to feel like that."

The speakers were Mrs. Trevor's rebellious offspring, who were crossing the common land which lay between Beverly House Estate and the Overdean Manor. Diana's eyes were very red, for the "hen convention" had been stormy, and there had been much ruffling of feathers; in fact, as Bertie put it, "Di had made the fluff fly," in seeking an explanation of the taboo placed on Mr. Osborne's house and family circle.

"I don't believe a word of it's true, Bertie, do you?"

Poor Bertie Trevor gave a groan that seemed to come from the very depths of his sporting waistcoat. "I don't know," he said, hopelessly. "I don't believe in the scandal, and all that rot. But, oh Di, if she really does care for Osborne like that, you know, I — I shall cut my throat!"

"Bertie!"

"Yes, I shall!" this with the deliberation of a man pledged to one course. "I shall certainly do it, Di. Miss Rayne has been my—my—what do you call it?—my guiding star for—for months; and if the devotion of—of months—is to go for nothing, I shall certainly!—I mean, there will have to be an end to it."

"Oh, Bertie, dear, how dreadful!" and Di stopped, unable to keep pace, in her astonishment, with her brother's gloomy srides.

"Of course, it's dreadful!" admitted Bertie, the lovelorn. "The serpent's tooth—no, I mean the monster's fangs—preying on one's—preying here, don't you know. Well, it's not agreeable, Di, of course. But I tell you candidly that my course is fixed. I am going to Osborne as man to man, and I am going to say to him—

"Yes, old fellow, what are you going to say to him?" It was Francis Osborne himself who had overtaken the pair, and slapped Bertie on the shoulder in his own frank, hearty way. "Good afternoon, Miss Trevor. Are all well at home?"

"Mr. Osborne, I—— Oh, dear!" and Di, ever and always a good little creature, stopped short, and drew back the hand she had offered, fearful of wounding her conscience by a direct act of disobedience.

Frank Osborne's face clouded a little. "I'm afraid I've interrupted you at an unfortunate moment," he said. "I must apologise. I was coming over to ask you from Eva to come up and see how the picture progresses; but perhaps some other day."

Digitized by Google

"Oh! There's isn't to be any other day for us," poor Di blurted out. "Mamma has forbidden it, Mr. Osborne, and so we can't help ourselves. At least I can't, because I am a beastly girl instead of being a boy; but do give Eva my fond love, and tell her my heart is broken—and—and I hope you won't bear malice, that is, I mean I know you won't. I'm going now. Bertie needn't see me home, and you mustn't—so you can talk it over," and trembling, blushing, and crying, all at once, but with unshaken belief in her brother's ability to carry out his resolve and speak to Osborne as man to man poor Di darted into the adjacent shrubbery.

"I'm afraid I know what that means," said Osborne, "so I need not ask you to explain, Trevor. I'm the last man in the world, I hope, to make disunion in a family, though nothing will alter my feeling for yourself and your good little sister. This is not the first time I have been coldly received in various quarters lately. However, I won't give my friends the trouble of telling me why. What was it you had to say on your own account?"

Poor Bertie. Deserted by his staunch ally, he stood voiceless for the moment—but though a bit of a fool, he was certainly no coward, and the thing had to be faced.

"I wanted to speak to you as—as man to man," he began, that phrase being ready prepared and formulated.

"As man to man, of course. Well?"

"It will possibly surprise you to know that for months—in fact, ever since I met Miss Rayne again—— Hang it all! I mean is there any objection to my—my presenting myself—in that sort of a light to a lady who—who——"

"Do you mean, Trevor, that you are seeking permission to pay your addresses to my cousin?"

"Yes, that's my meaning. That is—er—the—the point of the affair."

"My sister is her guardian, not I, Trevor."

"I wanted," objected Bertie, "to speak as—as man to man; and I couldn't very well say to Miss Osborne that way, don't you know."

"Besides, Miss Rayne is of an age to make her election for herself."

"Then that means that you see no reason why I shouldn't pay my addresses and all that sort of thing?"

"If you insist on trying your fortune, you may do so, of course, but——"

"Oh, it's all right, so long as you don't advise me not to. If there is no obstacle, except of course, my not being worthy of her——"

"She is three years your senior, Trevor."

"Well, I hope I'm man enough not to mind that, if she doesn't."

Osborne looked down at the youth of twenty beside him with a queer mingling of pity and envy; pity for the lad's short-sightedness, envy for his freedom and his high hopes, the royal prerogative of untried youth.

"She has had many offers, and has refused them all."

"Well, I may have better luck than a better man, Mr. Osborne. Anyway, I don't mind so much once she knows. What I wanted to ask—as man to man—was whether there was any prior engagement."

"There is not."

"Or—or any prior attachment?"

"I have not heard of any," this more slowly and in a lower voice.

"And you, personally, have no objection to my trying my luck?"

"Personally, no. I'm afraid you will not succeed, that's all."

"I don't expect success, unless years of devotion—and that kind of thing—help me along. I know I'm not fit for her; but, hang it all, if she can't marry till she finds one who is—she'll have to be a spinster all her life. Unless"—and Trevor threw a glance up at his companion—"unless——"

"I have had a wider experience than yours," Osborne interrupted, quickly, "and I admit unhesitatingly that I know no man worthy of her. If you are ready to risk a refusal take your chance. So far as it goes, I am able to tell you that no one is at present paying Miss Rayne any attention of that sort."

"Look here! You're a thundering good fellow, and always were!" Bertie exclaimed. "You—you couldn't say now, could you, just to encourage a fellow—that you wished him well?"

Osborne was looking in front of him steadily. Still with his eyes fixed on the horizon, bounded by the trees which surrounded his house—the casket that held the jewel of which they spoke—he replied:

Digitized by Google

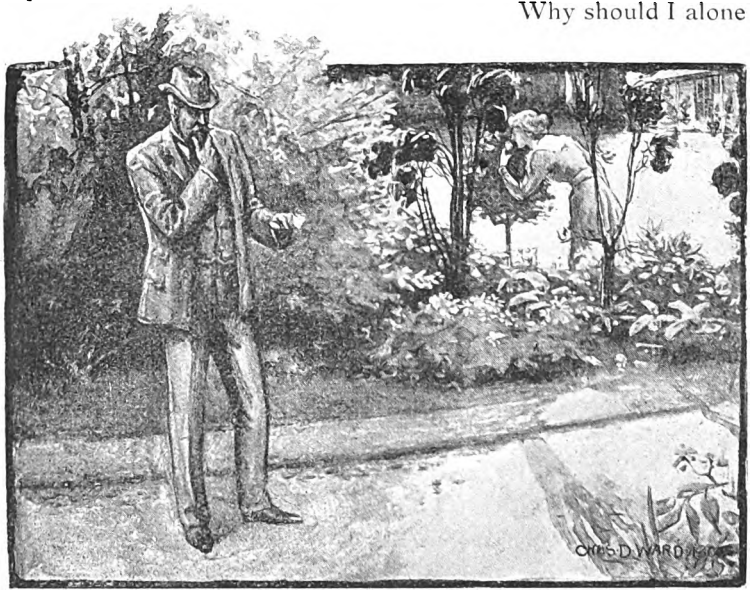
"I wish to see Miss Rayne married to the man of her choice some day. I would give her—gladly—to a worthy man, provided I could ensure her happiness that way. I don't know that I can say any more, Trevor. Let the best man win."

"Well, even the worse can only lose," said Bertie; "and it's something to have tried. Good-bye, Mr. Osborne, and thank you."

Once more alone, Osborne drew a deep breath. "A boy, a youth like that, to aspire to her," he mused, "while I——



"NO, NO," HE SAID. "IT WOULD BE A SACRILEGE."

Pshaw! He has no chance; I should rather pity him. God knows I ought to; I have been through it all. Of course he has no chance—yet there are others; it will come sooner or later, I suppose, and I must school myself to bear it like a man."

He went tramping on over the rolling common land of growing grass flecked with pure white marguerites, but the brightness of the June morning was gone for him; his face, even his carriage, were full of agitation now there was no longer any need for him to mask his feelings.

"As a man makes his bed, so must he lie on it," he said; "and mine was made in Paris three years ago. It will come; it must come, but I have at least a respite; she has not found the man as yet. Trevor is out of the question—it's ridiculous; and yet if he has the power to shake me like this, what shall I do when the time arrives? But I shall have to see it; I shall have to see it some day!"

His face had darkened with a lowering expression happily uncommon to it.

"Why should I?" he said. "Why should I, after all? Past question, I could make her happier than this Trevor, or perhaps any man. It is not just to her that she should not have at least the chance of election. Who knows anything about that farce in Paris? And if it were known, it could not be a legal bar. Why should I alone suffer? Why should I live like an anchorite? Helga has forgotten long since, and visited Naples again, and many another city, too, no doubt. I'm past my youth; there will be very little left in life for me if I do not snatch it now."

He turned again towards his house and went on quickly, a bronze flush on his cheeks, and his eyes glowing. As he turned in at the little lych gate and came up through the shrubbery, a sudden gleam of white garments caught his eye, and Eva, fair and sweet as a madonna, passed without seeing him across the lawn to the house.

He paused in his hasty stride, the flush left his cheeks, his eyes fell, and he faltered.

"No, no," he said. "It would be a sacrilege. She would not call the affair in Paris a farce. She believes that what is styled the ceremony of marriage is a non-essential, or at least, a thing framed by its publicity to influence those who could not be held by the moral obligation alone. To her the essential thing is the calling on God to witness a pledge of faith; and we did that on that night in Paris. If I dared this thing, if I won her, and she learnt the truth, if Helga by chance returned and told the tale, she would leave me at once, and despise me and herself."

Digitized by Google

"I'll tell her, though," he added, moving forward again. "I will tell her everything. And yet no—it could do no good, and it might do harm. She would think it her duty to leave me at once she knew my feelings towards her, and I am not strong enough to part with her yet.

"That's one of the very reasons why I ought to tell her; better to part now and get used to it, before I have to face the other kind of parting. That's my side of the case. But what of her? If she knew, she might never marry; never give me that insufferable pain. It would not be fair to influence her, to interfere that way in her fate. No it must go on; we must drift."

So with a heavy step and a still heavier heart, Osborne made his way back to the house.

> He either fears his fate too much,
> Or his deserts are small;
> Who fears to put it to the touch,
> And win or lose it all.

So poor Bertie, not usually a poetical moral, was saying to himself, as after his interview with Francis Osborne he started for home and lunch.

"Look here, Mrs. Gunter, he said, on presenting himself in his mother's drawing-room again, "it's all tommy-rot, you know, about Mr. Osborne being married to one lady and paying attentions to another. He a jolly good fellow, is Osborne, as we've told you all along; I can prove it, and some day I will."

Into his boyish head he had got the idea that Eva needed protection, and that he was the man to act. He pictured himself in a graceful attitude on his knees before her (an attitude he could never have assumed) pouring out words he might think of, but would never be able to speak. He saw himself in fancy beside her in society, her accepted suitor; and heard people recanting and expressing their entire belief in Mr. Osborne's innocence of ever having played fast and lose with her affections. About any matrimonial entanglement on Osborne's part he was not quite clear, but that was only a detail. The great thing was to prove that Eva had not stooped to love where her love was not returned.

"Of course he hasn't got his eye in that quarter, or he wouldn't have given another fellow a look in," he mused. His mental picture was marred by one expectancy truly.

It was probable, he thought, that Eva would preface the action of yielding to his entreaties by some such remark as this, "I can't pretend to love you, Mr. Trevor, though you have my esteem; but in my present painful position I accept your manly proposal, etc., etc."

Of such things Bertie dreamt all that day and the next, till his head whirled. It was enough to unsettle any young fellow, especially when added to it was the necessity of making a suitable choice of neck-tie and waistcoat in which to take the plunge gracefully.

Poor lovable, foolish Bertie! He was only "a silly bounder," of course; but silly bounders such as he develop sometimes suddenly, by some unknown process, into the men who make our island glorious in the annals of the world.

His bright tie and horsey waistcoats would not do, of course; in fact, a careful examination of his wardrobe showed him that he had nothing to wear suitable to the occasion. It was absolutely necessary to go up to town to rectify the deficiency; but how to find an excuse—that was the question? In this sore strait fortune favoured him. The Tower Bridge was to be opened on the 30th of the month. It was then June 28th. He could not have a better opportunity of getting up to London.

Bertie eagerly embraced this exceptional chance, with the result that early on the morning of the day on which the Prince of Wales was to open the new pride of London town he found himself on his way to his tailor's.

He felt that something ought to occur to baulk him in the purchase of the waistcoat; that it would have been only natural to find himself surrounded by difficulties; but none fell to his lot. A long interview with his tailor, a rattling drive from West to East, grand weather, a grand position from which to see the notable sight, and he returned to Paddington in time, but only just, to catch the down express. It was a case of a run and a jump, with guards shouting and porters trying to bar his way. He had no time for selection, of course, and as he tumbled into a first-class "non-smoker" a lady, the only occupant, started nervously, and caught at a nice little kodak camera which his hurried entry might have injured.

Digitized by Google

"I'm so sorry," he said. "Shall I put it up on the rack? It will be quite safe, don't you know."

She thanked him, but replied that it was as well where it was, as there was so much room. Then she relapsed into silence, and Trevor himself into thoughts of Eva. He thought so much of her, in fact, that it took him longer to discover that the lady opposite him was beautiful than it would have taken most young men privileged to sit opposite her in a railway carriage alone. When he did find it out, however, it came on him with a certain force, not only as a surprise, but because of the peculiar nature of her beauty. Certainly she was not young; but then Bertie's fancy did not run to sweet seventeen; and, though he judged this lady to be fully thirty-five, he found her better to look at than any girl under twenty he could have named off-hand. She was so sad-eyed too, so pale, so wan. "A good long stay down in our part of the world would do her no end of good," he mused. "Next to Eva—of course—I think she is the sweetest-looking woman I have ever seen. She hasn't got any papers; I wonder if it would be out of place to offer her some?"

He had just decided that perhaps it might be when she threw an accidental glance at the journals beside him, and the next moment, with a shy bow, he had handed them to her.

With a smile of acknowledgment she took them, but very soon her glance wandered away again and rested on the ever-changing landscape.

"The—the country looks very jolly just now," said Bertie, feeling that the long silence was becoming unbearable, seeing that he might not smoke, and was beginning to be unsettled by the haunting look in the bright eyes opposite him.

"Very well, indeed," she answered, and her glance returned idly to the papers he had given her, and, cutting the leaves of one which contained an insurance coupon, she caught sight of his name and address duly scribbled in—Hubert Trevor, Overdean.

"Is it far from the station to Overdean?" she asked, with just the faintest foreign accent.

"Oh, no," he answered, delighted at being allowed to indulge in small talk. "You will have to change at the junction. I'm going there myself. I hope you will allow me to help you. I ask because I see that you are particular about your kodak. May I?"

"You are very good," she answered, by which Bertie definitely understood not only that he might help her, but that she was bound for Overdean.

"I think you'll like our village. It is really a grand place for health and all that sort of thing," he went on. "There is a foreign gentleman staying at Beverly House who is quite enchanted with the place."

"Indeed!" There was just a faint ring of interest in her voice now. A foreigner, did you say?"

"Yes, a Frenchman," volunteered Bertie. "His name is Durand. Perhaps you know him?"

"Durand is a very common name," she answered. "What is this Durand like?"

"Well, he stoops, and his hair all stands up off his head, and he has lost a front tooth, and has a big, black moustache."

"I fear I am not assisted," she murmured with a brief, swift smile that lighted her countenance like sunshire and made the young fellow think that when this woman used to smile habitually she must have been well nigh irresistible.

"Oh! Well, he has funny, long thin hands, and when he thinks he puts his forefinger and thumb together and holds the tips to his lips; then when he gets hold of an idea he holds his forefinger up like this," and Bertie clumsily pantomimed the actions he described.

"Many Frenchmen have the habit," she answered again. "The description is vague to me."

"Perhaps you never met him? He is always washing his hands—I mean he seems to be always doing so. It's not a matter of any importance, only he is said to be rather a noted scientific fellow, and I thought he might be a compatriot."

"I am not a Frenchwoman," she said, and lay back upon the cushions of the seat. Noticing that her face was drawn as if with sudden pain, he demanded:

"Are you feeling ill?"

Moistening her dry lips she answered that she was not. He left her alone for a time, but at last, impelled by a desire to hear her soft, musical voice again—a desire which he himself could hardly understand—he demanded:

Digitized by Google

"Did you see the opening of the Tower Bridge to-day?"

"Unfortunately, no," she answered.

"It was a grand sight," Bertie went on. "I daresay they do things better, more artistically, on the Continent. Still, as far as my experience goes, it was a very memorable scene."

It was noticeable that Bertie was more at ease with some strangers than when in the family circle, where he was always dimly conscious that he might "put his foot in it," and not be quite proper enough. He was proud of the Tower Bridge as a great national achievement, and proud of his nation, too, as every young Englishman should be.

"I thought you might have been there, you know, to get a few snapshots. There were lots of kodaks about."

She laid her small hand on the camera beside her and answered: "I do not understand the working of the machine as yet, but I shall master it in time, and then—why then I hope to take some pictures."

"Well, I wish you had been in the crowd to-day," he persisted. "I am sure you would have agreed with me that it was the sort of thing to remember all one's life."

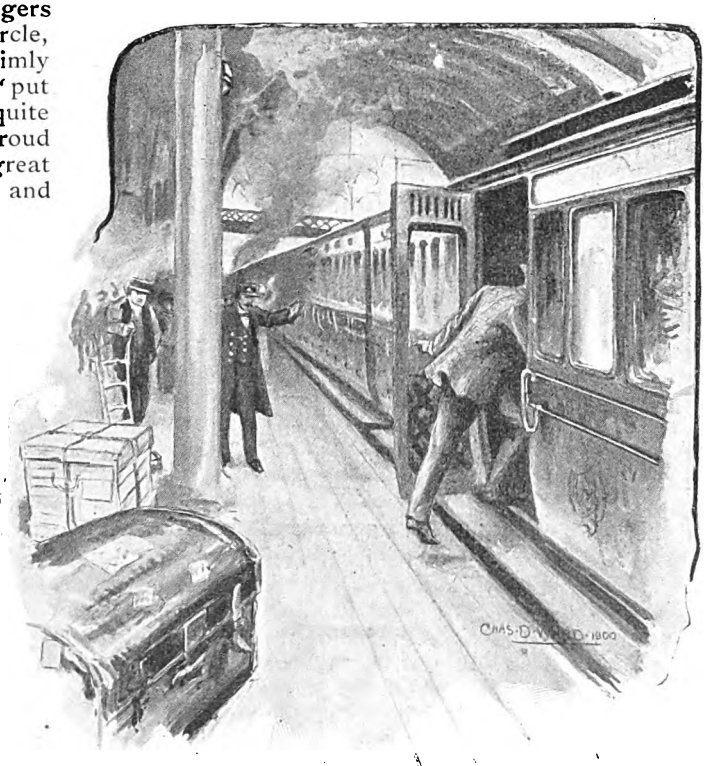
"No doubt," she assented, with just a faint smile flickering on her lips. "No doubt I should have thought so if I had been there."

The smile arrested him. Was she mocking—in the sarcastic way common to foreigners—his insular enthusiasm? He couldn't for the life of him decide; he only knew that this last smile was not as dazzling, as fascinating, as the one which had gone before. How did the woman learn to smile like that?

"There was an awful scare about Anarchists," he said; "but it came to nothing. For my part, I don't believe there are any such people in England."

"Have you, then, no discontented persons here?" she asked.

"Oh, lots," he answered, afraid he had unwittingly offended by vaunting the superiority of his native land. "I only mean that we are more slow going, less impulsive, don't you know, than other races. That kind of thing, I suppose, is a crank, or madness, of a sort.



IT WAS A CASE OF A RUN AND A JUMP.

Discontent just doesn't develop that way in the Teutonic blood."

"There are plenty of Anarchists in Germany," she retorted.

"Oh, yes, of course," he admitted, feebly, beginning to feel himself at a loss for Di to take the solos in the performance. "By Jove, though," he added, brightening up, "as you are going to Overdean you ought to meet a man there who will interest you. He doesn't spare our national faults. If there were more men like him there wouldn't be an Anarchist on the face of the globe. He is just the very best fellow alive. You're sure to meet him. His name is—— Hullo! Oh, here's the junction. Do let me carry the camera. Right? Thank you. Sure I've got everything? I'll be very careful, never fear."

Digitized by Google

Thus Bertie (he recalled the fact later) carried her kodak for her, and, having put her safely into the train and received, as an acknowledgment, one of her puzzling, enigmatical smiles, was taken (being so near home) once more with a sudden fit of shyness, and drifted away into a solitary smoker.

"My eye! What a stunner! Looks like a real lady; but she wouldn't have a keb, and she's got no luggage. Wonder whose house she's for?"

The local porter made the remark to the newsboy as he watched the retreating figure on the high road carrying the camera, her only parcel.

That she was on strange ground was evident from the fact that she stopped from time to time to observe the points of the road—a wayside house here, a clump of trees or other land-mark there. When she came to a fork in the road a hundred yards beyond the mile-stone she took the path to the right and walked on with less hesitation. Once only she paused to change her burden from one hand to the other. "It is seventy-four," she muttered to herself. "I think so, I feel sure of it. I am to take the camera to its maker."

The road was white with dust, bordered with flower-bearing hedges, exhaling their sweetness in the falling evening breeze. But she had no thought for the beauties of the way; her eyes were searching the road before her. They rested at last as she turned a bend on a solitary figure walking slowly toward her—the figure of a man who stooped, and walked with his head thrust forward and his hands clasped.

There was no need for any introduction between them. She simply walked straight up to him and said: "Companion Durand, you sent for me and I am here."

The man was in a tense state of excitement. "What has happened?" he asked, speaking in French. "Say, then, how is it? There are no papers yet in this hole, this corner; but it should have come with you in the train, in the guard's waggon, on the engine. They should have shouted it to the stations as they passed through. The very air should rock with it, and men and women hurrying to and fro should tell it to each other. But I hear nothing, I feel nothing. Say, then, what has happened?"

"Nothing," she answered, wearily. "The cause must wait for the dawning of another day. Nothing has happened."

"Then the master——"

"Is under arrest!"

"And you are free to tell it?"

"Yes, I am free. The only thing unprovided against by precautions, monumental in their elaboration, has occurred. He was arrested late last night on a trumpery charge of having picked a man's pocket. So much for the futility of a great effort. Need I tell you that the man who made the charge was a plain-clothes official? This morning early he was remanded, without bail, on the pretence of sending for provincial witnesses to speak to a former conviction. To-morrow, when all is over, the case will fall through, and they will release him. He will be free too late."

"But they will search his lodgings——"

"Possibly. They would find nothing, for he had nothing. All that was required was sent to me. I was to hand him what was necessary in Thames-street, five minutes before the appointed time."

"Bah!" he cried. "It is a great chance thrown away. Why did you not take his place?"

"You forget," she said, pointing to the camera, of which he had now relieved her. "I do not understand this child of your brain. It is new, untried. I cannot work it. The part allotted to me was only to guard that which might have brought danger to others. Why were you not there, comrade—you who understand this thing? If I could have taken the picture, then, indeed, there might have been something to tell."

"I will teach you," he said, hurriedly, colouring at her words. "As you are here it follows that you received a cypher from the leaders. How did you read it?"

"That failing what was proposed in London this morning there must be lesser demonstrations elsewhere to-night. I followed my instructions in coming here. But why have you chosen this unlikely spot?"

"Because it is unlikely," he answered, "and out of the world. After all, to let men find us at their doors here, in this peaceful country, will prove effectually that we exist and must be reckoned with."

Digitized by Google

"And why this solitary place more than another?"

"Because I have the entrée here through a woman, a ridiculous old woman, who believes she has enslaved me. I met her, strange to say, in Paris on the eve of the day that saw our first meeting. I sowed the seed then of the harvest we shall reap together. Her folly engendered that day has sheltered me of late."

"And you are about to repay her?"

"I have my reasons."

"I thought so," she answered, glancing at his darkling sinister face. "Private reasons are discountenanced by the cause, but in this instance selection is left to the individual. It is no matter."

"My reasons are not private ones," he affirmed. "The father of this man, this man in whose house there is to be a demonstration to-night, condemned a patriot to death, here in this country. Because that patriot was my father, is that any reason why I should spare his son? What house so fit as this that I have chosen for what must be to-night? In my father's person the cause was injured by his father. Upon the son of the one the cause shall be avenged by the son of the other. It is a great thing to be master of my craft. In this hand I hold the lightning that shall launch my bolt from the blue."

"Enough of reasons," she answered, carelessly. "I asked for none; my part is to obey. Tell me only how and when the thing is to be?"

He paused, and his furtive eyes turned sideways on her.

"There is the demonstration to be arranged for," he said, "and there is also the escape."

"Be frank," she replied. "I know your forte. The demonstration is to be worked by me, the rest you understand. Is not that so?"

"It would be better," he suggested. "In three minutes I can teach you all you need to know; but not here, not now. Observe the path beyond us to the right; it leads to a little gate, of which this is the key. You will find a summer-house near the entrance, which is in a straight line with the windows of the house. To the second row of windows there is a balcony led up to by stone steps. I shall excuse myself from the table this evening. Wait in the summer-house till you see the lace curtain flutter from the window near the steps, then come up boldly. At that time all the servants in the house will be engaged on the service of the table. I shall be there to explain all that is necessary. I myself will set and time the thing; you will have nothing to do but drop in the drops and touch the spring. The latter you will not do till I whistle to let you know that I am below with the horse and trap. There will then be five minutes for us to get beyond reach of harm. Are you satisfied?"

"Quite satisfied," she answered. "A demonstration is ordered; I am to assist. Where or how is of little moment. Do you take the camera? So—I am to keep the drops," and she pointed to a porcelain phial with a silver screw-top hanging from her waist with a few other meaningless gewgaws. "I shall wait in the summer-house for the summons."

He passed the key of the gate into her hands, and watched her take her way across the field as calmly as though she were on some ordinary mission, and then, carrying his camera with tender care, he returned by the high road and the drive to the house.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

French Protestants in England.

By SYBIL C. MITFORD.

THE coming of the Huguenots constitutes a by no means unimportant chapter in English history.

Those unhappy refugees, who at different times found here a safe asylum from religious persecution, numbered amongst them some of the best and noblest sons of France.

Scions of great houses, men of genius and learning, the cunning handicraftsman, skilled in the arts of industry, and the patient tiller of the soil, were alike driven to seek a new home, where they might unmolested pursue their peaceful labours, which add so much to the strength and riches of a nation.

Although the French emigration to this country is generally associated in our minds with the memorable year, 1685, which saw the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, its commencement is to be looked for at a much earlier period.

Both Edward VI. and Elizabeth accorded a ready welcome to the Huguenots who fled from the fanatical tyranny of their fellow-countrymen, and granted them full liberty to worship according to the faith of their fathers.

The memory of the religious persecution which they themselves had suffered was not likely to be soon effaced from the minds of Englishmen, and their keenest sympathies were aroused on behalf of the Protestant French who were received not as foreigners but as brethren.

There was, it is true, a class of people who not unnaturally looked rather askance at this alien invasion, as they regarded it.

These were the workers in certain trades, such as weaving, who found that the superior skill of their French competitors made it hard for them to get a living. But in the long run this proved of great benefit to our industries, and England doubtless owes something of her eminence in manufactures to the lessons taught by her Gallic foster-sons.

The secession of Henry of Navarre, the avenger of St. Bartholomew, to the Romish Church, undertaken from motives of policy, is one of the most humiliating sacrifices of principle to expediency ever recorded.

This undoubtedly paved the way for the sanguinary proscription which, nearly one hundred years later, followed the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes.

It is true that Henry would not allow the Protestants to be personally molested while he lived, but they were shorn of all political power and influence, and were thus left to the mercy of their enemies after his death.

Year after year their treatment grew steadily worse, and after a century of savage persecution Louis XIV. perpetrated the culminating crime, the Revocation of the Edict which guaranteed their lives and liberties. A second St. Bartholomew followed, not, it is true, like the first, a massacre of a day, but a long course of organised murder carried on with relentless cruelty day after day, and year after year.

Six hundred thousand French Protestants went into exile during the next twenty years, and great numbers found their way to England, where every assistance was given them. James II. issued orders in Council for general collections to be made in the churches of the United Kingdom for their aid. A fund called the Royal Bounty was formed and administered by clerical and lay committees composed of the chiefs among the emigrants. French churches were also organised and positions in the Church, in the army and navy, and in the learned profession were found for many, who, by previous training in France, were qualified to hold them, while employment in various forms was provided for those who were artisans and workmen. Many of the younger men were helped to emigrate to America. In all these, and other ways, the English people showed themselves ready to help those who were in distress and worthy of their assistance.

Digitized by Google

The Huguenots soon settled down in their adopted country, and after a few generations the majority became more or less assimilated to the people among whom they had made their home.

But there are still many who to this day preserve their Huguenot traditions and in whom their original nationality is very clearly discernable. For them services are still carried on in French in the chapel attached to Canterbury Cathedral, granted to the Huguenots by Edward VI., and in the Huguenot Church at Tottenham Court Road, the Church of the Savoy, Blooms-

HENRI DE MASSUE, EARL OF GALWAY,
First Governor of the French Protestant Hospital.

Digitized by Google

THE LATE EARL OF RADNOR,
Whose Family has given six Governors to the Hospital.

bury and some others. We find them in Spitalfields still pursuing the once famous but now decayed industry of silk-weaving.

The French Church in Canterbury Cathedral is one of the most remarkable memorials of the Huguenots yet remaining. The Black Prince's Chantry has been used for this purpose since 1892, but previous to that the church occupied part of the crypt of the Cathedral, though this was not the original site granted by Edward VI. It was Archbishop Cramner and Bishop Latimer who urged the young king to extend his protection to these godly French Protestants, who had many able preachers among them but no place to worship in which they could call their own. They were calculated to prove a great source of strength to our own Reformed Church in its struggle against Romish influences, which had by no means been eradicated, even by the drastic measures of Henry VIII., and so, while preserving their own forms of worship, they were received into the bosom of our national church. The French weavers in silk and wool, who were settled in large numbers in Canterbury, formed the great part of the congregation, which, in Elizabeth's time, numbered between two and three thousand. But as better times dawned for the Protestants in France, and the greater part of those who had settled in England became one with the people of the soil, the congregation grew less and less.

Before the close of 1824 the dwindled congregation found the south aisle of the crypt large enough, and this was shut off from the main body by walling up the arches of the piers. The further erection of a barrier across the east end of the aisle took away the vestry in St. Gabriel's Chapel, a protest to the dean and chapter proving ineffectual.

In 1846 preaching and communicating was only held four times a year by ministers from London, on other Sundays the liturgy being read by an elder. Thus, from a congregation in Elizabeth's time of 2,500, the church consisted of only twenty communicants, with a reader, an elder, and a clerk.

In 1875 the Charity Commissioners presented a scheme for diverting what they considered an almost extinct endowment into other sources. But the French church found a warm friend in Archbishop Tait, who ably opposed this measure in the House of Lords. Opposition seemed to restore a little life into the congregation, for, under the pastorate of M. Martin, who discontinued the Anglican liturgy and used a service book compiled by himself, the numbers increased.

No opposition was made to a very reasonable demand in 1892 from the Dean and Chapter that the Black Prince's chantry be used instead of St. Ernulf's crypt, they being anxious to unblock the south aisle in the latter church to admit daylight. A promise was given to provide more space if required. The Rev. J. R. Barnabas, of Canada, was elected pastor in 1898.

But the memories of the past are nowhere more fitly enshrined than in an institution whose beginnings may be traced to the eighteenth century. I refer to the French Protestant Hospital, which owes its rise to the generosity of one of the Huguenot leaders.

Digitized by Google

Amongst the distinguished men who had been obliged to flee the country was Monsieur de Gastigny, "heretofore Master of the Buckhounds in Holland," a soldier who subsequently fought at the battle of the Boyne. As a member of the Royal Bounty Committee, M. de Gastigny was greatly interested in the aged and infirm among his countrymen. He bequeathed £1,000 for their benefit, and from this bequest, largely added to by the contributions of the more prosperous refugees, sprang the French Hospital. In 1716, a piece of land in the parish of Saint Luke, to the North of London, was purchased from the Ironmonger's Company. Here a hospice, or, as it was then called, a hospital, was built and fitted up for eighty of the most aged and poor among the refugees—a veritable Hôtel Dieu to those whom steadfastness of faith in their religion had deprived of home and country. Two years later the hospital was dedicated, "in the midst of a great concourse of French refugees" and their families, according to the use of the Church of England, by Mons. Philippe Menard, Minister of the French chapel of Saint James' and first secretary of the corporation. At the same time a charter of incorporation was granted by George I., Henry Ruvigny, Earl of Galway, being appointed the first governor. A suitable appointment, for Lord Galway had always taken great interest in his Huguenot brethren. When one of the Lords Justices of Ireland, he founded the French Protestant colony of Portarlington, and encouraged the formation of other similar colonies, and he lost no opportunity of finding employment for the Huguenots as cultivators of the soil or as workers in the linen and other industries of Ireland.

As time went on and funds flourished, more ground was bought in St. Luke's parish, the hospital was increased in size, and a special wing was provided for those who from the sufferings they had undergone were deprived of their reason, and so the place became known far and wide among the refugees as "La Providence," to which all French Protestants could turn when in need of help or sympathy.

About the beginning of the reign of George III. the active persecutions of the Protestants in France were slackened, and fewer and fewer families found their way to England. By this time too many of the original immigrants had died, while others who were prospering in their trades or professions had made themselves independent homes in the land. In this way the number of the destitute Huguenots was greatly diminished, and so large a building was no longer needed. The west wing was, therefore, pulled down, and part of the garden ground was let on building leases. The names of the streets alone preserve in that district the memory of the founder and of various governors of the hospital. The reversion to the Corporation of the houses then built enabled the directors about the year

MR. A. GIRAUD BROWNING,
Deputy Governor of French Protestant Hospital.

Digitized by Google

1862 to move the hospital to the more suitable neighbourhood of Victoria Park, where it now stands in its own grounds of about three acres. A new hospital indeed it is, but bound by the old constitution and maintained for the original purpose of helping the descendants of the Huguenot refugees and other poor and aged French Protestants. So thoroughly does the spirit of the founders pervade the place even at this day that none are admitted inmates except upon proof of their eligibility under the provisions of the charter of 1718, while almost all the governors and directors are representatives of old Huguenot families.

REV. PHILIPPE MENARD,
First Chaplain and Secretary of the Hospital.

Some time ago the writer paid a visit to the present hospital. It stands on the north side of Victoria Park and is a large imposing building—set back from the noisy stream of carts and omnibuses which continually passes its gates. A pretty lodge leads into a large garden where the trees and flowers flourish so well that even in winter they offer a pleasant contrast to the monotony of the surrounding houses. The building is in the style of the French chateaux of the time of Francis I., with large mullioned windows and many pinnacles, the red brickwork decorated by the introduction of a design carried out in blue. Passing through the garden I at last arrived at the front door, and here I made my first acquaintance with one of the old ladies who live in the hospital. She opened the door and, with a word of welcome, showed me into the large stone entrance hall, leaving me there for a time whilst she called the steward to conduct me round the hospital.

As I stood there waiting I had time to look at the old prints that embellish the walls of the long corridor, many of them illustrating the persecutions of the Huguenots, whilst others show the hospital first established in London for the refugee families whose names are now so familiar to us that we almost forget their origin.

Digitized by Google

As I stood in the hall looking at the old prints, the steward came to show me the rooms and everything that was of interest in the place. He himself was a cheery sailor, full of life, with a kind word for all the old people we came across. He was the only person in the house, it appeared to me, not of Huguenot descent, though his opinions seemed to be as uncompromisingly Protestant as were any of those who in less happy days went to the stake for their religion.

On beginning my journey of inspection I was first taken into the Court-room, a large and lofty room panelled to about five feet from the ground. Above the panelling a band of armorial bearings of the earlier governors and directors was carried round the room, and from above the band looked down the portraits of M. de Gastigny, the Earl of Galway, Philippe Menard, Lord Ligonier, the Earl of Radnor, whose family has given six Governors to the Hospital, and other governors and directors. It is a fine room, but not to my mind so attractive as the library, which contains a large collection of books bearing upon the history of the Huguenots and their flight into England, besides engravings and other relics, all of them most interesting and in many cases almost unique. One of the inmates happened to be in this room, looking over the books. An intelligent old lady she was, quiet and refined, saying nothing of herself but only talking of her books. Her face seemed to tell the story of a life of much suffering paitiently borne, perhaps even without wonder that her lot should have fallen on rough ground when others had lives full of pleasantness and peace.

JACQUES DE GASTIGNY,
Founder of the French Protestant Hospital.

She talked to me about the treasures of the library which were under her special care, showing me the rare books with just pride, for there are many in that collection that cannot be matched in England.

Beyond the library is the chapel, with its beautiful stained glass windows and arranged with a gallery at the west end, that is entered from the upper floor of the building, by which means the sick and infirm can without too much exertion attend the daily morning and evening services.

Digitized by Google

From the chapel we went into the dining room or refectory, where all the inmates take their meals together, separate tables being arranged for the men and women. And then we passed to the men's day room, where two of the old people were playing chess, others were reading or talking, whilst another came in from his walk to a neighbouring shop where he had been making purchases for his friends, both men and women. Such is the way in which their afternoons are passed. In the morning the house work has to be done, those of the inmates helping who are able to do so; in the afternoon the old people spend the long hours in any manner that seemeth best to them. The old ladies also have their share in the household duties, helping chiefly in the mending of clothes and household linen. This particular afternoon being cold and foggy, I found them all busy in the day-room, sitting about in little groups, and most of them talking as fast as they worked. But they were all glad to see a stranger and to have a chat with someone from the outside world. So we talked together until tea-time, when the bell rang to summon them to the dining-room to which they all trooped off, whilst I made my way upstairs to see the sick people in the convalescent room.

All the rooms upstairs are built round a gallery, so that the house is quite open from the hall right up to the glazed roof ceiling. On one side of this gallery are the old ladies' rooms, on the other those of the men. All these I passed as I went to the convalescent room, where I found one poor invalid who had suffered from paralysis for the last two years. But, for all that, she was bright and cheery, making the most of the kindness that was shown to her, and grumbling not at all at the suffering that of late has been her lot. Other invalids were sitting about having their tea. Amongst these was a French lady who could not or would not speak a word of English. To her own tongue she was devoted, and no other would she adopt, even though this determination cut her off from much intercourse with her companions. Here, too, one of the old men entered, bringing little parcels he had been commissioned to buy for a friend, and they all had a bright word for each other, and it was only from sad voices and still more sad expressions of countenance that it was possible to see the marks of struggles and sorrows that life had brought to many of them.

Then two sisters took me into their bedroom, a pleasant, bright room which they shared between them. But to their minds it was much more than just a bedroom. The very fact that it belonged to those two alone made it home to them in a manner that no other part of the hospital could ever be. It made them happy to be together, they said, and they gloried in the privacy they could enjoy, and the sunshine that poured in through their windows whenever the sun appeared in the sky. So there were many hours that they spent there working and talking—a happy couple depending entirely on each other's companionship and love, and feeling themselves rich in those blessings which Fate had denied to others in the hospital.

Another old lady was going, as I met her, to lie down and rest after hours spent by the bedside of a sick companion. She knew a great deal about nursing and she had been only too glad to use her knowledge for the sake of her friend, whilst the work provided her with much more real interest than can be found in the ordinary daily routine of an institution of this description. Monotony is an evil that it is extremely difficult to avoid in such public homes, and in talking to the men and women I could see what pleasure they had in the concerts and entertainments that are from time to time got up for their amusement, whilst even a stray visit from one who would take the trouble to talk to them was a pleasure they greatly enjoyed. "We are always glad to see a new face," one of them said to me, as she wished me good-bye with a smile and a shake of the hand as she opened the great front door. And so with those words my first visit to the French hospital came to an end, and as I went down the dark and quiet drive and through the prètty lodge, I felt glad that the poor old people, though no longer possessing homes of their own, had found a real haven of rest in "La Providence" where they received every care and attention that old age and infirmities demand.

SIBYL C. MITFORD.

Digitized by Google

Ashville College, Harrogate.

By A. P. EASTON.

FOUNDED twenty-four years ago for the education of the sons of ministers and laymen of the United Methodist Free Churches, Ashville College, Harrogate, has won a deservedly high place among denominational schools. Its Executive Committee comprises some of the most prominent Free Church members of the North of England, and this is in itself a guarantee that the religious life of the school is as zealously looked after as its educational.

Four ministers and three prominent laymen constitute the Executive Committee, viz., the Rev. E. Boaden, the Rev. E. D. Cornish, the Rev. John Mather, and the Rev. John Moore, the secretary, who form the ministerial element, while the laymen are Joseph Briggs, Esq., A. J. Chippindale, Esq., and Robert Bird, Esq., J.P., the treasurer.

The object which the founders had in view was summed up in the following brief statement made at the opening of the College; it was, they said, "purely educational—to give an education broad, simple and comprehensive; one that would meet all the essential requirements of the students, the intellectual, moral and physical elements of human nature."

This ideal which the founders placed before them has proved no mere visionary one. It has been fully realised, the School being noted not only for the excellence of its scholastic training, but also for its high physical and moral culture.

It would be difficult to imagine a more delightful situation than that of Ashville College.

It occupies a position on the outskirts of Harrogate, itself a famous health resort, and stands on a plateau, 600 feet above sea level.

The air is pure and bracing, and the view from the College extends over twenty miles of varied and beautiful scenery.

The School is surrounded by 30 acres of land, part of which has been converted into cricket and football fields. It is approached by a fine drive, bordered with beautiful trees, and, as one emerges from this shady avenue, the majestic building, with its detached wings, forms a fine coup de'œil.

MR. JOHN BOWICK, M.A., LL.D.
(The Headmaster.)

The imposing exterior of the School raises high expectations of the interior arrangements, nor are these disappointed. All the rooms—dining-room, school-rooms, class-room, and dormitories—are spacious and well ventilated, and what strikes one especially is the general air of home comfort which is sometimes sadly lacking in scholastic establishments.

There is a fine library and reading-room well stored with books and periodicals, a recreation room where the boys play all sorts of games—a bagatelle board, chess, draughts, and dominoes being provided.

Digitized by Google

A great feature of the school is the splendid chemical laboratory which occupies a house to itself.

There the boys are taught to conduct experiments in chemistry, and the numerous scientific instruments and the endless rows of glass phials testify to the completeness with which the laboratory is fitted up.

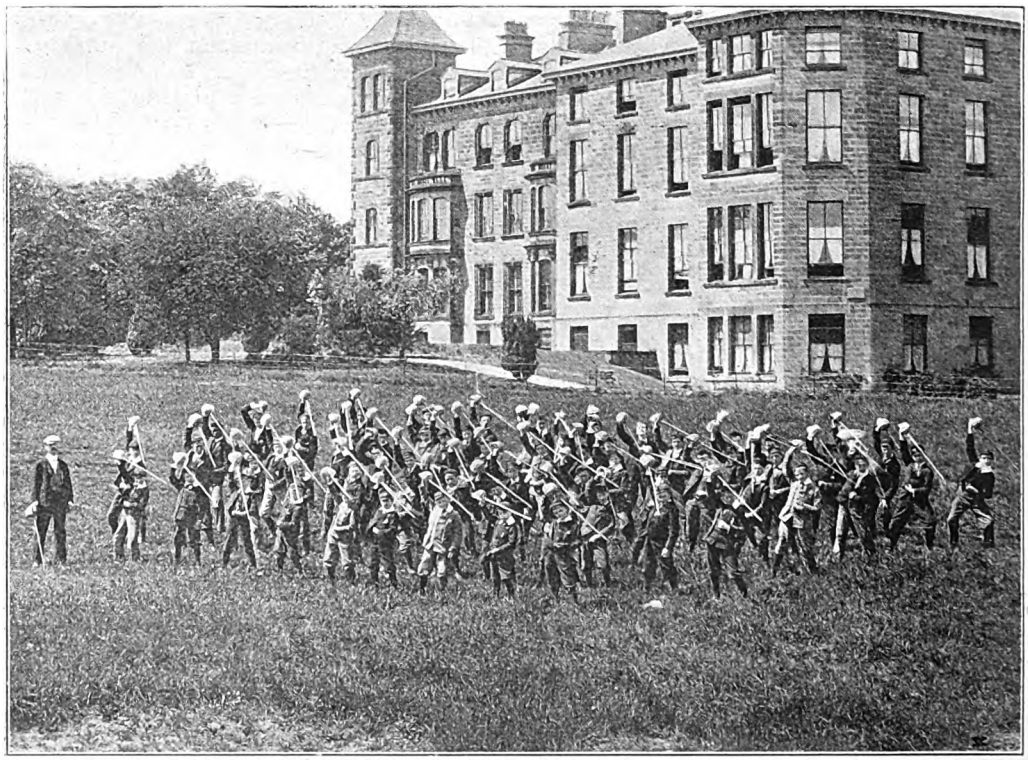
There is a lecture-room attached where the science master explains the full significance of the object lessons given in the laboratory.

In another building the gymnasium is located. There we find high bars, horizontal bars, trapeze, dumb-bells, Indian clubs, and all the apparatus of a completely furnished and well ordered gymnasium. The place presents a most animated sight when all the exercises are in full swing. The bars, trapeze, and swings are alive with pendulous figures going through all kinds of complicated feats, while fencing and boxing go on merrily between various combatants on the level ground. A very imposing sight is the assault at arms, when all the boys who are "cunning at fence" are drawn up on the college green and perform their evolutions in sword exercises, and cut, thrust, and parry in unison.

Another special feature of the School is the Sanitorium, which is also detached from the main building.

The health of the School has been remarkably good, no cases of serious illness having occurred during the present head-master's tenure of office, but should any infectious disease make its appearance the patient would be immediately removed to this infirmary, and here he would be completely isolated from the others. The wonderful success of the School is due in no small measure to the present head-master, Dr. Bowick, who has held the position for the last eleven years.

Though a scholar of the highest academical distinction, the Doctor is one of the most modest and unassuming of men, and there is not a trace of the pedant about



THE ASSAULT-AT-ARMS.

Digitized by Google

him. His remarkable success in dealing with his boys is due to the confidence he inspires in them. Thoroughly kind and just he is firm withal, and knows how to exact their unquestioning obedience.

He is a man of deep religious convictions and teaches the boys to love everything that is pure and noble and manly and to despise whatever is underhand and mean.

Such a training can only be efficiently carried out if the teacher has a broad mind and sympathetic nature, both of which Dr. Bowick possesses.

Boys may be driven into obedience by force, but it is impossible to raise their moral tone by this means. One must understand a boy's failings and temptations, and, while condemning the fault, try to effect its removal gently and in a sympathetic spirit.

Harshness never pays, for outward conformity often means rebellion working within.

The Doctor tries to enter into the individual life of each boy, both moral and intellectual, and often he summons one or more of them to his study for a quiet chat, when he gives them words of counsel and encouragement.

With regard to school studies, it is no uncommon experience for a boy to seem utterly unable to obtain a grasp of a certain subject, although he may be neither lazy nor generally stupid.

If he gets no more attention than is possible in ordinary class teaching it is very probable that it will remain a mystery to him all his life.

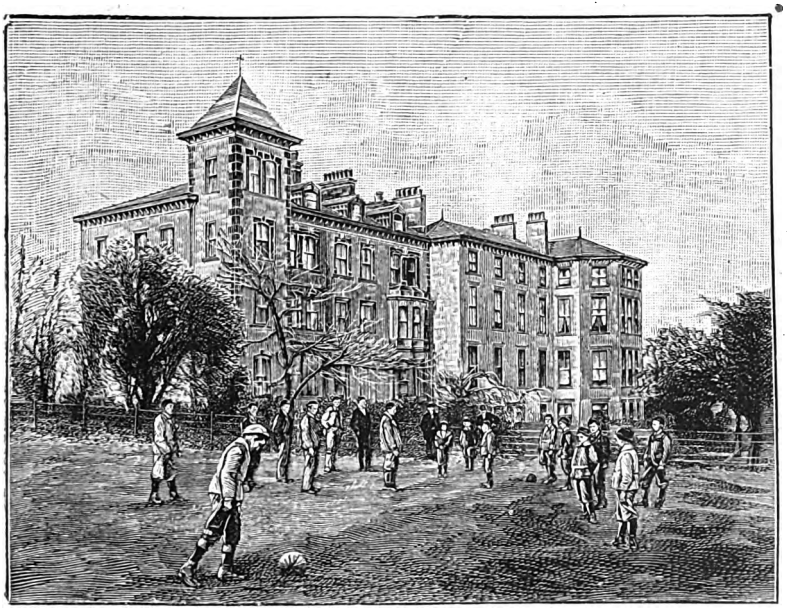
He has little natural aptitude for the study in question; its terms perplex him, and the rules appear a hopeless tangle of meaningless phrases.

Now Dr. Bowick makes it his business to acquaint himself with the mental capacities and peculiarities of every one of his boys, and consequently he is able to see just where the difficulty lies, and to present the subject in the light that is best calculated to appeal to his comprehension.

Dr. Bowick's academical career has been in every way most distinguished. He has reaped high honours at three Universities, Glasgow, Dublin and London. He gained the University scholarship at Glasgow and became Mathematical Prizeman.

He took his B.A. in mathematics, mathematical physics, and experimental physics, and M.A. in civil and constitutional history. He also took the legal degrees of LL.B. and LL.D. with honours in arts and law.

Before coming to the College Dr. Bowick had several notable achievements to record. He was head-master at a school at Burntisland, near Edinburgh, and his pupils were most successful in the local examinations of St. Andrew's University, while some gained high places at the bursary competitions of Glasgow and Edinburgh Universities.



PRACTICE IN THE FOOTBALL FIELD.

Afterwards he became head-master of the Collegiate School Camberwell, London, and in the Jubilee year a pupil of his gained the prize in an English Essay Competition open to all the high-class schools in London.

Her Majesty the Queen herself

Digitized by Google

MR. JOSEPH BRIGGS. MR. A. J. CHIPPINDALE.
REV. E. D. CORNISH. REV. JOHN MATHER.
REV. E. BOADEN.
REV. JOHN MOORE. MR. ROBERT BIRD.
Secretary. Treasurer.

presented the prize, a life of the Prince Consort in five volumes, and afterwards sent the boy a photograph of herself.

Of the assistant masters at Ashville College, Mr. A. W. Priestley, M.A., who teaches classics and foreign languages, is Exhibitioner and Classical Honourman at Queen's College, Oxford, and holds the Society of Arts first-class certificate for French and German.

Mr. King, B.Sc., F.I.C., the Science Master, is an Honourman of Victoria University.

Other masters are Mr. G. Goodfellow and Mr. W. V. Haigh, and there are music and art masters (certificated) and a drill sergeant. The results of the labours of Dr. Bowick and his able assistants, as shown by public examinations, have been very gratifying, the pupils of this school having gained more successes than those of all the other local schools put together.

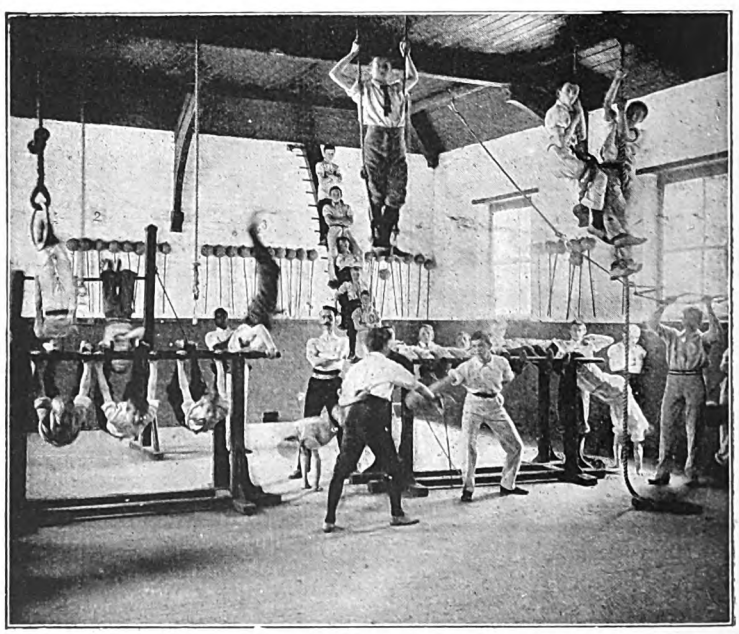
From 1891 to 1898, ninety-two passed the Cambridge Local Examinations, 43 with honours, 24 with distinctions, and 2 gained medals.

In 1900 nine were entered for the Cambridge Locals, and all passed, several with honours. At the College of Preceptors' Examinations, 27 were presented, and here again there was not one failure.

Out of 88 who have passed during the last few years, 75 were in the first division, and one of Dr. Bowick's pupils took the first place in arithmetic out of 12,000 competitors.

Two Ashville College boys have won the Geographical Society's medal, and no less than 250 certificates have been granted to pupils of the school by the Science and Art department. For music the School has also scored heavily, gaining honours and certificates both for the theory and practice of music.

These are only some distinctions gained by the School, the list given being by no means complete, but, as it stands, it is a grand record and bears eloquent testimony to the thoroughness with which the work of the College is carried out.



THE GYMNASIUM IN FULL SWING.

A. P. EASTON.

Digitized by Google

THE GREATEST NEED OF THE NEW CENTURY.

Some Further Opinions.

Rev. HUGH PRICE HUGHES.

I think that the greatest need of the New Century is really to remember that "man does not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceeds out of the mouth of God." The fundamental curse of our time is an idolatrously exaggerated estimate of the value of money. We need to be reminded by another St. Augustine that a golden key will open every door—except the door of happiness. And by another St. Francis of Assisi that the absolute needs of human life are astonishingly few, and that our real happiness is to be found in communion with God and with nature, and in seeking the welfare of others. In one word, to quote the supreme Teacher, our greatest need of all is to realise that "a man's life" (his real life) "consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth."

Mr. W. T. STEAD.

The greatest need of the New Century, that seems to me most pressing just now, is that Christians, especially eminent dignitaries of the Church, both Established and un-established, should open their eyes to the fact that, although it may be their duty to kill their brother, they ought never to take in hand the killing of him until they have tried, by means of arbitration, to discover some other method of fulfilling their duty to God and Man.

Mrs. ORMISTON CHANT.

"At the close of the nineteenth—this splendid century, our country is suffering from a bad attack of sordidness. Our rulers are afraid that, in spite of Divine providing through all the countless ages of mankind, God will have to be supplemented by human sagacity, and His probable inability to do the best for the British section of his family is forestalled by ways and dodges that are making a high mountain of disgrace and infamy for the future to be appalled at.

"Is it anything but sheer unmitigated sordidness that lets the trade in a maddening drink tempt and cajole the credulous multitudes to their doom?"

And to the same debasing cause Mrs. Chant goes on to say we owe "the long and popular run of plays that unconsciously 'hold up the mirror to nature' in a 'way not intended by the management.' 'These be your gods (amusements), O Israel'! the foul intrigue, the moral cancer carefully gowned, groomed and perfumed, and sinning to sweet music and loud applause."

Rev. NEWMAN HALL, LL.B., D.D.

Two Dozen Rules of Life for 1901.

Fear God.
Follow Christ.
Love mankind.
Speak truthfully.
Live honestly.
Pray constantly.
Work diligently.
Cultivate purity.
Be manly.
Be womanly.
Embrace goodness.
Abhor evil.
Forgive injuries.
Do good.
Emulate nobleness.
Respect poverty.
Assist weakness.
Wait patiently.
Cultivate peace.
Advocate righteousness.
Go forward.
Look upward.
Live godly.
Be heavenly.

Digitized by Google

For THE BAIRNS.

Conducted by
THE REV. J. REID HOWATT.

"OUR BROTHERS AND SISTERS."

Because of some rather severe remarks that were made at an educational institute as to a growing tendency for sisters to become unsisterly, and brothers unbrotherly, in their home-life dealings with one another, I thought I would get my young friends to decide whether the charge was true or not.

I have had several answers, but it would be difficult to see what most of them have to do with the matter!

The fault is entirely mine; I should not have expected the youngsters to sit in judgment on their own brothers or sisters, let alone those in other families. It is a fine arrangement which has dealt out the critical faculty very sparingly to children; it leaves more room for appreciation and affection, and these are better.

As all the letters are very concrete—giving sketches, more or less pleasant, about the writers' own brothers and sisters—they have all such a strong family-likeness that a couple of them may be taken as fair samples of all the rest.

The first is very nicely written :—

Sunnyside, Otley.

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—As this is the first time that I have written to you I scarcely hope to be successful in obtaining a prize, but I thought that I would like to try. I have no sisters, and only one brother, two years my junior, who lives at Detroit, in the United States of America. I am very sorry for this, because America seems such a long way off. I know all about Fred, though, nearly as well as if I lived with him. He writes me such nice long interesting letters, and never sends just a short one saying that he will write more next time, as I know a lot of boys would do. I think that brothers, if they liked (especially elder ones) could be great helps to, and nice friends for their sisters. I don't know what I should do without mine, although he does live so far away, and I am quite sure that there is not a better boy or a nicer brother in all the world than mine.—I am, yours truly,

UNA MANN (Aged 14 years).

The next is fuller than the last, and is a fairer test, for the boys are there to tease, it they want to tease, and sister is there, too, to be nasty, if she wants to be nasty; but none in this family have any wishes in these directions, beyond, perhaps, what is just needed to give a little spice to all else!

This letter has been reckoned the best of all sent in; to the young writer, accordingly, I have sent a handsome book as a prize :—

Sawley Grange, Derby.

DEAR MR. HOWATT.—To-day I saw in the TEMPLE MAGAZINE your competition about brothers and sisters, so I thought I should like to do it. I have three big brothers, all older than myself—Joe, Frank, and Rupert. They are very kind to me, and I love them very much. I have no sisters. Joe and Frank go to boarding school. I always look forward to them coming back for the holidays. I am a daily boarder at school and go by train. We live at a lonely house in the country. If the boys break up before I do, one of them generally comes to meet me at the station till I break up. The other one, Rupert, goes to school at the nearest town; he is a day boarder, so if I go out anywhere and come home at night when it is dark, he sometimes comes to meet me. At Christmastime they take me out to buy Christmas presents and play with me. They help me tidy my garden and dig it for me, and Rupert helps me with my lessons. Frank plays the piano, and he gave me music lessons in his last holidays. They give me nice birthday and Christmas presents. They are polite to me sometimes, but I cannot say they are always. They take me out skating and sliding. Joe has a magic lantern and sometimes gets it ready in a dark room and then asks us to go and see it. When I go to stay with my grandma one of them often comes with me, and we have such good fun! Joe and Frank sometimes write to me from school; they come back on the 19th, and then there will be a row in the house! I do not know much about other people's brothers, but I know father is very good and kind to his sisters, and mother says that her brothers were always kind to her.—I remain, yours truly,

Digitized by Google

ELSIE BOWMER (Aged 11½ years).

THE CRUTCH-AND-KINDNESS LEAGUE.

When it is fast day in one's own parish it is good to get a bark from a neighbour's dog, and—with all apologies for the metaphor—I am under obligation to Mr. Anderson, the kindly editor of The Reaper, for such a service. He has started in Glasgow a "Children's League of Kindness," in the hope of doing for the poor cripples in the great northern city what, to my wonder, God has enabled me to do for those in Londen by the Crutch-and-Kindness League. May his success be even greater than mine!

In an interesting account he gives of the starting of his branch, he says the movement has been organised on the same lines as our own, which he explains crisply and clearly in the following words, which may serve for all further explanation this month of the nature and objects of the Crutch-and-Kindness League:—

London is kind to her cripples. The Ragged School Union, under the guiding heart and head of the secretary, Mr. John Kirk, keeps a complete register, at present numbering over 6,000 cripples, or handicapped children—and sees that everything possible is done to cheer and brighten the lives of the young sufferers. And this is through the kindly ministry of a band of 1,000 voluntary workers, drawn from all parts of the city and suburbs. With this object in view the city has been mapped out, and small clusters of cripple children are grouped around conveniently chosen centres, each little group having a staff of workers usually connected with a local Church, Mission, or Sunday School, and each group being supervised by a local superintendent, responsible to the parent Ragged School Union. The workers in each local centre arrange for stated meetings, to which the cripples come or are carried—meetings for Bible study, singing, sewing, fretwork, story-reading and play. The most popular meeting is that known as the Cripples' Parlour, which, as often as possible, is ushered in with a cup of cocoa or tea, and biscuit or bun, followed by suitable games, dolls, toys, scrap books, and the like, and a short address, bright hymns, and prayer. Flowers, when possible, are handed round, so that each little cripple may carry home a sweet aroma as a token and memory of a happy hour spent with loving friends.

Cripples who are bedridden are visited weekly at their own homes, and made the recipients of flowers, pictures, and at least a kindly greeting. The parents of the cripples are advised as to the best medical aid, surgical appliances are procured for the cripples through the combined help of the Sunday Hospital Fund, the Ragged School Union, and friends specially interested in the local centre.

Sometimes the interest of Suburban Sunday Schools and Young People's Societies of Christian Endeavour is enlisted, resulting in little groups of cripples being treated to special evening entertainments in winter, and to garden parties and excursions in summer. Some churches and Sunday schools regularly provide speakers for one of the usual weekly meetings. Others become responsible for seeing that cripples of a certain group are regularly visited at their own homes. At Christmas most of the cripples get a hamper of good things. This year there will be about 5,000 hampers sent out, containing plum pudding, meat pie, plum cake, ½ lb. tea, and sweets. The funds to meet this expense are contributed by the puhlic, in response to an appeal by Alderman Sir William Treloar, to whom the London cripples owe so much, and whose interest in them is untiring. In addition, there is the "Crutch-and-Kindness League," instituted by the Rev. J. Reid Howatt, through which 4,950 correspondents throughout the United Kingdom, Ireland and the Colonies, have each been introduced to a little cripple, to whom they undertake to write a letter regularly once a month. The postman's knock is quite an event in the life of many a London cripple. It brings a gleam of sunshine, and the glad consciousness that a kind heart somewhere is thinking of it. For the moment, the ache, the crutch, the deformity are forgotten, the little world is enlarged, a fresh interest is awakened; and who can tell how often the presence of the Master Himself is suggested, is welcomed, through this simple and tender ministry to "one of the least of these." Some correspondents take quite a deep interest in their cripples. As many as 700 provided the means, this last summer, to give their little friend a fortnight's holiday.

Digitized by Google

When cripples become of age, and are fit for work, the resources of the Ragged School Union are placed at their service for a lift to some partly or wholly self-supporting industry.

All further particulars concerning the Crutch-and-Kindness League may be had for a stamp from Mr. John Kirk, Secretary, Ragged School Union, 32, John-street, Theobald's-road, London, W.C.

New Members for the Month.

Miss Jessie C. Kettle, Hampton Wick; Mr. Raymond Legg, Cirencester; Miss Elizabeth Foster, Birmingham; Mr. Albert J. Jacobs, London, N.W.; Miss N. Sibley, Cornwall; Miss A. Swan, S. Croydon; Miss L. Porter, Forest Gate; Miss R. Hargreaves, Burnley; Miss R. Charlton, Mr. Charlton, Tunbridge Wells; Miss Eleanor Franklin, Miss Dorothy Riggall, Thirsk; Miss S. R. Mintey, Christchurch; Mrs. E. D. Paton, Glasgow; Mrs. Wray, Kingston Hill; Miss N. Baker, Harrogate; Miss Ethel Livens, Miss Emily Livens, Gosforth; Miss Verena Twycross, Miss Minna Twycross, Worthing; Mrs. Foster, Bedford; Miss Alice Weeks, Ryde; Miss Mary B. S. Lang, Johnstone; Miss A. Greenham, Manor Park; Mrs. Froud's Sunday-school class: Mr. Albert Foulkes, Mr. Albert Cochrane, Miss Lucy French, Miss Caroline Gillard, Miss Katie Broom, Miss Edie Galton, Miss Elsie Giles, care of Mrs. Froud, Christchurch; Miss Sophie E. Griesbach, Leeds; Mrs. Roby, Leyton; Miss M. Batty, Belgrave-road, S.W.; Miss K. M. Hawes, Ealing; Miss S. J. Dunn, Burnley; Miss H. Westwood, Forfar; Master John Leale, Guernsey; Miss Amy Roberts, Dibsbury; Miss Mary Hostop, Bude; Miss Ellen Smith, Cottenham; Miss S. C. Mangin, Chathill; Mrs. Phillips, Miss Mabel Phillips, Miss Grace Phillips, Ipswich; Miss Hilda Edgerton Hall, Miss Cicely Hall, Bow; Miss Annie Stedman, Miss Stedman's Sunday-school class, Wanstead; Mr. T. Bridgland, Chalfont St. Peters; The Y.W. Circle, per Miss Reynolds, Witney; Mr. Willie Pearson, Mr. Joseph Pearson, Middleton; Miss E. M. Sadd, Wangford; Miss E. Henderson, Bracknell; Miss Florence Marshall, care of Mrs. Froud, Christchurch; Miss Maude Lucas, Bedale; Miss Bella Day, Ilfracombe; Miss Alice Ralls, Bridport; Miss Elsie Leyton, care of Miss Medway, Hendon; Miss N. Jenkins, St. Austell; Miss Heppell, Aberdare; Miss Emily Pettit, care of Miss Armstrong, East Finchley; Miss Edith Walker, Carlisle; Miss Enid Davies, King Williams Town, S.A.; Miss Alice Pigott, Cape Colony; Miss M. Hutson, Barbadoes; Miss Dora Hurford, Miss Eva White, Cornwall; Miss E. M. Barnard, Tasmania; Miss Elsie Tejar, Miss G. Hardy, Miss Alice Thompson, care of Miss Richmond, West Hartlepool; Miss Nellie Cotchin, Miss Dorothy Burgess, Miss Louie Underwood, care of Miss Underwood, Luton; Miss Embling, care of Miss Wright, Westgate.

NIGHT'S LULLABY.

When the day is done and the tired old world
  Goes wearily to its rest,
There's a crooning song, in a whisper soft,
  Comes dreamily from the West;
And it brings us peace and a restful calm,
  It sighs in the fading light—
'Tis the evening hymn to the wornout,
  The lullaby of the night.

"Come to my breast,
  I will give you rest,
As 'round you my cool arms creep,
  The cares of the day
  Are far away—
Oh, poor, tired world, go 'sleep."

And the night breathes low as the shadows come,
  And troubles fly away,
While dreamy peace fills the heart at last,
  With the twilight cool and gray.
And the tired, tired world wears a sleepy smile—
  The smile of a calm delight—
As the zephyrs bring in a soothing voice
  The lullaby of the night.

"Sleep to my croon,
  'Neath the silent moon,
While my drowsy stars all peep;
  And forget the day,
  For it's far away—
Oh, poor, tired world, go 'sleep."

Digitized by Google

The beauty of Silver, Plate, and Brasses, is entirely dependent upon the brilliance of their polish, and it is of the utmost importance that these goods should be treated with a really good polish or paste. There is nothing better for the purpose than Globe Metal Polish or Plate Powder, both of which are magical in effect and produce a mirror-like surface without the slightest exertion.

The Globe Furniture Polish is the equal of the Globe Metal Polish, for its specific purpose, and still remains uneclipsed for imparting an incredibly brilliant and lasting polish to all kinds of Furniture, Papier Maché, Patent Leather, Varnished and Enamelled Goods, &c. These Polishes are obtainable at all Grocers, or Stores, at prices to suit everybody. RAIMES & Co., Stockton-on-Tees, and Bow, London, E.

Digitized by Google

WHEN BUYING A BICYCLE

look at the tyres.

If they are not

DUNLOP TYRES

the machine is not cheap at any price.

THE DUNLOP PNEUMATIC TYRE COMPANY, Ltd., Alma Street, Coventry.

BRANCHES.—London, Birmingham, Wolverhampton, Nottingham, Manchester, Glasgow.

THE OLDEST AND BEST.

UNEQUALLED FOR ITS BRILLIANCE AND CLEANLINESS.

ADAMS'S FURNITURE POLISH

FOR FURNITURE, BROWN BOOTS, PATENT LEATHER, OILCLOTHS,
AND ALL VARNISHED AND ENAMELLED GOODS.

THE QUEEN says: "Having made a fresh trial of its virtues after considerable experience with other compounds of the same nature, we feel no hesitation in recommending its use to all housewives."

VICTORIA PARK WORKS, SHEFFIELD.

FARDONS' SAUCE

is a stimulating appetiser, possessing characteristics found in no other Sauce, and is invaluable as a flavouring with all kinds of Soups, Fish, Meats, &c. To enable everybody to test the merits of this delicious Sauce we will forward a dainty tasting sample free of cost to any applicant.

In Bottles at 4½d., 6d., and 1s.

If your Grocer will not supply you with FARDONS' SAUCE, send us your order, and his name and address, and we will see that you are supplied.

FARDONS' VINEGAR CO.,
BIRMINGHAM.

Over 70 years' Established Reputation.

NEAVE'S FOOD

"Highly Nutritious." Lancet.

FOR INFANTS & INVALIDS.

Used in the Russian Imperial Nursery.

Gold Medal awarded, Woman's Exhibition, 1900.

"NEGO"

No Paper Required. THE FIVE-SECONDS FIRELIGHTER. No Waste of Cinders.

THESE Firelighters are a scientifically-prepared composition, with enormous inflammatory properties. All that is necessary when lighting a fire is to break the block into three sections and place in the stove, surrounding the same with coal. When ignited a steady fire will immediately result. One of these Firelighters is quite sufficient to boil a kettle in a few minutes. Sold everywhere in packets of 10, price 3d.

THE "NEGO" CO., GOOLE, YORKS.

A sample of these Firelighters will be sent post free on application.

Agents for London and the South of England—

GENDALL & Co., 34, NORFOLK ST., W.C.

Agents for Australasia and the Colonies: R. A. THOMPSON & Co., Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane, Adelaide, Cape Town, etc.

LONDON: PRINTED FOR THE PROPRIETORS BY THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY, LIMITED, WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, CARMELITE STREET, E.C.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE

FOR HOME AND SUNDAY READING.

VOL. 5. MARCH, 1901. No. 6.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

A FAIR DAUGHTER OF A FAIR WRITER.

Photo by Alfred Ellis & Walery, 51, Baker Street, W.

LONDON: HORACE MARSHALL & SON, TEMPLE HOUSE, TEMPLE AVENUE, E.C.

Cadbury's Cocoa

Absolutely Pure, Therefore Best.

"The Standard of Highest Purity."

—The Lancet.

Digitized by Google

BEAMISH'S STOUT.

Invaluable for Nursing Mothers, Invalids, and all those requiring a palatable Tonic of high recuperative powers.

Brewed by Messrs. BEAMISH & CRAWFORD, Ltd., Cork, from the finest Malt and Hops. Guaranteed by them to be Absolutely Pure.

This Stout is unlike other bottled stouts, inasmuch as it is free from excessive quantities of Carbonic Acid Gas. Bottled by a special process, fermentation has practically ceased when it reaches the bottle. Invalids can therefore drink it without any fear of setting up fermentation in the stomach. It keeps in perfect condition in bottle for more than two years—an impossibility with other stouts of equal alcoholic strength.

BEAMISH'S STOUT.

A delicious and wholesome tonic, refreshing, invigorating and sustaining. Easily digested by the most delicate.

Delivered free to any address in the United Kingdom in Cases containing 3 dozen reputed pints, price 21/- per Case.

Wholesale Agents to whom all communications should be addressed—

GENDALL & CO., 34, Norfolk St., Strand, London, W.C.

BODLEIAN 14·3·1901 LIBRARY

Digitized by Google

BENGER'S

FOOD FOR INFANTS,

INVALIDS and the AGED.

DELICIOUS, NUTRITIVE, AND DIGESTIBLE.

GOLD MEDAL,

Health Exhibition, London.

Benger's Food is not only highly nutritious, but is most easily digested, and is so delicious that it is enjoyed by the youngest Infant or the most delicate Invalid.

Benger's Food is sold in TINS by Chemists, &c., everywhere.

BORD'S PIANOS

25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (second-hand, 10s. 6d. per month) on the Three Years' System. — Lists free of C. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C. PIANOS EXCHANGED.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

These magnificent Pianos for Hire on the Three Years' System, at advantageous prices and terms.—List and particulars free of CHAS. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

"NEGO"

No Paper Required. THE FIVE-SECONDS FIRELIGHTER. No Waste of Cinders.

THESE Firelighters are a scientifically-prepared composition, with enormous inflammatory properties. All that is necessary when lighting a fire is to break the block into three sections and place in the stove, surrounding the same with coal. When ignited a steady fire will immediately result. One of these Firelighters is quite sufficient to boil a kettle in a few minutes. Sold everywhere in packets of 10, price 3d.

THE "NEGO" CO., GOOLE, YORKS.

A Sample of these Firelighters will be sent post free on application.

Agents for London and the South of England—
GENDALL & Co., 34, Norfolk St., W.C.

Keystone Burgundy.

At our risk and expense you may try a sample of Keystone Burgundy.

We claim that it is palpably superior to all other burgundies and clarets.

Send us an order for one bottle, 1s. 6d., or twelve bottles, 18s., carriage paid, cash with order, and if you do not like it, or consider our claim misleading, return the wine, carriage forward, and we will refund your money.

But if Keystone Burgundy pleases you, we shall be pleased for you afterwards to buy it from a licensed grocer, chemist, or wine merchant.

Half-bottles, 10d.; whole bottles, 1s. 6d.; flagons, 2s.

Stephen Smith & Co., Limited,
Bow, London, E.,
Proprietors of Hall's Wine.

No. 56.

Digitized by Google

FOR MOTHERS AND DAUGHTERS.

ADVISE GENTLY.

Our advice must not fall like a violent storm, bearing down and making those to droop whom it is meant to cherish and refresh. It must descend as the dew upon the tender herb, or like melting flakes of snow; the softer it falls, the longer it dwells upon and the deeper it sinks into the mind. If there are few who have the humility to receive advice as they ought, it is often because there are few who have the discretion to convey it by a proper vehicle, and to qualify the harshness and bitterness of reproof, against which nature is apt to revolt, by a mixture of sweetening and agreeable ingredients.

STORIES OF QUEEN WILHELMINA.

Queen Wilhelmina even as a child possessed inflexibility of will, and in those early days a consciousness that she would one day be Queen of the Netherlands. "I do not allow you to entertain your friends in my presence," she remarked to a lady-in-waiting, upon whom an acquaintance had called one day, when the Princess had attained the mature age of four. And later on, when she was about thirteen years of age, there was an amusing scene between the Queen Regent and her little daughter, arising out of a strong desire of the latter to be present at a banquet given in honour of the German Emperor. To all the pleadings of her daughter the Queen Regent turned a deaf ear, repeating that she was too young to attend a State ceremony, no matter of what description, and more especially a dinner. "You are too young, and must go to bed." As, however, the child-Queen persisted in her demands, and would take no denial, there remained for the Regent but one alternative—to herself conduct the recalcitrant young lady to her bedroom. This she did, but not without one final energetic protest from the disappointed Queen of the future. "I will go on the balcony and tell the Dutch people how you abuse their Queen!"

THINKING FOR ONESELF.

There is nothing which so adds to the treasures of the mind and increases its power as its own thinking. Learn to think for yourself. It is all very well to hear and to read the wisdom of others. But one should not let this take the place of one's own thought. Many persons are like cisterns, they are good to hold the thoughts of others. But when the time comes that they are forced to rely on themselves they have no power to do so. The outside supply is cut off and the cistern runs dry. But if one, like the river, is constantly fed by its own springs, then, as the learning of others comes to him, it unites with his own waters and the stream widens and deepens.

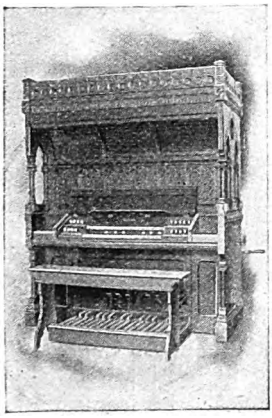
MAIDS OF HONOUR.

Some misapprehension seems to exist as regards the duties of Maids of Honour. These ladies "wait," two together, for a period of a month, three times a year. They have, of course, no menial duties to perform, but they are expected to be active, willing, very punctual, and entirely devoted to the Royal service. They are required to be discreet, and for ever silent concerning the private life and possible secrets of their Sovereign's Palace. There is an old story of a Maid of Honour who, being closely questioned on the daily doings of Royalty, refused any information, saying: "If I told you these things, I should be no longer a Maid—of honour." The "dressers" are just ordinary servants, holding exactly the same position, and fulfilling the same duties, as the lady's maid of everyday life.

The voids in our hearts and lives are often made for God's angels to stand in, for from the hard hands of the angel Experience we may take a purpose which makes life more worthy and beautiful than it might have been had our hearts and hopes not been broken to let her in.

Digitized by Google

Gregorian Church and Chapel Organs.



Style 23

The method of Tone-Production is radically different from all others.

SCIENTIFIC CONSTRUCTION does not signify increased expense, but rather reduced cost, for the results attained.

This is evidenced to a marvellous degree in the Gregorian, which has the characteristics of the pipe-organ, but is more compact in form.

The saving in the quantity of material admits of improvement in quality as well as reduction in cost.

The distinctive features are:

Tonal superiority,
Compactness of form in proportion to capacity.
Variety of Registration, and
Price.

Frederic Archer, the great organist, says:

"The Gregorian is in all respects the most perfect instrument of its kind extant. Its advent marks a new era in the art of organ manufacture."

Prices from 70 to 600 guineas.

Send for Catalogue A2 giving detailed description.

The ORCHESTRELLE COMPANY

225 Regent Street, London, W.

BROOME'S MUSIC.

*950-1-2 The Boys are Marching. T. Bonheur.
*953-4-5 Going to Table Bay. (Fantasia.) A. Macey
*992 Ladysmith March. Fabian Scott.
*993 Kimberley March. Fabian Scott.
*994 Mafeking March. Fabian Scott.
*995 Bloemfontein March. Fabian Scott.
*996 Pretoria March. Fabian Scott.
*997 Relief March. Fabian Scott.
*998-9-90 MARCH OF PEACE. d. Post Free, 7d.
*1001-2-3 " " " e. " "
*1004 When Tommy comes Marching Home Again. (March.) m. Noel Thayne.
1006 Go, Forget Me. (Song.) G. Berridge.
1007 'Neath the Cloisters (Recessional March.) m. Fabian Scott.
1008 Asiana. (An Oriental Danse.) Fabian Scott.
1009 Pigtail Polka. m. Fabian Scott.
*1010 When the Boys Come Marching Home. (March.) m. Theo. Bonheur.
1011-12-13 Blossoms. (Waltz.) m. Fabian Scott. Post Free, 7d.
1014-15-16 Suspense. " m. "
1017 Chinese March. Ezra Read.
1018 Pekin, Chinese Carnival. Ezra Read.
*1019-20-21 War on the China Sea m. (Descriptive Naval Fantasia.) Ezra Read. Post Free, 7d.
*1022-23-24 When the Boys come Marching Home. (Song.) By Theo. Bonheur. Post Free, 7d.
1025 Cock-a-Doodle. (Schottische.) m. C. Denton.
1026 Tearless Life. (Sacred Song.) Noel Thayne.
1027 The Old Barge. (Song.) W. H. Bennett.
1028 Won't yer let me kiss yer? (Coon Song.) W. H. Bennett.
1029 The Handy Man. (Naval Fantasia.) m. E. Read.
1030 Follow Your Leader. (Barn Dance.) F. Scott.
1031 Polish Dance. A. Strelegki.
1032 Spanish Dance. A. Strelegki.
1033 Bohemian Dance. A. Strelegki.
1034 Moment's Musical. A. Strelegki.
1035 Sleep Reverie. C. Neilson.
1036 Return of the Troops. A. Chambers.
1037 Sleep Baby Sleep. A. Berridge.

War Nos. 2D. each; By Post 3d., or Thirteen Copies sent flat, per Parcel Post, 2/6.

Buy of your Local Agent or W. H. BROOME, 15, Holborn, London, E.C.

SIXPENNY BOTTLES FREE.

Upon your returning us the wrapper from the first sixpenny bottle you purchase, together with this Advertisement from "The Temple Magazine," we will refund the sixpence it cost you.

If any difficulty in obtaining Fardons' Sauce, send us the name and address of your grocer and we will forward you a dainty tasting sample free.

Fardons' Vinegar Co., Limd., Birmingham.

Digitized by Google

"VETEDACEO"

(Registered),

THE GREAT AUSTRALIAN HERBAL REMEDY,

CURES

CONSUMPTION,
BRIGHT'S DISEASE,
LIVER COMPLAINT,
RHEUMATISM,
and all
BLOOD & SKIN DISEASES.

"VETEDACEO"

is made entirely from Herbs imported from and grown in Tasmania, and is absolutely free from poisonous Drugs or Chemicals of any kind, and can therefore be taken with perfect safety by the youngest infant or most delicate person, and has been given to an infant of two weeks old which developed skin disease, with satisfactory result.

As a TONIC for that Tired out and Run down feeling it is without an equal, while for graver and more complicated cases it has been most successful in the Australian Colonies.

"VETEDACEO"

stands alone as THE remedy for
JAUNDICE, NERVOUS DEBILITY,
POVERTY OF BLOOD, GALL STONES,
SCIATICA, CANCEROUS GROWTHS,
&c., &c.

Read the following:—

"Dec. 28th, 1899, Alma Road, Greaves, Lancaster.

"DEAR SIR,

"About eight years ago I became a subject to that fearful Complaint Rheumatism, and during that time tried various so-called remedies, all in vain, so thought I must go on suffering to the end, with sleepless nights. But reading of the many wonderful cures effected by taking 'VETEDACEO' I made up my mind to give it a trial, and am truly thankful to say, after taking 10 bottles, I am not only cured of Rheumatism, but better in general health, feeling quite ten years younger, and shall ever be glad to tell to those suffering the good 'VETEDACEO' has done me. I would answer any questions, accompanied with stamped envelope. You are at liberty to make what use you think proper of this.

"Yours very truly,

"(Signed) A. THORNTON."

Price 1/11, 2/9, and 4/- per bottle.

"VETEDACEO" is a Friend of the Suffering!
"VETEDACEO" gives back lost Health!
"VETEDACEO" is a Pure Herbal Remedy!

Compounded by a most skilful expert, the Proprietor, "VETEDACEO" is the world's Remedy, and should be in every home. Sold by all Chemists and Medicine Vendors. If any difficulty in obtaining it write to—

WEBBER'S VETEDACEO AGENCY,
Oswaldestre House, 34, Norfolk St., STRAND, W.C.

AN EVENING CAPE.

Although festivities are considerably curtailed on account of the mourning, still there is a large demand from all classes of folks, both rich and impecunious, for a useful model of a pretty evening cloak. A pretty cape such as the one shown in the sketch takes quite a small amount of material. Let the cape be the ordinary roundabout shape, and if the material used is a handsome one, let this cape be as little full as possible. To vary the ordinary roundabout monotony, try cutting up the lower edge of the cape into somewhat square tabs. These tabs should reach at least seven or eight inches from the lower edge. Then let the whole be outlined with a good black, white, or grey feather trimming. The lining of the cape should be as good as we can possibly afford, and should contrast happily with the colours already employed. If any doubt is felt in the matter a white lining is always safe. Among the best materials to employ for the making of a cape of the kind are a plain satin or bengaline, or a floral brocade. Of course, a grey foulé or cashmere can be employed, if preferred.

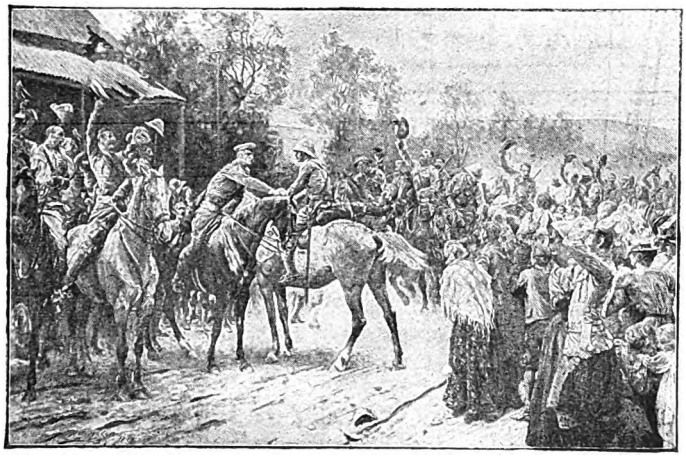
Digitized by Google

BOVRIL WAR PICTURE



"THE RELIEF OF LADYSMITH." [JOHN H. BACON.

A Magnificent Historic War Gravure, 28-in. by 18½-in., printed on fine Plate Paper, 40-in. by 30-in., free from advertising matter

FREE TO PURCHASERS OF BOVRIL IN BOTTLES.

In accordance with a plan, full particulars of which as well as Coupon, are given with every bottle.

The "Osman" Turkish Towels and Bath Mats.

OF ALL DRAPERS

Made by

BARLOW & JONES, Limited,

Manchester, London, & Bolton.

HOVIS

TRADE MARK.

The most tasty and appetising of all Breads. It makes every meal nicer.

Most Family Bakers supply it. Agents' Addresses are sent on application, and 3d. samples of Bread (1/- with Biscuits) on receipt of stamps by HOVIS LTD., Macclesfield.

Digitized by Google

WORLD - TRAVEL

Organised by

HENRY S. LUNN, M.D., B.Ch., F.R.G.S.,

W. HOLDSWORTH LUNN,

AND

CONNOP F. S. PEROWNE.

CRUISES

On the Magnificent Ocean Yacht, "ARGONAUT," Tonnage 3,254, H.P. 4,000. Electric Light. First-class Cuisine.

SAILING FROM Marseilles AS BELOW TO

April 24th.—Villefranche (for Nice, Monte Carlo, etc.) Naples, Palermo, Algiers, Gibraltar, Tangier, Lisbon, and Tilbury. A Twenty-one days' Cruise for 20 Guineas and upwards.

£10 10s. & £13 13s. TOURS TO ROME.

Extensions to Naples, Florence, Venice, the Italian Lakes, and the Riviera.

Tickets for Independent Travelling supplied to all parts, and Passages booked by all the principal Steamship Companies.

Full Particulars from the Secretary—5, ENDSLEIGH GARDENS, EUSTON, LONDON, N.W.

Newnes' Sixpenny Series of Copyright Works.

THE ROMANCE OF A MIDSHIPMAN.
186 pages. W. CLARK RUSSELL.

RODMAN THE BOATSTEERER.
154 pages. LOUIS BECKE.

MARCELLA.
312 pages. MRS. HUMPHRY WARD.

DEEDS THAT WON THE EMPIRE.
141 pages. W. H. FITCHETT ("Vedette").

STORIES FROM THE DIARY OF A DOCTOR. 188 pages. L. T. MEADE and CLIFFORD HALIFAX.

ENGLAND'S PERIL.
122 pages. WILLIAM LE QUEUX.

THE REPROACH OF ANNESLEY.
197 pages. MAXWELL GRAY.

THE SILENCE OF DEAN MAITLAND.
121 pages. MAXWELL GRAY.

ADVENTURES OF SHERLOCK HOLMES.
158 pages. A. CONAN DOYLE.

MEMOIRS OF SHERLOCK HOLMES.
157 pages. A. CONAN DOYLE.

THE SIGN OF FOUR.
124 pages. A. CONAN DOYLE.

THE EXPLOITS OF BRIGADIER GERARD. 124 pages. A. CONAN DOYLE.

THE IMPREGNABLE ROCK OF HOLY SCRIPTURE. 120 pages. Late W. E. GLADSTONE.

WHAT'S BRED IN THE BONE.
186 pages. GRANT ALLEN.

JESS: A STORY OF THE LAST BOER WAR. 192 pages. H. RIDER HAGGARD.

SHE: A HISTORY OF ADVENTURE.
190 pages. H. RIDER HAGGARD.

ROBERT ELSMERE.
317 pages. MRS. HUMPHRY WARD.

THE HISTORY OF DAVID GRIEVE.
324 pages. MRS. HUMPHRY WARD.

SHIPS THAT PASS IN THE NIGHT.
128 pages. BEATRICE HARRADEN.

A YANKEE BOY'S SUCCESS.
124 pages. H. S. MORRISON.

FIGHTS FOR THE FLAG.
158 pages. W. H. FITCHETT.

THE HERB-MOON.
126 pages. JOHN OLIVER HOBBES.

IN PREPARATION.

MALCOLM. By GEORGE MACDONALD. | A WILD PROXY. By MRS. CLIFFORD.

GEORGE NEWNES, 7 to 12, Southampton Street, Strand, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Christ's College,

BLACKHEATH, S.E.

PRINCIPAL—

F. W. AVELING, M.A., B.Sc.

Home Comforts.
Public School Training.
Practical Science Teaching.
Five Laboratories.

Ashville College,

HARROGATE.

TERMS:

January, May, and September

FEES:

£45 and £50 INCLUSIVE.

Illustrated Prospectus from

JOHN BOWICK, Esq., M.A., LL.D.,
Headmaster; or
Rev. JOHN MOORE, "Denehurst,"
12, Baker Street, NOTTINGHAM.

GRESHAM'S SCHOOL, HOLT, NORFOLK.

Headmaster—G. W. S. HOWSON, M.A. (late of Uppingham School). Founded 1555.

Three miles from the sea and close to Sheringham and Cromer. Splendid Climate. The soil is gravel on chalk. Entirely new drainage.

GOVERNORS: The Fishmongers' Company and County and Local Representatives.

Classrooms, Laboratories, and Workshops are in course of erection, at an estimated expenditure of £40,000.

HIGHEST INCLUSIVE FEES, £57 PER ANNUM.

Science and Modern Languages taught throughout the School.

Yearly leaving Exhibitions of £60 per annum for three years.

For further particulars address the Headmaster.

DALTON HALL, . .

Victoria Park, MANCHESTER.

A HALL OF RESIDENCE AND PRIVATE TUITION, OFFICIALLY LICENSED BY THE OWENS COLLEGE.

The Hall provides oversight and tuition, and the social advantages of college life to students at Owens. It contains Dining Hall, Library, Class Room, Billiard Room, Common Room, Workshop, and forty-three Studies. Careful sanitation. Electric light. Three acres of ground. Tuition by specialists in Mathematics, Classics, English, Physics, Chemistry, Engineering, Anatomy and Pathology.

It is the property of the Society of Friends and is managed by them on carefully unsectarian lines.

Hall Fee, £90 a Year.

Apply to JOHN W. GRAHAM, M.A.,
Principal.

Digitized by Google

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS.

ECCENTRICITIES OF GENIUS: Memories of Famous Men and Women of the Platform and the Stage. By MAJOR J. B. POND. With 91 Portraits. Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 12s.

MAX THORNTON. By ERNEST GLANVILLE, Author of "The Golden Rock." With 8 Illustrations by JAS. SHAW CROMPTON, R.I. Large crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

THE BLUE DIAMOND. By L. T. MEADE, Author of "The Voice of the Charmer," "An Adventuress," etc. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

A PATH OF THORNS. By ERNEST A. VIZETELLY, Author of "With Zola in England," etc. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

THE LESSER EVIL. By IZA DUFFUS HARDY, Author of "A Buried Sin," etc. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

A MISSING HERO. By Mrs. ALEXANDER' Author of "The Wooing o't." Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s'

GERMINAL; or, Master and Man. By EMILE ZOLA, Author of "The Downfall," etc. Edited, with an Introduction, by ERNEST A. VIZETELLY. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE MAN THAT CORRUPTED HADLEYBURG. By MARK TWAIN. With a Frontispiece by LUCIUS HITCHCOCK. THIRD EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

THE FOURTH GENERATION. By SIR WALTER BESANT, Author of "The Orange Girl," etc. THIRD EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

THE INIMITABLE MRS. MASSINGHAM: A Romance of Botany Bay. By HERBERT COMPTON. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"AS A WATCH IN THE NIGHT": a Drama of Waking and Dream. By Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED, Author of "Madame Izan," etc. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

PHILIP WINWOOD. By ROBERT NEILSON STEPHENS. With 6 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

THE "PRETTY POLLY": a Voyage of Incident. By W. CLARK RUSSELL. With 12 Illustrations by G. E. ROBERTSON. Large crown 8vo, cloth, gilt edges, 5s.

THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH. By CHARLES READE. A LARGE-TYPE FINE PAPER EDITION. Post 8vo, cloth, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net.

HANDLEY CROSS; or, Mr. Jorrocks's Hunt. By ROBERT SURTEES, Author of "Mr. Sponge's Sporting Tour." With 79 Illustrations by JOHN LEECH. A NEW EDITION. Post 8vo, cloth, 2s.

A HISTORY OF OUR OWN TIMES, from 1880 to the Diamond Jubilee. By JUSTIN MCCARTHY. A NEW EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

IN THE SOUTH SEAS. By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 6s.

LONDON MEMORIES: Social, Historical, and Topographical. By C. W. HECKETHORN, Author of "London Souvenirs," etc. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

TO ASTHMA SUFFERERS.

IMMEDIATE RELIEF in all cases of ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, CROUP, and WHOOPING COUGH is gained by the use of

POTTER'S DATURA ASTHMA CURE.

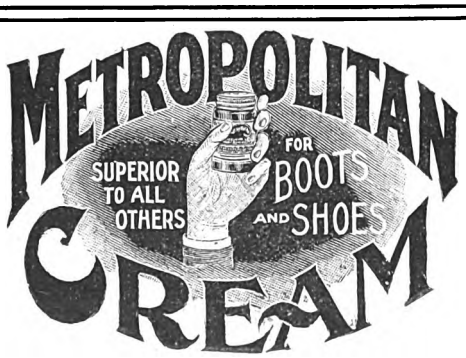
Sold by all Chemists and Herbalists, in Tins at 1s. each Free Sample sent on receipt of Post Card to POTTER AND CLARKE, Artillery Lane, London, E.

TO ADVERTISERS.

All communications respecting Advertisements for this Magazine must be addressed to

Messrs. H. DAWSON & Co.,

34, NORFOLK ST., STRAND, LONDON, W.C.



W. CLARK, 528, Oxford St., London, W.
(Near the Marble Arch).

Never Fails.

Established
26 YEARS.

Have you a Cough?
A DOSE WILL RELIEVE IT.
Have you a Cold?
A DOSE at BEDTIME WILL REMOVE IT.

WHEN YOU ASK FOR

Owbridge's Lung Tonic

BE SURE YOU GET IT.

Try it also for
Bronchitis, Whooping-Cough, Asthma, Consumption.

Prepared by
W. T. OWBRIDGE, Chemist, Hull.
Sold everywhere
in bottles, at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s.

COPYRIGHT.

Digitized by Google

HELPFUL BOOKS.

By J. A. CLAPPERTON, M.A.

HOW TO ATTAIN FELLOWSHIP WITH GOD.

By the Author of "Methods of Soul Culture," &c. Fcap. 8vo, cloth gilt, 1s. 6d.

"Concise, pointed, illustrative, suggestive."—Friend. "A small book of great value."—Christian.
"The author avoids unhealthy introspection and the mysticism which is too frequently the leading feature of works on personal holiness.'
—English Churchman.

By J. D. JONES, M.A. of Bournemouth.

THE WAY INTO THE KINGDOM;

Fcap, 8vo, cloth gilt, 1s. 6d. OR, THOUGHTS ON THE BEATITUDES.

"Fresh, cultured, earnest, practical."—Life of Faith.

By J. H. JOWETT, M.A.

MEDITATIONS FOR QUIET MOMENTS.

By the Rev. J. H JOWETT, M.A., of Carr's Lane, Birmingham. 1s. 6d. cloth boards.

"There is nothing abstruse, the argument being lucid and attractive."—Christian Leader.
"Mr. Jowett writes with reverence, with grace, and with power."—Life of Faith..

By Dr. LANDELS.

UNTIL THE DAY BREAK.

By WILLIAM LANDELS, D.D.

Small crown 8vo, printed on antique paper, cloth gilt, gilt top, 2s. 6d.

"They reveal that simple dignity and elevation of thought which characterised Dr. Landels' preaching."—Edinburgh Evening News.
"Their purpose is 'to comfort mourners, whatever may be the cause of their distress,' and it may be said that they will do this with a tender simplicity."—Glasgow Herald.

Published by THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, INCORPORATED, 56, Paternoster Row, London.

Buyers and Sellers.

Our business is to introduce buyers to sellers.

We have been engaged in doing this successfully for many years. Our friends admit that the results of our efforts on their behalf have been a large accession of buyers for their goods. They say, in short, that they are better off to-day than they were when first they made our acquaintance.

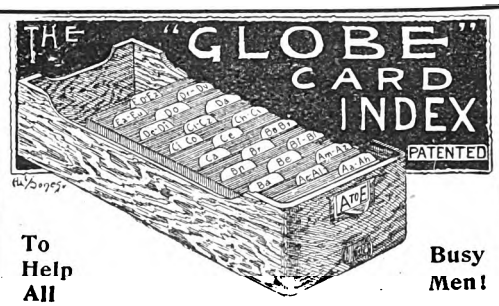
We should like you to be in their position. If you have an article of merit that people want, we should be glad to discuss with you our system of creating a demand for it by means of advertising, &c. It saves our client's time, worry, and money.

The advertiser has a greater opportunity of selling his goods than a non-advertiser.

H. DAWSON & CO.,

34, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google



To Help All — Busy Men!

Will make a poor business good—a good business better. The GLOBE CARD INDEX reduces guesses to facts — estimates to certainties. Profits increased! Expenses and trouble decreased!! Call to have system explained, or if you cannot call, send for Illustrated Explanatory No. 92 Catalogue, free to Readers of "Temple Magazine."

SUCCESS IN 1901

greatly assisted by our various Time-Saving Devices for Office and Library use.

ROLL-TOP DESKS, ELASTIC BOOKCASES,
FILING CABINETS, TILTING CHAIRS, &c.

THOS. TURNER (Leicester), Ltd.,
44, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.,
Birmingham, Leicester, and Bradford.

WHAT IS NORMAN AND STACEY'S PLAN OF FURNISHING?

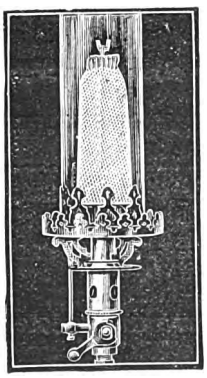
IT is a clever scheme now known and adopted in all parts of the English-speaking world, which enables you to furnish your house or flat throughout from drawing-room to kitchen (even to the extent of linens, silver, cutlery, blinds, etc.) out of income without disturbing your capital, by (instead of paying cash) dividing the whole amount into 6, 12, 24, or 36 equal monthly payments. During the above-mentioned period you can, of course, at any time (should you wish it) pay off the amount, and avail yourself of the cash discount.

NORMAN & STACEY, LTD.,
118, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C.

All goods marked in plain figures.
Country orders receive special attention.
Free delivery and inspection solicited. A beautiful catalogue in colours is given upon personal application.
N.B.—In 1894 we originated the Free Life Insurance System of furnishing.

Beware of Imitators.

You Simply turn on the Gas! the Self-Lighter ignites it.



Matches or Tapers Unnecessary.

The Gas Self-Lighter is a valuable patent that not only dispenses with the use of matches or tapers for lighting gas jets, but saves the expense of the gas consumed in the continuous light attendant upon a bye-pass jet.

Remit 3/- for sample, or send for List giving full particulars.

THE GAS SELF-LIGHTING Co., Ltd., 130, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.

Telegrams: "Spongelet, London." Telephone: No. 5206 Bank.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS FOR MARCH, 1901.

			PAGE
I.	Waiting for the Bride		Frontispiece
II.	A Chat with John Strange Winter. Illustrated.	A. Frederic White	471
III.	The Lost Bridegroom. Illustrated.	Sydney Watson	475
IV.	My First Sermon	Rev. Arnold Thomas	483
V.	Treasures in the Gutter: Louis Paulian and the Rag-Pickers. Illustrated.	Ward Muir	484
VI.	Do the Churches Want Money?	Silas K. Hocking	491
VII.	Some Anglican Sisterhoods and Their Homes. Illustrated.	Annie Goodenough Pike	493
VIII.	John Ardeshir's Coat. Illustrated by James Durden.	Sydney Travers	501
IX.	A Dutch Colony in England. Illustrated with Photographs by C. Constable, M.A.	M. Randal Roberts	509
X.	In the Time of Her Wealth. Illustrated.	Ellen A. Smith	514
XI.	In the Public Eye. Illustrated.	The Onlooker	523
XII.	Sacred Places Put to Secular Purposes. Illustrated.	Thekla Bowser	533
XIII.	A Bolt from the Blue. Serial Story. Chapters XXI.-XXIII. (Concluded.) Illustrated by Chas. D. Ward.	Dora Langlois	539
XIV.	Common Sense for Mothers and Nurses	Dr. Julia Holmes Smith	555
XV.	Wesley College, Sheffield. Illustrated.	A. P. Easton	558
XVI.	For the Bairns	Rev. J. Reid Howatt	562

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All manuscripts and drawings must be accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes, or the Editor cannot promise their return. They must be addressed, THE EDITOR, "TEMPLE MAGAZINE," WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, CARMELITE STREET, E.C.

Contributions accepted for "In the Public Eye," are paid for at the uniform rate of 5/- per paragraph including portrait. All photographs, which must be non-copyright, are returned.

Business Communications and Orders must be sent to. MESSRS. HORACE MARSHALL AND SON, TEMPLE HOUSE, TEMPLE AVENUE, E.C.

Letters relating to Advertisements must be addressed to MESSRS. H. DAWSON AND CO., 34, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, W.C.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE will be sent by post each month, to any address, for an Annual Subscription of 8s. Binding Cases can be purchased from the Publishers for 1s. 6d.

THOMAS TURNER & CO. MAKE THEIR OWN STEEL.

ENCORE RAZOR

Hand Forged. Extra Hollow Ground. Carefully Set. Guaranteed Perfect. See "Encore" on Shank.

IVORY ... 6s. 6d. | BLACK ... 4s. 6d.

Send for Free List of Cases. From all Dealers, or write direct to Makers—

T. TURNER & Co., Suffolk Works, SHEFFIELD,

who will supply through nearest agent.

Ask for "Encore" Pocket and Table Cutlery.

The only

GOLD MEDAL

Awarded for Milk-Chocolate at the Paris Exhibition, 1900, was gained by

PETER'S

MILK-CHOCOLATE,

The Original and Best.

Sold by all Confectioners and Grocers.

Sole Agents (trade only), S. J. MACKENZIE & Co., LTD., LONDON, E.

Digitized by Google

The Romantic and Tragic Story of the Tower of London, and of those who have lived and suffered within its walls.

Messrs. CASSELL & COMPANY are publishing in Monthly Parts a New Issue of the Great Work, which deals in a fascinating manner with this historic Pile, under the title of Her Majesty's Tower.

Part I is now ready, price 6d.

The Text is written by HEPWORTH DIXON, whilst a

New Introduction is contributed by W. J. LOFTIE, F.S.A., thus bringing the work up-to-date.

A Series of Beautiful Coloured Illustrations has been prepared for this issue.

(To be completed in 16 Monthly Parts.)

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED, Ludgate Hill, London.

By far the Best and Fullest Popular Account, not only of the Private Life of Queen Victoria, but of the Stirring Events of Her Long and Glorious Reign, will be found in

The Life and Times of QUEEN VICTORIA, of which a New Serial Issue is now commencing in Weekly Parts, 6d. net, brought down to the close of the Reign.

The Work includes a Special Memoir by Mrs. OLIPHANT, who had the advantage of personal knowledge of Her Majesty. It is profusely Illustrated throughout, and contains a Series of Splendid Rembrandt Photogravure Plates.

With Part 1 is presented a Beautiful Rembrandt Photogravure Portrait of QUEEN VICTORIA (size 17 in. by 14 in.).

Five Large Editions of Part 1 already exhausted. Parts 1 to 3 now on Sale at all Booksellers.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED, Ludgate Hill, London.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

A CHAT WITH JOHN STRANGE WINTER.

By A. FREDERIC WHITE.

TO pass from the dark murky streets on a dull winter's day to the cheerfulness and warmth of an English fireside is a contrast so pleasant to our insular ideas that we would not exchange it even for perpetual sunshine.

So I thought as I found myself in the cosy drawing-room of that delightful novelist, Mrs. Arthur Stannard, who, under the pseudonym of "John Strange Winter," has endeared herself to so many hearts by her buoyant and cheery fiction, which always has a true ring, and in whose own life, as well as in her books, there is so much to appeal to the sympathies of the home-loving Englishman.

Like another famous woman in a different sphere, the late Madam Patey, Mrs. Stannard is as great in the domestic circle as she is as an artist.

MRS. STANNARD AND HER SECOND DAUGHTER, "VIOLET MIGNON."
Photograph by Alfred Ellis & Walery, 51, Baker Street, W.

She is perfectly happy in her home life, and never allows her literary work to encroach unduly on her duties as a wife and mother.

After the necessary amount of "copy" has been reeled off, with what facility her stenographer can testify, she throws bookish cares aside, and there is nothing in which she so much delights as to spend a quiet evening by her own fireside with husband and children.

At four o'clock Mrs. Stannard was still engaged upon her latest novel, but shortly after entered and gave me a cordial greeting; and as soon as the grateful steam had begun to ascend from the freshly-filled teacups, I asked my hostess what form her latest literary efforts were to take.

"Just now," she said, "I am engaged upon writing a serial story for the Echo. It will be published in daily instalments. The idea of daily serial publication has always been a favorite one with me, and I am very glad to have an opportunity of testing it myself.

Digitized by Google

"You see there are so many people in England who live narrow lives—people with absolutely fixed incomes, where every farthing counts.

"I think that the majority of these cannot afford to subscribe to a library, and perhaps there may not be a free library anywhere near.

"The man, of course, has his newspaper, but many women care nothing about newspapers, and so the husband does not trouble to bring them home. Women are very unselfish and you seldom find one in the circumstances of which I am speaking buying a woman's paper for herself.

"I think if it became the custom to run serials in the daily papers there would be something for both husband and wife to read, and the paper would not be left in the train so often as is now the case.

"Another new undertaking of mine," continued Mrs. Stannard, her expressive eyes sparkling with enthusiasm, "is play-writing.

"You can't imagine how delightful it is to have an entirely new field in which to work. I have been writing novels for years and years until it has become almost a habit to me, but in this new branch I shall begin all over again with new ideas and other methods.

"Of course there is a great deal to be learnt in the art, but I think I have overcome the technical difficulties now. Some years ago I wrote a play, the idea of which was pronounced very good by competent judges, though they pointed out several faults of detail."

"Why don't you recast it?"

"Because I have better stuff here," replied Mrs. Stannard significantly, tapping her forehead.

"As to the influence of the stage, I think, on the whole, it is for good. Of course there is much that I should like to see removed; but I feel sure that plays are an education to people who seldom read. They make no great demands on the attention, and no time is lost in describing dresses and scenes; you see it all before you. In my novels I never allow much space to description, it spoils the interest; nobody cares for a minute description of personal appearance and dress in a novel, not even women. What we want on the stage are plays which will amuse, fresh breezy plays, not overweighted with moral, but such as bring out a certain nobility of character. It has been too often the custom to laugh with vice and sneer at virtue. But vice is not the only thing that is attractive even from the artistic standpoint; there is a great attraction in goodness.

"I don't care for the fashion in plays obtaining just now. I think the stage can be made a tremendous teacher; but that is not quite its raison d'être.

"It is a great mistake to force the moral too rigidly, both in books and plays.

"I have two plays nearly ready, and my aim is the same as in my novels, to make them as bright, cheery, and wholesome as I can, containing nothing but what any young girl may read or listen to, yet striking some note of real human passion or sentiment. Humanity and wholesomeness are—to my mind—the most desirable characteristics of all artistic work.

"My ideal play? Well, I think the most beautiful plays I ever saw, and which have held in my memory longest are 'David Garrick,' 'Lord and Lady Algy,' 'Sweet Lavender,' and 'Pantomime Rehearsal.'"

I had come to interview Mrs. Stannard on a subject which has not transpired, and which will not do so, for upon it the gifted authoress protested she had no ideas to offer. She contended that it was supremely ridiculous for people who were made the subjects of interviews to offer opinions on topics in which they took little interest and had no expert knowledge.

"I know nothing of anything but pots," she broke out with a sudden flash.

"Well tell me something about pots," I said, and in response she showed me her fine collection of china and curios. Not a collection that you could buy up for yourself in the first second-hand dealer's shop, but one that is the delight of the genuine curio lover, and the result of years of patient devotion to this fascinating hobby.

There were wonderful little portraits painted on ivory which, when bought, were so defaced with ill-usage and neglect that the untrained eye would have passed them by. A beautiful box of finest Japanese lacquer also caught my eye. This had been originally so encrusted with dirt that the pattern had disappeared, but the superior make of the box at once suggested to Mrs. Stannard that it was not a common article, and buying up this treasure for a few pence, she was delighted to find her anticipations realised, after a careful application of salad oil, which disclosed no fewer than seventeen dainty paintings under the dirt.

Digitized by Google

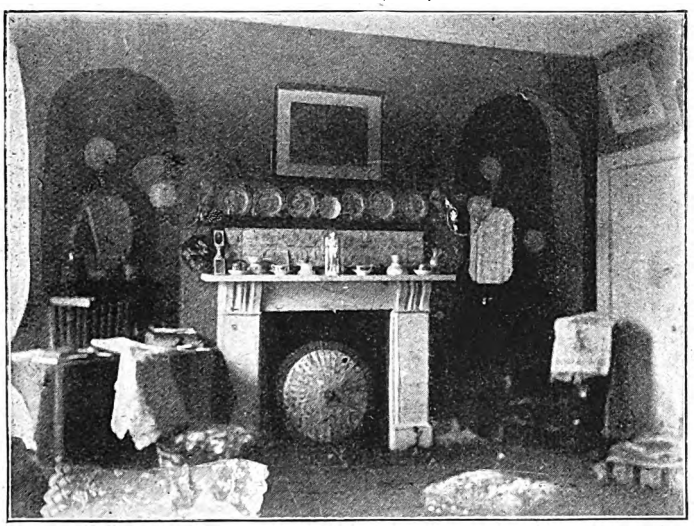
Then there is a splendid set of real Worcester china, this being a family heirloom; a fine collection of old blue Spode ware, not the feeble imitations of these degenerate days, but massive pieces of crockery, off which our forefathers loved to feast.



THE ROOM IN WHICH JOHN STRANGE WINTER WROTE "BOOTLES' BABY," HER FIRST FAMOUS NOVEL.

There is also a good deal of blue of various kinds—Nankin, Delft, Worcester, etc.—some good Chelsea, several very old Satsuma bowls, and some valuable pieces of glass (including an altar ewer 600 years old). Another very interesting possession is a set of old Dutch tiles, 300 years old, bearing pictures of Bible incidents, which Mrs. Stannard has identified, though the vagaries of the artistic mind made this no easy task.

Mrs. Stannard often attends auction sales at Dieppe (where she still retains her house for holiday use), and the many beautiful knick-knacks which she has picked up, often for a mere song, are testimonies to her success as a curio hunter. Among them I noticed a wonderful old fan, a tea service of great beauty and value, some fine old prints, and various ivory and silver treasures.

"The author of which I think most highly is Charles Reade," said Mrs. Stannard, in reply to my question, "and Henry Kingsley is another great favourite, his writing is so instinct with vitality; and, of course, I love Dickens. He was my first love in the way of novelists.

"I will tell you an anecdote I have never related before:—

"When I was six years old my elder brother had a fearful illness, which lasted many weeks. They always read to him all day long; and I remember especially that they were reading 'Barnaby Rudge.'

"I was six years younger than my brother, and as there was nobody for me to play with in our rambling old house I would not stay downstairs alone, but used to creep up into his room.

"I would listen to them going through 'Barnaby Rudge,' and the minute my brother went to sleep they used to sink their voices into a murmur, and shortly after cease altogether. Then I would get possession of the book and go on reading where they had left off, so that when they commenced next time I was miles ahead.

"I was only six years old then, and I had read 'Dombey' before that."

Mr. Arthur Stannard is as thoroughly kind and genial as his gifted wife, of whom he is very proud. She owes him a great debt, as he has relieved her entirely of the business worries connected with the publication of a book when the author's literary work is done.

He arranges all these details, and the marvellous fertility of production which has characterised her literary career, and enabled her to send out more than seventy novels, besides innumerable short stories, is due in no small measure to this fact.

Digitized by Google

Mr. and Mrs. Stannard have four children, three girls and a boy, and the great ambition of the latter is to be a journalist.

Mrs. Stannard was very quaint about her children, and confessed that she was often amused at the utter rubbish written about them and her from time to time.

"My kiddies are quick and good and bright," she said, "but there is nothing abnormal about them—it would be a great trouble to us if there were. I think that is one of the penalties of being well-known—one has so many injudicious friends, and among them they do make one out such an idiot. I was described in a paper the other day as having brought my boy up from his birth to do exactly as he likes! If I had, he would have been in his grave long since."

MISS AUDREY STANNARD, THE NOVELIST'S ELDEST DAUGHTER.

All the children are remarkably quick-witted, and the youngest little girl, as soon as she had been brought down from the nursery, and the ceremony of introduction had been gone through, quickly turned the occasion to her own advantage, and with story-book in hand, sought her mother's knee, and coaxed her into reading out a tale.

"Do you ever tell your children stories of your own?"

"Not very often. I did commence telling them one some time ago, but never finished it, and the children have been carrying it on by themselves in chapters ever since."

"You do not write soldier stories so much now?"

"No; but you would not believe what a trouble I have had to get away from them. Once you make a name with a certain kind of story, the public will scarcely allow you to write anything else.

"Another curious experience that I have had is that my best books have not always had the most recognition, but I suppose there has been something in the others which has just taken the public fancy."

"Do you make many alterations in composing your novels, or can you hit it off the first time?'"

"No, I never alter what is once written. I dictate to my stenographer, who afterwards types out her notes.

"All the alteration I do is while dictating, when, if a word or sentence does not please me, I change it. This only refers to my novels; of course, in writing plays, I am not so much at home, and I have to spend more time and care on them."

Here my talk with John Strange Winter came to an end, and fearing I might have made too long a stay, I commenced to murmur an apology, which was cut short by the cheery voice of my hostess:

"We are always glad to see interviewers," she said heartily, "and we don't refer to you as 'those horrid people.'"

A. FREDERIC WHITE.

Digitized by Google

THE LOST BRIDEGROOM.

By SYDNEY WATSON.

Author of "Jack Tremblett's Fairy," "The Sea Chimes," etc.

I.

GEORGE HENDERSON, sitting alone in his private office, glances up at the clock as it chimes the half-hour after two. He smiles as he murmurs to himself:

"In another hour I shall have finished; then hey ho! away to Marion!"

His mental mention of his fiancée's name was sufficient to stop his working, while he rhapsodised for a moment or two. Not that the man was given to spooning, only he happened to be human, and very much in love.

"Ah, Marion, my darling!" he murmured; "tenderest, sweetest of women, how came it to pass that among all who have sought you I should come to be the one upon whom your choice fell?"

For a smart, good-looking fellow, well-to-do and prosperous, it will be seen that George Henderson had a considerable streak of humility in his composition. He was a fairly tall man; dark rather than fair; with a face above the average for good looks and intelligence; an eye that was at once keen and kind; his hair was a very dark chestnut, his long well-kept moustache the same colour. He was nearly forty years of age, but did not look a day over thirty.

Just when we find him alone, soliloquising, he is sitting without waistcoat or coat—for the heat in London is intense; a ten-inch crimson silk band about his waist obviates the need of braces, and his wide shirt cuffs are unfastened, laid back, and held in position with a patent clip to the fuller sleeve, just below the elbow. All this negligé has been adopted to obtain the maximum of coolness amid the abnormal heat of an almost tropical season.

Just for a moment longer he indulges in soliloquy, murmuring: "And to think that this time to-morrow Marion will be all my own, will bear my name, and will start away to wander with me for a month over all the loveliest spots of Europe, and——"

He glanced swiftly at the clock, checked his foolish heart in its love talk, and with a happy, satisfied smile, settled down to work again, for he had many little items of business correspondence to clear up before leaving London, since he was to be married next day and start for a calendar month of honeymoon.

Several times during the next three-quarters of an hour he pressed his left hand tightly to his forehead, while his right hand raced across the various letter sheets he filled.

He was very much overwrought in brain, consequent upon months of overwork and not a little anxiety.

Suddenly he paused in his writing, gave vent to a low, sharp note of pain, lifted his hand to his head, and dropped his pen.

The expression of sharp pain passed away quickly from his face, and a weary, vacant look crept into it. He lifted his head high, turned it on one side in a listening attitude, then smiled.

The smile was a different thing to that which had filled his face an hour ago, when he mused upon his coming marriage; this new smile was almost idiotic.

In his ears there was sounding a drumming, singing noise, but above the drumming and singing he heard a voice calling him by name. The vacant smile spread over all his face, as he rose to his feet, the voice calling his name still sounding in his ears.

Digitized by Google

Turning to the wide hat and clothes rail, he took down a comparatively shabby coat; he had not worn it for a year, and it had a greeny look from the accumulated dust that was upon it. There was an old soft felt Colonial hat hanging upon the peg above that from which he took the coat. He took down the hat, and donning both it and the coat, he stood still a moment, with the same listening pose of the head that had marked his conduct a moment or two before.

The calling was sounding again in his ears, and with the poor, weak smile that seemed now almost a part of his face, he said softly: "I am coming."

Slowly he passed out of his own and through the outer office. Here a dozen or more clerks, waistcoatless like their master, sat driving their steel bars as well as the suffocating day would permit them.

A low, little more than whispered, exclamation of surprise from one of them caused every eye to glance towards the master. He took no notice of any of them, ignored the questioning look of Hackett, his chief clerk, and with a dreary eye and vacant grin he passed out into the street.

II.

Nina Dupuis stood at her long white-twill-covered table, busy ironing. She spent her life at this occupation, for she was accounted the best hand at getting up fine linen in all the old picturesque city of Quebec; as a consequence of which she never touched any but the very choicest work, and commanded remarkable prices for her deft handiwork.

Her back was to the open door of her ironing-room, which looked out and down upon a view as quaint as it was picturesque. Her little house was upon one of the heights, from which could be caught glimpses of the dark flowing waters of the mighty St. Lawrence, into whose depths the Canadian lakes poured their floods, seeking consort of the river to the great Atlantic. The lovely Isle of Orleans, with its simple cots and its vivid green meadows, beyond the river; the peaked roofs of the quaint old church of Notre Dame des Victoires; the University, and many other massive buildings, together with whole herds of tinned roofs, that flashed in the light of the evening sun; of tapering spires; of black and gilded crosses: of narrow, winding streets and high, narrow, quaint houses; of Frenchy folk galore, with nuns and priests in saintly and sombre garb—these things, with a never-ending view of rocky heights, and precipitous, zigzag stone stairways to houses and streets, were what Nina could always see from her ironing-room door. Not that she ever looked at the scene, or thought of any part of it, save only as it might at times connect itself with the one topic which alone filled her mind—her lost lover.

When Nina was eighteen—she is thirty now, though still young and fresh-looking, and very pretty—she had had an accident while walking on the river bank one evening. A part of the bank gave way, she was too near the edge, and in a moment she was struggling in the water, and in imminent danger of drowning. At this critical juncture a young man some distance above her, hearing her cry, sprang downwards swiftly and surely as some chamois, and leaping into the rolling stream, rescued her.

When she had recovered herself sufficiently to speak, she was naturally profuse in her thanks, ; then, as she was still very shaky from her recent shock, she accepted the help of her rescuer's arm, and thus her acquaintance with Paul George began. It seemed a case of mutual love at first sight; certainly she loved him, with a love that came to be, as time went on, a species of idolatry.

He was a clerk in one of the wharf stores, he said, and she, of course, believed him, though she never knew exactly where he was employed. For six weeks every day he visited her, and they began to arrange for their marriage.

Then one day he did not come, and Nina learnt, for the first time in her life, how Time's slow wheels could torture.

She sat up until midnight, ever hoping that he would come; then when she went to bed she could not sleep, and her pillow was wet with her tears.

The post in the morning brought her a warmly-worded, hurriedly-written letter, saying that his principals had sent him

Digitized by Google

suddenly to England on important business; that he had no time to do more than scribble a line before the ship sailed, but that he would write her fully when he arrived.

That was the last she ever heard of him, and that was twelve years ago She had tried, but could never learn anything about him in the city below, and no one in any of the offices on the wharves knew anyone of the name of Paul George.

Nina grieved for two years with a grief so great that she became at last very ill; then, when convalescence came, and she faced her old life of waiting again, she grew more patient, more philosophical—more stoical we had almost written; only that she was not stoical, for her poor tender heart ever yearned with an unutterable longing for the return of her lover.

WHILE DONNING A SHABBY COAT, HE STOOD FOR A MOMENT IN A LISTENING ATTITUDE.

Like Evangeline, she believed that her absent one lived, and would return. It is not given to every woman to possess such unshaken faith and constancy to a missing lover, and Nina Dupuis was rich in that her heart held the man she loved beyond all reproach. Why he had not returned, why he had not written, she did not know; enough for her that she believed him still true to her. Such a conclusion was not after the logic of the world; it was the groundless logic of a great love.

When other suiters came—and Nina was too pretty not to have suitors by the score—she had no words of encouragement, scarce even fair speech, for them.

While her hot iron passes swiftly over the snowy linen to-day, her thoughts, tinged with their usual hope, go back again to Paul George. She finishes the last frill of the dainty garment she is ironing, and turns to hang it across the wire line. Her eyes travel through the door to the street, when, with a low cry, she pauses, with the linen piece held in her hands, and stands as though transfixed, staring at the figure of a man who is passing by on the opposite side of the street. The man's head is bent; his eyes are upon the ground as he walks; there is a general droop in his whole pose. Over his round shoulders is swung a bag of carpenter's tools.

Another moment, and he has passed from her line of vision. Racing to the threshold, she watches to see if he will turn his head, if he will look back; but he does not, and in an instant she conceives the notion of following him, for her heart assures her that this sad-faced carpenter is her long-lost lover.

Digitized by Google

A bare minute is occupied in casting off her apron, putting on her hat, and locking her door ; then she speeds on swift foot after the slow-moving mechanic. She is soon within three yards of him ; then, slackening her pace in accommodation to his, she follows on behind him.

Half a mile away, in a kind of crevice of the rock, there is a quaint-built and very old wooden building—a hybrid structure, part house and part workshop. The man with the tools paused before the place, and taking a key from his pocket, opened the door and passed inside.

From where she stood watching Nina could see that the room he entered was a workshop, and over the doorway was a painted board, bearing this legend : "Paul, Carpenter and Joiner. Odd jobs performed at reasonable charges."

THE YOUNG MAN SPRANG SWIFTLY AS A CHAMOIS, AND RESCUED HER FROM HER PERILOUS PLIGHT.

"Paul!" she gasped, as she read the name ; "I was sure it was he."

When he passed through the door he had left it wide open behind him, and Nina, watching him with feverish, restless eagerness, sees him drop into a half-finished chair, rest his left elbow on his knee, and cup his chin in the upturned palm of his hand, his whole attitude suggestive of profound thought, wedded to an utter weariness.

With an uncontrollable impulse Nina, with soft, swift steps, swept across the intervening space, crossed the threshold, flung herself upon her knees among the shavings at his feet, and looking upward into his dark eyes, cried : "Paul, Paul ! O my love, my love !"

As she had swept before him and dropped at his feet, he had lifted his face and gazed at her. Now, as her voice fell upon his ears, he smiled upon her, stroked back her beautiful hair with the fingers of his two hands—the nails were red, and enamelled with French polish—while a look, as of some sudden awakening intelligence, passed into his face, and he whispered : "Nina."

With a burst of tears she wreathed her arms about his neck, and sobbed :

"O Paul, my love, my love ! Why did you not come to me ?"

He rose to his feet, lifting her with him, drew her into his arms and kissed her passionately. Utterly overcome now by the sudden shock of joy, she buried her face in his breast and sobbed aloud. Gazing down upon her bowed figure, a strange perplexity filled his face, which increased rather than diminished. When the violence of the storm of her weeping had passed, Nina looked up, and began mildly to upbraid him, crying :

"How could you leave me, Paul, through all this time, and never let me hear from you? Where have you been? And why did you pass my door just now, and never, never, never once look up ?"

With a vacant stare at her, he said, in a timid, apologetic, questioning voice, as though he did not understand her meaning :

"Long? Have I been away long ?"

He sighed heavily, caressed her face with his fingers, and with an increased perplexity he said : "Where have I been ? I have been ill, I think ; I feel so strange to-day, and seem to have lost all count of time. I remember now how I tried to recall where you lived, but I could not.

Digitized by Google

I could not even remember your name, and yet I heard you calling me. I came here from somewhere, I don't know where; and I wanted you—oh, so much!"

She gazed at him wonderingly, marvelling much what this strangeness in him could mean. While she watched him, she saw his eyes close in what looked like a sudden sleep. His body bent and swayed, and she gently lowered him into the chair.

He was fast asleep. An instinct prompted her to close the door, lest anyone passing by in the road should see her and wonder, and perhaps gossip.

Returning to his side, and seeing how deep was his sleep, she thought: "If only I could lay him down on that couch!"

An old couch, waiting to be re-covered, stood close by. Wheeling it close up to the chair, she managed to roll him from the chair seat to the bed of the couch, pillowing his head comfortably. Taking the chair for her own resting-place, she began her strange vigil. Did woman-lover ever have a stranger vigil? And while she watched, her thoughts were full of much perplexity.

"What does it all mean?" she mused, as she gazed down upon the man whose face she had hungered to see for twelve years and more. "He is quite twenty years older in looks," she told herself; then again came the torturing question: "Where has he been all these years; How comes he to be a carpenter? How comes it that he forgot my name and where I lived?"

A hundred times these questions, and many others, passed through her mind, yet never once did she mistrust his loyalty to her.

The sun set, and he slept on. She remembered words heard in her chapel once on a great saint's day: "If he sleep he shall do well," and she smiled with hope as she listened to the regular breathing of her long-lost lover.

Before the workshop became quite dark she sought for the means to make a light. But, though she found candles and a lamp, she could find no match to kindle a flame. She sat on in the darkness, holding his hand in hers. Slowly, all unconsciously to herself, as the hours passed on thought merged into sleep, her eyes had drooped and closed, and her head sank slowly upon the padded arm of the sofa.

The crowing of a cock awoke her. It was day dawn. She was stiff and chill, and amazed that she had slept. Her lover still slept; she called him:

"Paul, Paul! Are you ill, my love? Awake, awake!"

He opened his eyes, stared at her, then, with a look of intelligence such as she had not seen seen on his face overnight, he cried rapturously:

"Nina, my darling, where are we, that we are together again? I've had an awful dream."

. . . . .

It was a month later. The lovers were as happy as they could well be, short of being in Eden itself. No recollection of his past had come to Paul George, but both had decided, and were satisfied with their conclusion, that some strange illness on his part, with a lapse of memory following upon it, had been the cause of all Nina's weary waiting, and of his present inability to recall the lost years.

He took up things exactly where he had left them twelve years before—as regarded their joint relations one to the other—and began all the preparations for their wedding.

But sudden, swift sorrow came upon him. Nina sickened with diphtheria, and in three days she died. Bareheaded, and wild of eye, he rushed from the house when the nurse told him she was gone. At daybreak he was found by a watchman wandering in the streets, full of fever, drenched to the skin it had been raining all night—and muttering incoherently. The man led him away to the hospital, where Death fought with the doctors for three whole weeks for the life of Paul George. Then came the great crisis, and with scowling brow and low mutterings Death left the battle-ground, and the doctors rejoiced in another life won back by science, skill, and patience.

No one knew who the sick man was; no one came to inquire for him. When at last reason returned to him, with the feeble voice left in him he asked: "Where am I?"

"In hospital," the doctor replied.

"Guy's or St. Thomas's?" he asked.

The medical man smiled as he said: "Guy's and St. Thomas's are in London; you are in hospital here in Quebec."

"Quebec!" he cried. "But how—when—what can it mean? I only left my office to-day; it was half-past three when I left; my office is in Thames Street. I was to be married to-morrow at twelve, and——"

Digitized by Google

He was growing excited; the physician laid his hand soothingly upon him as he said: "You have been very ill here for the last three weeks—very near to death; you must not agitate yourself, or I will not answer for the consequences. Your life, even now, depends on your keeping your brain quiet."

. . . . .

The particular doctor who had had most to do with Paul George had grown strangely interested in him, scenting, doubtless a rare case of mental aberration.

As soon as the patient was really strong enough to be trusted to talk freely, the doctor himself broached the subject of the other's identity, offering to hear the story and to communicate with any friends whom his patient might wish to apprise of his whereabouts.

A calendar that hung upon the hospital wall, and the dated sheet connected with his own case, had both made known the startling fact to the strange patient that the date was August 17th, 18—.

"According to these dates," he began —"and I suppose they are correct"—the doctor nodded. and the patient went on— "I have been away from home a year and a month and five days; but where I have been, or how I got to Canada, I have no idea. My name is George Henderson. I am, or I was, a wholesale shipping and provision merchant, in Thames Street, London. It was the day before I was to be married that—I have remembered it all during the last few days—overpressed and overwrought with work, I was clearing up some correspondence before leaving business for the last time until my return from my honeymoon, which I had planned to last for a month. Suddenly I felt something like the snapping of a tight string in my head, while a voice called me: "Paul, Paul, come to me!"

"But you said your name was George?" said the doctor, watching his patient keenly.

The latter smiled. "That belongs to another story, as Kipling says, which I am now coming to. When I was quite a young man I was in Quebec for nearly seven weeks. I had only purposed to stay a week, but an adventure befell me which changed my course. One day I saved a pretty little girl from drowning in the St. Lawrence. An acquaintance began, and I grew very fond of her. I never told her I was only a visitor to the city, but made out that I was a clerk in one of the wharf offices. In six weeks we had arranged to be married; I was for the time thoroughly infatuated, though she was but a laundress. Then suddenly I got a wire from home: my father was seriously ill, and I was to go immediately. There was a vessel sailing that day; I packed up and departed, leaving a letter to go by post to Nina, promising I would write her on my arrival in England."

George Henderson's face flushed with a shame that had often filled his soul in the past as he continued:

"Nothing can excuse my folly, my sin, but I never sent the girl a line. Away from her presence, with other interests around me, the power of her personality waned. My father died; this made me very busy for a year; then, as the years went on, and I became more and more engrossed in business, I tried to utterly put from me the memory of the pretty Canadian laundress. But I could not. Hundreds of times I have awaked from my sleep at night, hearing her call me: 'Paul, Paul, come back to me!' (I had called myself Paul George to her, and it was by this name only that she knew me.) Then came the time when I met the lady to whom I was to be married, when this strange calamity fell upon me, and I left my office, as I told you, to go to my fiancée's house."

George Henderson looked up humbly, penitently, at the doctor as he continued:

"'God's mills,' doctor, 'grind slowly, but they grind exceeding small,' is an oft-quoted phrase, and I recognise the judgment of God upon my heartlessness in deserting that poor Quebec girl. Now, will you be my friend, as you have said you would? Will you have private inquiry made for one Nina Dupuis, a laundress, who lived somewhere on the Heights, and let me know the result before I write to my lawyer in England to tell him I am alive?"

That evening the doctor sought his patient, with some strange news, which in substance was much as we know it, and was as follows: Nina Dupuis had never given up hope of her lover's return; had refused all marriage offers made to her during a period of more than twelve years. Two months before George Henderson's arrival at the hospital she had found her lover working as a carpenter and repairer of furniture in a little out-of-the-way house, where he lived by himself. He had lived there nearly a year, people said, but always seemed strange and vacant. The pair were on the point of getting married when Nina died almost suddenly of diphtheria.

Digitized by Google

Arrived at this point in his narrative of discovery, the doctor was stopped by George Henderson, who, with a shuddering cry, buried his face in the bedclothes, and sobbed like a whipped child. It was some little time before he recovered, the doctor, recognising the value of tears to his patient in the overwrought state in which he was, giving no check to the emotion. When, after a time, the weeping man recovered, he said:—

"It all comes back to me. I don't remember how I got back to Quebec, but I remember living in a house and working as a carpenter. I must have chosen this trade in my demented state because it has always been my hobby. I had a splendid workshop in my father's house at home, where I have always lived; for since he died the place became mine.

HE SMILED UPON HER, STROKING BACK HER BEAUTIFUL HAIR WITH THE FINGERS OF HIS TWO HANDS.

Digitized by Google

Yes, I remember now how Nina found me, and all the rest."

Great tears welled up in his eyes again, and he ground his teeth in an agony of soul, as he cried:

"Poor Nina! God forgive me for all I made her suffer!" A look of abject misery and disgust crossed his face as he added: "I feel as though I should loathe myself as long as ever I lived for being the brutal, heartless cur I was to that poor dead girl."

. . . .

It was a year later. George Henderson, with his newly-wed bride, Marion, stood by a pretty little grave in a Quebec burial-ground. On the marble stone were carved the words: "Nina. Faithful unto death."

. . . .

That which we are writing is an embodiment of facts given to us a few years since. Had the story been purely fictional we should have preferred to have allowed Nina, faithful, noble, loving Nina, to have lived, and to have wed the man she loved! —though he did not deserve it.

The strange case of mental aberration of George Henderson is not strange in its principles to the medical faculty, since it is known that an average of three hundred people disappear from their homes every year, from London alone, and scarce ever appear again. Those who do are usually proved to have been victims of some such aberration as recorded here, and, having suddenly, swiftly, recovered their memory, return to their friends. Sometimes the absence extends over many years; and in all such cases some old-time incident shapes the course of their life during their temporary dementia, and and in every case they forget their name and the name of the place where they dwelt when the calamity fell upon them.

[THE END.]

MEMORY AND THE FULL MOON.

O Nights of silver memory—O Nights!
  Here at this casement (as of old) I stand,
  And greet the moon at full, flooding the land
With mystery and unmeasured dream delights.
But they who with me gazed on those green heights—
  Distanced in moonlight—while the night wind bland
  Rare incense from deep forest altars fanned—
Ah, whither gone, with giddy seasons' flights?

Intenser than of old thy burning orb,
  Thou planet lone in star-forgetting skies!
    Each ray from thee with tender purport smites;
Say, didst thou not those love-lit souls absorb,
  Wherefore thy splendour aches against mine eyes?
    O Nights of silver memory—O Nights!

Edith M. Thomas.

Digitized by Google

My First Sermon.

By the REV. ARNOLD THOMAS.

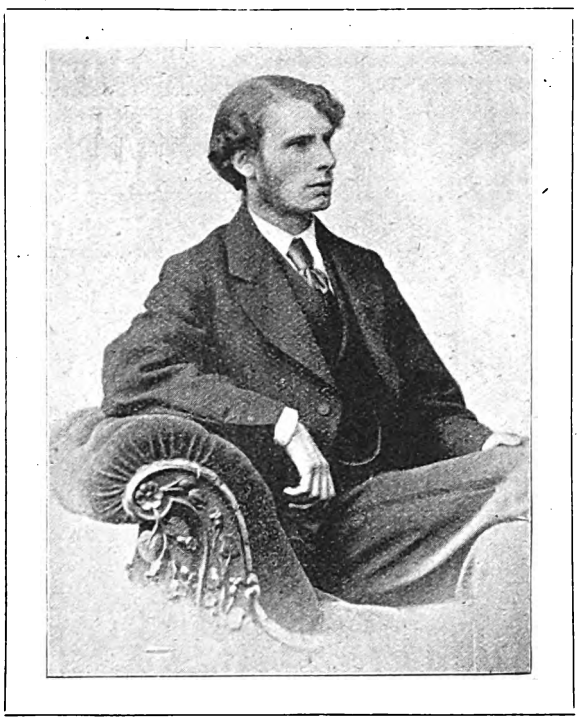
(Ex-Chairman of the Congregational Union.)

I PREACHED my first sermon when I was an undergraduate at Cambridge.

I was asked to take a service one Sunday evening at a mission hall connected with the Congregational church, then in Downing-street, and I felt it my duty to accept the invitation.

Being a very shy youth, and especially in regard to all religious matters, the anticipation of making my first public appearance was not without its horrors. I remember lying on the bank of the river in the Trinity walks on the May afternoon of the day fixed for the service, with an agony of apprehension in my mind, and am not sure that I did not feel tempted to slip into the sluggish stream and disappear finally from view.

However, I braced myself as best I could for the tremendous task, and duly turned up at the appointed hour. If I remember rightly I had prepared a sermon which I supposed would be more or less appropriate for the congregation I expected to find awaiting me, but I have no recollection whatever of the text or the subject. I only know that that excellent sermon was never preached, at that hall or anywhere else; for I found, on arriving on the spot, that the congregation consisted of a few small children who would most certainly not be able to make anything of my thoughtful little essay. I contented myself, therefore, with giving those youngsters a talk. What it was all about I am sure I cannot tell. From the sermon-class point of view it was probably the worst discourse that was ever delivered. I cannot recall a syllable of it, but good, bad or indifferent, that was my first sermon.



REV. ARNOLD THOMAS IN HIS EARLY PREACHING DAYS.

Digitized by Google

SIFTING THE CONTENTS OF THE RAG-PICKER'S BASKET.

TREASURES IN THE GUTTER.

LOUIS PAULIAN AND THE RAG-PICKERS.

By WARD MUIR.

WHAT is a chiffonnier?

To most folk the word chiffon conveys a vague impression of the summery frills and furbelows of the fair sex. They have probably forgotten how they learnt at school that it is the French for "rag." And even in the school days few could have told off-hand the meaning of chiffonnier.

A chiffonnier, then, is a rag-picker.

There are several thousand chiffonniers in Paris. They form an interesting and by no means uninfluential class of the population. Their calling, though a squalid and poorly paid one, at least possesses the merit of honesty. Indeed, the prison returns of the French capital indicate the striking fact that there are a smaller percentage of criminals from amongst the rag-pickers than from any other similar sized section of the working community.

There is one man in Paris who can tell you all about the rag-pickers, though he is of gentle birth, holds a high Government office, and is a Professor of the Institut Commercial. He is M. Louis Paulian. The reason why he is an authority on rag-pickers is because he has been one himself.

M. Paulian, who is a native of Nice, has now held the arduous post of Secretaire Redacteur to the Chambres des Députés for thirty years. From the very first he interested himself in social problems. The prison laws especially claimed his attention, and in the pursuance of his investigations in that line he repeatedly caused himself to be incarcerated in order that he might not pass judgment upon the systems then in vogue until he had viewed them from the felon's standpoint. Later, the existence of the mighty chiffonnier class dawned upon him, and, in his usual journalistic way, he resolved to study them personally. So for several years off and on all his holidays, and even his short spare hours were occupied in the actual work of rag-picking, or (as it might be more correctly termed) searching for marketable rubbish. He often spent days at a time with the chiffonniers; labouring with them, eating with them, living in their houses, and earning his bread just as they did. What Louis Paulian cannot tell you about them is not worth knowing.

Digitized by Google

The industry is an astonishingly extensive one. Not a few important manufactories depend entirely for their raw material on the contents of the chiffonnier's basket.

Empty sardine and fruit cans are perhaps the most valuable everyday plunder. These are collected in heaps, under which a fire is lit. The solder that forms the joins is thus melted, and may be collected.

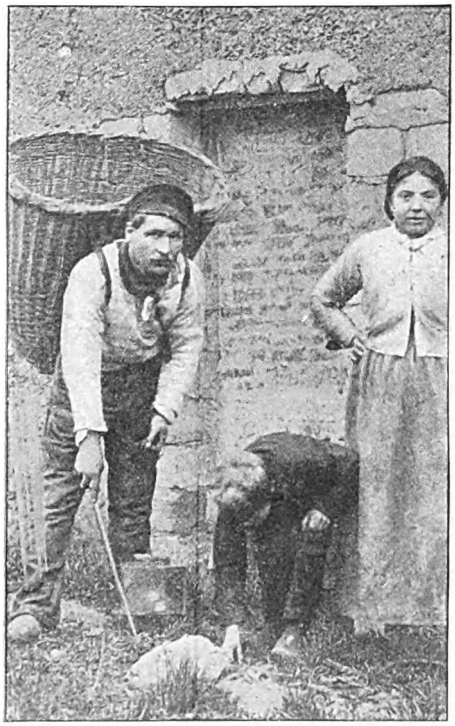
THE CHIFFONNIERS ALWAYS HAVE BENT BACKS.

LOUIS PAULIAN VISITING ONE OF THE RAG-PICKERS' QUARTERS OF PARIS.

Digitized by Google

LOUIS PAULIAN VISITING HIS OLD FRIENDS THE CHIFFONNIERS.

The tin itself remains intact. Tin toys—railway trains, carts, etc.—are cut out from this; while the wheels are cast in the solder. Metal soldiers are made similarly. The output of these latter is something immense.



PAPA, MAMA, ET BEBE—ALL RAG PICKERS.

M. Paulian found out that many of the poorer rag-pickers had built their own houses almost entirely of sardine boxes. Each box was filled with mud. They were then piled, two or three deep, one on the top of the other to form the walls, clay being used to fill up the interstices. The whole was whitewashed; and consequently it was quite impossible to discover, except by close examination, the ingenious way in which the construction had been carried out. Hundreds of the Paris chiffonniers are living to this day in hovels built of sardine boxes and clay.

Old posters and other pieces of waste paper form another of the chiffonnier's staple articles of commerce. The paper is sent to a mill, where it is placed under enormous pressure, and turned into a kind of very hard papier maché. This is then cut by machinery into buttons of all kinds. The bullet-like boot buttons which we use so much are made, in this way, of compressed paper. The casual observer might suppose from their hardness that they were some form of bone or crockery.

Digitized by Google

Speaking of crockery brings us to another odd branch of the subject. Broken plates and cups are, of course, very common in the rag-picker's hoard. Plain pieces are of but little value; but those ornamented with gold lines or other devices are carefully sorted out and placed on one side. There is a company whose sole business it is to chemically remove the film of gold-leaf from these bits of china, and collect the infinitesimal quantity of the precious metal thus produced. Gold is gold all the world over, and the remains of one of your best dinner services is a miniature Klondike to the residue collector.

Bones, too, have a very fair market value. So have bristles. The reader's toothbrush was once a portion of the jumbled mess in the basket of a diligent, if dirty, rag-picker. The thousand and one other bone articles which minister to our daily comfort are all—or nearly all—obtained from the same source. Every bone in a horse's or cow's body has its special value to the manufacturer. M. Paulian once drew up a chart of a cow's skeleton showing the various uses to which each of its portions are put. The tiny bits, it may be mentioned, are turned into toothpicks. The big markets are a happy hunting ground for the rag-pickers. They are admitted after business hours, and their search for rubbish lasts practically till opening time on the following morning. At the Halles—the most important public mart in Paris—the best "find" consists, oddly enough, of butter. This is procured in a decidedly strange way, for, needless to say, no saleable butter is ever left lying about after closing time. The explanation of the matter is this. There is an official, and a rather important one too, who is called the butter taster. His duty consists in doing for butter what a tea-taster does for tea. That is, he tastes each batch of butter that is brought to him and classifies its quality accordingly. But he cannot actually swallow all the butter which his office compels him to place in his mouth. Instead, he spits out each morsel almost as soon as it has touched his palate, and it falls on to a heap of straw. Quite a quantity collects there during the course of the working day. This straw-heap is subsequently gathered up by the chiffonnier. The whole mass—dirty, wet, and altogether loathsome—is plunged into a cauldron of boiling water. The straw floats, and the butter does so also in the shape of oil. The straw is first carefully picked off and

A YOUNG APPRENTICE.

A RAG PICKER'S HOARD.

Digitized by Google

A CHARMING YOUNG RUBBISH SORTER.

placed on one side, to be used when dry as fuel. The oil is then skimmed off and set aside to cool. When thoroughly cold it is eaten as fine fresh butter by the thrifty rag-picker and his family, to whom it is a great treat. Sometimes they sell it to their neighbours, who know quite well how it was made, but have no delicacy about using it.

Cigar stumps form yet another treasure of the gutter. M. Paulian proved by actual experiment that sufficient tobacco to earn a modest living could be picked up daily on the streets of Paris. It may be pointed out, however, that few Frenchmen smoke pipes. It is doubtful whether cigar-stump collecting would pay in England, where the more economical form of smoking is generally practised. Be this as it may, no Parisian chiffonnier would pass a half-burnt cigarette or cigar without adding it to the highly miscellaneous store in his basket.

The rag-picker is equipped for his work in a simple but efficient manner. Strapped to his back is a wide-mouthed basket. In his right hand he holds a stick, the end of which is armed with a sharp-pointed bent nail. In his left is a hanging lantern with a broad glass face, designed to cast a large area of light. He never picks up anything with his hands; the hook stick is always used, and with it the object, whatever it be, is thrown over the shoulder into the basket. Every chiffonnier has a crooked back, partly due to the weight of the basket and partly to the constant leaning forward to look for rubbish on the ground. The deformity is noticeable almost from birth in the children who come of a chiffonnier stock, the trade descending from father to son and mother to daughter through many generations.

The whole of the family, however, are never occupied in the perambulatory portion of the business alone. The searching is only half the matter. For when the full baskets are brought home they must be carefully looked through, and their cargo sorted. This sorting—which is no mean job—is generally done by the women. The rubbish is all classified, and placed, according to this classification, in the crates, with which the chiffonnier's work-

THIS OLD LADY HAS BEEN A RAG PICKER ALL HER LIFE AND HER GRAND-DAUGHTER IS GOING TO BE ONE TOO.

Digitized by Google

room is furnished. When a crate is full of its particular specialité—paper, broken crockery, bones, or what not—it is carried to a neighbouring manufactory, the manager of which pays cash according to the weight of the crate's contents.

Louis Paulian, as has been said, lived the life of a chiffonnier for months at a time. He came back to "civilisation" convinced of one thing, viz., that these despised rag-pickers had decidedly interesting personalities beneath their grime. Honesty, and an inborn genius for thrift, were their most striking characteristics—characteristics which redound greatly to their credit, when we consider the squalid surroundings of their lives.

M. Paulian became the champion of the chiffonniers through the medium of the press. He introduced them to the

RAG-PICKERS' DWELLING WHERE LOUIS PAULIAN LIVED.

Digitized by Google

Parisians. He gave the proud ladies and gentlemen of the French capital a glimpse into the existence of the "other half." His purpose was not that of eliciting charitable aid. He merely wanted to gain justice for his poor friends. In this he was successful. The laws, which were severe (and in fact practically classed the rag-pickers as vagrants), have now been modified. The chiffonnier—formerly a kind of leper—now takes his proper place in the scale of society. He is a legally acknowledged member of a respectable community.

It is hardly necessary to add that M. Paulian has won the sincere admiration of his protégés. They recently expressed their gratefulness by presenting him with a model lantern, adorned with an inscription, testifying the fact of their affection and esteem. Whenever he goes to visit their quarters of the city he is enthusiastically received. He has often conducted eminent artists and philanthropists thither on a tour of inspection, and it was on one of these occasions that the photographs which illustrate this article were taken. They are reproduced by special permission of M. Paulian himself.

W. WARD MUIR.

THOUGHT.

Thought is deeper than all speech,
Feeling deeper than all thought;
Souls to souls can never teach
What unto themselves was taught.

We are spirits clad in veils;
Man by man was never seen;
All our deep communing fails
To remove the shadowy screen.

Heart to heart was never known;
Mind with mind did never meet;
We are columns left alone
Of a temple once complete.

Like the stars that gem the sky,
Far apart, though seeming near,
In our light we scattered lie;
All is thus but starlight here.

What is social company
But a babbling summer stream?
What our wise philosophy
But the glancing of a dream?

Only when the sun of love
Melts the scattered stars of thought,
Only when we live above
What the dim-eyed world hath taught,

Only when our souls are fed
By the fount which gave them birth,
And by inspiration led
Which they never drew from earth

We, like parted drops of rain,
Swelling till they meet and run,
Shall be all absorbed again,
Melting, flowing into one.

C. P. Cranch.

Digitized by Google

Do the Churches Want Money?

By SILAS K. HOCKING.

SOME time back the heads of the Presbyterian Church in America, casting round for some method of celebrating in a suitable manner the dawn of a new century, came to the conclusion that money was not the thing most needed, nor even churches for the accommodation of the people, for there were already more churches than were comfortably filled. The thing that appeared to be most desirable was to get hold of the young life of the nation, to educate the children in the principles of the religion of the New Testament. So they decided that they would make a great and simultaneous effort to increase the number of children in their Sunday schools. If they could get half a million more children under religious instruction, how much that might mean in the future life of the nation. So their churches throughout the States took the matter up, and the desired number was reached by the close of the year.

This was a very notable and noble achievement, and if, now that they are gathered into the schools of the country, the same intelligence and enthusiasm can be thrown into their training, the good that will result therefrom in the future no man can estimate. In this country the heads of the various Churches have come to the conclusion that the great thing needed is money, and so nearly every denomination has started its century scheme for raising guineas. Our country is wealthy, we have passed through a period of great commercial prosperity, and so it seems only fitting that some of the surplus cash should be given to the various denominations for the purpose of Church aggression. Speaking for myself, I cannot honestly say that I think that money is the great want of the Churches to-day. What the Churches need is something that money cannot purchase. We may build huge churches and rear lofty spires and decorate with artistic skill, but if we cannot get the masses of the people into those churches, and so bring them under the influence of the Gospel, then our expenditure is very largely in vain.

It may be a wise thing to go on building more churches and still more churches, yet one cannot help asking sometimes whether it would not be a wiser thing to try and devise some means by which the churches we have already built may be filled. I am not sure that the heads of the churches in this country are doing the wisest thing in dunning the people for money. Many people are already beginning to grumble, and cynical folks look upon Church organisations as just so much elaborate machinery for getting shillings and sovereigns out of the pockets of the general public. Most of the century schemes for raising guineas secured a very enthusiastic start and had a splendid send-off, but enthusiasm of that kind quickly dies down. Fears are being entertained that the schemes will fall short of what was intended; consequently very frantic efforts are being put forth to galvanise these money-raising enterprises into life, and to get the people to double or even to quadruple their subscriptions.

When the Weslyan fund was started to raise a million guineas, the idea was that there were in England a million Methodists who would be willing to subscribe a guinea each and have their name placed on an historical roll. At first it seemed as it this idea would be realised, but as time went on it became evident that there were not a million people who were prepared to take a guinea's worth of interest in the matter. Then the rich laymen were appealed to, and they subscribed right nobly. Sums of £1,000 and £2,000 and £5,000, and in one or two cases £7,000 or £8,000, I believe, have been subscribed by single individuals. Conference having wisely decided that the payment may be deferred until the end of 1901, I sincerely hope that all the money will be raised, though it is very clear that a number of people who could well afford to contribute, for some reason or other, are holding back. Various reasons have been given in explanation of this.

Digitized by Google

A wealthy layman in the Midlands told me some time ago that he declined to give anything to the Century Fund because the names were published, and the Scriptural injunction was that we were not to let our left hand know what our right hand did. I pointed out to him that because the majority of people did not object to see their names in front of the amount they had contributed that need not prevent him from giving his mite anonymously. Had he been a close-fisted individual I might have come to the conclusion that it was a mere excuse for saving his pocket, but as he happens to be one of the most liberal men in that part of the country, and is always giving in a quiet and unostentatious way, I was, of course, bound to conclude that he had a conscientious objection to this way of trumpeting the names of those who give to the fund. Then there is no denying the fact that a large number of people are opposed to spending a quarter of a million of money on a huge building somewhere in the West of London.

The Church of England, some time ago, spent a vast sum of money on what is called a "Church House," and I believe that its uses are not at all commensurate with the amount of money expended upon it. The Congregationalists, also, many years ago, put up a great buiding in Farringdon-street, known as the Memorial Hall. It is not a particularly beautiful building, nor is it particularly convenient. I should say that, in the main, the place is more or less of a white elephant. The bulk of it is let off in offices, from which, no doubt, a good income is derived, but that was not the idea when the building was erected. Religious denominations do not build for the sake of letting offices. The public rooms, however, in this building are very rarely used; and, with these examples before them, many people among the Wesleyans think that to put up a building somewhere in the neighbourhood of Trafalgar-square, costing two hundred and fifty or, it may be, three hundred thousand pounds, would be largely a waste of money, and would prove in the end of little practical value.

Then, again, there can be no doubt whatever that the war has played its part in diminishing the number of subscriptions, not simply because there has been such a drain upon the pockets of the people, in support of the various funds for the relief of the wounded, and for the support of the widows and orphans of our dead soldiers, but because feeling has run so high between different sections of the community. It seems to me that if a movement is good, then it ought not to suffer because we may not agree in all things with those who are at its head. Moreover, our views on one question ought not to be permitted to interfere with our actions in another matter which is of an entirely different order. It is quite true that the question of war is ethical quite as much as it is political—in fact, it is much more a religious question than an Imperial one. The central note of Christianity is brotherhood, which war from its very nature entirely ignores. On the other hand, appeals to force seem, to the very large majority of even Christian people, not only to be necessary, but quite justifiable on ethical grounds. Hence it would be a thousand pities—to say nothing of its inconsistency—to allow any differences which have arisen on questions of policy or of politics to interfere with our duty as religious men. The kingdom of God should be placed before all other things, and no personal predilection or prejudice should be allowed to interfere with our duty to our Maker and to our fellow men.

There is yet another reason I have heard advanced why the million-guinea scheme somewhat hangs fire at the present time. I give it for what it is worth, which may not be very much; but it is usually understood that foreign missions are to share in this golden pie, and very rightly so. But there is no denying the fact, and it is one that the Churches will have to face, that there is no enthusiasm to-day for missionary enterprise. If it were known that all the missionaries who have been labouring for the past ten years in foreign lands were going to land at Southampton next week, and would come to town by a special train, I don't think London would turn out to give them welcome, or that the City Fathers would spend £3,000 in entertaining them. They might be able to tell of heroisms, of patient endurance, of souls by the hundred brought out of darkness into the light, but London would not heed, and the country would not care. Enthusiasm does not run in that direction to-day. The reason given by Lord Salisbury may be the true reason, or it may be that Majuba has overshadowed Calvary.

SILAS K. HOCKING.

Digitized by Google

SOME ANGLICAN SISTERHOODS AND THEIR HOMES.

By ANNIE GOODENOUGH PIKE.

This article will be interesting to all Denominations. Written by an admitted admirer of Anglican Sisterhoods, it reveals the life followed by ladies who devote themselves to celibacy and good work.

CELIBATE community life is an accepted feature of Roman Catholicism, and in that connection excites little curiosity in the mind of the ordinary citizen. Its existence in the Church of England is, on the other hand, still popularly regarded with a wonder not altogether devoid of suspicion, though half a century has passed since the Oxford movement led to its revival in that Communion.

Of the many fallacies entertained concerning it one of the most common is that every Anglican Sister of Mercy is trained either at Clewer or at Wantage. As a matter of fact, however, the Anglican Church contains at least seventeen distinct communities of women, each of which has its own parent house, its own Mother Superior, its own code of rules, and its own organisation. In essentials the whole seventeen are as one. Thus they are all bound by the three vows of Poverty, Obedience and Chastity. They all fulfil the law of Christ, or at any rate strive to do so, by devoting themselves solely to worshipping God and working for God's creatures, and in every sisterhood personal inclinations, tastes, and even talents, are subordinated to the interests of the community as a whole.

But when it comes to non-essentials we have this uniformity relieved by considerable diversity. In some convents you will find absolute silence at meal times. In others the refectory will buzz with cheerful conversation. At some claret and light ale are provided for the guest table (I never saw anything more stimulating than weak tea consumed by the sisters and novices themselves), and at others the choice of drinks is limited severely to milk, or water, for visitors, while members of the community are afforded no choice at all; they drink the product of the pump or they drink nothing.

The manner of admitting and training postulants

Photograph by McHattie Smith.

THE FOUNDRESS AND MOTHER SUPERIOR OF ST. KATHERINE'S SISTERHOOD.

Digitized by Google

and novices, the mode of conducting the community work, and even the "make-up" of the sisters' habits, and the way they wear their crosses, give rise to differences in nearly every religious order of women in communion with the English Church.

Most sisterhoods have a speciality. With some it is the reclamation of fallen women; with some the care and upbringing of orphan or destitute children; with some educational work of all grades—elementary, middle class, and advanced; with some nursing and the training of nurses; and with some the feeding of the sick and hungry poor. This latter is a great feature of the work of the Kilburn Sisters, who, every Sunday morning, provide a hot breakfast for 600 of the most destitute of their 6,000 school children, and every week-day, during the winter months, send two truckloads of hot nourishing food to the entrance of London Docks, where it is sold at nominal prices to the men and boys hanging about the gates for work. The pre-eminent strength, both numerical and financial, of the Wantage and Clewer Sisterhoods enables them to each undertake several of these works, and carry them out in distant parts of the Empire as well as in Great Britain—which probably accounts for the prevalent impression that they constitute the head centres of all community life and labour.

Turn in from that very dreary and commonplace thoroughfare, the Fulham Road, and behind a long thick wall which dates from far before the birth of the jerry builder, you will find the habitation of St. Katherine's Sisterhood, the only community founded for the express purpose of prison rescue work. It is a curious house, half early sixteenth, half late nineteenth century. The refectories, dormitories, and workrooms, all lofty, airy, and well lighted, are typical examples of the latter period. The private room of the "Reverend Mother," the visitor's parlour (where, by the way, a quaint spinning-wheel and distaff stand beneath the narrow, diamond-paned casement), and a few other rooms are distinctly Tudor; having the low ceilings, oak-panelled walls, deep, wide fireplaces, and high mantelpieces, beloved of the architects who flourished in the time of good Queen Bess. To walk down a rose staircase, old and beautiful, and find that this short and simple proceeding has transferred you from a scene which would be a fitting frame for a company of stately dames in farthingales and ruffs, and sturdy gallants in laced doublets and silken hose, to one that smacks in every detail of the present utilitarian and unpicturesque age is somewhat bewildering to an impressionable mind, and calculated to induce hankerings of a retrospective and impossible character.

Interesting as Normand House is in every particular, it contains nothing more interesting or attractive than the personality of the "Mother Superior." Twenty years ago, when she was still living in the world, and answering to the name of Miss Granville, the terrible difficulties of earning a respectable livelihood experienced by girls once convicted of theft weighed so heavily upon her heart that she resolved to make a systematic effort to cope with them. The adoption of the religious life and the foundation of the Order of St. Katherine was the result. For five years the Mother Foundress and her little company of sisters worked in a hired house at Hammersmith, there being no suitable freehold property in the market

CONVENT OF HOLY CROSS, HAYWARD'S HEATH.

Digitized by Google

to afford the Order a habitation in perpetuity. Then Normand House was put up for sale. Miss Granville bought it, and for fourteen years she has been making modern additions to the original Tudor building, with the result that the house now provides accommodation for thirty girls, who come straight from the prison gates at the expiration of their first sentence, and after two years' training in house, needle, and laundry work, are provided with outfits and situations, and sent forth to resume the battle of life under fair conditions.

Photograph by W. Atkinson.

MOTHER FOUNDRESS OF THE SISTERHOOD OF THE HOLY CROSS.

A beautiful little chapel by Sir Arthur Blomfield is the sisterhood's latest achievment in bricks and mortar. It possesses silver sanctuary lamps of Italian workmanship, and a handsome reredos having a full length painting of the Redeemer in the centre, and figures of St. Katherine and St. Elizabeth in the side panels. Fine needlework and washing are the chief industries at Normand House. Trousseaux and layettes are turned out by the score to help defray the expenses of the establishment, and if you pay the laundry a visit on any Thursday you will find Sisters, with the ends of their veils knotted out of the way behind them, ironing and goffering away for dear life in the midst of the girls; while the Mother Superior, blue-eyed, smiling, and intent, is busy in the packing-room seeing that the contents of each basket tallies with the written records thereof, and so obviating that disturbance of mind and intemperance of language which so often follows upon the arrival of the family washing.

CONVALESCENT HOME, SISTERHOOD OF THE HOLY CROSS, HAYWARD'S HEATH.

Under the shadow of the Malvern Hills nestles the Convent of the Holy Name, a handsome modern house which, with an equally handsome and up-to-date Penitentiary, called the Home of the Good Shepherd, forms a quadrangle of red brick surrounded with pleasant private grounds, wherein religieuses and penitents alike spend much of their recreation time. The Sisters work in the parishes of St. Peter's, Vauxhall; Christ Church, Marylebone; St. James', Wednesbury; St. Alban and St. Patrick, Birmingham; and even so far afield as Canada, where they have established a branch house in the parish of St. John's, New Brunswick.

But their principal object in life is the social and moral salvation of fallen members of their own sex, and in this they are wonderfully successful. The Home of the Good Shepherd affords accommodation for forty penitents, and since its opening in 1879 it has been the channel through which no fewer than 500 young women and girls have passed from the stormy and fathomless ocean of vice to the pleasant harbour of virtuous respectability.

"Are there many backsliders?" I asked the Sister who superintends the Penitentiary work.

"Practically none among

Digitized by Google

the girls who remain with us the full two years. There is always a small percentage who either leave of their own accord, or have to be expelled for persistent turbulence long before their term of probation expires. But if they are sufficiently in earnest to remain their full time, experience shows us that they may be depended upon to keep straight afterwards."

"Trying work, I should think."

A smile, half humorous, half tender, flitted across Sister Ruth's charming face. "Yes," she rejoined, "often trying but never wearisome, because the girls are so lovable. Even the naughtiest and most difficult among them, the ones whom we eventually have to get rid of because of their mutinous spirit, are in their better moments so responsive to sympathy, so affectionate and contrite, that they twine themselves about one's heart-strings unawares."

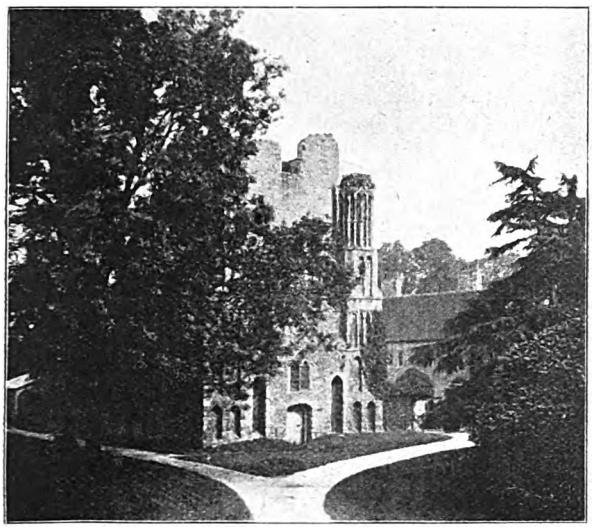
Here I may remark that I never yet came across a religious worker of varied experience who did not say that of all social wreckage the Magdalen is the one that most endears herself to the soul of the salver. Not strange either when one remembers that in so many sad cases the cause of a woman's fall is not innate wickedness of heart but weakness and folly, a lovable trusting disposition uncontrolled by fixed religious principles.

The Community of the Holy Name has its foundations settled with unusual firmness and solidity, thanks mainly to the late Mother Frances Mary, a lady remarkable alike for spiritual and intellectual gifts. Its rule is rather strict. Breakfast follows directly upon the Communion Service in the private chapel, and is always a silent meal; as, indeed, it is in most convents. It consists of porridge, home-made bread and butter, tea and coffee. But the guest-table which, by the way, is generally presided over by the Assistant Superior, has an additional dish in the form of boiled eggs, at the rate of one for each visitor. Dinner is served in the middle of the day, and again absolute silence reigns at the tables, but a Sister, seated at a desk just inside the refectory door, reads from one of the Fathers all the while the meal is in progress. One dish of meat and two of vegetables are placed on each table directly in front of the Sister seated in the centre. She helps herself to a modest portion and passes each dish as it is dealt with to her left-hand neighbour, who again passes it on in rotation, and thus it goes round the table.

At a signal from the Mother Superior two white-veiled novices rise from the table sacred to novices and postulants, and go noiselessly round the room collecting first the dirty knives and forks, and then the plates and dishes. The second course, consisting of some simple sweet, is brought in as noiselessly as the first one was removed, and the ladies, having served it, resume their seats and their meal. Tea is a very informal affair. An urn and some plates of rather thick bread and butter are put upon a side table at half-past four, and from then until half-past five members of the household drop in to the refectory as inclination prompts, or duty allows, pour themselves out a cup of tea, drink it in silence and depart. Supper comes at eight, and generally consists of a choice of hot soup or cold meat as a first course, and milk pudding to finish with. During Penitential seasons such as Lent and Advent this also is a silent meal, but at all other times talking is permitted, though not, I fancy, warmly encouraged. After supper, visitors make for the cosy guest parlour, while the professed Sisters not on duty in the Penitentiary, and the white-veiled novices and white-capped postulants repair to their respective sitting-rooms. The social hour is, however, but a short one, for at half-past nine the Silence Bell rings each person to her cell, and from then until the Calling Bell sends forth its rousing clang at six next morning no sound is heard within the covent walls.

The Community of the Holy Name does not seem to be so troubled as are most religious organisations by that "eternal lack of pence" which is apt to weigh upon the spirits of sisterhoods as well as to "vex the souls of public men." The household expenses of the convent are defrayed by the Choir Sisters, and the laundry generally contrives to pay 80 per cent. of the "keep up" of the Penitentiary. The remaining 20 per cent. is met partly by the profits from boarders who stay at the convent as a house of Retreat during June and September, and partly by the ecclesiastical and art needlework executed by some of the Community under the direction of Sister Grace.

Digitized by Google



ST. MARY'S ABBEY, WEST MALLING.

To this little band of skilled embroideresses was entrusted the copying of St. Thomas à Beckett's vestments at Sens, when it was determined that a new set, similar in every detail, should be presented to Canterbury Cathedral, and their raised work in gold thread is held by experts to have no equal in the whole world of art needlework.

In addition to all this the Community has contrived to build itself a chapel such as is possessed by no other Anglican sisterhood with which I have any acquaintance. Simple even to severity, yet dignified to the point of grandeur, this building, with its sanctuary floor of red and white marbles, its noble windows, and perfect proportions, appeals powerfully to the imagination, and conduces most strongly to that spirit of reverence which every sincere soul must wish to bring to the worship of God.

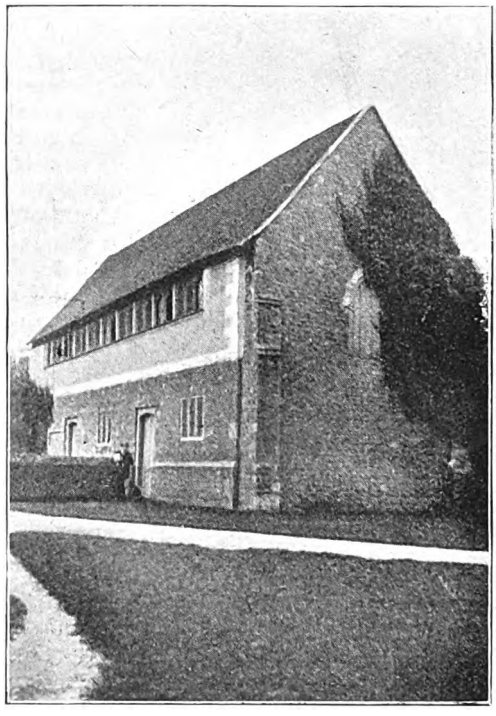
The Community of the Holy Cross, which now has its headquarters at Hayward's Heath, Sussex, also came into being with the intention of making the reclamation of fallen women its chief concern. With that end in view it was no sooner founded in 1857 than it settled down, under the late Rev. Charles Lowder, in the district which now forms the parish of St. Peter's, London Docks, and tried its 'prentice hand on the reformation of the brutalised Phyrnes who then swarmed about Ratcliffe Highway. Never, probably, was such a colossal task undertaken by a few delicately nurtured ladies, and though they had penitents—genuine and spurious—in plenty, it is scarcely surprising that they gradually came to the conclusion that in moral as well as physical diseases prevention is better than cure, and eventually decided to employ their energies in training the rising generations to virtuous conduct and honourable industry, instead of practically wasting them upon adults grown prematurely old in vice and degradation.

They began their preventive work in 1858 with six little girl children, and the labour of love has increased in scope proportionately as the Sisterhood has increased in strength, so that Holy Cross House now regularly contains sixty children; some rescued from destitution,

ANOTHER VIEW OF ST. MARY'S—A CONVENT WITH A HISTORY.

Digitized by Google

some plucked from the dens of vice and haunts of crime that infest our great city. They are received at any age after actual babyhood—the youngest member of the establishment at present is a rosy little dumpling of four, who came to it a wan, woe-begone mite, six months ago, through the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children—and they remain until they are eighteen. The latter fact causes much vexation of spirit (to say nothing of violence of speech) among many parents who display but a perfunctory interest (if any) in their offspring during the helpless years of their life at the Home, but develop a fervent solicitude about them directly they reach a wage-earning age. However, the plan of not sending the girls out into the world until they have been thoroughly trained for service, and the foundations of their characters settled, works well for the girls themselves, and while it does that the Mother Superior is likely to let the representations of belatedly fond parents pass her like the idle wind.



OLD GUEST HOUSE, WEST MALLING.

It is scarcely possible for girls to grow up under happier conditions than they do at Holy Cross House. Their schoolrooms and dining-room are spacious and cheerful; there is a cosy playroom well stocked with toys and games for evenings and wet days, and their light, airy dormitories are models of nicety and neatness. Each girl has her own bed, with a large red cross embroidered on the holland counterpane, and her own wash-basin and towel-rail, from which hangs a toilet-bag to match the bed-cover. The beauty of orderliness pervades every part of the house, and a sense of home reigns supreme therein

The Holy Cross Sisterhood was the first Anglican community to take up work of any sort in the East End, and how it did work there during the cholera visitation of 1866 probably only the Sisters themselves and Father Lowder really knew. Some idea of their labours during that terrible time may be gathered from the fact that as soon as it was found that good nourishing food was a great preservative against the disease, they cooked and distributed from 150 to 300 meals a day, besides nursing the sick and comforting the dying. Ever since then the Sisters have given a good deal of attention to the weak and suffering, and when they first entered into possession of their beautiful Sussex home they set aside one of its wings for the accommodation of poor convalescents needing country air. Three years ago they were able to buy a house in an adjoining field still better suited to this purpose, and here in sunny rooms, pretty as ivory paint and brocade papering can make them, the convalescents regain health and strength amid invigorating breezes blown from the Brighton Downs. The Convalescent Home affords accommodation for five ladies as well as fifteen poor patients, and a constant resident is the Foundress of the Community (a sister of the Rev. J. M. Neale of Sackville College), whose days of usefulness being done, now waits for everlasting rest near the home of the Sisterhood which her love of God and humanity brought into being just forty-three years ago.

Holy Cross Home has recently enlarged its programme of activities by two items. One is a school for the daughters of gentlemen. The other is the manufacture of electric light! The Community, being fired some time ago with an ambition to adopt the latest thing in illuminants, and having been assured that a spring of water strong enough for its manufacture was to be found beneath a tower in their grounds, started digging operations. They dug and dug until patience ran low and hope had nearly flown. Then they summoned to their counsels the most noted expert in the use of the divining rod. This gentleman, after duly examining the ground, preached perseverance and encouraged the Sisters to penetrate still deeper into the recesses of the earth, with the result that a fine well was eventually tapped, and Holy Cross House and its oratory soon supplied with electric light by some Sisters with a turn for modern science as well as a vocation for the religious life.

Digitized by Google

SCHOLARS AT ST. MARY'S ABBEY, WEST MALLING.

There is only one Anglican sisterhood that has adopted the rule of St. Benedict, and lives the enclosed life—which being interpreted means that it carries on its works entirely within its own walls. It was founded in 1868 by a descendant of the unfortunate House of Stuart, and after dwelling first in a farmhouse at Feltham, and afterwards at Twickenham, has now found in St. Mary's Abbey at West Malling a permanent home well in keeping with the ancient lineage of the lady who was its foundress and has been its Mother Superior ever since.

St. Mary's Abbey is one of the oldest religious houses on record. It had its genesis in 945 when Edmund, King of the Angles, and brother of Athelstane, gave three ploughlands at Malling to the Monastery at Rochester, with the ulterior motive of benefiting his own soul. In 1077, Bishop Grandulph of Rochester, a monk great both as a builder and an ecclesiastical reformer, decided to build a habitation for consecrated women in the midst of these fields. He was evidently a man of rapid action as well as of enterprise, for 1078 saw a wing of the new convent up and filled with Benedictine nuns. Filled with nuns of this Order the Abbey continued to be from that time until Henry VIII. laid his iron hand upon it and drove them forth. As compensation he "did of his clemency" grant the Lady Abbess £40 a year for life, and bestowed upon each of the ten nuns

OLD PEOPLE AND CHILDREN KEPT ON CHARITY.

Digitized by Google

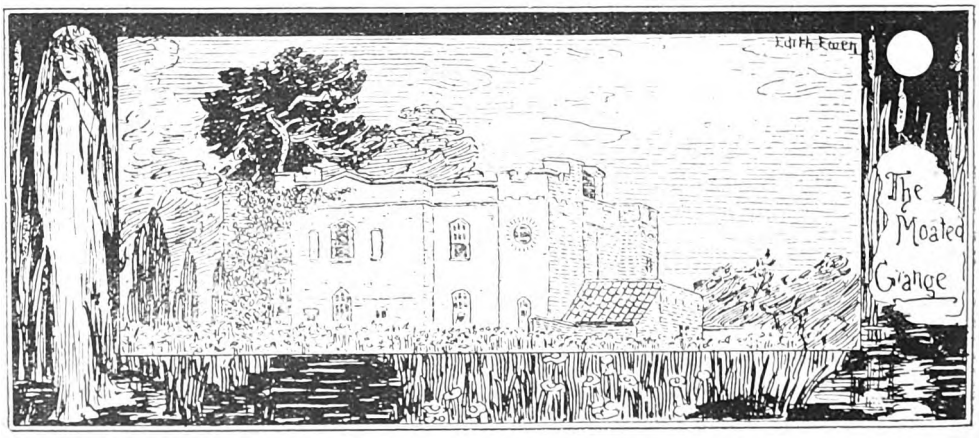
a yearly pension ranging in value from £2 13s. 4d. to £3! I mention this little matter as evidence that no amount of matrimony will enable some men to form any adequate idea of a lady's monetary needs.

St. Mary's Abbey remained a secular house from the day that it and its revenues were confiscated by the Crown until 1889, when its habitable portions were reconsecrated and taken possession of by its present occupants. Thus has it resumed its original character and purpose, and once more become a Home of Benedictine Nuns.

Life there is not strenuous. The Sisters spend much time in meditation and intercessory prayer, and labour diligently at church embroidery and plain needlework in order to support their works of charity. These are the care of a few aged women, who at the close of a respectable and industrious life would have to seek refuge in the workhouse were it not for the kindly hospitality thus provided; the training of a few friendless girls for domestic service; and (dearest, I think, of all to the hearts of these gentle nuns) the nursing up of a few little sufferers from city slums, whose only chance of healthy life lies in such a pure and peaceful atmosphere, and such tender care as they here enjoy. For the delight of these fortunate little unfortunates the Abbey maintains a donkey who, it is pleasant to relate, has a sufficient sense of the befitting to show a considerate and obliging spirit not always conspicuous in his kind. On this animal's back the happy youngsters amble along the ancient Nuns' Walk, which affords a rare spectacle in the shape of a hawthorn tree crowned with mistletoe; up and down the cherry orchard, and through the shady paths of the Walnut Grove, where still stand two of the trees which helped pay the Abbey's annual quit rent of walnuts and flax to the Crown in the time of Henry II.

As an illustration of the fact that mighty products often spring from modest sources I know nothing better than St. John's Home at Clewer. The Clewer Sisterhood carries on work in no less than seventeen parishes in different parts of England. It nurses and teaches in Calcutta, Bombay, and Darjeeling. It has established a large daughter house in New York, from whence Mission Sisters are sent to all parts of America. At Clewer it keeps sixty-eight orphan and destitute girls under training for domestic service; has always upwards of 100 penitent women striving more or less earnestly to work out their salvation in the House of Mercy; and is responsible for a large Convalescent Hospital and a smaller House of Rest, to say nothing of the heavy educational work it undertakes in connection with St. Stephen's College. And the place from which all this work is directed and controlled, the Home where novices are trained, to which professed Sisters return from time to time for rest and nursing when overwrought, and to which they come back for good when capacity for active service is over, is just a simple, one-storey house with rustic porch and gabled windows, set around with old-fashioned flower-beds and laburnum trees.

ANNIE GOODENOUGH PIKE.



Digitized by Google

JOHN ARDESHIR'S COAT.

by

SYDNEY TRAVERS.

Illustrated by JAMES DURDEN.

IT was of black velvet, well cut and little worn, and it had hung, off and on, from the same peg in a dingy, dirty shop, amongst many dingy, dirty second-hand clothes, ever since I came to London, and took lodgings just round the corner. I say off and on advisedly, for occasionally the coat would disappear, and, passing, I would miss its conspicuous, high-toned jet-black from the closely-hung row of plebeian, dull-hued garments displayed for sale.

But however often it disappeared it always came back to its old place.

I thought at first that the elderly Jew who owned the shop, and was usually to be seen lounging in the doorway, took it within for a few days, for reasons of his own. But one evening I saw a young fellow pay for the coat, and take it away over his arm. Two days later the coat was once more hanging on its accustomed peg. I then wondered if he had a stock of these black-velvet coats, and put out only one at a time, but that seemed very unlikely.

I entered into conversation with the old Jew one evening, and I asked him the price of the coat.

"Seven-and-sixpence," he answered; and he puffed away at his pipe, without turning his head either towards me or towards the coat.

"Cheap," I remarked.

"Ver' cheap," he grunted.

"And yet it remains on your hands."

He did not answer; he was not conversational.

"I thought I saw a young man buy it the other day, and take it away?"

"Ver' likely. It did not vit him."

I bade him good evening; an old-clothes shop is not a cheerful place for conversation, nor was the old Jew an interesting companion.

One morning, after one of the periodical disappearances of the coat, I met another man going towards the shop with the coat over his arm.

When one lives alone in a great town, where one can count but few friends, one seeks interests almost morbidly from the common occurrences in the daily round. I made no excuse for myself for so doing—I turned, and followed him back to the shop. When I overtook him he was explaining rather volubly to the Jew that it didn't fit.

The old man made no comment; he paid his late customer five shillings, and hung it back on the nail.

I accosted the man as he turned away. The Jew had gone inside, and was out of hearing.

"Nothing wrong with that coat, is there?" I enquired, carelessly. "Forgive me for asking you, but I've rather a fancy to have it myself."

He turned to me quite civilly, though he seemed to hesitate. He was a pale, worn-out-looking fellow, with dark, heavy lines about his eyes. He looked as though he had been up all night.

"Oh, no! nothing wrong—that is, not exactly—I mean, it's a bit dirty—yes, a little dirty; don't buy it."

He had stammered at first, but his last words came out with a rush. I thanked him, wished him a very good day, and went on to my office.

Digitized by Google

I thought a good deal about that coat as I did my work. It had grown to be a landmark in my comings and goings. There was something interesting in seeing its sleek, glossy surface among those shabby old coats, and something friendly in the way it turned up to catch my eye once more after I had missed it for a day or two. It occurred to me that I would be quite sorry if one day it fell into hands that did not care to part with it, and I should not see it again. Why did it always come back, I wondered?

Seven-and-sixpence was not, in those days, a sum I could afford to throw away, but as I walked home in the chilly November dusk I said to myself that I must buy that coat. I had taken a friendly interest in it for so long, and I did not want another man to have it.

The old Jew took it down, and I examined it. It was not in the least dirty. The velvet was unmarked, and looked almost new, the white silk which lined the sleeves was unsoiled, the buttons in perfect condition. There was even a faint perfume of "White Rose" clinging about it.

"Seven-and-sixpence?" I asked.

"Seven-and-sixpence," he replied, and then he added, "and if it does not vit you, I vill return you six shilling for it."

"It will fit well enough for my purpose," I answered as I paid him.

He pocketed the money.

"Others have said the same," he returned, indifferently, "yet it hangs in my shop."

Smallpox and scarlet fever occurred to me on the way home, so I stopped at a chemist's, and bought some pastels, and I fumigated the coat before I had dinner. After the process I noticed that the scent of "White Rose" was just as distinct as it had been before.

I had an engagement that night; I had promised to go to the theatre with some friends, so I hung up the coat on a nail at the back of my sitting-room door, and left it.

We had a very lively evening, and I came in late. When I threw open the door and walked into my sitting-room, I had the strangest sensation of a rush of cold air on my face—cold, damp air that seemed to have curled itself out of the other air and broken on me, bringing with it a sickening, repulsive smell, which was very distinct, though faint. I shuddered from head to foot, but it all passed away in a moment, and I went through to my bedroom, and slept soundly all night.

The next night I came in early, hurried over my dinner, lit my pipe, put on the coat, got out my law books, and sat down to read. The coat fitted me very well, and was remarkably light and comfortable. And one feels more of a personage in a black velvet coat than in a shabby old college blazer. I was in very good spirits as I sat down, and, with my pipe to keep me company, I looked forward to getting through a very good night's work.

I read steadily for about half an hour, then I found myself unexpectedly distraught and tired. My spirits had vanished, an uneasy depression began to torment me. I found myself neglecting the book, which lay open before me, and staring dejectedly into vacancy, thinking of gloomy things.

It had been a quiet, mild night when I walked home, but now a strong wind seemed to be getting up. I heard a dull, low wail outside, which I took for wind, and which filled me with the restless anxiety of those who live by the sea, when a night storm threatens.

I crossed to the window, and pulling aside the blind, looked out. It was a clear, very still night, with the stars sparkling brilliantly in a luminous, cloudless sky, and the young moon sinking down behind the housetops. There was no movement amongst the trees which grew round about a church, standing a little way up on the opposite side of the road. The branches did not rustle, the tree-tops hardly swayed.

And yet when I let go the blind, and turned away from the window, I heard the moaning sound rise and fall and rise again more clearly than ever.

The windows were loose and ill-fitting; there was an old cowl on the chimney which threatened to fall off; the slightest breeze was wont to set the windows shaking and the cowl jangling harshly, but to-night no sound came from either.

Yet, if not wind, what was that swelling, heavy wail?

I went back to the table, and, leaning my head on my hands, tried to read again. I resolved to give my whole mind to the subject I was studying. I took a pencil, and began making elaborate notes in the note-book beside me.

Digitized by Google

But as it grew later, the noise, with its unceasing rise and fall, grew louder in my ears. It was like the roar of a heavy sea breaking on distant rocks.

And the atmosphere of the room grew foul with the nauseating smell I believed myself to have imagined the night before.

The weight of depression which bore me down grew heavier. I was wretched, unhappy, oppressed — and at last afraid.

And then, ah, how that fear grew on me!

Does any man know what it is to be held and conquered by fear, and not know what he fears? To have his own reason assuring him that there is nothing to fear, and yet to know that craven, miserable terror is making him crouch and shudder, is overpowering his will and his senses, turning his blood to ice, making his flesh shrink and his hair rise, setting his teeth chattering, and stiffening his every limb?

All this I knew, and more!

I cringed before that awful, mastering fear. I dreaded each moment with a ghastly terror no words can express.

Terror of this unbidden, uncaused fear assailed me —horror at the madness it must be or bring. Far, far away sank every memory of previous days or years—all my life was merged in this moment. There was no yesterday, no to-morrow, no memory, no hope. Fear followed on fear, possessing me, and increasing, while I lost my youth in its cruel hold, and grew old—old, like a man who is tired with long suffering.

IT WAS NOT IN THE LEAST DIRTY.

I was mad now, I said to myself—mad, who had been before the sanest and healthiest of men.

The sea roar had grown louder; I could hear distinctly a noise like that of waves rushing into narrow creeks and gulleys, and falling back again. And the foul, sickening smell which I seemed to recognise, yet could not name, grew stronger and stronger.

And all this time no faintness came to relieve me, no unconsciousness to stop my agony. Every nerve in my body was alive to suffer, my brain clear and strong to realise this hideous, horrible fear.

And then suddenly—did I try to get my arms out of that coat, and did cold, strong hands prevent my movement? I have brought back no memory of that moment which was, perhaps, the most terrible of all that night. I felt that I fell — the rush of air that I seemed to cleave sounded in my ears: yet with no shock of concussion my fall came to an end. I found myself still sitting, though no longer in my own room.

Light seemed to come and go before me—light in such brilliant flashes that I was blinded by it—and then darkness.

But after a prolonged period of absolute darkness, I became conscious that it was lifting—that a pale, faint twilight was taking its place. The fear had not left me, but still held me trembling and shrinking, as I tried to peer into the darkness of my surroundings.

Close to me a window had begun to loom out of the darkness—a white,

Digitized by Google

luminous window, with small panes and heavy framework, and gradually from that window the light strengthened, and suffused the room I found I was in.

Gloom still hung heavily in the corners and about the roof, but looking round with terrified, eager eyes I saw that the walls were hidden with high bookcases, filled with large, strangely bound books, with quaint signs and letters on their bindings. Some of them lay on the floor, and gaps in the even rows above marked their places. The few chairs and a great writing-table were of massive carved oak. From a nail on a closed door hung an ill-shapen skeleton, with abnormally large skull. I could see the white bones gleaming in the faint light.

Then suddenly, as if my eyes were forced to cease their wanderings and fix themselves where they were bidden, I became conscious that I was not alone in this dark room. A solitary, tall man's figure stood erect in the centre of the uncarpeted floor. Round his feet, on the bare, unpolished boards a heavy shadow lay, forming a complete circle. I cannot say what threw it there, but when he moved it moved with him.

Fascinated, as some small field-mouse may be when a bird of prey hovers above, I felt all my being centred in this tall figure. My eyes once resting on it had perforce to stay there. My life-force seemed to be drawn out of me by some subtle power emanating from it.

The face had been turned from me, but now he moved, and looked towards me.

Shall I ever forget the features I saw, ever lose the haunting power of the eyes I looked into? It is before me yet—will be before me, I believe, when I die—the ghastly, livid hue of the skin, cast in innumerable, infinitesimal wrinkles, covering cheek-bones so fleshless that verily it seemed a skull and not a face I saw; the lank, black hair that fell damply upon the high, bleached, lined forehead, the scant, harsh moustache, which straggled about the drawn, blue, bloodless lips, and the horrible, lashless, dark eyes, that looked into mine with a red gleam in their repulsive orbs.

I believe, if craven fear had not so strongly held me, I should have pitied the awful thing before me, man or spirit or apparition, whichever it might be. For the look in those eyes told alike of hatred and despair, of melancholy and wrath, of deep anguish and venomous revenge.

He moved—the black shadowed circle that lay about his feet moved with him. Though the eyes had looked into mine, I felt that he did not see me—that, indeed, I had no part in the drama enacted before me. I was but an unwilling witness of a reflection and an echo of the past. He knelt on the floor, and opened one of the great books that lay there; it seemed to be a manuscript book, the characters in it were small and black, and intermingled with large, cabalistic signs.

The uncertain light that filled the room was strong enough to plainly reveal that emaciated figure resting on one knee, with the book supported on the other, and behind him the misshapen, large-skulled skeleton against the dark, carved door.

A long time seemed to elapse before he let the book fall again, and raised his black, sunken eyes, with the red gleam shining in them more fierily than ever, to look at me—no, through me—with a mad, revengeful exultation.

One quick movement—I could not follow it—and suddenly the room was filled with the red glare of quickly-mounting flames, coming from a deep recess I had not noticed before.

He threw up his arms with an awful cry. Heaven and earth! how it rang through the room and echoed in the rafters, sending thrills of horror through my shrinking body!

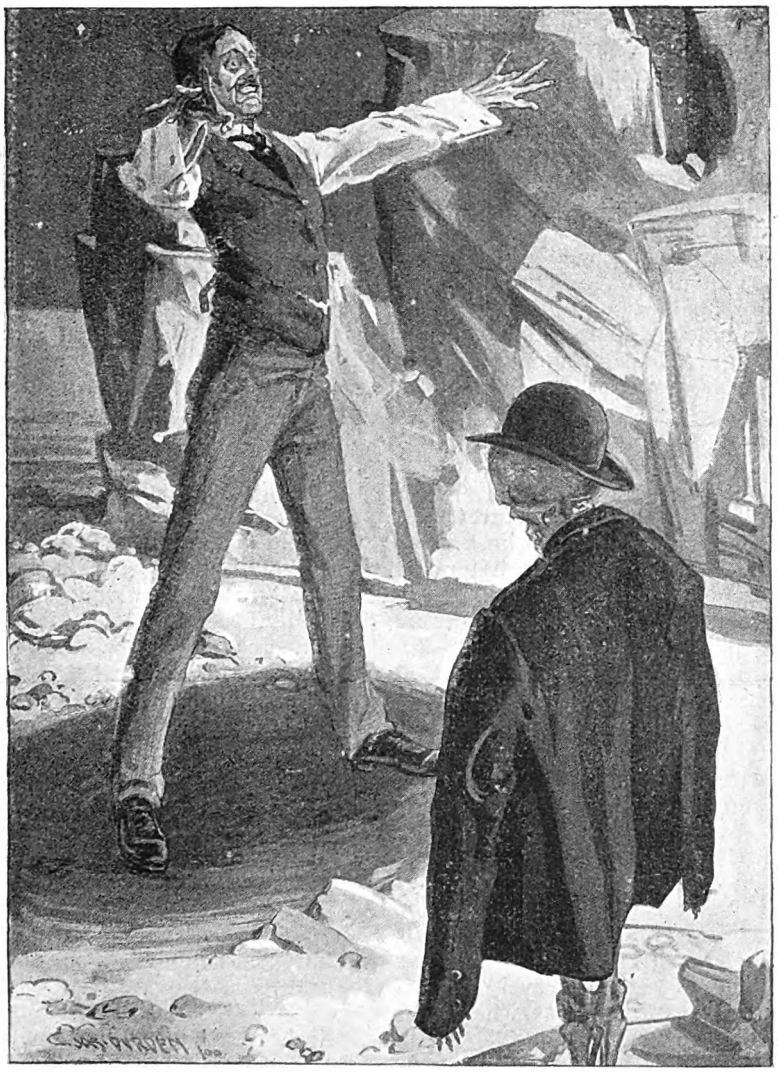
I watched him still. I longed to shut my eyes, to shut out the sight of his dread face and form, but watch him I had to, whether I would or no.

He gathered up the books that lay on the ground, and tossed them towards the recess, where the red flames blazed fiercely. He took the skeleton off the nail from which it was suspended, opened the door, and went out.

Of the next moment I have no memory. Perhaps I walked out after him, perhaps the scene faded and changed before my eyes, perhaps he drew me unconsciously where he had gone. We were no longer in the darkened room, but out in the open air, with a moonlit sky above us, and the rocky, grass-grown ground of a high sea-cliff beneath our feet.

The grey, angry sea rolled in below us, breaking with hoarse roar among the jagged, fantastic, water-worn rocks, and retreating with low-voiced gurgle. There was no wind. The waves came from the huge, steady swell that follows a wild storm.

Digitized by Google



STRETCHING OUT HIS WASTED HANDS THE MAN BEGAN A TERRIBLE INCANTATION.

I do not remember looking about me, yet I know that I faced a wild stretch of sea-washed, rocky cliffs, that the open sea was to my left, and that just behind me the waves rushed into a long, narrow creek up to a small, stony, sloping beach, and that, about a hundred yards away, a high house stood alone, its turrets and gables looming black and weird against the clear, moonlit sky.

And up from the rocks and beach came the sickening smell of hundreds of jelly-fish, broken and thrown up by the recent storm, rotting where they lay.

How it permeates the memory of that night—the loathsome, charnel-house smell of decaying sea-produce.

Close to where I crouched the man stood, facing the deformed skeleton, which had been fixed up, how, I cannot tell, but it stood like a horrible caricature of Death, dangling its long arms, with the empty eye-sockets glowering into the distance.

The man took off his coat, lifted a hat he had evidently thrown down near him, and, approaching the skeleton, he placed the hat upon the great skull, and drew the long arms into the sleeves of the coat, buttoning it so that it hung loose upon those gleaming bones.

Digitized by Google

The coat was of black velvet!

The moonlight fell on the strange scene —that gruesome, grinning remnant of man, clad in velvet coat and round bowler hat, for all the world like some foolish student's trick, in that wild place where the hills rose round about and the sounding sea beat down below.

And more hideous, more hideous far did the other figure look—remnant of man that was he seemed to be no less than the skeleton.

And they two stood facing each other, the heavy circled shadow still lying about the tall man's feet.

Then raising his head, and stretching out his wasted hands, the man, in a voice to make angels tremble, began a terrible incantation—

"I am John Ardeshir—thou—thou art every man that inhabits this earth——"

The name, as he spoke it, seemed to awaken some faint, unrecognisable memory in my mind.

His awful voice went on. I heard its cruel tones rise and fall above the incessant roar and splash of the waves, but the words he spoke I could not follow, so quickly did he hurl them out, so madly drown them in the growl of malignant wrath. I knew that every syllable he uttered was a devilish, venomous curse, and that the grotesque parody of man was fixed up there to represent every fellow-creature upon earth, against whom this vile imprecation was directed.

It was not always English that he spoke—every language that I could recognise came into that wicked flow of words, and many, many strange tongues I had never before heard, as if—and truly I believe this was the case—he had called upon all languages under the sun to yield him every ill-wishing word they held, and lend them to envenom his horrible curse.

Can any words describe the nightmare horror of what followed? Can a man's soul be bandied about, be tossed from place to place, from habitation to habitation by the strength of another man's words, like a feather on the breeze? At one moment I crouched, a trembling, terrified, shaken spectator—in the next I seemed to inhabit that air-riddled, grotesque skeleton, and every cruel, venom-laden word from that demoniac figure before me sent indescribable tortures into my wretched being. And then, again, it was I who stood with a mania of long-pent hatred and malevolence burning within me, striking my very life into an intoxicating revenge.

And back and fore, from the subjugation of fear to the nethermost depths of torment, and the insanity of hatred, my personality seemed tossed to and fro, with never a pause or a moment's relief—till at last it ended.

The shadow upon the ground on which the man who called himself John Ardeshir stood had shrunken and grown paler as those volleyed execrations rang out into the night, had faded till it could hardly be discerned, and now, like a flame, it flickered and went out.

And with the last pale flicker on the dusky grass, the loud, strident voice ceased, the cruel gleam died out of the black, sunken eyes, the outstretched hands dropped to his side.

Released now, I seemed to kneel at the extreme edge of the cliff, and in one sudden, awful second I saw that tall, dread figure fall heavily backwards into the chasm, dashing from rock to rock in its headlong flight, till, with a sickening splash, it struck the water that was befouled with the putrefying jelly-fish.

Still the moments passed. The very air seemed filled with the poison of that mighty curse. I made one desperate effort to rise—one mad plunge forward——

And I found myself in my room—leaning out of my window through the glass pane I had smashed, the cold wind piercing my white shirt-sleeves, and the coat lying huddled in the furthest corner of the room.

The dawn was beginning to illuminate the east. A passing policeman flashed his lantern up at me. I staggered from the window, and, throwing myself upon the sofa, I sank into a long, blessed unconsciousness.

When I came to myself the full light of day flooded the room—my landlady was standing in the doorway, wondering, no doubt, what had induced me to spend the night on the sofa instead of in bed.

I made my way to my bedroom, and tried to make some sort of a toilet. The face I saw in the glass was drawn and haggard, the eyes bloodshot, with heavy shadows about them. As soon as I had swallowed a hasty breakfast I hurried to the rooms of the only intimate friend I had in London, a young Scotchman, who was assistant to a doctor in the neighbourhood. I believe I neglected even to send a message to my office.

Digitized by Google

Mackay was having breakfast as I strode into his room.

"Alec," I said, abruptly, "who was John Ardeshir?"

"Good heavens, man! what have you been doing to yourself?"

"Oh, never mind me. Did you ever hear of a John Ardeshir?"

"Ardeshir? Don't you mind? The chappie who was let out of prison a year or two back, after serving a life sentence for ridding himself of his wife in a primitive fashion."

"Did he murder his wife?"

"He was run in for doing so, but many people believed him innocent, and I fancy the doubt got him his reprieve. He killed himself after he got out of prison."

"How?"

"Tumbled over a cliff on purpose, after setting a match to the home of his ancestors. Now sit down, man, and tell me the reason of your extraordinary excitement, and still more extraordinary looks."

I took the chair beside Alec's, and stumbled incoherently through the whole story of the coat and the terrible night I had passed.

Alec listened patiently, and, moreover, he did not laugh at me. He was a Scotchman, and Scotchmen know many strange secrets.

"Well," he said, meditatively, when I had finished, "you won't ask me to comment on it, so I'll thank you to bundle on to my bed, and I'll give you a sleeping draught."

I did what he asked me. I was too tired to resist, and was only too thankful to fall peacefully asleep and forget the night that was past.

The day was far advanced when Alec woke me again. The autumn sunset was gleaming through the narrow window, and Alec's landlady was coming in with a tray of tea-things.

"I have made a few discoveries," he said. "I thought I should, for I know a fellow who comes from Ardeshir's part of the world."

"Well?" I enquired, eagerly.

Alec took the big brown teapot in his hands, and began to pour out tea.

"Yes—his wife died mysteriously, and he was accused of her murder, but the people round about firmly believe him innocent, and say that the girl made away with herself—out of fear, the women add, of her rather peculiar husband. Anyway, he was sentenced to penal servitude for life, and was released at the end of the customary twenty years. He came straight back to his castle, and, after living there a few months—during which time the country folk got hold of all sorts of rumours anent black magic and deep-rooted plans of revenge—he killed himself one night by throwing himself over the cliffs, and the castle was burnt down the same night. My man tells me they found him in the water the next morning.

"Your idea of the curse tallies with the people's story of revenge," he added. "We won't gain anything by discussing it, but we'll destroy the coat after tea. I took the liberty of fetching it from your digs."

The day was dying rapidly when we turned to undo the parcel that made me shudder. I am not ashamed to own that it was with fear and trembling I saw Alec build up the fire about that glossy velvet coat till the flames roared half-way up the chimney.

But the flames wrapped and curled round it, just as if it had been any ordinary piece of cloth, and no breath of that strange, living fear touched either of us. Before very long only a mass of thick ashes remained of the coat that had aged men ten years in a single night.

Alec lit his pipe, and left me to dream, as I gazed at the fast-blackening ashes, of the weird, terrible legacy left to mankind, of which I might tell, but find no man to believe.

They would say, as long as John Ardeshir's story was told, that he had drowned himself over the cliffs on a moonlight night. I alone would know that death had come to him in another way, that his spirit had fled before he reached the water—that there was no life in the helpless form that had fallen backwards over the rocks.

Was this heap of ashes the end of John Ardeshir's story?

When the village people came up, and found that awful corpse in the rotting

Digitized by Google

water and those whitened bones on the cliff, did they carry away the skeleton and give it burial, simply and reverently, as they did the worn frame of John Ardeshir? Did the wind catch the hat and blow it into the wide sea to be there lost? Or is there an accursed hat in other second-hand shops, and a skull and bones going from hand to hand among students and doctors? But somehow I think not. The skeleton that stood there to represent mankind, coated and covered like a man, was resting somewhere, and the curse, meant to spread among all that wore human shape, had been lost in the innocent earth—the curse, that had taken the life of the curser, had been a great failure, for the coat, sole bearer of its blighting shadow, lay a mass of ashes in Alec's grate.

GROWING OLD.

A little more grey in the lessening hair
Each day as the years go by;
A little more stooping of the form,
A little more dim the eye.
A little more faltering of the step
As we tread life's pathway o'er,
But a little nearer every day
To the ones who have gone before.

A little more halting of the gait,
And a dullness of the ear;
A growing weariness of the frame
With each swift-passing year.
A fading of hopes, and ambitions, too,
A faltering in life's quest;
But a little nearer every day
To a sweet and peaceful rest.

A little more loneliness in life
As the dear ones pass away;
A bigger claim on the heavenly land
With every passing day.
A little farther from toil and care,
A little less way to roam;
A drawing near to a peaceful voyage
And a happy welcome home.

Digitized by Google

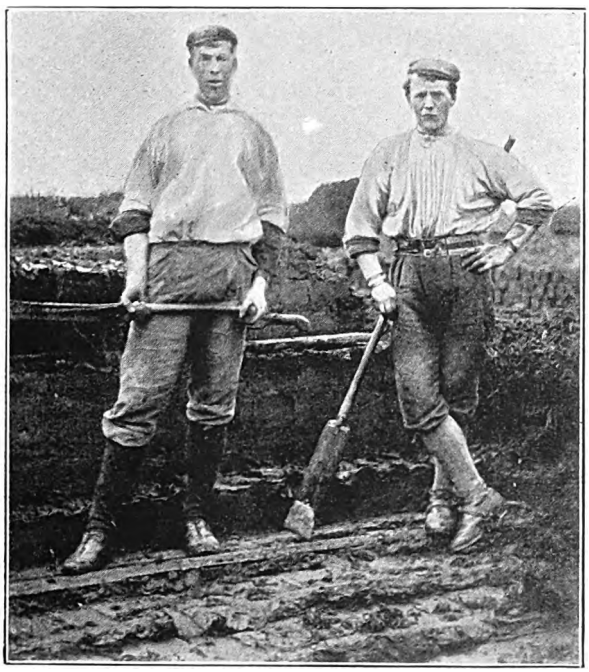
A Dutch Colony in England.

By M. RANDAL ROBERTS.

Photographs by C. Constable, M.A.

A BLEAKER or more unpicturesque region than the great tract of moorland which lies between Doncaster and Goole it would be difficult to imagine. For mile upon mile the flatness of the vast Yorkshire veldt is unrelieved by even a solitary kopje. A stranger finding himself on any of the roads that intersect the moorland might fancy that he had been plumped down into a vast desert. Human beings here seem as rare as hillocks.

It is a region of paradox. Geographically the country is Yorkshire, but in all outward semblance it is the fen land of Lincolnshire. It looks the embodiment of desolate unproductiveness; in reality these moors have given rise to a most profitable and interesting industry. Step off the road and tramp a couple of miles towards the heart of the moor. Soon tall chimneys loom in sight; you will hear the rattle of machinery and the hum of voices, and as the men come swarming out to dinner at the sound of the shrill steam whistle, you can imagine you are transported back to Leeds or Bradford.

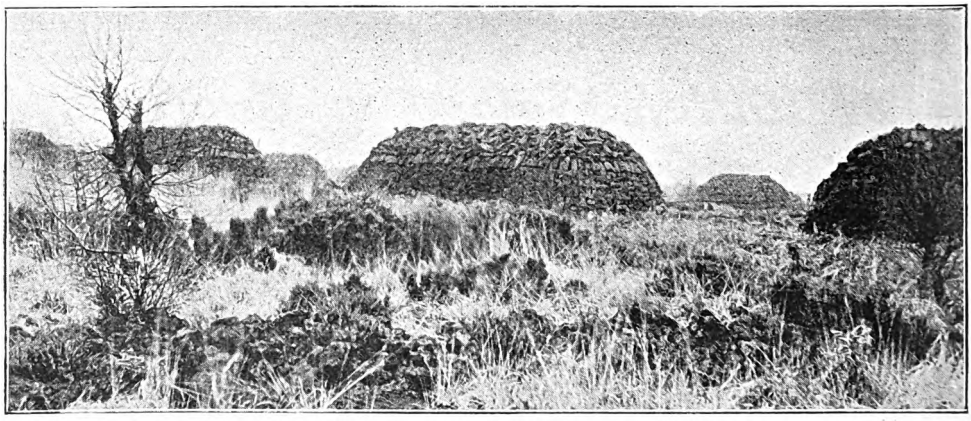


TWO PEAT MOSS CUTTER

The chimneys and machinery belong to the works of the British Moss Litter Company. Some fifteen years ago an enterprising genius discovered that there were great possibilities in the peat which formed a surface of these moors. By the simple process of cutting this peat out of the moor to the depth of about three feet, and subsequently drying and chopping, there was ready to hand one of the most excellent materials for litter for horses and cattle, etc. As a matter of fact, for more than a century this operation had been well known in Holland, and a great part of the litter bedding for cattle in England used to come from the Dutch marshlands, but as a home industry the moss litter trade in this country only dates back fifteen years. The discovery that the peat from the Yorkshire moors could be worked up to litter every bit as cheap and as good as the Dutch commodity proved a profitable one, and some three years ago all the moors in this part of Yorkshire and some in Lancashire were taken over by the "British Moss Litter Company," which now works as peat farms nearly 8,000 acres of moorland.

However, the most picturesque fact about these

Digitized by Google



HOW THE PEAT MOSS IS STACKED.

moors is not the process by which 8,000 acres of apparently waste land are converted into little gold mines, but that this novel industry has led to the formation of a Dutch colony in England. One of the moors belonging to the Company—Moor Ends, as it is called—is a hundred miles from everywhere. Native labour here is naturally scarce, so the Company have imported Dutchmen to work this particular moor. These Dutch workmen form a veritable colony of their own. The nearest village to "Moor Ends" is Thorne, some four and a half miles distant from the Company's works. When the Dutchmen were first imported they were housed among the other villagers at Thorne. But this experiment did not run smoothly. Some of the habits and manners of the Dutchmen were not in accordance with the niceties of the etiquette of the British workman; anyhow they did not form a harmonious blend. In political disputes in the tap room, the Dutchmen, when they found the argument going against them, used to apply the closure of the knife, which led to police intervention. Not that the Dutchmen were altogether to blame; they were mostly peaceable enough, but they could not quite appreciate the highly-seasoned jokes of their English fellow-workmen, and thought their lives were in danger where only rough horse play was intended. Finally the Company put an end to all such collisions by forming a special settlement for the Dutchmen by building houses for them half way between Thorne and the moor. In this settlement, known as "Moss Terrace," the Dutchmen can conduct their households on their own native lines unmolested and unmolesting.

When I paid a visit to the settlement for the purpose of this article, I found that my path bristled with difficulties. Not that the Dutch colonists resented the intrusion into their houses of two strangers, one armed with a note book and the other with a camera. They simply preserved an air of impenetrable stolidity. Englishmen under similar circumstances would probably have ejected us into the street, but in the end I should have got some facts out of them. The Dutchmen did not seem to care a jot whether I came in or went out, as long as they were not compelled to talk to me. Fortunately, the women were more communicative, and most of the facts here related I gathered from the vrows of the taciturn workers in peat moss.

LISTENING TO THE STREET MUSICIAN.

The House Beautiful is

Digitized by Google

apparently unknown among these Dutch women. At any rate in all the houses I visited the only furniture to be seen in any of the rooms was a plain deal table and a few chairs. In two of the houses a card party was going on. Round the deal table the players sat, each with a small black cigar between his lips and a mug of beer at his elbow, absolutely indifferent to the bitter cold (it was in the early part of February and there was no fire in the room) and to the presence of a stranger. Card playing and the consumption of English beer and weird-smelling Dutch cigars seem to be these Dutchmen's solitary idea of amusement. They spend most of their leisure time in one or all of these three recreations. But the stakes must be small and the native cigars cheap, because one of the officials of the Moss Litter Company informed me that the Dutch workman is the thriftiest of individuals and generally manages to save half his wages for his annual trip to Holland. This holiday trip to his native land, by the way, is taken at Christmas and generally lasts for six weeks. One of the Dutch women I interviewed was reading a Dutch newspaper most attentively. I risked wounding her sensibilities and asked her what she thought of the war. My scruples were quite unnecessary. Tante wasn't in the least a pro-Boer, or if she was she concealed the fact wonderfully well. "The English will win," she said, "they always do." Was she sorry for this? Not she. "Why should I like the English to be defeated?" she said; "they give my husband good wages and work all the year. I know the English are good, and I don't know anything about the Boers."

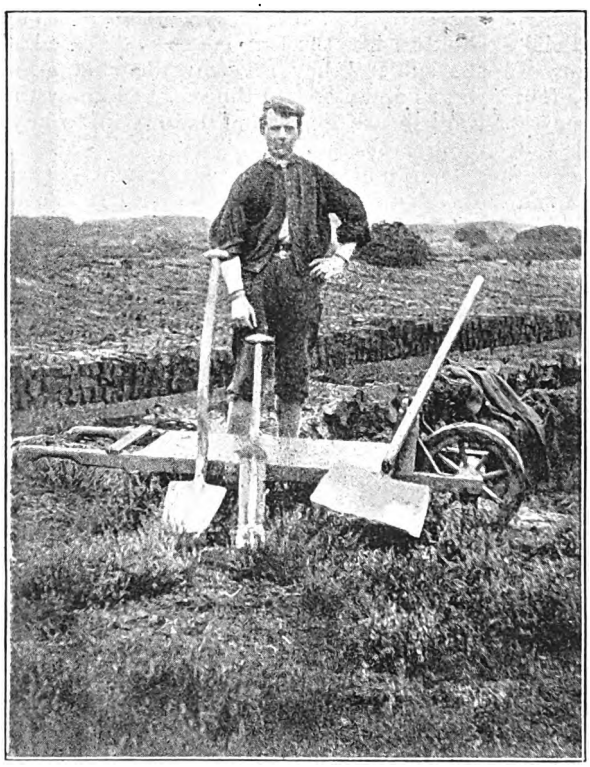
ONE OF THE OLDEST INHABITANTS.

One house in the settlement stood out distinct from all the rest. There was nothing Dutch about it except the name on the signboard which hung over the door. The bottom storey formed a small shop of the general dealer type, a medley assortment of tobacco, soap, sweets, tea and sugar being displayed in the window. The furniture, too, in the house was comparatively comfortable, and it could be seen at a glance that some English influence had been at work there, and I could have told at first sight that, whatever the nationality of the husband, the housewife here was not Dutch.

The Dutch settlement consists partly of a floating population, but many of the immigrants, when once they have found work at Moor Ends settle down here for good, and take unto themselves English wives. This, of course, was the case in the house referred to above, and as far as could be judged from the air of superior comfort and prosperity, this system of inter-marriages answers well.

The children of some of these Dutch fathers and English mothers are most fascinating little mites, with their curious patois, half of their small

Digitized by Google



VIEW OF A PEAT MOSS FIELD WITH CUTTER AND HIS IMPLEMENTS.

vocabulary being Dutch, and the other half English.

The tiny wooden shoes—the regular sabots of the Dutch peasants—and the voluminous saque blouses which most of them wore, produced a quaintly picturesque effect. The shoes looked somewhat weighty affairs, but the discomfort was counterbalanced by the saving in boot leather, from the parents' point of view, anyhow. For all their stodgy appearance, some of these little children are wonderfully agile dancers. One mother, for my special benefit, made her little daughter execute a breakdown in the kitchen. The little thing was really quite a skilful step-dancer, and her baby feet, notwithstanding the heavy clogs, positively twinkled with the rapidity of her motion.

The Dutchmen in the Yorkshire settlement are mostly Roman Catholics. There being no chapel in the district their spiritual wants are attended to by a priest from a neighbouring town who holds mass for them every Sunday in the Town Hall at Thorne. Oddly enough there is a native Dutch pastor in the village not many miles from Thorne, but as none of the settlement are his co-religionists, the care of spiritually administering to them devolves mainly on an English priest. Probably, as time goes on and the Dutch settlers increase and multiply, they will form a congregation large enough to require a place of worship of their own at Moor Ends and a native priest. One of the Dutch women told me that she liked living in England all very well except for one thing, and that was the absence of a school where her children could be taught as they would be in their native country. Still, the system of English education is not altogether a failure, because the son of one of the settlers, who got most of his schooling in Thorne is now a local preacher of some renown.

Quite apart from its Dutch settlement, the British Moss Litter Company is one of the most interesting industries in England. The methods by which this vast track of apparently useless moorland is made to yield a most valuable article of commerce deserves an article to itself, but I must be content here with describing briefly how this work of transformation is accomplished. Anyone who has ever seen turf-cutters at work in Ireland will easily understand the process.

AFTER THE DAY'S WORK.

Digitized by Google

Armed with an implement called a graver, the Dutch workman proceeds to cut out the soil of the moor to the depth of about three feet in bricks some sixteen inches in length. As he cuts them out he throws each of these brick-shaped clods on to a sort of wooden stretcher. When the stretchers are full they are carried off to the drying ground, where the bricks are "stacked" for some months till they are thoroughly dried by the combined influence of the sun and wind. This process of "stacking," by the way, is not nearly as simple as it seems. "Stacked" by an unskilled hand, the bricks would remain for a year a heavy damp mass, as the peat contains an enormous amount of water. The Dutch workmen, however, build up each stack in such a way that there is a perpetual through current of air which helps to dry the whole stack rapidly. After the drying is accomplished, the bricks are removed to the chopping room where they are converted by machinery into the litter bedding with which everyone is familiar. Removing the bricks overland from the drying ground to the chopping room proved so tedious and laborious that a few years ago the Company cut a canal through the moor, and the removal is now affected by canal boats. From an artistic point of view, too, this canal is highly to be commended, as it gives an additional Dutch flavour to the surroundings of the moor.

There seems to be no end to the resources of these prolific moors. The supply of peat moss, even from 8,000 acres, is not inexhaustible, though it is estimated, I believe, that at its present rate the output will last for another fifteen years. At the end of that time, however, the moors will merely blossom into another form of usefulness. The moorland lies so low that it will be perfectly easy to flood it from the river Don. The deposit left after each successive flooding will not only raise the moors to their original level, but will convert them into most fertile land, especially for potatoes. What will be the next scene no one can tell. The adaptability of these moors seems endless.

M. RANDAL ROBERTS.

TO JESUS.

"Si honoras, O dulcis Domine
Inimicum amici nomine,
Quales erunt amoris carmine
Qui te causent et modulamine?"

Hondenius (De Pass).

If Thou, O Saviour sweet
Didst traitorous Judas meet
And hail him Friend,
What shall our greeting be
Our song of love to Thee
When we in harmony
Our voices blend?

Wm. Thos. Adey.

Digitized by Google

In the Time of Her Wealth.

By ELLEN A. SMITH.

A LARGE hotel on a little island; the island such a gem and so tiny that one expected to see it rock gently on the swelling bosom of the clear blue waters which seemed to bear it up. A place of loveliest natural beauty; a cradle to lull all care to sleep and dream it into nothingness; an oasis for the spent and weary; and, if it were not a paradise where death might not enter, a place where one might choose to die.

But to enjoy the peacefulness of this favoured spot it was extremely necessary to get away from the noise and bustle of the big hotel, and the still more distracting scrutiny of fellow boarders, which often seemed to suggest little that was flattering to the object of their curiosity.

There was one man staying in the hotel, however, who seemed popular with all the inmates. Why, it was difficult to say; in a quiet, unobtrusive way he was good looking, but apparently no halo of wealth enhanced these good looks; and when a real lord endured a week at the hotel, James Grantley was the only man in the big dining-room who did not turn a hair as the lord entered to satisfy his noble appetite. He was not much of a lord to look at, being under-sized and of a sporting make. His father had been a highly fortunate brewer, having attracted royal favour by aiding handsomely in royal benevolence; in fact, he had honestly paid for the title that his son now enjoyed, and his memory was duly honoured.

Unlike the rest, Dr. Grantley was singularly little interested in his lordship, but her ladyship was quite another matter, and, although she did not appear until the next day at luncheon, James Grantley scrutinised her even more intently than the rest. But she was quite accustomed to be looked at, for she had been, and still was, an operatic singer; nay, more than that, for she had composed an opera, singing the title-rôle as no other singer had been able to do. She not only acted and sang the part, but she was the part, and as the poetically-conceived heroine of her own opera, "The Legend of a Dream," she had scored a great success. So rarely are composers able to interpret their own work that her genius was recognised far and wide. But even genius is none the less thought of under the mantle of a title, so for that reason she had married Lord Selhurst, whose knowledge of the divine art of music could not soar above comic opera. But he was really very good-natured, though pleasure-loving and indolent. He was very fond of Lilian and very kind to her; but, he was hardly an ideal match for the artistic temperament; and in spite of his title, peopled wondered a little at such a marriage. Dr. James Grantley was one of those who wondered, even at first sight, for he was a keen observer of character; as so many learn to be who feel themselves merely onlookers at the game of life. He had not caught her name then, and did not know what a celebrity he was looking at. But he saw power in her face which no weariness could cover up; and she did look very weary. Her fair face had that languor in in it, which so often indicates that the springs of life and energy are running low. Watching her, Grantley thought she had come to the right place, if only her fussing little lord would leave her in peace. She looked at no one in the room, but out of window, where a seagull, made captive by clipped wings, waited to be fed. Grantley had often pitied this captive, but she seemed to forget everything else as she looked compassionately at it. The watcher concluded that at least half her pity was for herself. Being newly arrived, a titled celebrity and most exquisitely dressed, she was well observed by nearly all in the room, but as her eyes left the dingy spiritless bird, they glanced swiftly upon James Grantley's, so swiftly that he made no pretence of not having watched her, and returned her look steadily. He was a quiet man, but rarely afraid of anything, and this gave people —and especially women—great confidence in him. For a few moments she studied him, wondering if he were some acquaintance to whom she ought to bow, and then a sudden consciousness made her wrest her eyes from his, not from embarrassment, but because she felt that in some manner he had divined more of her hidden self than was expedient. It is bad enough to exhibit to our friends those ailments of the mind which we cannot hide, even if we would, but it is intolerable to have strangers guessing at them, and obviously pitying us. She felt scared at the interpretation of herself, mirrored in this stranger's eyes, and a faint red flickered into her pale face. Her husband was pleased to take note of it.

Digitized by Google

"You are looking better Lil. I am glad after all that we came to this absurd little hole of a place. See that pretty girl over there? By Jove, she is leading those two young men a life, and I cannot tell which is the favoured one."

With an interest, purely vicarious, she directed her attention to the fluffy-haired girl who was evidently enjoying a good time. She was with her father, and thus safeguarded had no scruples about her holiday task of flirtation, if flirtation it was, and not the real thing, for she looked a nice girl, and at least one of her admirers appeared serious enough for even matrimony.

"I know the favoured one," answered Lilian. "She is infinitely less civil to him than to the other one, but I suspect there is a better time in store for him, and the papa looks eminently substantial."

Selhurst nodded, "She's a jolly little girl, and we'll make their acquaintance," he said, good naturedly.

They left the room then, and Grantley went out fishing, to see them no more that day. The next morning various informants had satisfied him that Lady Selhurst and Lilian Carew, the singer and composer, were one and the same person, and his interest in her deepened considerably. He had always thought there would be a day of reckoning between them, but he felt strangely unready for it. To war upon a woman—to wrest the weapons of offence from her hand and strike her with them, seemed alien to his chivalry. Besides, had he not forgiven the woman, by remembering her only as the artist who had so magnificently created the title-rôle of "The Legend of a Dream." Moving about from one foreign station to another, the fame of this opera and its most able exponent had reached him; and he had wondered why an air played on the regimental band was so strangely familiar to him. When he returned to England he wondered still more, and certain castles in the air which he had built hopefully through years fell straightway into ruins about him, and he had never had the heart to rebuild. Some years ago he had heard Lilian Carew sing, and although he had half forgiven her on the spot, the affair remained as great a mystery as before. He could not fathom it and dared breathe no word to anyone, for proof was needed, and he had little or none—and she was a woman, and he was emphatically a gentleman. He thought it strange that he should not instantly have recognised her the day before; but years had elapsed since he had heard her sing, and her stage dress had completely altered her, so that Lady Selhurst's identity with the professional singer was an utter surprise to him. And now the mystery would be explained; he felt so certain of it and was content to bide his time. Where was the hurry now, with his chances reaped by another?

Strolling absently along, full of thought, and beating down all bitterness as it rose, he came suddenly upon her. She was alone and had evidently lost her way, as all fresh comers do; she was studying a map of the island with a wandering attention which proved her indifferent as to lunch, but on recognising him, she asked her direction as though perfectly satisfied to have him for a guide. He inspired this feeling even in strangers, and she was much at her ease with him.

"If you would tell me my way back, please? There are so many ways, and the sea being all round, is worse than useless as a guide." With a gravity hardly suited to the occasion (as she saw it)—he took the map from her, and pointed out certain landmarks.

"The sea is not a safe guide; but notice there is only one windmill on the island, and it stands right in the centre; it is a reliable landmark even when it is standing still."

She regarded the windmill obediently, but evidently the importance of returning in time for the hotel lunch was a matter of supreme unimportance, and she remained seated on her rock. "Do I know you? I half felt yesterday as though I should have bowed."

Digitized by Google

There was such trust in her look, that he felt half ashamed of his almost certain knowledge; but he shook his head with a grave smile; "The moon looks on many brooks: the brooks see but one moon! Fortunately for you, you need not bow to all those who know you."

"You mean that you have heard me sing? What did I sing?"

"You were 'Ursula' in 'The Legend of a Dream.'"

She looked away restlessly out to sea. "I have sung in so many other operas, but it is 'Ursula' that people always mention; I suppose I am a failure in all the other rôles, for it is always 'Ursula.'"

And then he knew quite well that even the enchanted isle could give her no peace until she had laid her burden down. He saw how unrest had well-nigh outworn her beauty, and he was sorry for her. He was sorry for himself, seeing her evident trust in him.

She rose unwillingly as he offered to show her the way back to the hotel, and the silence that reigned between them might easily have been the pleasant familiar silence which falls between those who understand each other well.

That evening, after dinner, an impromptu musical entertainment was enjoyed by the hotel guests. Miss Sibley, the bright young lady who had attracted the favorable notice of Lord Selhurst, was a good pianist, and her youthful good spirits and pretty face made her a general favourite. Lord Selhurst, in his genial way, found her good company, and willingly joined the group of smokers, who were clustered round the music-room window. He and Grantley had joined the same bathing party in the morning, and had already exchanged civilities; so he was quite content to see him looking after Lilian, as the two sat out on the lawn listening to the music. As far as he went he was an excellent husband, and could not have enjoyed himself after his own fashion without first seeing her comfort well provided for. In common with the rest, he saw Grantley was of a trustworthy sort. Mr. Sibley, as responsible caretaker of a very charming daughter, remained on duty until lured away to a certain cosy corner, where whist awaited him.

"He has left his lamb among the wolves," said Lady Selhurst, on seeing how Mr. Sibley had succumbed to temptation, "but they seem harmless sort of wolves."

Grantley laughed. "I saw the beginning of the comedy, and I fancy one wolf—the blue-eyed wolf—has an excellent chance of annexing that particular lamb. She is a most fresh and unspoilt little girl, and I take it he's in luck."

Little by little the beautiful, many-coloured lights of sunset slipped out of the sky, and, set clear in space, large

DR. GRANTLEY SCRUTINISED HER LADYSHIP INTENTLY WHEN SHE APPEARED NEXT DAY AT LUNCHEON.

Digitized by Google

bright stars sparkled and shone. But for the noises of laughter and singing they might have heard the dew fall; even the sea, in gently murmuring of rest, had fallen asleep.

The silent woman by Grantley's side did not speak; her white gown looked wraith-like under the stars, and Grantley thought he knew at least a little of what was passing in her mind. But how strange that they two, of all people, should be drawn together into the silence of friends! And yet, perhaps, not so strange, for she had caught the very echo of his soul and given it magnificently to the world. Presently from the lighted window came two figures, invading their dual solitude. They were Selhurst and the fluffy-haired Miss Sibley, and they seemed on excellent terms.

"Lilian, Miss Sibley wants you to sing to the people; will you?"

"Oh do, Lady Selhurst, it you don't mind. It would be such a treat," the frank young voice rang pleadingly out, not realising how even primâ donnas object to wasting their sweetness in unremunerative toil; but Lady Selhurst seemed to require no pressing, only rising as though she would rather have remained where she was. Seeing that she was willing to sing, everyone followed her into the music-room, and she turned very kindly to the radiant Miss Sibley: "What would you like me to sing?"

"If you only would! Ursula's farewell from 'The Legend of a Dream.'"

"I cannot sing that!" answered the singer with sudden, painful sharpness; "is there nothing that will please you but that most dismal and unhappy thing? Let me sing you a little Hungarian love-song—one that ends happily."

With her enthusiasm a little checked by the manner of the other, Miss Sibley accepted the amended programme; and the onlookers reckoned Lilian up as being, for all her gentle looks, no less imperious and self-willed than other singers equally successful. With the power that belongs only to the artist, she threw herself heart and soul into her song, and they forgot immediately that they had ever wished to hear anything but just the song she was singing, with apparently all her heart in every impassioned note; and without doubt this was so for the time being. The gracious gift of song is as wings to the captive, letting him escape far enough to at least view the promised land, outside which his best longings remain for ever unfulfilled. She was artist enough to forget herself and her audience, and she sang to them so beautifully of Love that the wings of that fleeting angel seemed to beat the air throbbingly as it passed.

They found her very good-natured, for she was willing to sing to them every evening; but no selection from her own work, "The Legend of a Dream," was ever rendered by her, to the general disappointment; she seemed utterly to ignore it, and they accused her of the pride that apes humility. But one evening they got what they wanted, and this through no option of hers. It had come on to rain during dinner, so the inmates of the hotel were thrown entirely on their own resources for amusement. They tried music, dumb crambo, thought reading and various other assuagements of a wet evening. They tired of these things in turn however, and then someone laughingly suggested that Grantley should try his hand at hypnotic suggestion. To amuse them, he had done it once or twice before more or less successfully, and nothing pleases a holiday crowd better than something mysterious and exciting. It was useless that Grantley protested, saying he was not in the mood, and in all probability could influence no one in the room sufficiently to make them even pick up a pin at his bidding. His good-humoured refusals merely heightened their persistence, and to avoid being a wet blanket he allowed himself to be persuaded. His first victim proved very amenable, and the blue-eyed wolf gravely presented a Spanish onion to the lady of his affections under the hallucination that it was a rose. Shouts of delighted applause startled the young man back into himself, and he looked half scared.

"How the dickens did you manage that, Grantley?"

"It was quite easy, because in your case you made no resistance to my suggestion. For the amusement of the company you yielded your will to mine; otherwise I couldn't have done it."

Grantley spoke in good faith, and the young man looked relieved; but no one volunteered immediately for further trial.

"It seems to me you're no quite canny," remarked a grave Scotchman, as he eyed the doctor not without suspicion.

Digitized by Google

"Surely that is a dangerous gift for ony mon to have?"

Grantley shook his head reassuringly. "Not in my case, whatever it may be in the hands of others. I never remember being able to make an unwilling victim succumb; indeed, I have never used the gift or knack or whatever you choose to call it, except as a pastime; to do so would not be justifiable."

"It's wonderful, by Jove," cried Selhurst, quite eagerly. "Have you ever tried to hypnotise a woman?"

"Never. Not even to the extent of picking up a pin; a thing they will so rarely do."

"I wish you would try your skill on one now," persisted his lordship, who had dined sufficiently well to make him extremely desirous of having his own way. "Miss Sibley won't mind, I know; she is much too kind."

But it appeared that Miss Sibley did mind, even if Grantley had been willing, which he certainly was not. Probably the affair would have died a natural death but for Selhurst, who being a lord was not accustomed to being disappointed of his whim. He crossed over to his wife, who was nearly always merely the quiet onlooker. "Come, Lilian, you won't mind, I know, and I am curious to see if feminine wits are not more than a match for this modern magic."

Strangely enough at the suggestion Grantley felt his scruples vanishing. It was as though fate were helping him, and he meant her no harm, quite the contrary; he wanted to forgive her, but to receive forgiveness she must open her heart to him first, and this seemed a step on the way. He waited to hear her protest, which was smilingly in the negative, although her faith in the power of hypnotism was little or none. Even the Spanish onion had failed to banish her scepticism. Seeing at last that her husband was inclined to make a fuss over a trifle she yielded, and sceptical though she might be, both she and Grantley knew that she would have permitted no other in the room to make such an experiment with her. So well, indeed, had he studied her during the few days' companionship, that he warned her frankly about the probable success of his attempt. "In this instance, of course, I may be wrong, Lady Selhurst, but I have noticed that the artistic temperament is the one most easily influenced by hypnotic suggestions."

He felt almost certain of success, and when he saw her smile of unbelief he almost wondered at it. Drawing Lord Selhurst a little on one side he whispered a few words, and the listener nodded, well satisfied; then Grantley approached the faintly smiling sceptical woman, "Now, Lady Selhurst, if the worst come to the worst, Lord Selhurst approves of what I shall ask you to do."

"Nothing very dreadful, Lilian, I assure you," smiled his lordship, "but I don't suppose for a moment that you will do it."

Without using his hands at all Grantley held her eyes steadily with his own until her look of smiling indifference changed suddenly to a dismayed recognition of some unknown power. Intent upon her as he was, he saw her will leap into her eyes to combat his, which was so set upon subduing it. He felt that she was resisting him to the utmost of her powers, and for some moments he did not know which would prevail. Then he saw her eyes flicker suddenly, as though dazzled by a strong light, and she half put up her hand as though to shield them, dropping it again obediently at his unspoken command. She strove faintly a little longer, and then Grantley spoke to her: "Lady Selhurst, we have often asked you to sing 'Ursula's Farewell.' Will you sing it for us now?"

Amid dead silence she rose at his bidding and went to the piano, but Grantley himself sat down to play the well-known accompaniment, and at the right time she began to sing, softly, sweetly, with all the mournful tenderness of a last parting. It was a beautiful thing, and she rendered it beautifully, and robbed by her state of every atom of self-consciousness, she might have been some sad spirit telling her grief upon some strange and lonely shore. The effect was weird, and the frivolous party was awed and silenced by it. After the last note had fallen softly like a sigh, the singer moved mechanically back to her seat again, and Grantley followed her, and stood waiting until she looked slowly about her as though waking from sleep. As she did so there was a general murmur of relief. Grantley spoke to her first, in cheerful everyday tones: "Thank you, Lady Selhurst, you have given us a treat. I hope you feel none the worst for it?"

Digitized by Google

But she was a little dazed and bewildered: "You have failed then; or did I——? What has happened?"

He returned her perplexed look with a very kindly one. "Nothing happened, except that you sang to us very beautifully; don't you remember?"

"Don't you remember, Lilian?" echoed Selhurst, looking almost as bewildered as his wife. "I wouldn't have believed it!"

"I remember nothing," answered Lilian. "What was it that I sang?" She turned enquiringly to Miss Sibley, who had often accompanied her.

"You sang 'Ursula's Farewell,' but Dr. Grantley played the ending quite differently, and you never hesitated over one note! It was simply wonderful!"

"Merely hypnotic suggestion," remarked Grantley, lightly, "and now I propose the assembly break up. The heat has been trying and the ladies look tired."

He was right, for on one woman at least a great paleness had fallen.

The next morning Selhurst and the doctor went together to bathe, and the former, full of that confidence in him which Grantley nearly always inspired in others, unbosomed himself freely about the nervous indisposition of his wife, which had brought them to such a quiet place. "You see, of course, that she is out of sorts, doctor?"

Grantley assented, glad to see that the little lord was genuinely concerned and anxious. He answered reassuringly.

"Speaking merely from observation, I see nothing really wrong. How long has she seemed not quite herself?"

"About a couple of months ago, as nearly as I can recollect. She had been singing in that thing of hers, which everybody raves about. I daresay you recollect the name; anyhow, you made her sing a bit of it last night. Well, ever since then she has been nervous and depressed, and why the dickens she should be I can't say. One would think that of all women she had nothing to worry about."

"They are often the ones who worry most; but Lady Selhurst has abundant occupation in her profession—and you say her depression came on suddenly?"

"Yes; and although it seems ridiculous to say such a thing about such a talented woman as my wife, I believe she dreamt that her life would come suddenly to an end some time during this month. It has occurred to me, after seeing what you did last night, how easily you might suggest to her that she never dreamt such a silly thing. Can't you make her forget all about it? I paid a professional man five guineas for an opinion, not worth twopence from a practical point of view; but I'd willingly pay any amount to have my wife her old self again."

The offer was not too delicately made, for under his title there was only the plain man of business, but Grantley liked him far better so than as the somewhat indolent, self-indulgent lord. He liked the man's honest concern for his wife's welfare; but he knew that something far heavier than the shadow of any dream weighed down the spirit of the woman, making life a weariness to her. He knew, moreover, that strange chance had made Selhurst apply to the only one who could touch Lilian's malady with the finger of healing—he, the one wronged and cheated of his best by an unscrupulous woman, and yet he had no anger for her, quite the contrary.

"I cannot take any money from you, Lord Selhurst, that is impossible, but having received your permission I will try to find out more definitely what is troubling Lady Selhurst, and remove the cause, if possible."

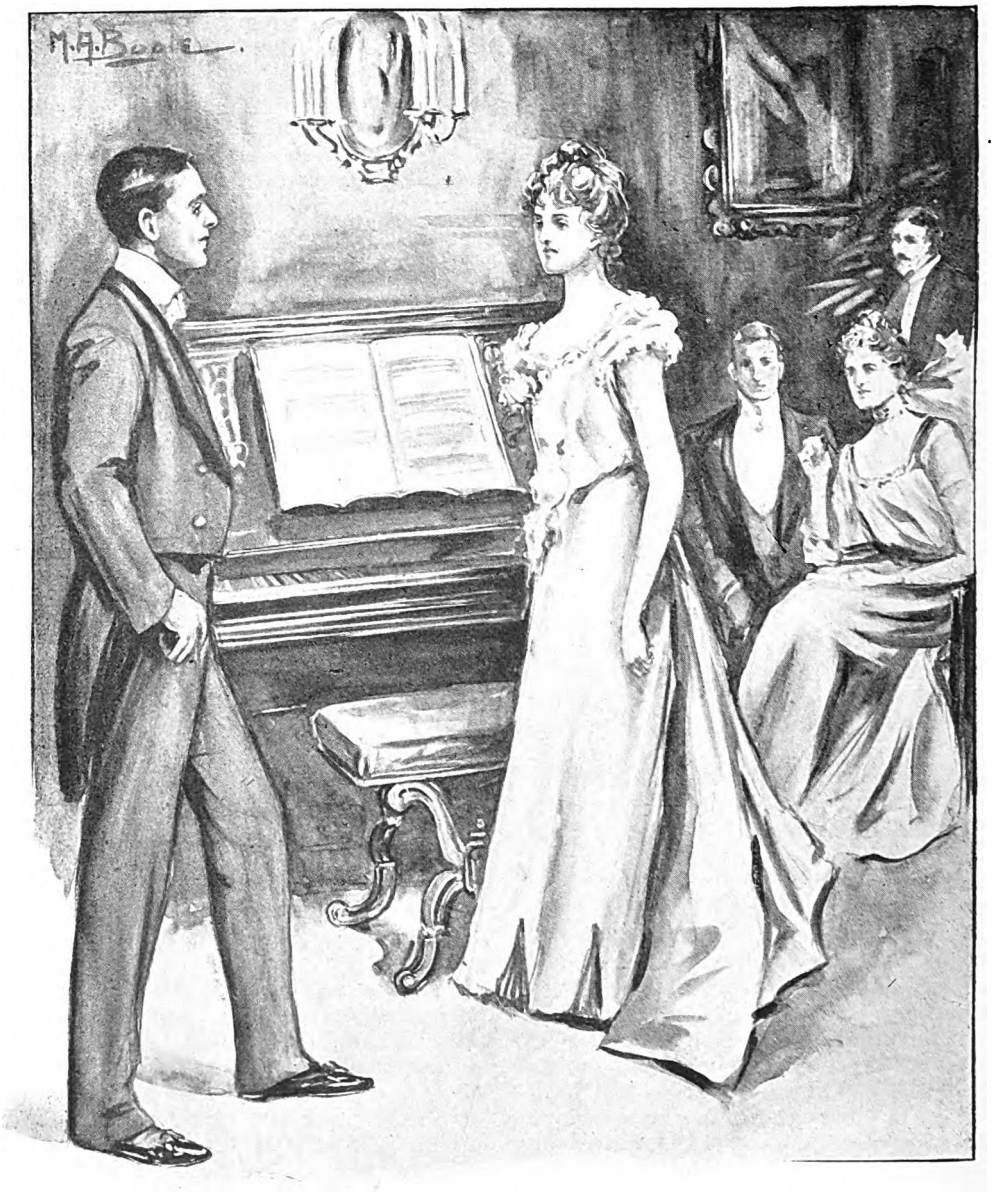
Selhurst did not quite understand the refusal of his money, but he was willing to accept the proffered kindness, and said so frankly.

"Of course, Grantley, I understand that these cures and suggestions are rather ticklish things to meddle with; but you're a gentleman and a thorough good sort. I trust you."

"Yes," answered Grantley, quietly, "I do happen to be a gentleman. Moreover, my hypnotic suggestions begin and end in the drawing-room. The cure, if any, shall be plain sailing, I promise you."

Rather mystified, but still full of confidence in this new physician, Selhurst set off shortly after breakfast for the main land, where some races would take place in the afternoon. But, although the coast was clear, Grantley had no chance of speaking to his new patient through the day. It was plain that Lilian avoided him, nor was he surprised; but it was extremely necessary that he should speak to her, so as soon as dinner was disposed of Grantley left his own table and approached hers.

Digitized by Google



SHE ROSE AT HIS BIDDING AND WENT TO THE PIANO.

"Lady Selhurst, there is going to be a wonderful sunset. Will you come out and see it?"

She looked very white and troubled, and was plainly more than half afraid of him; but she did not refuse. He fetched a wrap for her, and wordlessly they walked towards the west, where the sun was sinking gloriously, the sky blazed with colours, which were faintly mirrored by the calm summer sea. Gently and caressingly the evening tide crept in upon the shore, and a pale, transparent new moon was waiting for the sun to go down. Some reapers, late at work, were reaping in yellow patches of corn, using their primitive sickles, and the great, ponderous sails of the windmill stood sharply outlined against the opal sky. Here and there amongst the reaped corn gleamed poppies, but the fading light had stolen their brilliant colour, and all the earth grew faint before the glory of the sky. It was rarely Grantley's way to hesitate over the thing that had to be done; but he was silent awhile after finding her a resting-place, where the changing beauties of sea and sky could best be seen.

Digitized by Google

It was she who spoke first. "You have brought me here in order to say something to me. What is it?"

"I will tell you. Lord Selhurst is anxious about your state of nervous depression; he thinks that some imaginary fear is troubling you and wants me to 'suggest' to you that this fear has no existence."

"And would you do this—if you could?"

She was so far mistress of herself that she was perfectly quiet, but suspense had quickened her breathing and roughened the softness of her voice.

"I would not in the way your husband wishes. Who would dare to juggle with jewels of priceless worth? Not I, assuredly; but there are other and more honest ways of quieting a troubled mind, but to enable me to do this I need your confidence."

"It is kind of you," she cried bitterly, "to seem to make terms with one who is already at your mercy. Why stand on so much ceremony?"

"I know more than the world does of what is troubling you; but I know very little even now. The thing is still a mystery to me, and I want you to tell me the whole story."

"You talk of honest ways! Was your way 'honest' last night; even to unmask a cheat?"

"You shall ask me that a little later. Meanwhile, confide in me."

Her impotent anger fell back, ashamed before his gentleness, and she began her story almost like one glad to lay a burden down.

"You know so much that it is well you should know the whole. As a young girl I was talented, good-looking, ambitious, as only ignorant youth can be, and extremely poor. My talent, which was real enough, struggled hopelessly with my poverty, and got worsted. I studied as long as I could, living from hand to mouth to do it; and then my father, who had helped me to the best of his limited ability, fell ill, and into debt. The man to whom he owed most was a rich tradesman, and it was proposed that I should render my services as governess to his family, and so gradually work off the debt. I was quite willing, thinking that in so wealthy a situation I should find ample opportunity for pursuing my studies, for I was very industrious. But in this hope I reckoned entirely without my employers. Do you know the sort of people, where the governess is less thought of than the cook; where her position of dependence is thrust upon her a dozen times a day, and she is made the victim of small indignities from morning to night? Although I lived in the house, I rarely knew as much as the names of the visitors who came and went, and, if by accident I encountered them, I was never introduced. All my scanty moments' leisure were spent in hating those people with all my heart and soul, for I was shy and sensitive, and every stroke of their contempt drew blood. Moreover, as regards myself, I was wasting precious time, for I was only permitted to teach music, not to study it. My talent was wasting, and the pain of this knowledge stung me by day and by night. Knowing myself in a measure chained to the oar, I made no complaint, even to my father, but secret brooding and sleepless nights brought me to desperation, and I was quite ready to be tempted and fall. Then a distant relative of my employer's came to stay in the house. He was young and musical, intensely musical with a gift of expression which was recognised only by me, for in that house music was a dead letter and had no meaning. Without knowing even his name, I heard him composing, and knew I was listening to a masterpiece. The household in general thought the visitor was merely amusing himself by strumming aimlessly upon the piano. But I knew better, and at night I would creep down and examine his written scores, for he was untidy and would leave them about. I was often tempted to go to him boldly and make myself known as a fellow artist who could understand the beauty and value of his work. But I never did, for he was a relative, although a distant one. The children liked him too, and I was always afraid of those they liked, for they were such horrid children."

"They were," agreed Grantley emphatically, "wretched selfish little beasts."

Digitized by Google

Her remorse turned suddenly heart-broken, as his words let in the truth upon her. "Was it you? Oh God! the one I would least have injured!"

"Never mind; tell me the rest. I was called suddenly away, leaving my work unfinished; it was you who completed, and gave it to the world. How could you remember it so well?"

"I had followed it note by note, and copied it down; doing it at first purely for love of the thing, and with no dishonest idea. To this day it is difficult for me to remember that my brain did not give it birth, and surely I finished it with more power than even you could have done?"

"I grant it, and yet because you took the first fruits of my labour of love from me, I thought bitter things of you. Like you I had my ambitious dreams, in which a purely medical career had no part, not that I am unsatisfied with a less brilliant one; it has, probably, been quite as useful. And now having told me this, you will feel less sorry. That is what I wanted."

"Not less sorry, but more so if it were possible. The full knowledge of what I had done came suddenly to me as I was singing 'Ursula' for the last time—of course I shall never sing it again—and suddenly my soul felt naked and ashamed before the people; they seemed to be grinning and mocking at my humiliation, and I did not know which way to turn. I saw then that the art I so loved had been my bitterest enemy, and it could console me no longer. I am very sorry for my husband, but of course I ought never to have married him."

